START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

June 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE
NUMBER:
BSO-56-041

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

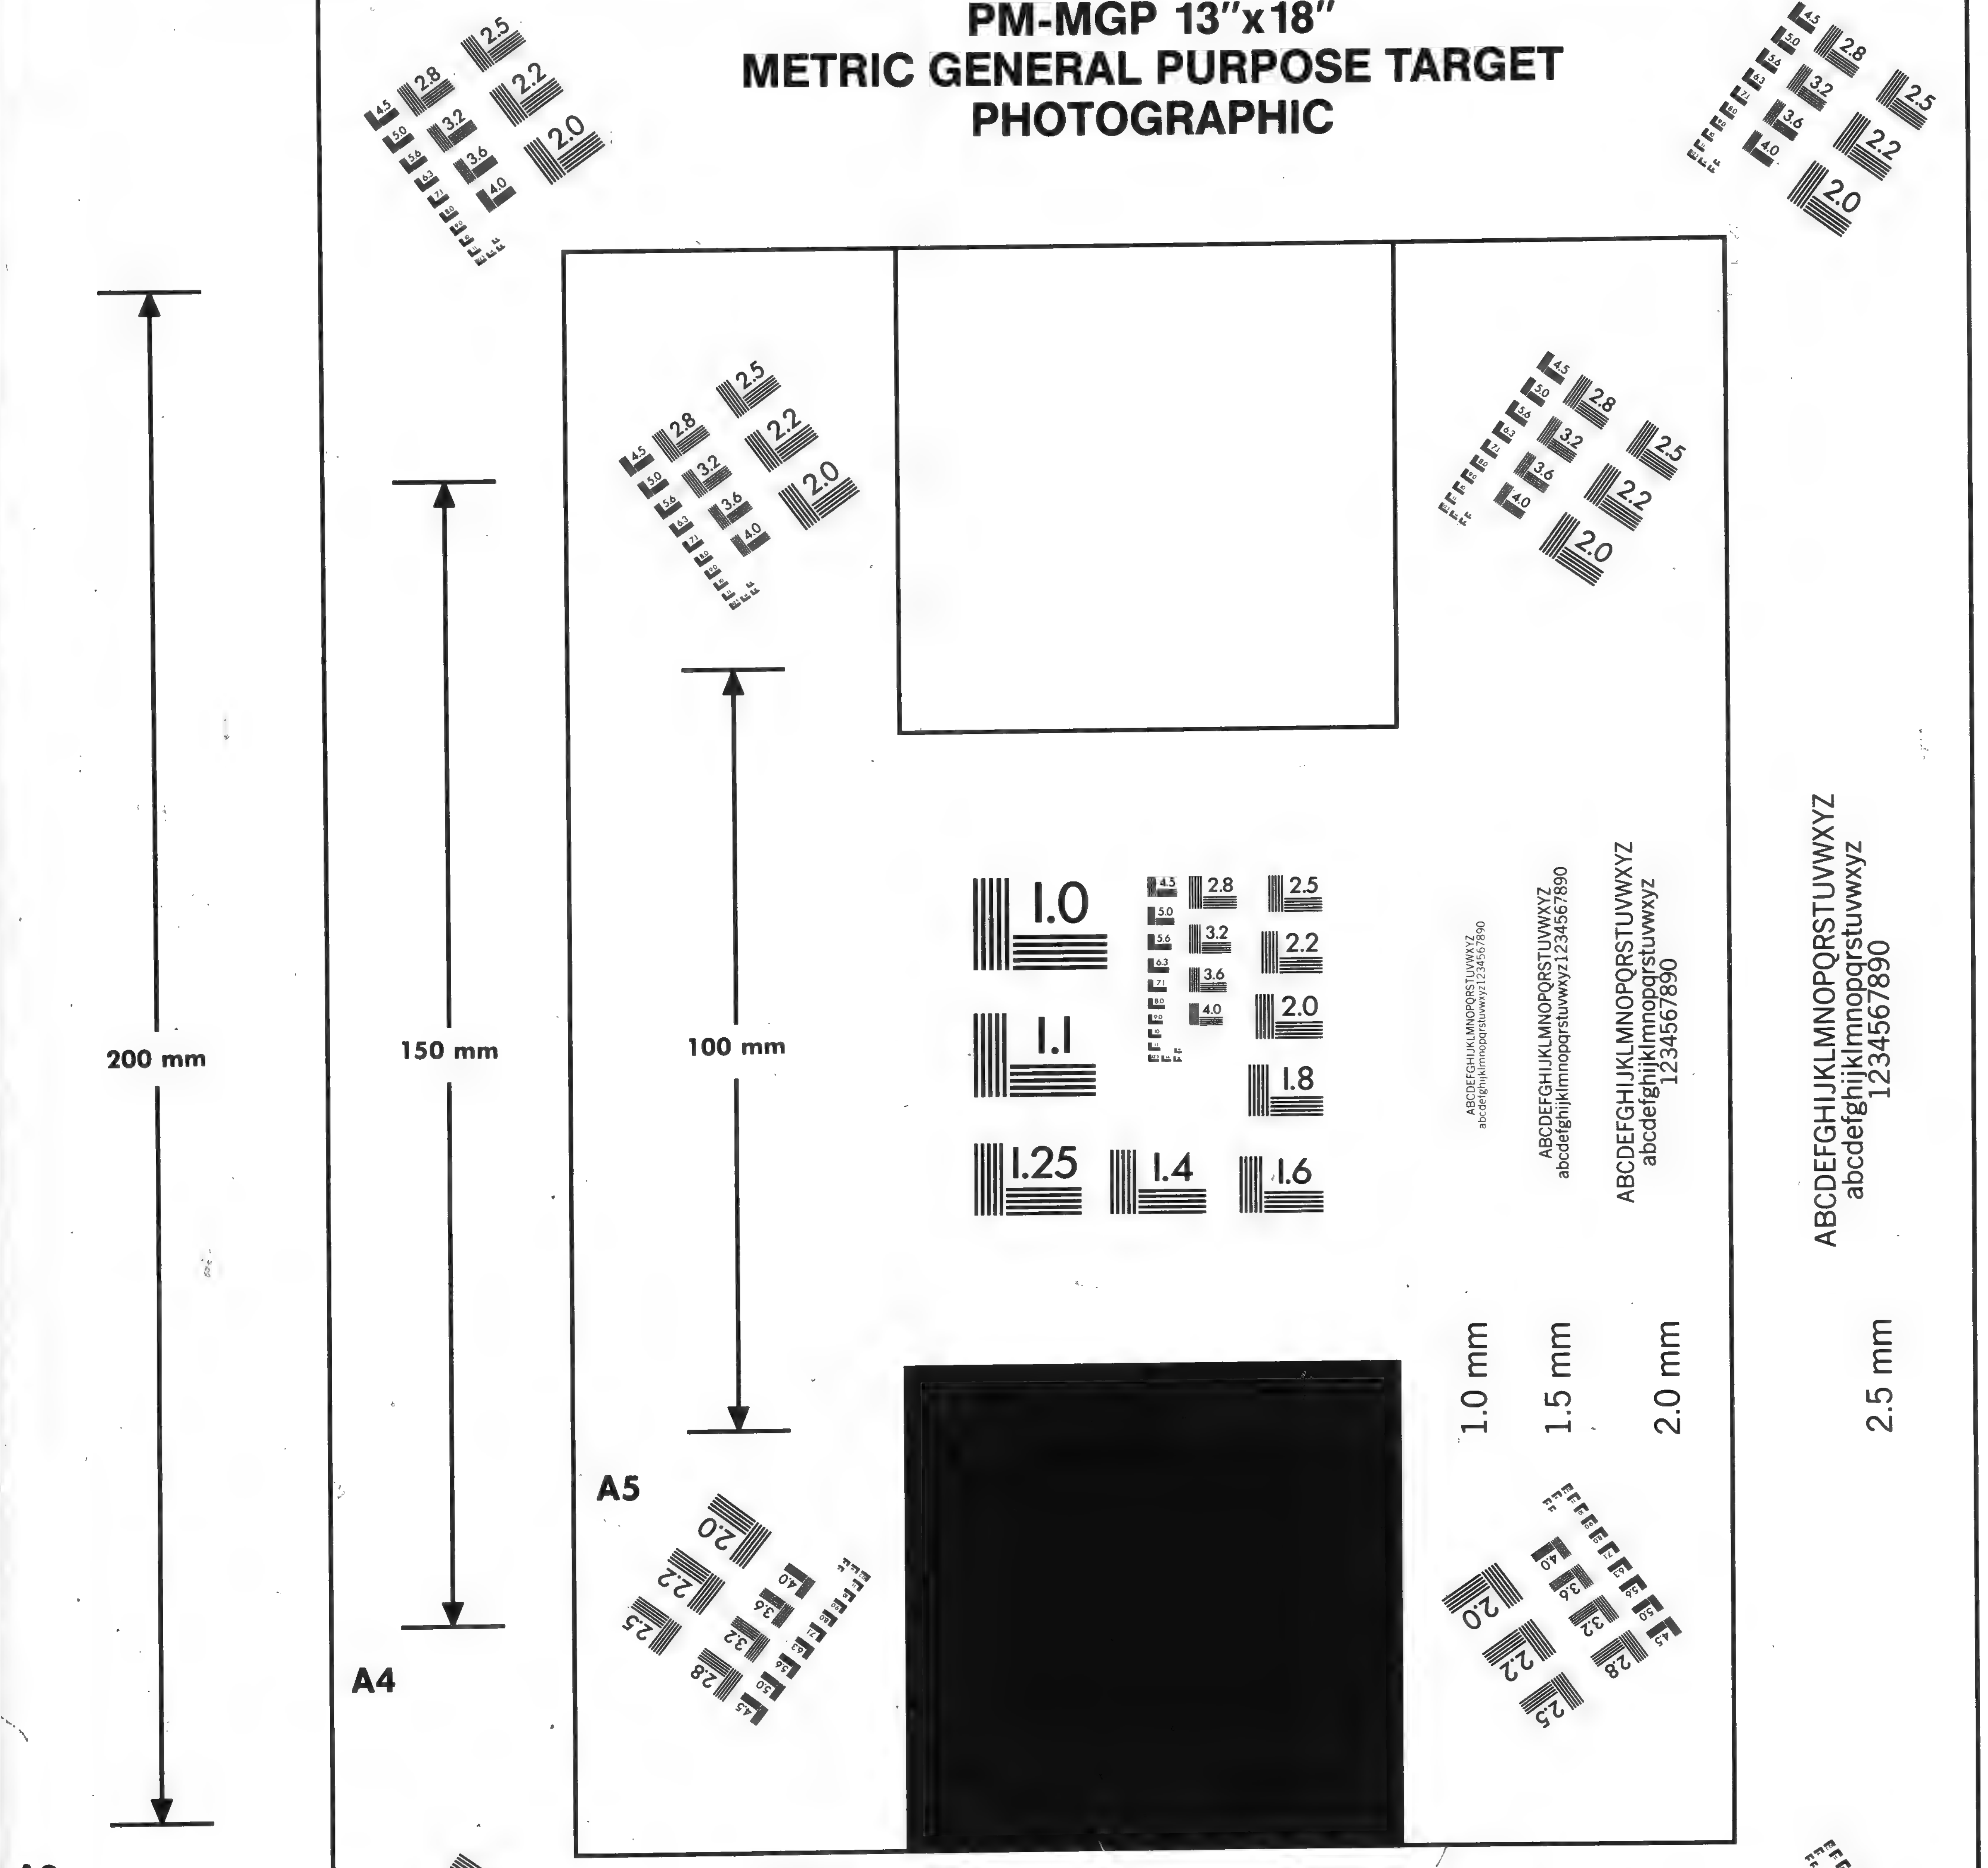
FILM STOCK: Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35 mm x 30.5 m · 100 ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 05/1996
1461-0341-012-06
CAT 840 3594
04-08

REEL 41

Volume 76

BSO
Pops
1946 - 1947

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR-VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 76

BSO
Pops

1946 - 1947

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

NATIONAL Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER
Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
1032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
1033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
→ 1041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

SEP 2 1946

From England came composer Benjamin Britten to hear the recent performance of his opera "Peter Grimes" at Serge Koussevitzky's summer colony at Tanglewood. His opera was first produced in England in June, 1945, and has been performed in Stockholm, Antwerp, Basel and Zurich before being given in the United States. The opera, which tells the story of a fisherman whose two apprentices are killed in seeming-accidents, and who himself is finally driven out to sea to drown by the angry villagers, is hailed by Dr. Koussevitzky as the finest opera since "Carmen." Most music critics, according to Time magazine's estimate: ". . . Almost unanimously hailed frail, 32-year-old Benjamin Britten as the most promising operatic composer of the day."

While the critics and audience raved, the composer himself committed himself in print only so far as to say, in the Time article: "There's no use pretending it was professional. . . . It was a very lively student performance."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

SEP 8 1946

Fine Boston Performances

The "Boston" label on a Victor Red Seal recording invariably means something well nigh perfect. No exception are Victor's latest releases — Tchaikovsky's 5th Symphony in E Minor, Op. 64, by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky's baton and the ballet music from Massenet's opera "Le Cid." The latter is performed by the Boston "Pops" under Arthur Fiedler's direction in an album of three ten-inch discs. Truly exciting music.

Despite frequent playings of the Tchaikovsky 5th in concert halls and on the radio, Koussevitsky's reading of this work sounds anything but hackneyed. Covering both sides of six 12-inch records, the Boston performance displays brilliant tonal quality, precision and fidelity of interpretation.

Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68, receives a similarly brilliant performance by the New York Philharmonic under Rodzinski's direction in a Columbia album of five 12-inch discs.

Except for students of the violin, there appears to be little to interest the average listener in Prokofiev's "Sonata in D Major for Violin and Piano, Op. 94" as performed by Joseph Szigeti, violinist, with Leonid Hambro at the piano, in a Columbia album of three 12-inch records. Although the work is sprinkled with tuneful and dance-like sections, there is an overabun-

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 8 - 1946

On the Record

By Claudia Cassidy

Any record reviewer rash enough to take a vacation knows how disconcerting it is to return to face that formidable, not to say reproachful, array of cardboard cartons, augmented by notes from the postoffice and express company that more is yet to come. Descending on my current crop with all feasible facility, I found myself instantly curious about three albums, representing an old friend and two piquant newcomers. Almost any one wants to know how Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony sounds when the Boston orchestra plays it under Serge Koussevitsky's direction [Victor M-1059; six 12-inch records] and those who like new music will want to investigate Prokofieff's Sonata in D major for Violin and Piano, played by Joseph Szigeti and Leonid Hambro [Columbia M-620; three 12-inch records] and to discover from William Primrose's viola what Arthur Benjamin has written in his Elegy, Waltz and Toccata and Roy Harris in his Soliloquy and Dance [Victor M-1051; four 12-inch records].

William Primrose
[Wide World Photo]

Prokofieff's sonata seems to me particularly distinguished. It belongs to the clean forward sweep of the Fifth symphony and the later piano sonatas, with a strong bold line pungently animated but devoid of embroidery. There is no sentiment in the music and the brief andante is rather an interruption, at least on first hearing, but the work as a whole is additional revelation of a major composer whose stature becomes increasingly imposing. Both performance and recording do it justice.

• • •

Mr. Benjamin gets the best of the viola album, tho Mr. Primrose plays both compositions with the beauty of tone and simplicity of style typical of his work. In the Elegy, Waltz and Toccata the elegy is arresting rather than merely melancholy, the waltz has an acrid tang, and the toccata is a concise integration of music which with less skill might be merely busy. The piano part is exceptionally interesting, and Vladimir Sokoloff plays it well. Mr. Harris' contribution is less vital. His soliloquy follows the pattern of musing that turns rhapsodic, then falls to musing again, and his dance is a dry point rather reminiscent of "Danses Concertantes." Johana Harris is the accompanist here, and again a good one.

The Tschaikowsky is just about what you would have guessed without playing it. The superb tone of the Boston orchestra and the emotional drive of its Russian director have a happy hunting ground and interrruptions at record edges may make you impatient for the advent of spool recording. My set has some surface noise, and I can't convince myself the solo horn is well recorded. That Boston horn at its best could be used to rouse sensitive souls who would be shocked by Gabriel's trumpet.

• • •

If you want to pretend you are at a "Pop" concert by the Philadelphia orchestra, an album called "Six Dances" will help the illusion, and you get conducting by both Eugene Ormandy and Saul Caston [Columbia M-588; three 12-inch records]. Mr. Ormandy, whose Hungarian background can conjure up exactly the right blend of silkiness and langor for this sort of thing, offers Smetana's "Dance of the Comedians," from "The Bartered Bride," Dvorak's Slavonic Dance No. 10, in E minor, Brahms' Hungarian Dance No. 5, and Strauss' "Wine, Women, and Song," which sets balletomanes thinking of "Beau Danube." Mr. Caston does Glière's Russian Sailors' dance from "The Red Poppy" and Fernandez's "Batuque," a rather too civilized version of a Brazilian dance touched with African memories.

• • •

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
HERALD

SEP 15 1946

Listening Hour Program Varied

Grand Rapids Public Library will present a new type of program at its listening hours in the browsing room of the Ryerson building this week. The programs, which are given daily at 3:30 p. m., will include three programs of modern music, most of which has not been commercially recorded.

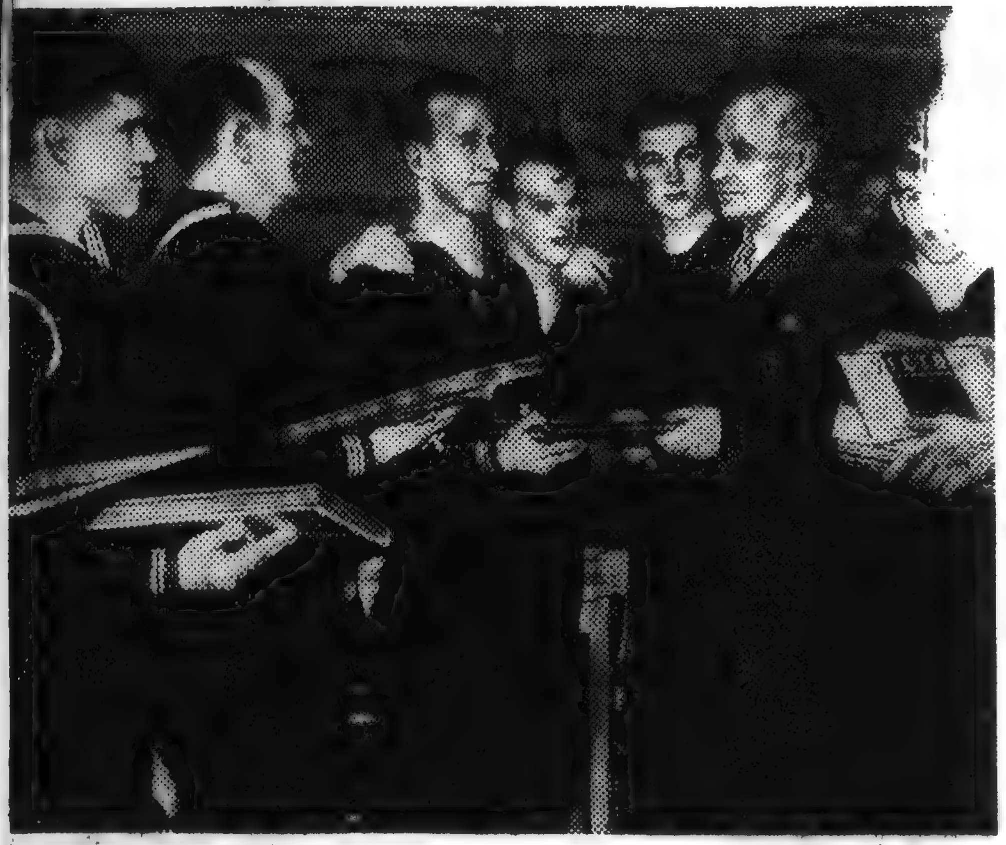
✦ ✦ ✦

MONDAY the Shostakovitch "Ninth Symphony," recently played by the Boston Symphony, will be given. Programs for two other days during the week will include Howard Hanson's "Symphony No. 4," Schoenberg's "Theme and Variations," "Quiet City" by Aaron Copland and "Prelude to The Dream of Gerontius" by Elgar.

Except for the last named, these compositions have all been taken off the air by the Recording Studio and loaned to the library. The remaining three days of the week the listening program will be devoted to request numbers.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

SEP 12 1946



Treasured Gift

A selection of RCA Victor albums was the recent gift of conductor Serge Koussevitzky to a group of servicemen in Philadelphia. Koussevitsky, shown presenting the albums, has recorded Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony with the Boston Symphony orchestra for release on the September Red Seal list.

---

had never really heard her voice in previous commercial records and pictures.

Among the other artists to be seen and heard in this film are Lily Pons, Gregor Piatigorsky the cellist, Bruno Walter the conductor, Ezio Pinza of the Metropolitan, and Artur Rubinstein the pianist.

Incidentally, Rubinstein is no

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

SEP 15 1946

. . . Seventy-five pianists have entered the contest, the first of its kind, sponsored by the Rachmaninoff Fund, Inc. Thirty-nine are women; 36, men, ranging from 17 to 26 in age. President of the Fund is Pianist Vladimir Horowitz and Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is chairman . . . William Kapell takes his instrument wherever he goes. En route to South America by way of a Pan American clipper, the young artist took with him a 16-pound portable piano made of tubular aluminum and fiber glass. He intends practicing during the trip . . .

Sun. Star 9/14/46

Boston Symphony Loses Radio Sponsor

Radio sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday programs by the Allis Chalmers Corporation has been cancelled because of strikes in the concern's various plants and resultant cut in advertising, it was reported today.

The orchestra's manager, George E. Judd, was reported on his way to California, seeking new sponsorship for the broadcasts, after completing discussions of the subject in New York City.

Learning of the development, the American Broadcasting Company has given the orchestra a "sustaining"—that is, unsponsored—spot on its network at 9:30 Tuesday nights.

As a result, subscribers to the season at Symphony Hall and at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, have been informed of drastic revisions in the concert schedule, with six concerts scheduled for Monday evenings shifted to Tuesdays, and the six others scheduled at Sanders Theater on Wednesdays also shifted to Tuesdays.

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER

SEP 17 1946

More future developments: The Boston Symphony, in returning to ABC on October 8 for a 40 weeks' series, will move to Tuesday night from Saturday. The time will be at 9:30 for an hour.

The five-day "Glamor Manor," previously Cliff Arquette's show on ABC, will undergo a format change on September 30, first broadcast upon the resumption of a standard time schedule. Kenny Baker, former Jack Benny singer, Announcer Don Wilson and Sam Hearn's "Schlepperman" will take over. Arquette has been out of the program since June, when Eddie Dunn started a Summer series.

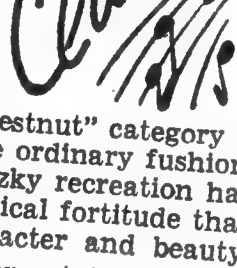
This same September 30, the CBS school of the air is to return at 9 P. M. for its seventeenth year. Present occupants of the half-hour, "Feature Story" and "Woman's Club," will be discontinued.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

SEP 13 1946

By MILTON WIDDER

No matter how many issues of the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony there are in the record repertories of the disc companies, one welcomes a pressing such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's of this popular and immensely dramatic work.



Victor heads this month's releases with the Serge Koussevitzky version and to me, listening to it, it was a thrilling experience. The "old man" (as his musicians affectionately call him behind his back) gives a tremendous lift to this work that might be considered by some as hackneyed. It probably is in the "chestnut" category if it is played in the ordinary fushion, but the Koussevitzky recreation has the push and musical fortitude that gives it real character and beauty.

While the interpretative qualities are excellent, there is also brilliance in the playing of the orchestra and the well-known precision for which the Bostin is famous.

This version of the Tchaikovsky could easily be a duplicate in the serious record collector's library. Set M-1057, $6.85.

In the Columbia releases is an album called SIX DANCES, played by the Philadelphia Orchestra "Pops," directed both by Eugene Ormandy and Saul Caston. The best in the lot is the RUSSIAN SAILOR DANCE from The Red Poppy, Gliee's ballet. Others, done fairly fluently, are DANCE OF THE COMMEDIANS from Smetana's The Bartered Bride, dances by Dvorak, Brahms and Johann Strauss. Set M-588, $4.05.

The Columbia singles should find favor with discriminating record listeners—Weinberger's polka and fugue from SCHWANDA, played by the Philadelphia, and Stravinsky's FOUR NORWEGIAN MOODS, with the New York Philharmonic, conducted by the composer.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DISPATCH
SEP 15 1946

RECORD NOTES

Discriminating music lovers will welcome RCA Victor's latest release by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor. For it proves once again that the music of the Russian composer, when it is played by an orchestra whose director concerns himself with a faithful interpretation of Tchaikovsky's intent, is still among the most satisfying experiences.

Despite frequent playings in the concert hall and on the radio, this particular work, along with Tchaikovsky's Fourth and Sixth Symphonies, has never sounded hackneyed when given a reading by a conductor with the insight that Koussevitsky has of the composer's music.

Koussevitsky's reading of this symphony, which was written in 1888 and is among the Russian composer's best-loved, leaves nothing to be desired. An outstanding example of Tchaikovsky's mastery of the symphonic form, with its gloomy theme lightened by a third movement in the form of a valse, the work receives a performance characteristic of other recordings for RCA Victor made by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky's baton—brilliant tonal quality, precision, and delity of interpretation.

This new version of the Fifth Symphony will be a must for music lovers who are intent upon building their record libraries on a firm foundation of outstanding performance of symphonic recordings by one of the world's leading orchestras.

LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR
SEP 22 1946

Boston Symphony Resumes Oct. 8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which this year will observe its 66th season, again will be heard weekly over the American Broadcasting Company beginning Oct. 8, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting his 22nd season, at 8:30 p. m.

The broadcasts will cover a period of approximately 40 weeks and will include the ensemble's regular winter season, the summer "Pops" and Esplanade Concerts, and some of the annual Tanglewood Festival programs next summer.

Music and M

Shostakovitch Ninth on First Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 66th season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 4, when Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 23d successive season as conductor. He announces for the opening program the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, the Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The new symphony of Shostakovitch had its first American performances at the Berkshire Festival by this orchestra last Summer and is now to have its first Boston hearing.

The opening concert of the Tuesday evening series in Symphony Hall (formerly Monday evenings) will take place on Oct. 8, when Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, the Third Symphony of Brahms, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL
SEP 18 1946

Columbia takes the lead by presenting "Stars in the Afternoon" in two separate airings—the first next Sunday, the second on the following Sunday. Both broadcasts will be an hour and a half in duration.

The NBC show, "Parade of Stars," is scheduled for Oct. 13 and 14. The opener, in the afternoon, runs for an hour, with the other, at night, lasting 90 minutes.

When the Boston Symphony returns to ABC ~~for a 40-week~~ series it will be heard on Tuesday nights instead of Saturday as in the past. Time is set for 9:30.

Art Linkletter has made a rapid recovery from his recent major operation and has received permission from his medico to open with "People Are Funny" next Friday.

* * *

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
SEP 22 1946

Boston Symphony Season to Start Oct. 4

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, Sept. 21—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 66th season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 4 when Serge Koussevitzky will begin [redacted] season as the orchestra's conductor. Dr. Koussevitzky announces for the opening program Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, the Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The opening concert of the Tuesday night series in Symphony Hall (formerly Mondays) will be Oct. 8, when Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, the Third Symphony of Brahms, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

04-25

This Clipping From
TIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 27 1946

• Allis-Chalmers Corp. has canceled sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Saturday programs. Reason is the crippling strikes which have beset the firm, causing a slash in all its advertising. The orchestra is seeking new sponsorship, although ABC has donated a sustaining slot Tuesday nights.

• WLAW (Lawrence, Mass.) is preparing to open new major studios in Boston, and has appointed Harold B. Morrill general manager. A new 50,000-watt transmitter is being erected at Burlington. WLAW also has been granted a permit to operate an FM station.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 23 1946

CITY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bernstein to Open Season Tonight With Shostakovitch Work

The New York City Symphony, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, will give its first concert of the season at 8:30 tonight at the New York City Center. Shostakovitch's Seventh, or Leningrad, symphony will be the featured work of the evening.

There will be five visitors from Russia on hand to hear it. They are Semen Stefanyk, Professor of Jurisprudence at Lvov University and member of the Supreme Soviet; Zoya Haidai, soprano, and Ivan Patorzhinsky, basso, of the Kiev State Opera; and Luka Malamarchuk and Andrei Malyschko, war correspondents.

The Russians are members of a delegation sent by the Ukrainian Society for Cultural Relations With Foreign Countries. They will attend the concert as guests of the American Soviet Music Society, which is headed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Mr. Bernstein as vice president.

D, SEPTEMBER 22, 1946

THE RADIO BEAT

Herald

By Rudolph Elie, Jr.

The Rover Gets Radio-Active Every Sunday, Plunges in as Radio Critic with Misgiving

It is with very considerable misgiving that I begin today a Sunday radio column in which, I am given to understand, I can say what I like about anything. Radio criticism is the thing nowadays, especially with John Crosby turning it into a professional and literate art, and I am game if The Herald is.

The trouble is, it is very hard to know what standards to apply. In music, the theater, movies, books and art, all of which I have at one time or another written about (not always with forbearance), there are certain standards, certain well-established procedures and technics. Moreover, you know in a fairly general way who goes to the theater, who listens to good music, who reads good books, and who buys authentic art. Soon you come to know them well enough to address them as if they were spiritually akin if not exactly friends.

Reader the Critic

Yet there has been (and is) a great deal of misunderstanding of the role of critic, if it may even be conceded he has one, I used to run into it quite a lot when I was writing about music and it always startled me a little. People would come running up and, with overtones of glee, say, "I see that Warren Smith of the Post didn't agree with you at all," or, "You know that Hanson Symphony you panned? Well, you'll be interested to learn that it has just won the $1,000 Koussevitzky prize," or something like that.

This is all very well and of course it is true enough; critics very frequently do not agree—though they do agree more often than you might think. But it has always seemed to me that the comparing of critics is an aimless, even a silly occupation that proves nothing. For the value of a critic to a casual reader is in direct ratio to the confidence he, the critic, can achieve in the reader over a period of time by agreeing with the reader more often than he disagrees. That is to say, it is the reader who is critic, not the critic himself.

Let us say a reader and a critic attend the same performance, musical or theatrical. Next morning in his newspaper the reader notes that the critic said almost exactly what he thought himself. "Hmm," he says, "here's a pretty sharp character; he knows what he's talking about." They attend a dozen or more concerts or plays, and each time the critic manages to express the reader's own point of view or, if it differs on one point or another, makes clear the reason for that difference in a reasonable, unpompous, even entertaining way.

In the end the reader, if he finds the critic agrees with him more often than he doesn't and presents his views in a literate, lively way, can come to depend on the critic's judgment, thus saving himself a lot of time and money. In my own case I find I agree with Wolcott Gibbs more often than not. If he tells me a play is good, I go; if he says it is terrible, I stay away. If Hamilton Basso tells me to buy a book, I borrow it, at least. If John Crosby says a radio show is wonderful, I usually find it so, too. They entertain and stimulate me, and they save me a lot of time. I depend on them as I would a friend who shares my own pleasures and recommends something to me.

On the other hand there are hundreds of critics who just don't seem to be writing for me at all. Their opinions couldn't get me to or keep me away from a concert or play under any circumstances. Why? Because I never agree with them and probably don't like them, anyway. They seem to me to be like suit salesmen who think to clinch a sale by telling me they wear the same thing themselves.

Somebody Else

The point is these critics are not writing for me. They are writing for a special audience to which, through strange byways of education, environment, taste or something I just don't happen to belong. This isn't to say they are no good; their own readers may find them sound and excellent, and be very happily guided by them. But it is folly for a person to go to a concert or a play and rush out next morning to get all the papers and see what all the critics say. Naturally, he is going to be amused or infuriated or disgusted with the whole business. Why should he accept the opinions of perfect strangers who, for all he knows, eat beans with their knives?

How all this applies to radio I am not quite sure. There is some reason to believe it doesn't apply at all, for the radio audience is so wide and encompasses such a variety of tastes, intellectual and cultural levels and everything else, that no standards of criticism save those of common sense and a reasonably balanced point of view can be applied, and the audience is so large you can't get to it at all. In any case, I hope you will stay with me long enough to find out whether I seem to be talking your language or not, and don't hesitate to rap my knuckles if I start eating with my knife.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 29 1946

Recital on Double Bass Is Given by Ludwig Juht

Boston Symphony Member at Town Hall

Ludwig Juht, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital on the double bass yesterday afternoon at Town Hall. For the first half of his program he played music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, including a sonata by Vivaldi, a grave and gavotte by Corelli and a sonata by Henry Eccles, English violinist and composer. The other works on the list, composed for this most massive member of the stringed instrument family, were a sonatina by Emil Kornsand, a member of the Boston Symphony's viola section; a "Chanson Triste" and "Miniature" by Serge Koussevitzky, who was noted as a double-bass virtuoso before he took up conducting, and a "Souvenir" and "Scherzo" by Mr. Juht.

Recitals on the double bass occur here infrequently—there have been few, if any, since Mr. Juht's Steinway Hall appearance in 1935—and yesterday's concert, with Valentin Pavlovsky as the co-operating pianist, gave an interesting opportunity to note and consider the resources and possibilities of this instrument in a solo role. Mr. Juht, who was born in Estonia, is a well versed artist whose playing gave a sense of earnestness and devotion as well as of thorough technical skill. There was musicianly phrasing and devotion to pitch; a tone of generally appealing quality and lyricism in the upper notes, and sonorous depth in the lower ones. In the middle register, especially in swift passages, the quality was occasionally muffled. Pizzicati were very effective.

Mr. Juht's playing avoided the danger of weightiness and often was laudable for sensitiveness and imagination. In the program as a whole more dynamic rise and fall and a greater variety of instrumental timbres would have been desirable. This occasional impression of limited variety was at least partly due to the program, whose first half offered works similar to each other in period and style. The Kornsand sonatina was more interesting as a demonstration of the instrument's possibilities than in itself; the shorter pieces were very agreeable. But the available literature in this field is limited. Mr. Juht was warmly applauded and was called upon for several encores.

F. D. P.

Boston Symphony Near Sellout

Globe

If you haven't already bought tickets, you'll probably have to go to Providence, R. I., this season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Reporting a "phenomenal" 23rd season, the management announced yesterday that all 24 Saturday evening performances in Symphony Hall are fully subscribed and seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts are 98 percent sold.

And Rhode Islanders may grab all tickets for the orchestra's five Providence performances.

DISPATCH

SEP 15

RECORD NOTES

Discriminating music lovers will welcome RCA Victor's latest release by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor. For it proves once again that the music of the Russian composer, when it is played by an orchestra whose director concerns himself with a faithful interpretation of Tchaikovsky's intent, is still among the most satisfying experiences.

Despite frequent playings in the concert hall and on the radio, this particular work, along with Tchaikovsky's Fourth and Sixth Symphonies, has never sounded hackneyed when given a reading by a conductor with the insight that Koussevitsky has of the composer's music.

Koussevitsky's reading of this symphony, which was written in 1888 and is among the Russian composer's best-loved, leaves nothing to be desired. An outstanding example of Tchaikovsky's mastery of the symphonic form, with its gloomy theme lightened by a third movement in the form of a valse, the work receives a performance characteristic of other recordings for RCA Victor made by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky's baton—brilliant tonal quality, precision, and delity of interpretation.

This new version of the Fifth Symphony will be a must for music lovers who are intent upon building their record libraries on a firm foundation of outstanding performance of symphonic recordings by one of the world's leading orchestras.

LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR

SEP 22 1946

Boston Symphony Resumes Oct. 8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which this year will observe its 66th season, again will be heard weekly over the American Broadcasting Company beginning Oct. 8, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting his 22nd season, at 8:30 p. m.

The broadcasts will cover a period of approximately 40 weeks and will include the ensemble's regular winter season, the summer "Pops" and Esplanade Concerts, and some of the annual Tanglewood Festival programs next summer.

Music and M

Shostakovitch Ninth on First Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 66th season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 4, when Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 23d successive season as conductor. He announces for the opening program the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, the Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The new symphony of Shostakovitch had its first American performances at the Berkshire Festival by this orchestra last Summer and is now to have its first Boston hearing.

The opening concert of the Tuesday evening series in Symphony Hall (formerly Monday evenings) will take place on Oct. 8, when Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, the Third Symphony of Brahms, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL

SEP 16 1946

Columbia takes the lead by presenting "Stars in the Afternoon" in two separate airings—the first next Sunday, the second on the following Sunday. Both broadcasts will be an hour and a half in duration.

The NBC show, "Parade of Stars," is scheduled for Oct. 13 and 14. The opener, in the afternoon, runs for an hour, with the other, at night, lasting 90 minutes.

When the Boston Symphony returns to ABC for a 40-week series it will be heard on Tuesday nights instead of Saturday as in the past. Time is set for 9:30.

Art Linkletter has made a rapid recovery from his recent major operation and has received permission from his medico to open with "People Are Funny" next Friday.

• • •

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

SEP 22 1946

Boston Symphony Season to Start Oct. 4

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, Sept. 21—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 66th season in Symphony Hall on Oct. 4 when Serge Koussevitzky will begin [illegible] season as the orchestra's conductor. Dr. Koussevitzky announces for the opening program Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, the Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The opening concert of the Tuesday night series in Symphony Hall (formerly Mondays) will be Oct. 8, when Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, the Third Symphony of Brahms, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

TIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 27 1946

• Allis-Chalmers Corp. has canceled sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Saturday programs. Reason is the crippling strikes which have beset the firm, causing a slash in all its advertising. The orchestra is seeking new sponsorship, although ABC has donated a sustaining slot Tuesday nights.

• WLAW (Lawrence, Mass.) is preparing to open new major studios in Boston, and has appointed Harold B. Morrill general manager. A new 50,000-watt transmitter is being erected at Burlington. WLAW also has been granted a permit to operate an FM station.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 23 1946

CITY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bernstein to Open Season Tonight With Shostakovitch Work

The New York City Symphony, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, will give its first concert of the season at 8:30 tonight at the New York City Center. Shostakovitch's Seventh, or Leningrad, symphony will be the featured work of the evening.

There will be five visitors from Russia on hand to hear it. They are Semen Stefanyk, Professor of Jurisprudence at Lvov University and member of the Supreme Soviet; Zoya Haidai, soprano, and Ivan Patorzhinsky, basso, of the Kiev State Opera; and Luka Malamarchuk and Andrei Malyschko, war correspondents.

The Russians are members of a delegation sent by the Ukrainian Society for Cultural Relations With Foreign Countries. They will attend the concert as guests of the American Soviet Music Society, which is headed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Mr. Bernstein as vice president.

D, SEPTEMBER 22, 1946

THE RADIO BEAT

Herald

By Rudolph Elie, Jr.

The Rover Gets Radio-Active Every Sunday, Plunges in as Radio Critic with Misgiving

It is with very considerable misgiving that I begin today a Sunday radio column in which, I am given to understand, I can say what I like about anything. Radio criticism is the thing nowadays, especially with John Crosby turning it into a professional and literate art, and I am game if The Herald is.

The trouble is, it is very hard to know what standards to apply. In music, the theater, movies, books and art, all of which I have at one time or another written about (not always with forbearance), there are certain standards, certain well-established procedures and technics. Moreover, you know in a fairly general way who goes to the theater, who listens to good music, who reads good books, and who buys authentic art. Soon you come to know them well enough to address them as if they were spiritually akin if not exactly friends.

Reader the Critic

Yet there has been (and is) a great deal of misunderstanding of the role of critic, if it may even be conceded he has one. I used to run into it quite a lot when I was writing about music and it always startled me a little. People would come running up and, with overtones of glee, say, "I see that Warren Smith of the Post didn't agree with you at all," or, "You know that Hansen Symphony you panned? Well, you'll be interested to learn that it has just won the $1,000 Koussevitzky prize," or something like that.

This is all very well and of course it is true enough; critics very frequently do not agree—though they do agree more often than you might think. But it has always seemed to me that the comparing of critics is an aimless, even a silly occupation that proves nothing. For the value of a critic to a casual reader is in direct ratio to the confidence he, the critic, can achieve in the reader over a period of time by agreeing with the reader more often than he disagrees. That is to say, it is the reader who is critic, not the critic himself.

Let us say a reader and a critic attend the same performance, musical or theatrical. Next morning in his newspaper the reader notes that the critic said almost exactly what he thought himself. "Hmm," he says, "here's a pretty sharp character; he knows what he's talking about." They attend a dozen or more concerts or plays, and each time the critic manages to express the reader's own point of view or, if it differs on one point or another, makes clear the reason for that difference in a reasonable, unpompous, even entertaining way.

In the end the reader, if he finds the critic agrees with him more often than he doesn't and presents his views in a literate, lively way, can come to depend on the critic's judgment, thus saving himself a lot of time and money. In my own case I find I agree with Wolcott Gibbs more often than not. If he tells me a play is good, I go; if he says it is terrible, I stay away. If Hamilton Basso tells me to buy a book, I borrow it, at least. If John Crosby says a radio show is wonderful, I usually find it so, too. They entertain and stimulate me, and they save me a lot of time. I depend on them as I would a friend who shares my own pleasures and recommends something to me.

On the other hand there are hundreds of critics who just don't seem to be writing for me at all. Their opinions couldn't get me to or keep me away from a concert or play under any circumstances. Why? Because I never agree with them and probably don't like them, anyway. They seem to me to be like suit salesmen who think to clinch a sale by telling me they wear the same thing themselves.

Somebody Else

The point is these critics are not writing for me. They are writing for a special audience to which, through strange byways of education, environment, taste or something I just don't happen to belong.

This isn't to say they are no good; their own readers may find them sound and excellent, and be very happily guided by them. But it is folly for a person to go to a concert or a play and rush out next morning to get all the papers and see what all the critics say. Naturally, he is going to be amused or infuriated or disgusted with the whole business. Why should he accept the opinions of perfect strangers who, for all he knows, eat beans with their knives?

How all this applies to radio I am not quite sure. There is some reason to believe it doesn't apply at all, for the radio audience is so wide and encompasses such a variety of tastes, intellectual and cultural levels and everything else, that no standards of criticism save those of common sense and a reasonably balanced point of view can be applied, and the audience is so large you can't get to it at all. In any case, I hope you will stay with me long enough to find out whether I seem to be talking your language or not, and don't hesitate to rap my knuckles if I start eating with my knife.

HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP [illegible] 1946

Recital on Double Bass Is Given by Ludwig Juht

Boston Symphony Member at Town Hall

Ludwig Juht, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital on the double bass yesterday afternoon at Town Hall. For the first half of his program he played music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, including a sonata by Vivaldi, a grave and gavotte by Corelli and a sonata by Henry Eccles, English violinist and composer. The other works on the list, composed for this most massive member of the stringed instrument family, were a sonatina by Emil Kornsand, a member of the Boston Symphony's viola section; a "Chanson Triste" and "Miniature" by Serge Koussevitzky, who was noted as a double-bass virtuoso before he took up conducting, and a "Souvenir" and "Scherzo" by Mr. Juht.

Recitals on the double bass occur here infrequently—there have been few, if any, since Mr. Juht's Steinway Hall appearance in 1935—and yesterday's concert, with Valentin Pavlovsky as the co-operating pianist, gave an interesting opportunity to note and consider the resources and possibilities of this instrument in a solo role. Mr. Juht, who was born in Estonia, is a well versed artist whose playing gave a sense of earnestness and devotion as well as of thorough technical skill. There was musicianly phrasing and devotion to pitch; a tone of generally appealing quality and lyricism in the upper notes, and sonorous depth in the lower ones. In the middle register, especially in swift passages, the quality was occasionally muffled. Pizzicati were very effective.

Mr. Juht's playing avoided the danger of weightiness and often was laudable for sensitiveness and imagination. In the program as a whole more dynamic rise and fall and a greater variety of instrumental timbres would have been desirable. This occasional impression of limited variety was at least partly due to the program, whose first half offered works similar to each other in period and style. The Kornsand sonatina was more interesting as a demonstration of the instrument's possibilities than in itself; the shorter pieces were very agreeable. But the available literature in this field is limited. Mr. Juht was warmly applauded and was called upon for several encores.

F. D. P.

Boston Symphony Near Sellout

Globe

If you haven't already bought tickets, you'll probably have to go to Providence, R. I., this season to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Reporting a "phenomenal" 23rd season, the management announced yesterday that all 24 Saturday evening performances in Symphony Hall are fully subscribed and seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts are 96 percent sold.

And Rhode Islanders may grab all tickets for the orchestra's five Providence performances.

[5]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

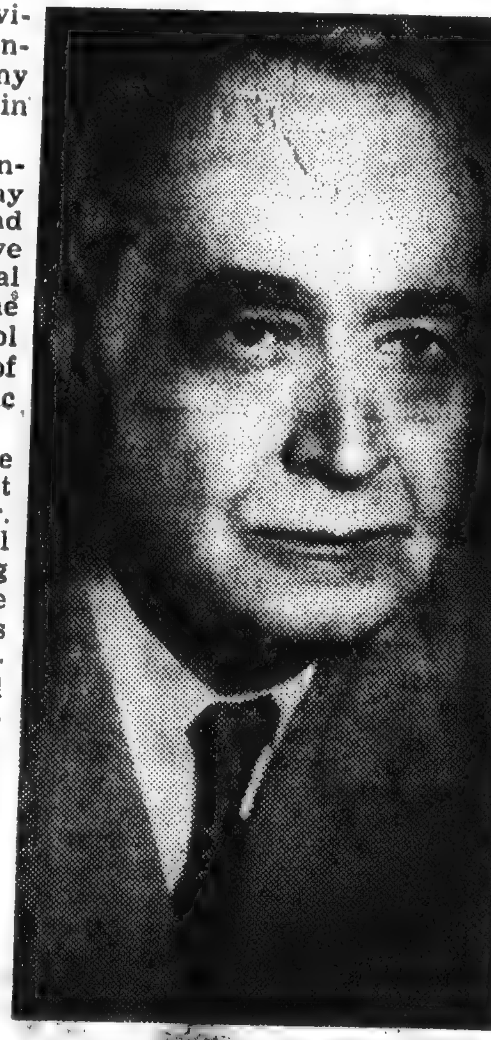
SEP 29 1946

Boston Symphony Will Launch Concert Season Here Oct. 15

Community Association and Philharmonic Orchestra Announce Program Series; Famous Artists Are Coming

THE new music season in Providence will open with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night, Oct. 15, in the Metropolitan Theater.

The Providence Community Concert Association will get under way on Oct. 22, and the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra will give the first of its series of three local programs on Nov. 6. On Nov. 8 the Museum of Art, Rhode Island School of Design, will present the first of its annual series of chamber music recitals.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Brings Bostonians here Oct. 15.

Missing this season will be the series that has been offered in recent years by the Metropolitan Theater. The management, however, will book musical attractions among which grand opera probably will be included. Functioning outside this city will be the civic music associations of Pawtucket and Newport and the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra which will make three tours. The latter organization will give its Providence concerts in the Rhode Island School of Design Auditorium. Most of the other major programs will be in the Metropolitan Theater.

First Symphony Program

Opening its Providence season on Oct. 15, the Boston Symphony, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play Brahms' Third Symphony, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and the Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch which had its first performance in this country at the Berkshire Festival during the Summer. The same program will open the orchestra's Boston season Friday. Succeeding Providence concerts by the Bostonians are scheduled for Nov. 19, Jan. 28, Feb. 25 and March 25.

Todd Duncan, Negro baritone star of "Porgy and Bess," will be the starter for the Providence Community Concert Association's lineup of five events, all new to the local concert stage. Following Duncan in the series the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance here Dec. 10, conducted by William Primrose, viola soloist. On ~~Jan. 21 will appear~~ Maryla Jonas, Polish pianist, who during the war escaped from a Nazi prison to Brazil. Zino Francescatti, remarkable young violinist, is due on Feb. 18. Jennie Tourel, leading mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Association, will close the series on March 18.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 29 1946

A new item for collectors of Toscaniniana: The conductor sent the following note to his fellow-conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, president of the American-Soviet Music Society, when asked to attend a reception for the Soviet singers:

"My Dear Koussevitzky:—Thank you for your kind invitation. I accept cordially and heartily, but permit me not to come, because more and more as I grow older I feel I have to remain alone, closed in my shell like a snail. Excuse me. Cordially yours, Arturo Toscanini."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 29 1946

RECENT RECORDS

By Jerome D. Bohm

TWO new recordings of Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto in C minor are available. One is published by Victor, with Artur Rubinstein as soloist, accompanied by the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, directed by Vladimir Golschmann; the other, put forth by Decca, has Eugene List as soloist, assisted by the Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles, conducted by Alfred Wallenstein.

Victor's recording is vastly superior to Decca's on every count. Mr. Rubinstein's traversal of the solo part is characterized by virtuosity of the most arresting kind, blending technical assurance with tonal persuasiveness and imaginative conviction. The tone of the piano has been captured with exceptional felicity and the percussive rattle which is present in most piano recordings is not to be heard here. Mr. Golschmann provides an accompaniment which admirably seconds the soloist's accomplishment, and the sound of the orchestra is well adjusted to that of the piano in even the most powerful climaxes without injury to dynamic values.

On the other hand, in Decca's recording, Mr. List's tone sounds consistently shallow, being next to inaudible in climactic passages, (partly, of course, because of inferior recording) and rattling noises are ever-present.

Other Victor Sets

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge ~~Kousse~~vitzky's direction. The sumptuous tonal-texture obtained with a minimum of surface-scratch is an engineering achievement of the first order. The interpretation, too, is an eloquent one, aside from the numerous abrupt tempo changes in the first movement which weaken the work's architectonics.

Haydn's Symphony No. 97 in C major is superbly set forth by the London Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham's discerning guidance. Excellent recording.

Szymanowski's Four Mazurkas, Op. 50, which although they could not have been written had Chopin not lived, are so fine that Chopin need not have been ashamed to lend his signature to them had he composed them, are played with fine musical sensibility and tonal charm by Artur Rubinstein. Satisfactory recording.

Fritz Kreisler's Concerto for violin in C in the style of Vivaldi is performed by the composer accompanied by the Victor String Orchestra and Victor Symphony Orchestra conducted by Donald Voorhees. Mr. Kreisler interprets his pseudo-classic music tellingly. The wistfully questioning quality of his tone in slow passages has lost none of its peculiar appeal. The final side of the album of two twelve-inch records holds Mr. Kreisler's Chanson Louis XIII and Pavane in the style of Couperin. Good recording.

William Primrose performs two contemporary works for viola: Arthur Benjamin's Elegy, Waltz and Toccata and Roy Harris's Soliloquy and Dance, the former with Vladimir Sokoloff at the piano, the latter with the composer's wife, Johanna Harris, as assisting pianist. This writer is only acquainted with a few of Mr. Benjamin's products, and of these, the Elegy, Waltz and Toccata are by far the most impressive. From both the ideational and structural aspects this set of pieces is decidedly worth while. Mr. Harris's introspective mood in "Soliloquy" was more conducive to effective results than his cliche-ridden Dance. Both works are compellingly discoursed by Mr. Primrose and both pianists. Excellent recording.

Grieg's Symphonic Dances, Op. 64, based on Norwegian themes, set forth by the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, directed by Fabien Sevitzky, and the ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid," performed by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, are pleasant enough if heard in small doses and in the proper surroundings, either indoors or out, providing enough pleasant conversation is at hand. Able performances and satisfactory recording have been accorded both compositions.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 29 1946

LUDWIG JUHT PLAYS CONTRA-BASS MUSIC

Member of Boston Symphony Is Heard at Town Hall in Distinctive Recital

By NOEL STRAUS

Playing of marked distinction was heard from Ludwig Juht, Estonian contra-bassist, at his recital given yesterday afternoon in Town Hall. Although the contra-bass is so unwieldy and cumbersome that it is rarely employed for solo work on the concert stage, Mr. Juht's performances demonstrated its possibilities for subtlety and refinement of effects when mastered by an artist of his skill and musicianship.

Mr. Juht, shortly after his arrival in this country early in 1934, had an opportunity to play for Serge Koussevitzky, foremost contra-bassist of the day, who invited him to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in April of that year. Immediately afterward he joined that organization, of which he is still a member. His New York début was made at the Barbizon Plaza Concert Hall in 1934 and was followed by a second recital in Steinway Hall in May, 1935.

In the past, celebrated masters of the contra-bass, such as Dragonetti and Bottesini, often used a small instrument with three strings for their concert work. Mr. Juht, however, employed a full-sized, four-stringed one made by Francesco Ruggieri in Cremona in 1679. From it he drew a tone of extraordinary purity and mellowness, capable of the finest gradations and always under absolute control.

Despite the warmth and humidity of the atmosphere, so unfavorable to strings, Mr. Juht found it possible to maintain an unblemished quality of sound and impeccable intonation throughout his admirably chosen list of offerings.

The first half of the program was devoted to Mr. Juht's own transcriptions of early classics, comprising Vivaldi's sonata in E minor and Eccles' sonata in A minor, both originally for viola da gamba, and a Grave and a Gavotte by Corelli. The rest of the schedule was given over to original modern works for the instrument, including a Sonatina, by Emil Kornsand, violist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which received its première; Koussevitzky's "Chanson triste" and "Valse miniature," and Mr. Juht's own "Souvenir" and "Scherzo."

All of these contributions were presented with unfailing understanding of their style and content. In sustained cantilena the sonorities became velvety, rich and intense, or ethereally delicate and sensitively colored, as the music demanded, while the more rapid movements were alike remarkable for lightness, evenness in passage-work, and masterly command of finger and bow, the elasticity and agility of the bowing being phenomenal.

There was always real depth of mood and meaning in the readings, though kept under just the right amount of restraint to add to the impressiveness of their delivery, in a series of performances that maintained so high a level of achievement that it would be futile to pick out one as more worthy than another.

Mr. Kornsand's new Sonatina, commissioned by Mr. Juht, was a well-made, rather derivative composition, melodious and fine-grained in each of its four movements, but not as knowingly written for the contra-bass as the other works presented, as it often lay too low to avoid occasional muddiness of effect in combination with the elaborate, if thin, piano part. Valentin Pavlovsky, in his keyboard support, here as elsewhere played accurately, but with too much tone for good balance.

It had been the intention of the broadcasting division of the State Department to have a record of the recital made and then to broadcast it to Europe and South America, but the necessary equipment could not be provided in time.

The audience, though not as large as Mr. Juht deserved, was highly enthusiastic. Among those in attendance were Consul Johannes Kaiv and Attaché Ernst Jaakson of the Estonian Consulate in New York, and a representation from the Lithuanian Consulate of this city.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 30 1946

Recital on Double Bass Is Given by Ludwig Juht

Boston Symphony Member at Town Hall

Ludwig Juht, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital on the double bass yesterday afternoon at Town Hall. For the first half of his program he played music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, including a sonata by Vivaldi, a grave and gavotte by Corelli and a sonata by Henry Eccles, English violinist and composer. The other works on the list, composed for this most massive member of the stringed instrument family, were a sonatina by Emil Kornsand, a member of the Boston Symphony's viola section; a "Chanson Triste" and "Miniature" by Serge Koussevitzky, who was noted as a double-bass virtuoso before he took up conducting, and a "Souvenir" and "Scherzo" by Mr. Juht.

Recitals on the double bass occur here infrequently—there have been few, if any, since Mr. Juht's Steinway Hall appearance in 1935—and yesterday's concert, with Valentin Pavlovsky as the co-operating pianist, gave an interesting opportunity to note and consider the resources and possibilities of this instrument in a solo role. Mr. Juht, who was born in Estonia, is a well versed artist whose playing gave a sense of earnestness and devotion as well as of thorough technical skill. There was musicianly phrasing and devotion to pitch; a tone of generally appealing quality and lyricism in the upper notes, and sonorous depth in the lower ones. In the middle register, especially in swift passages, the quality was occasionally muffled. Pizzicati were very effective.

Mr. Juht's playing avoided the danger of weightiness and often was laudable for sensitiveness and imagination. In the program as a whole more dynamic rise and fall and a greater variety of instrumental timbres would have been desirable. This occasional impression of limited variety was at least partly due to the program, whose first half offered works similar to each other in period and style. The Kornsand sonatina was more interesting as a demonstration of the instrument's possibilities than in itself; the shorter pieces were very agreeable. But the available literature in this field is limited. Mr. Juht was warmly applauded and was called upon for several encores. F. D. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The audience had a good time at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. It liked Aaron Copland's new Third Symphony. Or, at least, the end of it, in which the clanging of bells was added to the din of brass and assorted percussion. It liked also Erica Morini, notable violinist, who was making her first local appearance with the orchestra in the Concerto of Tchaikovsky. No less did it like the Concerto itself, with its excitements and its fruity tunes, and most of the members were probably not disturbed by the fact that the Concerto had been heard at Symphony Hall a little less than a year ago, when Mischa Elman was the soloist and Paul Paray conducted. A negligible minority wished that Miss Morini had chosen for her vehicle something a bit more substantial.

There was substance in Mr. Copland's Symphony, but the first impression was that it was not always his own substance. And when it was that, it was not peculiar to this particular work. One recalled Mr. Copland's hit-piece of last season, the music from the ballet, "Appalachian Spring." And not even Mr. Copland can resist the temptation to copy a composer very much in the limelight today, one whose peculiar way of treating the orchestra has become something of an epidemic.

To overstate the case a bit fancifully, you might title the Symphony "Shostakovitch in the Appalachians." Into this mountain retreat come the boys from Mr. Copland's "Rodeo" and also Richard Strauss with the score of his "Thus Spoke Zarathustra" open to the Fugue, "Of Science." In the end, the whole company is transported to Russia to participate in the restoration of the Great Gate at Kiev to music a la Moussorgsky-Ravel ("Pictures at an Exhibition"). Such a summary, while suggestive, is not quite kind to a composer who can handle the materials of composition as well as Mr. Copland can. And, while there are reminiscences and resemblances, as aforesaid, the work is no mere stylistic hodge-podge. It has physiognomy. It is, on the whole, a rather quiet and reflective symphony, with an initial slow movement, a Shostakovitichian touch and another and rather tenuous slow division later on. At intermission time there were those who were prepared to state that the Symphony was a landmark in American music. As to that we must wait and see.

Speaking again of the audience, one member of it suggested that, this being a season of anniversaries, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" ended the program as a mark of disrespect to the recently-executed Nazis. Till, you know, dies on the scaffold. Anyway, Dr. Koussevitzky had already produced him at the first Tuesday evening concert and he will be on the job again Sunday afternoon.

Plaque Is Unveiled at Symphony Hall To Honor Memory of Acoustics Adviser

Honor was done to the memory of Wallace Clement Sabine, acoutical adviser, when a placque citing his achievements was unveiled at Symphony Hall before a group of officials and friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon.

Presentation was made on behalf of the donors by Jerome D. Greene and accepted on the part of the Trustees of the institution by Henry B. Cabot.

In attendance at the brief ceremony was Dr. Jane Kelly Sabine, widow of Professor Sabine and associates of his in his teaching days at Harvard University. A short address was made by Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor.

The placque, an oblong tablet in bronze, is set in the wall of the corridor near the Massachusetts Avenue entrance, at the left of the door which opens to the cross-aisle of the hall. It cites Professor Sabine as Pioneer in Architectural Acoustics, and refers to Symphony Hall as the first auditorium in the world built in known conformity with acoustical laws, and as designed according to Sabine's specifications.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that music after all is more than a wave of sound, mathematically explained, that strikes upon the ear, and is rather something that goes to the heart and makes its impression there. The hall, nevertheless, he has found a fundamental consideration; and halls are of all grades, from very good to very bad.

But speaking broadly of acoustics, he said that each player in an orchestra has his own acoustic question. With a violinist, it resides in an instrument of strings and wood; and with a horn player, in one of metal.

With the conductor, who directs the whole orchestral organism, the question is in the auditorium; and he has made acquaintance with three examples which he regards as fully meeting his desire. One is located in Moscow, dating far back; the second, in Leningrad, likewise old; and the third in Boston, the hall engineered acoustically by Sabine.

TONAL MARATHONS

Long Musical Works May Well Be Cut, But Controversies Sometimes Arise

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

BOTH as a heritage from the past or as the present continuation of an unfortunate tradition—you can have too much of even a good thing—the overlong work of art is still with us. The watchword of our era is brevity. Yet in the theatre we have had Eugene O'Neill's "The Iceman Cometh;" in the concert hall the 7th and 8th Symphonies of Shostakovich; and in the opera house Prokofieff's "War and Peace," which the Metropolitan is considering and which apparently contains enough music to make two operas of ordinary length. I also recall some rather long novels and equally extensive movie versions of the same.

There are three things that conductor or producer can do about one of these dramatic or tonal marathons. He can give it in one piece and let the auditors squirm or perhaps walk out on him; he can split it; or he can cut it. The split method has its clear advantages. No one can cry "sacrilege," and our frail natures are accommodated.

The conventional way of splitting something is to give one act or one part before dinner and the rest afterwards. That is what is now being done in New York with O'Neill's "Iceman" and was done there and elsewhere with his "Strange Interlude."

I have sat through uncut Wagner in this country and not without fatigue. And I have heard these works in festival performances in Munich or Bayreuth, with time out for dinner in the opera house restaurant and for further sustaining of the inner man between acts II and III. Once, at the Tremont Theatre, we had a two-session "Parsifal" (in English) from the realtor-impresario, Henry W. Savage. If that were done today in America the orchestra would have to be paid for two performances, a very practical objection.

* * *

Splitting, however, is entirely practicable in the case of choral works, and Dr. Koussevitzky habitually does Bach's B minor Mass and "St. Matthew" Passion that way. Just why he or any other conductor is so squeamish about having an intermission in the course of a long symphony is something that I can't figure out. It is the obvious solution, whether the composer be Bruckner, Mahler or Shostakovitch. As a matter of fact, when the radio timetable forced his hand, Dr. Koussevitzky thus divided the Shostakovitch 8th and there could be nothing but satisfaction with the result. So far as I know, splitting is never attempted in the case of Handel's "Messiah." You merely get different cuts in different performances, and the same would be true of Meyerbeer's "The Huguenots," if that exceedingly long work were to come back into circulation. Contrary to popular belief, Wagner was not the first long-winded opera composer nor the last.

Cutting is an obvious way out and in some cases an actual necessity, but there may well be protests, both in and out of the public prints. You may feel personally cheated at being deprived of some passage you particularly cherish or it may be merely your sense of justice: the feeling that the composer is entitled to a break. A recent example of really damaging cutting was the performance of "Tannhaeuser" that the Metropolitan gave us last April. Admittedly, some of Wagner's best music is to be found in the revised first scene between Tannhaeuser and Venus, yet each year the Met shears away more and more of it.

* * *

Still more recently the issue has been raised with Dr. Koussevitzky's performances of the Bruckner 8th Symphony. In this curtailed version a work that would normally run to about an hour and a quarter was reduced to something over 50 minutes. Dr. Koussevitzky's contention is that he was doing the composer a service, always an arguable business. However, when Weingartner complained that the finale was too long, Bruckner himself advised him to shorten it, but merely as a temporary expedient. The cut that really distressed me and brought counter-fire from the conductor was one of 102 measures in the Adagio, a saving, according to Dr. Koussevitzky's calculation, of eight minutes and the elimination of "needless repetitions." Yet in the missing portion come measures of exceeding beauty, not found elsewhere, and the second of the movement's three great climaxes. An attentive reader of the program notes might well have wondered what had happened to it. In the current issue of "Chord and Discord," the publication of the Bruckner Society of America, Philip Greeley Clapp speaks of Boston being "a fairly Bruckner-proof city until Karl Muck in 1913 was accused by certain critics of investing the Seventh and Ninth with 'a unity' (whatever that is) which they did not actually possess. This is not to say that Boston had not previously been exposed to Bruckner, but rather to garbled Bruckner; and, as is usual when a work is cut, truncated Bruckner really does seem too long, just as the head and limbs of a large man would seem monstrous if transferred to a child's torso." He may have something there, at that.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Anton Bruckner died 50 years ago yesterday and Dr. Koussevitsky, with more sense of the fitness of things than some of his fellows, marked the occasion with a performance of the Austrian master's Eighth Symphony, last heard here in February, 1939. The "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn served as a curtain-raiser.

According to how you look at it the monumental Symphony of Bruckner was judiciously curtailed or ruthlessly cut. The performance consumed not much over 50 minutes and the piece should last closer to an hour and a quarter. In the case of the Adagio, always the climax of any Bruckner Symphony, it is a shame to omit a single measure. It is all too heavenly. Yet this is a restless age and rather than have his audience grow fidgety a conductor will use the blue pencil. Nevertheless, we have had to endure the entire oppening Adagio of Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony, lasting some 20 minutes; and Bruckner had a great deal more to say and said it a great deal better.

This is no place to rehearse in detail Bruckner's generally acknowledged shortcomings as symhonic composer. And while we of Boston have not been permitted to know his music as well we might, we still have a pretty good idea of what were his special virtues and his particular defects. In the light of yesterday's performance the first movement of the Eighth seemed more closely knit, more unified in structure than the corresponding movements in the other symphonies. Again, the finale is less of an anticlimax than is that of the Seventh, though it may well be objected that solemnity is the keynote of the great Adagio and "Solemn (not fast)" is what Bruckner wrote over the succeeding final division. It is too late to object to Bruckner being the man he was. But you can't help wishing that he had had the knack of writing a finale with some of the get-up-and-go that Beethoven, and even Brahms, have led us to expect.

To turn to Bruckner's merits, we have here, as elsewhere, themes of incomparable strength and beauty, wondrous harmonies and magnificent orchestral sonorotties. This simple, uncouth man spoke with the voices of Beethoven, Schubert and Wagner, not copying them but paralleling their eloquence with his own. Dr. Koussevitsky gave the Symphony a fervent and devoted reading, one in which the many beauties of the music were fully revealed. If the large brass choir was at times over-exuberant, that detail may be corrected this evening. As for Mendelssohn, the "Italian" Symphony has long been one of the most notable accomplishments of conductor and orchestra. No two symphonies could be more different, but both were well received yesterday.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Two strongly contrasting symphonies, Mendelssohn's "Italian" and the Eighth of Anton Bruckner, make up this week's program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitsky chose Bruckner's long and massive work as an observance of the 50th anniversary of the composer's death. Usually such anniversaries have to be recognized within anything from four days to a week, concert schedules being what they are, but this time the conductor was able to hit upon the exact day, since Bruckner died in Vienna Oct. 11, 1896.

It was good that Mr. Koussevitsky settled upon the Eighth rather than the more familiar Seventh or the less admirable Fourth. As for the Ninth, that will come along later in the season when Bruno Walter is here as guest conductor.

Although composed and revised between 1884 and 1890, Bruckner's Eighth has certain aspects that looked considerably ahead of its time. In it you find the same German continuity and logic you find in Brahms or Beethoven, and you find Wagner to be the origin of much of the instrumentation. Yet there is more than that: a certain sense of modernity that led to the more sophisticated and involved style of Mahler and others who followed.

The element native to Bruckner, however, was a sense of emotional naivete, of splendid visions and unworldliness. That element is on every page of the Eighth Symphony. Here, perhaps, is the fact that has kept Bruckner from achieving wide popularity. It very well may be that concert-goers are still confused by the paradox of naive expression set in a complicated and grandiose style, and that it is hard for them to distinguish between Bruckner's highly developed technic and the provincial simplicity of the man himself.

Aven though yesterday's concert was over comparatively early, Mr. Koussevitzky saw fit to make cuts in the first, third and fourth movements. That is, of course, a practical matter and probably wise because modern audiences are reluctant to sit through a piece that takes more than an hour. But cutting does emphasize the episodic (Weingartner called it "terraced") nature of Bruckner's symphonic construction, and makes the Eighth, certainly, seem ever more spreading.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony furnishes not only strong but clever contrast. Mendelssohn was a hundred times lighter than Bruckner, for that was his nature, but at the same time he possessed the same symphonic logic. In the "Italian" Symphony, with its superficial evocation of Mediterranean warmth through the saltarello rhythm and other devices, German logic was put to a strange and effective use.

THE SCREEN

Symphony Concert

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A major, No. 4, "Italian," Op. 90 ....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 8 in C minor ....Bruckner

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert was mainly a commemoration, to the day, of the death of Anton Bruckner, 50 years ago. Thus did we listen to the strains of his eighth Symphony and read, if so minded, many details of his arduous career. This was a fitting thing to do, for whatever the faults of his genius—and they are obvious—there is always to be found in his music nobility of spirit and grandeur of conception. He may at times bore you, but at least you have the feeling of having suffered in a worthy cause.

The key to the Eighth Symphony is the adagio. This long and impressive movement contains the sum of what Bruckner had to say. The finale, therefore, appears as a sort of ponderous excrescence and even the two preceding movements grow dim in retrospect.

To state the other side of the case the tediousness of the Symphony is brought about by Bruckner's habit of repeating and hammering home the obvious. As an English critic once put it: "One more cadence and I'll shoot!" But the essential nobility and spiritual fervor of the man are what remain in the mind after hearing the Eighth Symphony. These qualities were the more deeply impressed on us by the intense and sympathetic interpretation which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave of the score.

The concert opened with the sunny and amiable "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn, doubly well known to Boston audiences by reason of the excellent recording which our orchestra made of it some years ago. The performance yesterday had one or two rough spots, notably in the opening of the Saltarello; but these were minor blemishes on what was mainly a spirited and captivating reading of Mendelssohn's finest Symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first performance of Aaron Copland's Third Symphony; Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto (with Erica Morini as soloist), and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

NEWS OF MUSIC

Boston Orchestra Opens 66th Season With Concert Next Friday Afternoon

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's 66th season and Dr. Koussevitzky's 23rd as its conductor will begin on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. At this pair of concerts and the first of the new Tuesday evening (formerly Monday evening) series, which falls on Oct. 8. Dr. Koussevitzky will offer the relatively brief and rather slight Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which had its American premiere at the Berkshire Festival last August. Since the 50th anniversary of the death of Brahms will come next April he will set the local Brahms ball rolling with the First Symphony and will follow it with No. 3 on Tuesday. The remaining number this week will be Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and the Tuesday program has in its place Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

It was announced here some time ago that Dr. Koussevitzky would conduct only 13 of the 24 pairs of regular concerts and that four of them would fall to Bruno Walter. It has now been disclosed that the other conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and a distinguished newcomer from France, the Alsatian-born Charles Muench, whose regular orchestra is that of the Paris Conservatory. A Frenchman who is no stranger here, Darius Milhaud, will conduct the first performances of a new symphony of his, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and originally slated for last season.

Dr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for that singular composer, Alexander Scriabin, with whom he was once closely associated, has cooled of late. He put the "Poem of Ecstasy" on his very first program and immediately established himself as the unexcelled interpreter of the composer's works. Since I have already promised to pay my respects to the late Paul Rosenfeld, it is doubly to the point at this time to quote a portion of his remarkable summary of Scriabin's orchestral compositions. In the wrong hands, and sometimes in Mr. Rosenfeld's, the impressionistic method of criticism can fly wide of the mark. But in such a passage as the following it can say more in a few words than could be said in pages of technical analysis. The passage in question is to be found in Mr. Rosenfeld's first volume of critical studies, "Musical Portraits," concerned, as was nearly everything that he wrote, with the figures of our own time.

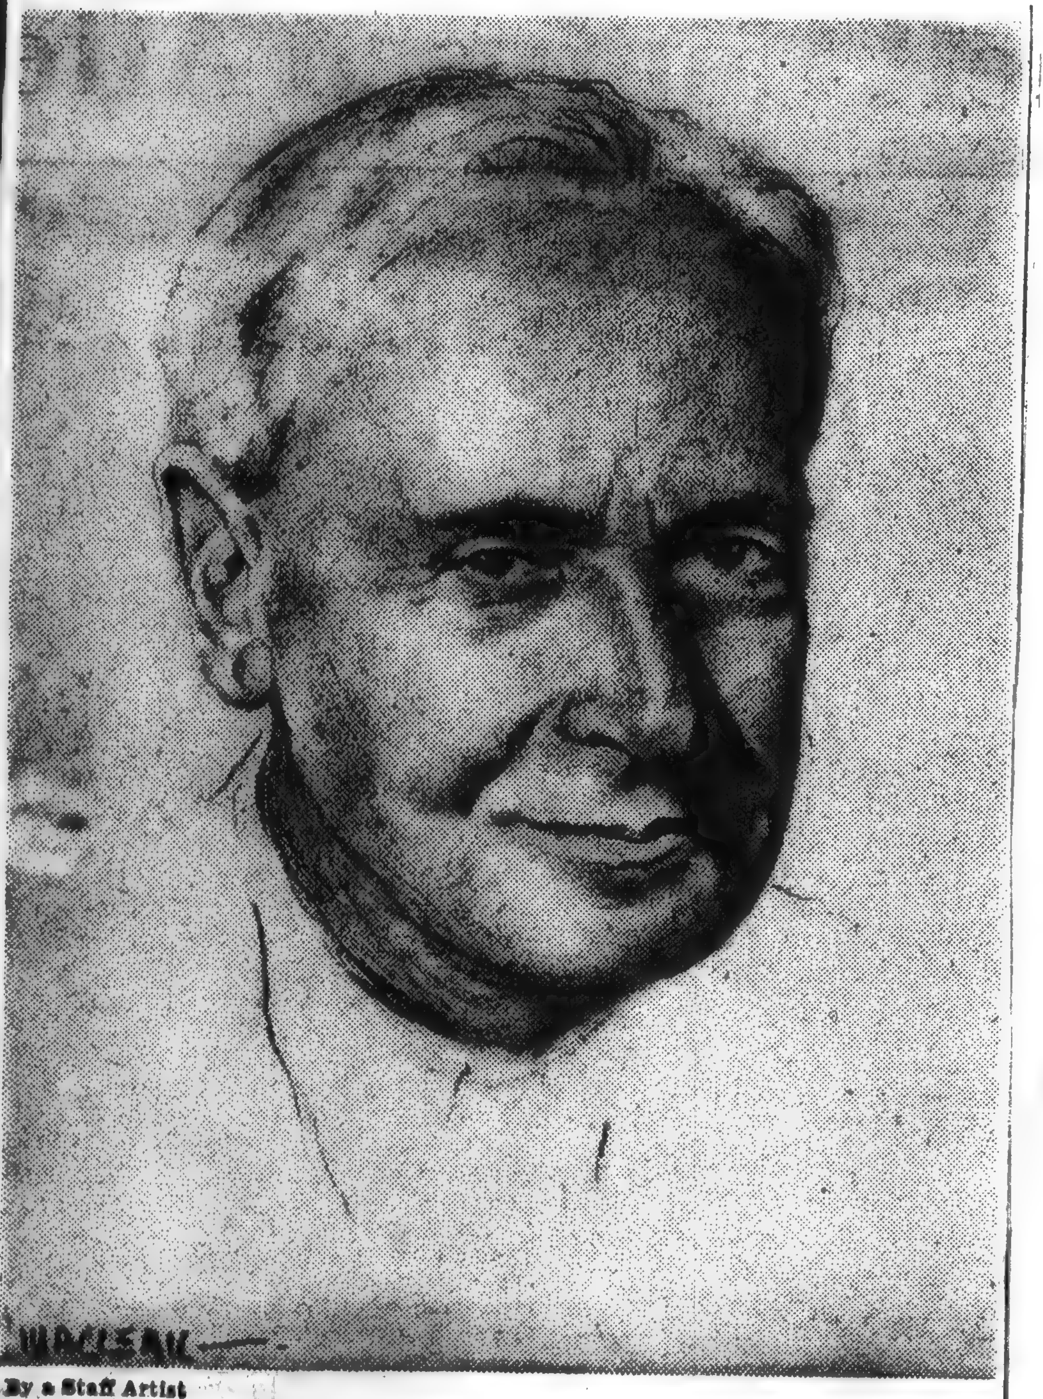
"He had made for himself a curious personal religion, a bizarre mixture of theosophy and neoplatonism and Bergsonian philosophy, a faith that prescribed transport; and these works (symphonic poems) were in part conceived as rituals. They were planned as ceremonies of elevation and deification by ecstacy, in which performers and auditors engaged in active and passive celebrants. Together they were to ascend from plane to plane of delight, experiencing divine struggle and divine bliss and divine creativity. The music was to call the soul through the gate of the sense of hearing, to lead it slowly, hieratically, up through circle after circle of heaven, until the mystical gongs boomed and the mass emotion reached the Father of Souls and was become God."

* * *

As was remarked here the other day, Mr. Rosenfeld was one of the few critics who could write with real understanding about not only one but several arts. He was an artist himself, in Oscar Wilde's sense of the critic as artist; and occasionally his virtuosity led him into a morass. But we can forgive him his bad guesses—we all make them—and his occasional turgidity, his lapses into fine writing and sometimes not far removed from hifalutin, because he had that rare gift of creating a word-picture that was the perfect analogue of the music that inspired it.

I can never think of Scriabin without recalling the passage quoted above, or of Sibelius, without being reminded of the eulogy of his music in the same volume: ". . . it is blood brother to the wind and the silence, to the lowering cliffs and the spray, to the harsh crying of seabirds and the breath of the fog, and, set amid them, would wax, and take new strength from the strength of its kin . . ." Yet a quarter of a century later, reproaching the conductors for their neglect of Milhaud, he could write: "It is they who have turned aside toward the second-rate, in especial toward the music of that overstuffed bard, Jan Sibelius, unto the latest bray."

We think of contemporary criticism as the sort of thing that detected barbarism in Mozart, lunacy in Beethoven and Wagner, acerbity in the gentle Mendelssohn. Mr. Rosenfeld, and it did no great harm, leaned the other way. For him newness was very nearly synonymous with excellence.



By a Staff Artist

Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his twenty-third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the concerts of Oct. 4-5 in Symphony Hall, Boston. This will be the orchestra's sixty-sixth year.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By JOHN W. RILEY

Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's able associate conductor, made his first appearance of the season in that capacity in Symphony Hall last evening. His program was a well balanced sampling of old and new, of music in various moods, all expertly played.

First there was an Handel Concerto Grosso—in this case, Op. 6, No. 10 in D minor—which always makes good preparation for most anything to folllow. Then came Prokofieff's Suite from the Ballet, "Chout," which hasn't been done here since 1938. This is sharp, clean-cut music, imaginative in every respect and very good fun to hear.

After the interval Mr. Burgin played for the first time in Boston Alexei Haieff's Divertimento. This was quite acceptable and agreeable music, but rather difficult to fathom. Aside from a debt obviously paid to the modern Russians, it lacked a strong character of its own. Still, the Prelude was warm, humid music and the Finale was bright and lively.

Mr. Burgin closed his program, the latter half of which was broadcast by the American Broadcasting Company, with an intense, but well-ordered performance of the Sibelius First Symphony.

'Tale of Tanglewood'• History

"THE TALE OF TANGLEWOOD" by M. A. DeWolfe Howe; (Vanguard Press, $2.00)

With the first post-war festival just getting under way at Tanglewood, this little history of the Boston Symphony's summer home makes a very timely appearance. Mr. Howe, who has become the unofficial historian of the Boston Orchestra, obviously loves Tanglewood, both for its present place in the world of music and for its historic and literary past.

He gives a fascinating glimpse into that past, as he tells of the visit close by of Hawthorne, who immortalized the Berkshire home of the Tappans in his "Wonder Book" and "Tanglewood Tales." We meet not only the Hawthornes, but also such other literary figures of the time as Emerson and Melville.

As for the development of the Berkshire district as a music center, it shoud not come as too great a surprise that it received its first impetus from that great lady of chamber music, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. In 1918 she established at South Mountain her Berkshire Festival of Chamber Music, which this year, for the first time, is included in the regular Tanglewood Festival.

The first full-sized Berkshire Symphonic Festival was held at the Hanna Farm in Stockbridge, and presented the N. Y. Philharmonic Orchestra under Henry Hadley's direction. In 1936 the Boston Symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, played at the Emerson farm in Stockbridge, and it was just a year later that Mrs. Gorham Brooks and Miss Mary Tappan presented Tanglewood to the orchestra as a summer home.

DORIS SPERBER.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The concerts this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in part birthday parties for American composer Howard Hanson, who will be 50 next Monday. In honor of this event Serge Koussevitzky is playing Mr. Hanson's own Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings, and the Variations which Roy Harris composed on the tympani theme from Mr. Hanson's Third Symphony. The program begins with the "Surprise" Symphony by Haydn, and ends with the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Mr. Harris entitled his score "Celebration" and dedicated it to his friend Mr. Hanson. These performances are the first anywhere. Until the printed score is available we shall have to wait to know just how Mr. Harris went about fabricating his Variations. All the trade secrets he revealed in the program notes may be condensed: They begin fast, become slow, and end fast. (Let no conservative make a pun about their not ending fast enough!)

At any rate, the Variations are a continuous musical fabric, cleanly if now and then noisily scored; cheerful, amiable, and not of an especially recondite style. (Those last two words are fancy reviewers' jargon, meaning the piece isn't overpoweringly discordant.) Beyond all doubt these Variations sound much better than would any group of Mr. Hanson's friends singing "Happy Birthday." But they are also much harder to remember than that ubiquitous tune. Mr. Harris was applauded when he appeared on the stage.

George Laurent, the flute soloist, and Bernard Zighera, harp soloist, lavished their infinite virtuosity and great musicianship upon Mr. Hanson's modest though expertly contrived Serenade, which was added to the program during the week. All hands received cordial approval.

Haydn's luminous "Surprise" Symphony was heard in a performance that was a model of interpretive proportion and executant deftness. With Tchaikovsky Mr. Koussevitzky triumphed again. No one can play Tchaikovsky as he can, with such inward glow and emotional tension. Even the finale, some of the noisiest nonsense ever penned, took on grandeur under the force of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The living are also honored at the Symphony Concerts. A fortnight ago, Dr. Koussevitzky was marking the 50th anniversary of the death of Anton Bruckner. This week's pair of concerts constitutes a slightly premature celebration of the 50th birthday of Howard Hanson, which actually occurs day after tomorrow. Mr. Hanson wasn't there yesterday but his friend, Roy Harris, was to hear the first performance anywhere of "Celebration," his Variations on a Theme from the Hanson Third Symphony. Somewhat disguised, the familiar refrain, "Happy birthday to you," comes just before the end.

Mr. Hanson's theme is more rhythmic than melodic. It is very short and in the Symphony it is carried principally by the kettledrums. Not so much variations in the usual sense as a sort of orchestral improvisation on this energetic motive, the Harris piece, in the composer's own words, "develops an A-B-A form not unlike a large concert scherzo—fast, slow, fast." The distinct flavor of Sibelius, so prominent in this Symphony is not entirely lost in Mr. Harris' development of the theme, for that is what it amounts to. For a considerable distance this development is more convincing than anything in the Symphony itself. In the slow section, Mr. Harris gets a bit involved and toward the end of the piece, just before the "happy birthday" quotation, he drops rather incongruously into the rhythm and general spirit of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," a tune that he has already glorified. The net impression is of a piece not designed too seriously, merely a kind of tonal slapping on the back. But it is some slap, for the orchestra requires 14 woodwinds, a tenor saxophone and euphonium besides the normal brass, a large array of percussion instruments, a piano and the usual strings.

One instrument that Mr. Harris forgot to put in was the harp. However, hard Zighera, the Orchestra's first pist had had his chance just be-

. At the last minute, Dr. Koussey added to the program Mr. Hans own serenade for solo flute, harp strings, a pleasant piece that would well at the Pops. Georges Laurent was the flutist, as expert as ever, and much applauded for his little bit. Familiar symphonies, both for themselves and in Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic interpretations begin and end the current program. They are Haydn's "Surprise" and the Fourth of Tchaikovsky.

Superlative Recording of Tchaikovsky Fifth by Koussevitzky; Other New Items

By CYRUS DURGIN

Before catching up with serious recordings issued for September (and a few left over from August), let's hearken to an unusual announcement from Columbia. To wit: Beginning a week from tomorrow, which will be Sept. 30, that firm will release its Masterworks, albums and singles, on a weekly instead of a monthly basis. In a way this is revolutionary for the serious side of the trade. The initial Masterworks set under the new policy is a "Paris" Album (M-638) of arias and songs about the City of Light, sung by the Metropolitan's Lily Pons.

Since Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is unquestionably the world's premiere interpreter of Tchaikovsky, Victor's new issue of the Russian composer's Fifth Symphony must be the best. What the academic boys call a "definitive version." The orchestra is the Boston Symphony. Tonally, it is marvelously rich. The surfaces are clean, the balance and reproduction in general of the best quality. And the Koussevitzky way with Tchaikovsky—intense beyond description—will be treasured for years. (DM-1057, $6.85.)

Columbia has seen fit to do another Brahms First Symphony—by Artur Rodinski and the New York Philharmonic - Symphony. Mechanically, technically it is excellent; interpretively it is fair, though cool and not too plentiful of nuance. No doubt this surpasses Columbia's Weingartner performance in sheer sound, but as for expression, I'll take the old one. (MM-621, $6.15.)

Seven pseudo-Spanish ballet numbers from the French opera "Le Cid," by Massenet, have been done for Victor by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra. It is too bad that this, one of the more pretentious pops recordings could not have been better. The tone is often rough and hard, and you realize only too well, from the plentiful echoes, that the recording was made in an empty hall. (DM-1058, $3.)

Songs of Mahler

Gustav Mahler's unique "Songs of a Wayfarer," put out by Columbia, also deserved a finer job. By Negro contralto Carol Brice; conductor Fritz Reiner and the Pittsburgh Symphony, this is adequate but no more. To be sure, the orchestra sounds well and Mr. Reiner is a good man with Mahler, but Miss Brice's voice is uneven of tone and she affords only a shadow of the deep emotional expression these songs ought to have. (MX-267, $3.)

Haydn's C major Symphony No. 97 (No. 1 of the Salomon series) is seldom played today. On discs it had existed in this country only in an old, imported and now discontinued Victor set. Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic have done it anew for the same company. No model either of delicacy or imagination, it nevertheless is hearty and competent. (DM-1059, $3.85.)

Any day now I'm going to count the items in the record catalogues (O yes!) to prove my hunch that Wagner is the most recorded composer. Well, here's some more, the last scene of the first act in "Die Walkuere." The singers are the Metropolitan's soprano Helen Traubel and tenor Emery Darcy; the orchestra the New York Philharmonic, Artur Rodzinski conducting. This scene includes the arias of Siegmund and Sieglinde and the music of the drawing of the sword. In all respects the album is fair, yet flawed vocalizing and conductorial tepidity keep it from reaching top grade. (Columbia MM-618, $4.05.)

If you like the way soprano Jeanette MacDonald sings, you'll find pleasure in Victor's M-1071 ($3), which is a collection of operetta arias. Miss MacDonald renders two numbers each by Victor Herbert, Jerome Kern and Rudolf Friml, with orchestra and chorus to help out.

The thousands who crowd the concert halls every year for the Don Cossacks' concerts are herewith advised of Columbia's M-619

Records

(Continued on Next Page)

Items Concerning Music; Symphony Broadcasts Changed

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Various odd items of musical news will have to supplant the usual sermon in this space, since they are rather more pressing than reviews of books or records or abstract critical opinion. First of all there is the interesting change in the Boston Symphony's radio contract. The old Saturday night broadcasts are off, and instead the orchestra will be on the air for an hour each Tuesday from 9:30 to 10:30 P. M. starting October 8. Actually the Boston Symphony management was able to effect this rather sweeping change in its schedule with more ease than might at first seem possible. The six Monday night concerts have been shifted to Tuesday with only one upset, so that there will be two concerts in the series in October and then none until January from which point they will be monthly. Secondly, the regular series of eight concerts in Cambridge will be similarly changed and thirdly the Providence concerts are conveniently on Tuesdays anyway. The few remaining concerts to round out the radio contract will be made up on the road during the orchestra's tours.

I must say that I am delighted at this change. For some time it has been pointed out that the programs of the regular series have frequently suffered artistically and ideally because of having to be tailored to the strict demands of radio time. It meant in sum that the longer part of the program came after the intermission, a debatable practice, and that modern music was almost always relegated to the opening. Once last winter when President Truman was to speak Saturday night we had one course knocked out of our musical repast. Now, to be sure, it will be the subscribers to the subsidiary series who will occasionally suffer. But it is better so. In the first place the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts are the foundation and standard on and by which the orchestra lives, and thus the programs should be subject to no other consideration than that of making them the finest possible. Secondly, not so much modern music is played at the subsidiary series, so that it will be much easier to arrange a suitable, if rather conventional, hour of music each week for the radio public.

Since I am on the subject of radio I listened last Sunday to the 200th broadcast over C. B. S. by our celebrated local organist, Mr. E. Power Biggs. He is currently engaged in playing all the organ music of Handel, as he has done in the past with Bach. Last Sunday he had the assistance of the Fiedler Sinfonietta in the presentation of the first and second of Handel's organ concertos. Mr. Biggs uses the baroque organ, a modern reconstruction of the remarkable instruments for which Bach, Handel and the great 17th century German organists composed. Altogether this is an excellent opportunity to become acquainted with a field of music about which the general public knows all too little. The only out about the broadcasts is that they occur from 9:15 to 9:45 in the morning, which makes it awkward for those music lovers who happen to reserve Sunday morning for sleep.

The 87th annual music festival at Worcester comes rather late this year, from Oct. 14 through Oct. 19. The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting, the Worcester Festival Chorus and a long list of soloists will participate. On the whole the programs do not depart very far from the well-tried symphonic repertoire. There is one notable exception for which I certainly intend to make the trip to Worcester on Thursday, Oct. 17, to hear. That is Prokofieff's Cantata Op. 78, "Alexander Nevsky," for mixed chorus, mezzo-soprano solo and orchestra. The work has been recorded by Columbia, but it has had no local performance.

Harvard University releases the news of the appointment of that great musical scholar, Otto Kinkeldey, as visiting lecturer in music under the Horation Appleton Lamb Fund. Past lecturers have included Georges Enesco, Gustav Holst, Hugo Leichtentritt, Bela Bartok and Aaron Copland. For two summers about 10 or a dozen years ago I sat at Mr. Kinkeldey's feet and imbibed the wisdom that he fascinatingly imparted. For many years he taught at Cornell, and I am glad that Harvard has at last secured him for a position of more prominence than teacher in the summer school.

MUSIC: Moses Smith

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first concert of the season last Friday, sounded as good as ever. It displayed the familiar virtuosity, tonal brilliance and beauty, and wide range of tonal colors. Hearing it in the flesh, instead of over the radio and records as I have in recent months, I was again captivated by its manifold virtues.

SMITH

The same goes for Koussevitzky, who in his 73rd year, displays the wonted superlative drive and enkindling imagination. His presentation of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," for example, a miracle of careful planning for orchestral effect and climax, had, for the listener, the freshness of the performance on the occasion of Koussevitzky's debut here 22 years ago or what must have been its freshness when he first presented it in St. Petersburg and Moscow in his first Russian season of conducting, 1909-10. Watching Koussevitzky, indeed, as he drove the musicians imperiously on, one had the illusion of looking at a young man in his thirties.

The miracle of Koussevitzky is not to be explained readily, and I certainly shall not attempt to explain it in 800 words. It is easier, on the other hand, to tell why his orchestra plays as well at the beginning of the season, after only a few rehearsals, as in mid-season, after many. It is because the great majority of the musicians have played together and—even more important—with Koussevitzky for year after year so that, rather than following his commands, they seem to anticipate them. They resemble a first-rate jazz orchestra. They are in the groove.

There have been changes in personnel, of course, and there will be more, for the body of men whom Koussevitzky engaged in his early years here and with whom he reshaped the orchestra have aged along with their leader. At the opening concert there were seven musicians who had not appeared in the orchestra at the end of last season.

Two had returned from the war to take up their old places. One of the additions was in the first violin section to replace Alfred Krips, who had moved up to the important post of assistant concert-master, replacing the retired Theodorovicz. There is a new first oboe, J. Holmes, in place of Gillet ,also retired. A new horn player, J. Stagliano, comes to lead the second quartet and occasionally alternate (as he did in the Brahms First Symphony last week) with W. Valkenier as first horn. The other new men are a trumpet player and second violinist. The new first oboist and trumpet player, it may be noted in passing, are former students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

There is spectial significance in the selection of the first oboist. The orchestra has in recent years steadily added to its rank of American-born and American-trained musicians. (It is not many years since the orchestra was a foreign institution). But, so far as I am aware, young Holmes is the first native section leader of the orchestra. Whether he makes good or not, I think it's about time for the change. I think we have finally arrived at the point where some of our conservatories can produce not only first-class technicians (as they have been doing for some years now) but also first-class musicians. At any rate, we must, once and for all, give up our reliance on periodic supplies from abroad. If America is not now able to stand on its own musical feet, it will never be able to.

I should like to make a brief addendum to the effect that, hearing the Shostakovitch Ninth Symphony for the first time, I found it enjoyable. It is not a long work, like its predecessors, but it is not so slight, either in length or in substance, as I had been led to expect. It is a thoroughly mature work. In method and manner it harks back much to the composer's youth—as far back as the First Symphony, written in his teens, and the 'Cello Sonata. But while it has some of their freshness and even impudence, the controlling hand of a master is now evident

---

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

OCT 2 - 1946

Russians Refuse Bid to Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

OCT 2 - 1946

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony, revealed that two of the most famous Russian composers have refused to serve as guest conductors of the orchestra. The men who said no to Koussevitzky's invitation to guest-lead are Serge Prokofieff, best known possibly for his whimsical, "Peter and the Wolf," and Dmitri Shostakovitch, whose symphonies drew American raves. Asked why Koussevitzky shrugged, "Perhaps their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country. Propaganda in the papers against Russia is terrific. Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until conditions between the countries are more settled."

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

OCT 2 - 1946

★ ★ ★

BACK ON THE AIR starting Oct. 8, the Boston Symphony orchestra again will be heard weekly at 9:30 p. m. over ABC-WGBS.

The broadcasts, covering a period of about 40 weeks, will include the ensemble's regular winter season, the summer "Pops" and Esplanade concerts, and some of the annual Tanglewood festival programs next summer. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his 22nd season as conductor, will be at the podium for most of the broadcasts.

★ ★ ★

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

OCT 2 - 1946

RUSSIANS REFUSE

Will Not Lead Boston Symphony In Playing Their Compositions

Boston, Oct. 2 (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

OCT 2 1946

Russian Composers Refuse To Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 2, (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston symphony orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

This Clipping From
UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
OCT 2 - 1946

Rochester Man In Orchestra

Boston—(AP)—A native-born American has been installed as a "first desk" player for the first time in the 66-year history of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, announced yesterday.

Koussevitsky—at the conclusion of the orchestra's first 1946 rehearsal—said 28-year-old John Holmes of Rochester, N. Y., would play first oboe.

The conductor explained that "first desk" is orchestra jargon for a leading instrument position.

Holmes studied at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester and with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony for several summer seasons at Tanglewood, Lenox.

The orchestra will open its 1946 season Friday afternoon featuring the new Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch and "Poem of Ecstacy" by Alexander Scriabin.

This Clipping From
CLINTON, MASS.
ITEM

OCT 2 - 1946

Boston, Oct. 2 (INS)—Greater Boston music lovers were disappointed today by news that Shostakovich and Prokofieff, great modern Russian composers, have declined invitations to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed he had invited both to lead the orchestra in their compositions, this season, as a means of improving relations between Russia and the United States.

At first, he said, they indicated they would accept the invitation. Koussevitzky said they later sent their "regrets."

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in G major No. 94, "Surprise" .... Haydn
Serenade for solo flute, harp and strings .... Hanson
"Celebration," Variations on a theme by Howard Hanson .... Harris
Symphony No. 4 in F-minor, Op. 36 .... Tchaikovsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The best music yesterday for my money was the Haydn Symphony, familiar though it be. The performance was particularly delightful, and, as the "surprise" element is no longer anything more than a dear old chestnut, we can concentrate on the eternal beauty and strength of the music and enjoy it to the full.

Nevertheless, Haydn was not meant to be the hero of the concert. That niche was reserved for Dr. Howard Hanson and the celebration of his 50th birthday. Hanson's importance to American music is universally acknowledged; but it is surely based on education not creation, though goodness knows he has written enough. In Rochester and elsewhere he has always encouraged American composers and has played their music in festivals and concerts. It was for these services that Mr. Roy Harris unleashed at the end of his Variations the strains of "Happy birthday, dear teacher, happy birthday to you!"

I am sure that this was intended in a spirit of affectionate reverence, but all the same the new work seemed to me rather an embarrassing tribute. It is a heavy-handed and rather messy scherzo, with an extraordinarily thick orchestral texture. Nor is the theme from Hanson's excessively Sibelian Third Symphony a very suitable one for variations. Perhaps if we had not heard the Copland Symphony last week Harris' piece, which was also played for the first time, would have sounded more attractive. As it is I should rate it as one of Harris' lesser achievements. Mr. Harris was in the hall yesterday and acknowledge the applause.

Previously we heard something from Dr. Hanson's own pen, a Serenade, in which Mr. Laurent distinguished himself as solo flutist. In this work, which was written in 1945, he harks back, not to his adored Sibelius, but to the sort of French music that was being written in the conservatories before the last war. The piece is pleasant enough for the combination and ends with a neat twist, but I don't think even flutists are going to clamor for it to be repeated.

One of Koussevitzky's favorite war-horses, the Tchaikovsky 4th Symphony, brought the concert to a close which had the audience howling with rapture. The finale was taken at the usual break-neck pace and each climax was more rousing than the previous one. It was the sort of performance that fetches the public in droves, and the orchestra can certainly bring it off. At that let us leave it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Richard Burgin will conduct the following program: Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor; Revueltas' "Cuanahuac"; Prokofieff's Suite from "Chout"; Sibelius' Symphony No. 1.

---

a very large audience which included Archbishop Cushing. For their appearance, which was presented by Aaron Richmond, in association with the League of Catholic Women, the group of about 40 boys sang a program of both religious and secular songs.

Most successful, perhaps, were the simple ecclesiastical numbers which opened the concert, sung without accompaniment. In Palestrina's "O Bone Jesu," Lotti's "Regina Coeli" and M. Haydn's "In Monte Oliveti," the voices had a solemn purity that was most effective. Franck's "Panis Angelicus," sung as a soprano solo by three very serious youngsters, did not fare so well, as it was dragged out too long and lacked the carrying quality it required.

The most ambitious offering was a group of sections from Faure's lovely Requiem, which suffered from lack of an orchestral background. Both audience and singers seemed to get a great deal of enjoyment from the less serious selections which comprised the latter half of the program.

During the intermission a brief talk was given by Father Flanagan, who explained the aims of the organization at Boys' Town. The choir will make a second and final appearance at Symphony Hall on next Thursday evening.

D W S

TORONTO, CANADA
STAR
OCT 2 - 1946

RUSSIAN MAESTROS SPURN BOSTON VISIT

Boston, Oct. 2—(AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimtri Shostavovich at first indicated they wound accept, but later sent their "regrets."

Boston's Greatest Book Fair Opens at Symphony Hall, Oct. 14

(Continued from First Page)

have their day at a special Thursday matinee.

Vincent Sheean, famed correspondent, Elliott Roosevelt, biographer of his father, two opening-night speakers, and Dr. Gordon Seagrave, who will appear on Wednesday, Oct. 16, are a sampling of the brilliant names that have been assembled from all parts of the world for the fair. Dr. Seagrave, beloved "Burma Surgeon," will arrive in Boston on the last leg of a long flight from Rangoon.

VIEWS CROSS-SECTION

The opening program on Monday afternoon will present a cross-section of world views, with Harrison Salisbury, author of "Russia on the Way," Mbonu Ojike, African author of "My Africa," and Ben Kuroki, young Japanese-American author of "Boy from Nebraska," as speakers. Russell Janney, author of the tremendously popular "Miracle of the Bells," will also speak at this session.

The Book Fair will end with the traditional Sports Night, with H. Allen Smith, popular humorist and author of "Rhubarb," among the speakers. The complete program will be announced in next Sunday's Herald.

By Oct. 14, the opening day of the Book Fair, the foyers of Symphony Hall will be transformed into "A Street of Books," in which 22 co-operating book stores will each have their own distinctive display. The doors will be open at 1:30 in the afternoon, and at 7 in the evening, so that Book Fair crowds will be able to do their window shopping in advance of each speaking session, and vote for their favorite display. An award will be presented to the book store having the most popular window. An art exhibit, comprising a priceless collection of American water colors and drawings, will be on view during the four days of the fair.

SEATS RESERVED

As usual, speaking sessions will begin at 3 o'clock in the afternoon except on Thursday afternoon, when the children's program will begin at a special time to be announced later) and at 8:15 in the evening. Tickets will go on sale Tuesday at co-operating book stores in all parts of New England, at Symphony Hall, and at the Boston Book Fair box office, 80 Mason street, Boston. Tickets for all sessions, except for the children's program, with a special price of 15 cents, will be 50 cents, and all seats will be reserved.

The following book stores are co-operating in the Book Fair:

Bay Colony; Beacon Press; The Book Shop, Providence; Dartmouth Bookstall; Denholm & McKay, Worcester; DeWolfe & Fiske Company; Irving F. Ephraim, Worcester; Gilchrist's; Goodspeed's Book Shop; Grover-Cronin; Norman Alexander Hall; Harvard Co-operative Society; Hathaway House Bookshop; C. F. Hovey & Co.; H. S. Hutchinson & Co., New Bedford; Lauriat's; Jordan Marsh Company; Methodist Publishing Company; The Old Corner Book Store; Personal Book Shops; Phillips Book Store; Smith & McCance; Tory Row Book Shop; Mary Spaulding's, Winchester; Vendome Book Shop; The Village Bookstall, Weston; R. H. White Company; Williams Book Store and Pius XI Co-operative Society.

COMMITTEE NAMED

The Boston Book Fair Committee, headed by Alice Dixon Bond, Chairman of Arrangements, who will preside at all sessions of the fair, and Milton E. Lord, Honorary Chairman, is made up of the following members:

Charles Francis Adams, Mrs. Harriet Warner Baxter, Dr. Bancroft Beatly, Daniel Bloomfield, Erwin Canham, Dr. Leonard Carmichael, Channing Cox, the Most Rev. Richard J. Cushing, archbishop of Boston; Richard E. Danielson, the Rev. Frederick May Eliot, Francis J. Flagg, Miss Beulah Folmsbee, Dr. Claude M. Fuess, Mrs. William Lloyd Garrison, Mrs. Vincent L. Greene, Mrs. Harvey E. Greenwood, Mrs. Samuel Hallowell, Mark A. DeWolfe Howe, Dr. Edith L. Hurd, Mrs. Wallace Starr King, Henry A. Laughlin, Dr. Joshua Loth Liebman, rabbi of Temple Israel; Mrs. Thomas Mahoney, George E. Minot, Benjamin Ticknor, Ben Ames Williams, Mrs. A. Kingsley Porter, John Marquand, Dr. Daniel L. Marsh, Mrs. Pasquale E. Massa, Mrs. Bertha Mahony Miller, William Dana Orcutt, Miss Dorothy Rackemann, Stuart Rand, Kenneth Roberts, Stanley Salmen, Mrs. Joseph E. Scanlon, the Rt. Rev. Henry Knox Sherrill, presiding bishop of the Episcopal church, and Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

BOSTON BOOK FAIR COMMITTEE MEMBERS DISCUSS PLANS—Part of a group of Boston natables who attended a recent luncheon meeting to formulate plans for the 1946 Book Fair. Standing, from left to right, are Dr. Frederick May Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Society; Dr. Leonard Carmichael, president of Tufts College, and Dr. Bancroft Beatly, president of Simmons College. Seated are Daniel Bloomfield, manager of the Retail Trade Board, and Mrs. Joseph E. Scanlon, president of the Boston City Federation of Organizations.

Clark to Add

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 2 - 1946

Lead in Boston Orchestra To American for 1st Time

By The Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 1—A native-born American has been installed as a "first desk" player for the first time in the sixty-six-year history of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, announced today.

Dr. Koussevitzky, after the orchestra's first rehearsal of the season—said John Holmes, 28, of Rochester, N. Y., would play first oboe. The conductor explained that "first desk" is orchestra jargon for a leading instrument position.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
OCT 2 - 1946

Ex-City Oboist Sets Precedent

John Holmes, 28, a former Eastman School of Music student, has been installed as a "first desk" player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky yesterday.

It is the first time a native-born musician has held the position in the 66-year history of the orchestra. Holmes, who will play first oboe, studied with the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitsky for several summer seasons at Tanglewood, Mass.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
OCT 2 1946

Koussevtizky Gets "Regrets" From Red Composers

BROOKLINE, (U.P.) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has revealed that two of Russia's most prominent symphonic composers declined to serve as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season "probably because of unsettled conditions" between their native land and the United States.

The Boston Symphony conductor, an exile from Russia after the 1917 revolution, said he had invited Serge Prokofieff and Dmitri Shostakovitch to lead the Boston orchestra in their own compositions. At first, both signified their "regrets." Several Soviet soloists did likewise, he said.

Asked why the Russians had changed their plans, Koussevitzky replied:

"Perhaps their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad. The propaganda in the papers here against Russia is terrific. Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until conditions between the two countries are more settled."

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
OCT 2 - 1946

Soviet Composers Sprun U. S. Bid Until Rift Heals

Brookline, Mass., Oct. 1 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky said tonight two of Russia's most prominent symphony composers won't serve as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra until conditions between the two nations are "more settled."

Koussevitzsky, a Russian-born American, said he invited Serge Prokofieff and Dmitri Shostakovitch to lead the orchestra in their own compositions.

They signified intentions of accepting, but later sent "regrets," he asserted.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
OCT 1 - 1946

Juht: Fine Musicianship

Every once in a great while, from the depths of the symphonic string bass section, there comes an individual player who has the equipment and desire to give a solo recital.

Such a bassist is Judwig Juht (Yoohit), of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who played a program of classic and modern works in Town Hall last Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Juht is a very proficient bassist and showed fine musicianship in his recital.

Solo bass literature is very limited and the Corelli and Vivaldi works on the program, though standard bass solos, were originally written for a much smaller instrument. They are spirited and interesting compositions, but lie rather high and do not make enough use of the whole range of the modern string bass. The works of Koussevitzky and Mr. Juht's own compositions were specially written for bass and exploit the instrument more fully. They were light and melodic in character and beautifully played.

The first performance of a Sonata by Kornsand for bass and piano was a feature of the program. This work is well suited to the instrument and afforded moments of interest and beauty. The composer was present and shared the applause of the small audience which, by the way, seemed to consist of all the bass players in New York who happened to have the free time that afternoon.

Valentin Pavlovsky accompanied and played the piano part of the Kornsand piece with great taste.

MURRAY CHASE.

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
OCT 1946

Quintet from "Peter Grimes," reading clock-fashion from conductor Leonard Bernstein's back: Eric Crozier, who co-directed it, Benjamin Britten, who composed it, Aaron Copland, who lauded it, and Serge Koussevitzky, whose Foundation ordered it in 1941

At the first American performance of the opera "Peter Grimes" in Lenox, Britain's Benjamin Britten and Crozier are applauded by Bernstein and a cast of students. The text, based by Montagu Slater and Britten on a poem by Crabbe, "The Borough," is as exciting as the melodic invention of the music

PHOTOS BY RUTH ORKIN

Globe Oct. 2, 1946 THE

Fear of Reaction Bars U. S. Visit of Soviet Artists—Koussevitzky

By CYRUS DURGIN

"All those who seek for peace and friendship must want good relations with Russia," asserted Serge Koussevitzky yesterday. The conductor of the Boston Symphony said it in the living room of his own Brookline home in the middle of a press conference about his plans for the orchestra's 66th season, which will begin at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon.

The subject had come up when, in response to a question, Mr. Koussevitzky replied that two foremost Soviet composers, Dimitri Shostakovich and Sergei Prokofieff, would not be coming to the United States this season. There had been rumors that the former might journey over here to hear his new Ninth Symphony, which, performed at "Tanglewood" last Summer, will be on the opening Symphony program this week.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave it as his belief that Prokofieff and Shostakovich, together wth a violinist and conductor invited to his country, could not come because of difficult relations between the United States and the Soviet.

"It may be that the authorities there feel that these musicians might not be well received here. Certainly the propaganda in the papers here against Russia has been terrific."

Urges Ministry of Fine Arts

Looking ruddy and fit, the Russian-born conductor who has been an American citizen for a number of years, seemed to be in a disputatious mood. He spoke his mind too, about good music on the radio and the function of government in supporting music.

"There is not enough good music on the radio. The government should do something. There should be a Ministry of Fine Arts to encourage and support music. You know, of course, about the radio in England. There everyone who has a receiving set has to pay for it, and the British Broadcasting Corporation controls the programs.

"In the United States there should be an opera and an orchestra in every state. I do not think that musicians would consider they were being regimented if there were a government Ministry of Fine Arts

Eastman School "Best Conservatory"

Mr. Koussevitsky also paid high compliments to the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y.

He plans during the season to honor the director of the Eastman School, Howard Hanson, by performing Roy Harris' Variations on a Theme by Howard Hanson. The work is dedicated to Hanson for his 50th birthday.

John Holmes, a 28-year-old product of Eastman and of Koussevitzky's own Berkshire Music Center, has been appointed first oboe of the Boston Symphony. Holmes is the first American — both by birth and training — to occupy a first desk in the entire history of the Boston Symphony. Holmes will succeed Fernand Gillet, who was the young man's teacher for three Summers at the Berkshire Music Center.

Alfred Krips, announced Mr. Koussevitzky, has been chosen to succeed Julius Theodorowicz as assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Krips has been a member of the orchestra for several years.

New Works to Be Heard

A number of new works will be given first performance anywhere during the season to come. These include the Third Symphony by Aaron Copland (American); the Brazilian Guarnieri's First Symphony; Second Symphony by Darius Milhaud (French); a Symphony by the French Olivier Messaien, and the Third Symphony by Walter Piston of the Harvard University Music Department.

The other new works will include "The Song of Songs," with a soprano solo on a text from the Old Testament, by Lukas Foss, pianist of the Boston Symphony. There also will be the Harris Variations aforementioned; a Concerto in G minor for Organ with Strings and Kettledrums by the French Poulenc, and Metamorphosen, latest composition by the aged German composer, Richard Strauss, written for 23 strings.

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS
OCT 2 1946

REFUSE INVITATIONS TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Oct. 2, (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda....against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 2 - 1946

Soviet Composers Reject Boston Offer

Boston, Oct. 2.—(AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda * * * against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

(Dr. Koussevitzky, however, said his orchestra would play Shostakovich's ninth symphony here Friday and Saturday as scheduled, the United Press reported.

(Koussevitzky said his orchestra also would broadcast the ninth symphony from Providence, over a coast-to-coast network Oct. 15, as scheduled.

(In Moscow, Nestiev said in Culture and Life, a newspaper published by the agitation and propaganda committee of the Communist party's central committee, that Shostakovich's latest work has ideological weaknesses and does not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people.)

BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL
OCT 2 - 1946

Russian Composers Won't Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Oct. 2.—(AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda . . . against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

AUSTIN, TEXAS
TEXAN
OCT 2 1946

American Culture Mature Says Famed Columnist

Commenting on the Tanglewood Festival held in the Berkshire Hills of Massachussetts this summer, Columnist George E. Solkosky said that American culture is as mature as any in the world.

He based his opinion on the repeated success of the Tanglewood Festival. Year after year, people from all over the country gather in a mountain setting to hear great music. More than ten thousand people heard the Boston Symphony this summer under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

The people who traveled thousands of miles to hear this music are proof of America's advanced culture said Mr. Solkosky.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
OCT 2 1946

Soviet Composers Reject Bids To Boston

BOSTON (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Shostakovich at first indicated Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their deception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda . . . against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS
OCT 2 - 1946

DECLINE BID TO LEAD SYMPHONY

Soviet Composers Not to Conduct Hub's Concerts

BROOKLINE, Oct. 2—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has revealed that two of Russia's most prominent symphonic composers declined to serve as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season "probably because of unsettled conditions" between their native land and the United States.

The Boston Symphony conductor, an exile from Russia after the 1917 revolution, said he had invited Serge Prokofieff and Dmitri Shostakovitch to lead the Boston orchestra in their own compositions. At first, both signified their intentions of accepting the invitations, he said, but later sent their "regrets." Several Soviet soloists did likewise, he said.

Asked why the Russians had changed their plans, Koussevitzky replied:

"Perhaps their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad. The propaganda in the papers here against Russia is terrific. Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until conditions between the two countries are more settled."

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
OCT 1946

Quintet fro[illegible] reading clock-fashion from conductor Leonard Bernstein's backs Eric Crozier, who co-directed it, Benjamin Britten, who composed it, Aaron Copland, who lauded it, and Serge Koussevitzky, whose Found[illegible] it in 1941

At the first American performance of the opera "Peter Grimes" in Lenox, Britain's Benjamin Britten and Crozier are applauded by Bernstein and a cast of students. The text, based by Montagu Slater and Britten on a poem by Crabbe, "The Borough," is as exciting as the melodic invention of the music

PHOTOS BY RUTH ORKIN

Globe Oct. 2, 1946 THE

Fear of Reaction Bars U. S. Visit of Soviet Artists—Koussevitzky

By CYRUS DURGIN

"All those who seek for peace and friendship must want good relations with Russia," asserted Serge Koussevitzky yesterday. The conductor of the Boston Symphony said it in the living room of his own Brookline home in the middle of a press conference about his plans for the orchestra's 66th season, which will begin at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon.

The subject had come up when, in response to a question, Mr. Koussevitzky replied that two foremost Soviet composers, Dimitri Shostakovich and Sergei Prokofieff, would not be coming to the United States this season. There had been rumors that the former might journey over here to hear his new Ninth Symphony, which, performed at "Tanglewood" last Summer, will be on the opening Symphony program this week.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave it as his belief that Prokofieff and Shostakovich, together wth a violinist and conductor invited to his country, could not come because of difficult relations between the United States and the Soviet.

"It may be that the authorities there feel that these musicians might not be well received here. Certainly the propaganda in the papers here against Russia has been terrific."

Urges Ministry of Fine Arts

Looking ruddy and fit, the Russian-born conductor who has been an American citizen for a number of years, seemed to be in a disputatious mood. He spoke his mind too, about good music on the radio and the function of government in supporting music.

"There is not enough good music on the radio. The government should do something. There should be a Ministry of Fine Arts to encourage and support music. You know, of course, about the radio in England. There everyone who has a receiving set has to pay for it, and the British Broadcasting Corporation controls the programs.

"In the United States there should be an opera and an orchestra in every state. I do not think that musicians would consider they were being regimented if there were a government Ministry of Fine Arts

Eastman School "Best Conservatory"

Mr. Koussevitsky also paid high compliments to the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y.

He plans during the season to honor the director of the Eastman School, Howard Hanson, by performing Roy Harris' Variations on a Theme by Howard Hanson. The work is dedicated to Hanson for his 50th birthday.

John Holmes, a 28-year-old product of Eastman and of Koussevitzky's own Berkshire Music Center, has been appointed first oboe of the Boston Symphony. Holmes is the first American — both by birth and training — to occupy a first desk in the entire history of the Boston Symphony. Holmes will succeed Fernand Gillet, who was the young man's teacher for three Summers at the Berkshire Music Center.

Alfred Krips, announced Mr. Koussevitzky, has been chosen, to succeed Julius Theodorowicz as assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Krips has been a member of the orchestra for several years.

New Works to Be Heard

A number of new works will be given first performance anywhere during the season to come. These include the Third Symphc by Aaron Copland (American); the Brazilian Guarnieri's First Symphony; Second Symphony by Darius Milhaud (French); a Symphony by the French Olivier Messaien, and the Third Symphony by Walter Piston of the Harvard University Music Department.

The other new works will include "The Song of Songs," with a soprano solo on a text from the Old Testament, by Lukas Foss, pianist of the Boston Symphony. There also will be the Harris Variations aforementioned; a Concerto in G minor for Organ with Strings and Kettledrums by the French Poulenc, and Metamorphosen, latest composition by the aged German composer, Richard Strauss, written for 23 strings.

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS
OCT 2 1946

REFUSE INVITATIONS TO LEAD ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Oct. 2, (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda . . . against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 2 - 1946

Soviet Composers Reject Boston Offer

Boston, Oct. 2.—(AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Ser[illegible]zky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda * * * against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

(Dr. Koussevitzky, however, said his orchestra would play Shostakovich's ninth symphony here Friday and Saturday as scheduled, the United Press reported.

(Koussevitzky said his orchestra also would broadcast the ninth symphony from Providence, over a coast-to-coast network Oct. 15, as scheduled.

(In Moscow, Nestiev said in Culture and Life, a newspaper published by the agitation and propaganda committee of the Communist party's central committee, that Shostakovich's latest work has ideological weaknesses and does not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people.)

BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL
OCT 2 - 1946

Russian Composers Won't Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Oct. 2.—(AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda . . . against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

AUSTIN, TEXAS
TEXAN

American Culture Mature Says Famed Columnist

Commenting on the Tanglewood Festival held in the Berkshire Hills of Massachussetts this summer, Columnist George E. Solkosky said that American culture is as mature as any in the world.

He based his opinion on the repeated success of the Tanglewood Festival. Year after year, people from all over the country gather in a mountain setting to hear great music. More than ten thousand people heard the Boston Symphony this summer under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The people who traveled thousands of miles to hear this music [illegible] proof of America's advanced [illegible]

OCT 2

Soviet Composers Reject Bids To Boston

BOSTON (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Shostakovich at first indicated Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their deception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda . . . against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS
OCT 2 - 1946

DECLINE BID TO LEAD SYMPHONY

Soviet Composers Not to Conduct Hub's Concerts

BROOKLINE, Oct. 2—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has revealed that two of Russia's most prominent symphonic composers declined to serve as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season "probably because of unsettled conditions" between their native land and the United States.

The Boston Symphony conductor, an exile from Russia after the 1917 revolution, said he had invited Serge Prokofieff and Dmitri Shostakovitch to lead the Boston orchestra in their own compositions. At first, both signified their intentions of accepting the invitations, he said, but later sent their "regrets." Several Soviet soloists did likewise, he said.

Asked why the Russians had changed their plans, Koussevitzky replied:

"Perhaps their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad. The propaganda in the papers here against Russia is terrific. Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until conditions between the two countries are more settled."

Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 2

Koussevitzky Looks to a New Season—

Finds Absence Of Russians Regrettable

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Russian musicians whom Serge Koussevitzky would like to have appear in Boston, and one or two whom he invited some time ago and whom he confidently looked for, have abandoned the idea of a trip for the present and are remaining at home, so representatives of the press were told yesterday at Dr. Koussevitzky's house in Brookline.

"They do not know," he said, "how they will be accepted in America, and they do not want to take the risk. I see no other reason for their hesitation. We ought to try to get them over here. We can work for good relations with their country in that way."

He explained that concerts of American music are given in Russia, and so no question of hospitality to the art of the United States over there intervenes. There does arise, indeed, trouble in regard to the protection of Russian musical property here, because no copyright safeguards exist for their composers.

⁂

But it looks as though the chief difficulty just now grows out of the diplomatic disaccommodation that has sprung up. At any rate, a sensitiveness has seized their men of music, with the result that they have hastened to cancel arrangements that seemed completely settled. A symphony, for example, which Dr. Koussevitzky wanted from a new Russian composer was offered and then withheld. A conductor whom he wished to introduce to the Boston public reneged on a promise to make a call. A violinist, who would seem to be, from reports, the peer of the brilliant youths who issued from the studio of Leopold Auer after World War I, was all but entered in the books when he stopped negotiations.

Dr. Koussevitzky, talking in his frank and fervent manner, mentioned a problem or two confronting a man who directs the doings of an illustrious aggregation of players like the Boston Symphony. Of particular and professional interest was the matter of visiting conductors.

"You know," said he, "that they come along with the most conservative ideas. They don't want to attempt anything novel or anything that may not be generally acceptable. Consequently they submit programs that are all in the old classic routine. I have to sift out things that are too familiar and worn with our listeners, in order to secure the needed freshness. Then, on my side, where am I when a guest takes charge of the orchestra for a week and I read in the papers that at last the public has heard the Boston Symphony, and that this is how the real thing sounds?"

⁂

Someone asked Dr. Koussevitzky about the relation of the orchestra to the radio, and he responded with enthusiasm in behalf of music of a high order for the air-wave public.

"As for the men who govern the business," he said, "they have good taste and they want the best; but they sometimes gain the impression that the chief thing in music is the name, and that if you mention 'Sibelius' or anybody equally well known, that is enough. Anything by Sibelius, they think, will do. But I know of few composers who are not much better in some of their works than they are in others."

Dr. Koussevitzky expressed a hope that more music by the good orchestras of the country—and he declared there were plenty of them—would be sent out on the radio. Little is accomplished in comparison with what could be.

First in time among new works which Dr. Koussevitzky is presenting this season is Copland's Symphony No. 3, now set for presentation at the third pair of Friday and Saturday concerts, score and parts for the concluding movement not yet received from the copyist.

For another detail in plans, Bruno Walter in his two visits will put on the Symphony No. 9 of Bruckner and the Symphony No. 4 of Mahler; and for still another, Mr. Bernstein in his visit will revive the "Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky.

A new member of the orchestra is John Holmes, oboist, taking the place of Mr. Gillet, retiring. Mr. Holmes, Dr. Koussevitzky observed, is the only American to be appointed to a solo desk in the Boston Symphony in the whole history of the institution. Item again, in the roster of members, the name of A. Krips will be printed where that of J. Theodorowicz has hitherto stood. Mr. Krips moves up from the fourth desk of the first violin section to the front desk, taking the chair

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
OCT 2 - 1946

Boston Honors Ex-City Oboist

A former Eastman School of Music student, John Holmes, 28, has been installed as a "first desk" player in the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra—the first time a native-born musician has held the position in the 66-year history of the orchestra.

The Associated Press reported that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made the announcement yesterday at the conclusion of the orchestra's first 1946 rehearsal. Holmes, who will play first oboe, studied with the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky for several summer seasons at Tanglewood, Lenox. The orchestra will open its 1946 season Friday afternoon, featuring the new Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch and "Poem of Ecstacy" by Alexander Scriabin.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
OCT 2 - 1946

Soviet Composers Decline to Conduct

BROOKLINE, Mass. (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has revealed that two of Russia's most prominent symphonic composers declined to serve a guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season "probably because of unsettled conditions" between their native land and the United States.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 2 - 1946

Refuse to Lead Until Another Time

BOSTON, Oct. (AP) 2 — Two of Russia's great composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The new propaganda . . . against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
OCT 3 - 1946

Russians Say No

Boston, October 2. — (AP) — Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostavovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL
OCT 2 - 1946

Red Composers Refuse To Lead Hub Symphony

BOSTON — (AP) — Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution of 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

MUSIC

Tuesday Symphony

The second concert of the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Richard Burgin conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso in D minor for Strings, Op. 6 No. 10 .... Handel
Suite from the Ballet, "Chout" .. Prokofieff
Divertimento .... Haieff
Symphony No. 1 in E minor Op. 39 .... Sibelius.

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Since all but one of the works on last night's program will be heard at the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts this week, detailed comment on them may be reserved for that time. The new work which will not be repeated was the Divertimento by Alexei Haieff and was played last night for the first time in Boston. A first performance was given last spring in New York by the Little Symphony, Joseph Barone conducting. The composer was present last night in the hall and was induced by Mr. Burgin to come forward and acknowledge the applause.

Mr. Haieff is, I believe, an associate of Stravinsky, for it was he who came out last season in Symphony Hall and conducted Woody Herman's band in the Ebony Concerto of that master to the consternation of the fans. There is more than a hint of the later Stravinsky in this Divertimento. I found it on first hearing a little thin and rather monotonous. The Aria, the Scherzo and the Lullaby, all, for instance, sounded very much alike except for the tempo. Nevertheless, it is not a futile piece of composition. It is a modest effort to be musically diverting and is reasonably successful in this aim.

The Divertimento would have sounded better, I suspect, if it had not followed Prokofieff's Suite from "Chout," which, though written in 1915, is original and entertaining music of a higher order. This is a curious habit of conductors—to put a fairly good modern work against a much better one. Still, more than a generation has intervened between the dates of "Chout" and Mr. Haieff's Divertimento, so that it is perhaps not quite fair to book Mr. Burgin on that charge.

THE BOSTON HERALD
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1946

Symphonic Treason

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 66th season this week with a musical defilement of the precepts of the Russian revolution. It is playing Shostakovich's Ninth, which has ideological weaknesses, a cynical and evil grotesque, the tone of merciless joking and ridicule, the cold irony of stylization. It is so characterized by the Propaganda Committee of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. It is musical insurrection.

It must be so if Shostakovich's own countrymen say it is so. But those who heard its light, exuberant joyousness at Tanglewood this summer, or will hear it this week at Symphony Hall or next Tuesday in Providence and on the radio, will wonder in just what words it commits sedition against the Soviet Union. Music may be articulate, but it is hard to find in it a language with political significance.

Shostakovitch was once before guilty of schismatic composition. His pre-war ballet and opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," was heard by Stalin, who found it not to his taste, and the work was proclaimed un-Soviet, unwholesome, cheap and eccentric. He was regarded as a traitor until his Fifth Symphony was produced, which was somehow more in the Stalinist idiom.

The Seventh and Eighth, full of the martial glory of Russia, completed his restoration to orthodoxy. But, perhaps because he was expected to produce a third in a grim and warlike trilogy, and instead came up with a symphonic breath of joyous living, his Ninth is stigmatized as in the stylized form of the ancient classics. Serge Koussevitzky, incidentally, differs on this criticism. He believes the work to be one of the most beautiful of contemporary productions and thoroughly modern.

Shostakovich himself and Prokofieff ("Peter and the Wolf") had accepted invitations to conduct the Boston Symphony, but suddenly sent their regrets. Again an indication of the subordination of the arts in Russia, where musical compositions are contracted for by the government. On the program with the Ninth this week is the "Poem of Ecstasy" of another Russian, Alexander Scriabin, who believed music could speak to the soul. Somehow that is a more comprehensible notion than the belief that it has political overtones.

BOSTON POST, THURSDA

TAKES ISSUE WITH CRITICS

Koussevitzky to Play the Work of Shostakovich

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took issue yesterday with Soviet criticism of Dimitri Shostakovitch. The Ninth Symphony of the famous Russian composer, which was denounced in Moscow, will be played by the Boston Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Oct. 18-19.

Soviet critic I. Nestiev attacked the Ninth Symphony as "not reflecting the true spirit of the Soviet people," and called it "a playful and fanciful trifle."

Dr. Koussevtizsky, while declining to enter any controversy, said, in direct contradiction of the Russian: "Speaking entirely from the musical point of view, I sa is one of porary wo

Only a from Mos takovitch
sian crit nounced denly cha offer to c poser of t season. H
the Russ might be Musical Moscow placed an composer's
Many mus ficial Russ
American son why h

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 2 - 1946

Russian Composers Decline Symphony Bid

BOSTON, Oct. 2 (AP)—Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda against Russia is terrific." he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 2

Koussevitzky Looks to a New Season—

Finds Absence Of Russians Regrettable

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Russian musicians whom Serge Koussevitzky would like to have appear in Boston, and one or two whom he invited some time ago and whom he confidently looked for, have abandoned the idea of a trip for the present and are remaining at home, so representatives of the press were told yesterday at Dr. Koussevitzky's house in Brookline.

"They do not know," he said, "how they will be accepted in America, and they do not want to take the risk. I see no other reason for their hesitation. We ought to try to get them over here. We can work for good relations with their country in that way."

He explained that concerts of American music are given in Russia, and so no question of hospitality to the art of the United States over there intervenes. There does arise, indeed, trouble in regard to the protection of Russian musical property here, because no copyright safeguards exist for their composers.

* * *

But it looks as though the chief difficulty just now grows out of the diplomatic disaccommodation that has sprung up. At any rate, a sensitiveness has seized their men of music, with the result that they have hastened to cancel arrangements that seemed completely settled. A symphony, for example, which Dr. Koussevitzky wanted from a new Russian composer was offered and then withheld. A conductor whom he wished to introduce to the Boston public reneged on a promise to make a call. A violinist, who would seem to be, from reports, the peer of the brilliant youths who issued from the studio of Leopold Auer after World War I, was all but entered in the books when he stopped negotiations.

Dr. Koussevitzky, talking in his frank and fervent manner, mentioned a problem or two confronting a man who directs the doings of an illustrious aggregation of players like the Boston Symphony. Of particular and professional interest was the matter of visiting conductors.

"You know," said he, "that they come along with the most conservative ideas. They don't want to attempt anything novel or anything that may not be generally acceptable. Consequently they submit programs that are all in the old classic routine. I have to sift out things that are too familiar and worn with our listeners, in order to secure the needed freshness. Then, on my side, where am I when a guest takes charge of the orchestra for a week and I read in the papers that at last the public has heard the Boston Symphony, and that this is how the real thing sounds?"

* * *

Someone asked Dr. Koussevitzky about the relation of the orchestra to the radio, and he responded with enthusiasm in behalf of music of a high order for the air-wave public.

"As for the men who govern the business," he said, "they have good taste and they want the best; but they sometimes gain the impression that the chief thing in music is the name, and that if you mention 'Sibelius' or anybody equally well known, that is enough. Anything by Sibelius, they think, will do. But I know of few composers who are not much better in some of their works than they are in others."

Dr. Koussevitzky expressed a hope that more music by the good orchestras of the country—and he declared there were plenty of them—would be sent out on the radio. Little is accomplished in comparison with what could be.

First in time among new works which Dr. Koussevitzky is presenting this season is Copland's Symphony No. 3, now set for presentation at the third pair of Friday and Saturday concerts, score and parts for the concluding movement not yet received from the copyist.

For another detail in plans, Bruno Walter in his two visits will put on the Symphony No. 9 of Bruckner and the Symphony No. 4 of Mahler; and for still another, Mr. Bernstein in his visit will revive the "Sacre du Printemps" of Stravinsky.

A new member of the orchestra is John Holmes, oboist, taking the place of Mr. Gillet, retiring. Mr. Holmes, Dr. Koussevitzky observed, is the only American to be appointed to a solo desk in the Boston Symphony in the whole history of the institution. Item again, in the roster of members, the name of A. Krips will be printed where that of J. Theodorowicz has hitherto stood. Mr. Krips moves up from the fourth desk of the first violin section to the front desk, taking the chair

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
OCT 2 - 1946

Boston Honors Ex-City Oboist

A former Eastman School of Music student, John Holmes, 28, has been installed as a "first desk" player in the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra—the first time a native-born musician has held the position in the 66-year history of the orchestra.

The Associated Press reported that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky made the announcement yesterday at the conclusion of the orchestra's first 1946 rehearsal. Holmes, who will play first oboe, studied with the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitsky for several summer seasons at Tanglewood, Lenox. The orchestra will open its 1946 season Friday afternoon, featuring the new Ninth Symphony by Shostakovitch and "Poem of Ecstacy" by Alexander Scriabin.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
OCT 2 - 1946

Soviet Composers Decline to Conduct

BROOKLINE, Mass. (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has revealed that two of Russia's most prominent symphonic composers declined to serve a guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season "probably because of unsettled conditions" between their native land and the United States.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 2 - 1946

Refuse to Lead Until Another Time

BOSTON, Oct. (AP) 2 — Two of Russia's great composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The new propaganda . . . against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution in 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
OCT 3 - 1946

Russians Say No

Boston, October 2. — (AP) — Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations, Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostavovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

This Clipping From
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL
OCT 2 - 1946

Red Composers Refuse To Lead Hub Symphony

BOSTON — (AP) — Two of Russia's greatest composers have refused invitations to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their own compositions this season, apparently because of strained international relations. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovich at first indicated they would accept, but later sent their "regrets."

"Perhaps," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad."

"The propaganda against Russia is terrific," he continued in an interview. "Perhaps they didn't want to risk an unfavorable reception until our two countries are more settled."

The Boston Symphony conductor became an exile from Russia after the revolution of 1917. He warmly supported his native country, however, in World War II.

6A 3

MUSIC

Tuesday Symphony

The second concert of the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Richard Burgin conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso in D minor for Strings. Op. 6 No. 10	Handel
Suite from the Ballet, "Chout"	Prokofieff
Divertimento	Haieff
Symphony No. 1 in E minor Op. 39	Sibelius

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Since all but one of the works on last night's program will be heard at the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts this week, detailed comment on them may be reserved for that time. The new work which will not be repeated was the Divertimento by Alexei Haieff and was played last night for the first time in Boston. A first performance was given last spring in New York by the Little Symphony, Joseph Barone conducting. The composer was present last night in the hall and was induced by Mr. Burgin to come forward and acknowledge the applause.

Mr. Haieff is, I believe, an associate of Stravinsky, for it was he who came out last season in Symphony Hall and conducted Woody Herman's band in the Ebony Concerto of that master to the consternation of the fans. There is more than a hint of the later Stravinsky in this Divertimento. I found it on first hearing a little thin and rather monotonous. The Aria, the Scherzo and the Lullaby, all, for instance, sounded very much alike except for the tempo. Nevertheless, it is not a futile piece of composition. It is a modest effort to be musically diverting and is reasonably successful in this aim.

The Divertimento would have sounded better, I suspect, if it had not followed Prokofieff's Suite from "Chout," which, though written in 1915, is original and entertaining music of a higher order. This is a curious habit of conductors—to put a fairly good modern work against a much better one. Still, more than a generation has intervened between the dates of "Chout" and Mr. Haieff's Divertimento, so that it is perhaps not quite fair to book Mr. Burgin on that charge.

THE BOSTON HERALD
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1946

Symphonic Treason

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 66th season this week with a musical defilement of the precepts of the Russian revolution. It is playing Shostakovich's Ninth, which has ideological weaknesses, a cynical and evil grotesque, the tone of merciless joking and ridicule, the cold irony of stylization. It is so characterized by the Propaganda Committee of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. It is musical insurrection.

It must be so if Shostakovich's own countrymen say it is so. But those who heard its light, exuberant joyousness at Tanglewood this summer, or will hear it this week at Symphony Hall or next Tuesday in Providence and on the radio, will wonder in just what words it commits sedition against the Soviet Union. Music may be articulate, but it is hard to find in it a language with political significance.

Shostakovitch was once before guilty of schismatic composition. His pre-war ballet and opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," was heard by Stalin, who found it not to his taste, and the work was proclaimed un-Soviet, unwholesome, cheap and eccentric. He was regarded as a traitor until his Fifth Symphony was produced, which was somehow more in the Stalinist idiom.

The Seventh and Eighth, full of the martial glory of Russia, completed his restoration to orthodoxy. But, perhaps because he was expected to produce a third in a grim and warlike trilogy, and instead came up with a symphonic breath of joyous living, his Ninth is stigmatized as in the stylized form of the ancient classics. Serge Koussevitzky, incidentally, differs on this criticism. He believes the work to be one of the most beautiful of contemporary productions and thoroughly modern.

Shostakovich himself and Prokofieff ("Peter and the Wolf") had accepted invitations to conduct the Boston Symphony, but suddenly sent their regrets. Again an indication of the subordination of the arts in Russia, where musical compositions are contracted for by the government. On the program with the Ninth this week is the "Poem of Ecstasy" of another Russian, Alexander Scriabin, who believed music could speak to the soul. Somehow that is a more comprehensible notion than the belief that it has political overtones.

BOSTON POST, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1946

TAKES ISSUE WITH CRITICS

Koussevitzky to Play the Work of Shostakovich

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took issue yesterday with Soviet criticism of Dimitri Shostakovitch. The Ninth Symphony of the famous Russian composer, which was denounced in Moscow, will be played by the Boston Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Oct. 18-19.

Soviet critic I. Nestiev attacked the Ninth Symphony as "not reflecting the true spirit of the Soviet people," and called it "a playful and fanciful trifle."

Dr. Koussevtizsky, while declining to enter any controversy, said, in direct contradiction of the Russian: "Speaking entirely from the musical point of view, I say that the Ninth Symphony is one of the most beautiful contemporary works."

Only a few hours before a despatch from Moscow had indicated that Shostakovitch is out of favor with the Russian critics, Dr. Koussevitsky announced that the composer had suddenly changed his mind and declined an offer to come to Boston as guest composer of the Symphony Orchestra this season. He expressed the opinion that the Russian felt public opinion here might be "hostile."

Musical circles here, in view of the Moscow attack on Shostakovitch, placed another interpretation on the composer's refusal to come to Boston. Many musicians seemed to feel that official Russian displeasure, not possible American coolness, was the real reason why he changed his mind.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF. CHRONICLE

OCT 4 1946

Shostakovich Defended by Koussevitzky

Special from the New York Times

BOSTON, Oct. 3—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who believes art is art and not politics, described Dimitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony today as "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works."

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated he spoke from a musical point of view after reading that the Communist party newspaper, Culture and Life, had stated Shostakovich's latest work had ideological weakness and did not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people.

Dr. Koussevitzky said "Shostakovich's classicism is modern, a classicism not in the old understanding. The whole content, the form, the harmony, ~~is~~ contemporary in this symphony."

The symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Friday and Saturday concerts.

Dr. Koussevitzky had disclosed earlier that Shostakovich and Serge Prokofieff had declined invitations to be guest conductors this year.

"It may be that the authorities there feel that these musicians might not be well received here," he commented.

This Clipping From
PRINTERS INK WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 4 - 1946

Jitterbugs vs. Long-hairs

West Hartford

A few weeks ago you published, as an editorial, an article dealing with radio . . . specifically, as regards its misuse by sponsors of so many of today's radio programs.

I happen to be one of the many thousands of Americans with an appreciation for fine music. There was a time, a few years ago, when fine music could be heard via the air waves—but today only a few of the old stalwarts remain, such as The Telephone Hour, The Firestone Program, NBC and CBS Symphonies, International Harvester's "Harvest of Stars," the Ford Sunday Evening Hour and the Longines-Wittnauer "Symphonette."

It seems to me that sponsors of radio programs are taking the wrong slant when they believe, seemingly, that a boogie-woogie program will win more friends for a quality product than a program of Beethoven and Tschaikovsky played by the Boston Symphony. And it would be wonderful if PRINTERS' INK could make these sponsors realize that jitter-bugs are not half as discriminatory when buying merchandise as are lovers of symphony concerts and the opera. — M. PEMBER JACKSON.

UNDAY JOURNAL, OCTOBER '6

CHICAGO, ILL. TRIBUNE

OCT 4 - 1946

ON THE AISLE

Chicago Symphony's 56th Season Opens with Drab Concert in Crowded Orchestra Hall

By Claudia Cassidy

To a reviewer who has the misfortune to have to report what happened rather than what should have happened, the job of covering the Chicago Symphony orchestra becomes increasingly perplexing. In the department of incontrovertible fact, the orchestra began its 56th season in Orchestra hall last night, its fourth under the direction of Désiré Defauw. Bus strike or no bus strike, the place was crowded, and there was an atmosphere of polite applause during the first half of the concert, while Brahms' First Symphony drew more robust response, punctuated by a little feminine squeak of delight not unlike the rapturous tribute paid Frank Sinatra.

Concert by the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Desire Defauw, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Thursday evening, Oct. 3, 1946. The program:

Overture, "Coriolanus" ....Beethoven
Suite No. 3, D major.................Bach
Chorale and Variations in B minor
.... Franck-Defauw
[First performance in America]
Symphony No. 1, C minor.........Brahms

The rest of the evening's manifestations are less simple to set down. Perhaps you remember that when Mr. Defauw was engaged his patrons told the rest of us to wait three or four seasons and give him a chance to show the wonders he could do with our orchestra. This is the fourth season and Mr. Defauw is monarch of all he surveys. He has changed orchestra personnel to suit his taste — and some of it quit to suit its own taste—and he has abolished the post of associate conductor, presumably because he and Hans Lange were incompatible in music. Arbitrary as some of these things might seem, they are a good conductor's privilege if they pay dividends in better music.

But how defensible are they when that music, far from improving, grows steadily worse? Last night's concert was a drab mediocrity in which the strings did what they could to maintain a slipping standard, while the woods were as ragged as an unmended fence, and the conducting was at best a dreary grind organ. Yet most of the program was standard stuff, featuring three of the Bs in music that the orchestra has played superbly more times than most of us can remember. There were just two novelties in and on the program. One was Mr Defauw's article, the first of a series on his trip overseas. The other was his transcription of Franck's organ chorale in B minor, which at its best resembled Fauré, and in general illustrated Mr. Defauw's taste for the sentimental, the pretentious and the bombastic.

Koussevitzky to the Rescue

Serge Koussevitzky yesterday called Dimitri Shostakovich's 9th Symphony "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works," after reading the dispatch from Moscow in which the communist party newspaper, Culture and Life, stated that Shostakovich's latest work had ideological weakness and did not reflect the true spirit of the soviet people. Mr. Koussevitzky, who gave the work its first American performance at his Tanglewood festival last summer, will further illustrate his point at his Boston concerts this afternoon and tomorrow night. The Chicago Symphony will play the Symphony here next week.

Notes

Maurice Evans brings his GI "Hamlet" to the Erlanger for a limited engagement starting Nov. 25. . . . Helen Hayes returned to the stage last night in the Boston opening of Anita Loos' "Happy Birthday." . . . Karl Krueger heard Tito Schipa sing in Paris last spring, and has engaged him as soloist with the Detroit Symphony orchestra Jan. 24 and 25. . . . Vladimir Horowitz will play two Monday evening recitals in Orchestra hall Jan. 27 and Feb. 17. Tickets cost $1.50 in the gallery and from $2.40 to $4.80 on the main floor.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That the first Symphony program would contain Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony and something by Brahms was a foregone conclusion. The Russian's work, which he played for the first time in America at Tanglewood last summer, is Dr. Koussevitzky's latest prize. And since the German composer died 50 years ago next April, this is to be a Brahms season. Having announced the Third Symphony, the conductor finally settled for the First. The remaining number is Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The initial verdict on a piece of contemporary music is frequently reversed, or at least modified. But in the case of so transparent a work as the Shostakovitch Ninth, a first impression can easily be a final one as well. The parodistic, flippant mood of much of the music, which annoyed the Russian critic, Nestiev, who found in it "idealogical weaknesses," which do not "reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people," were as apparent yesterday as they were last August. The two movements which offer a relief from this prevailing jauntiness, the attenuated second and would-be portentous fourth, sounded also much as before. The spun-out meagerness of the Moderato, a movement as long as the rest of the symphony put together, was again on the irritating side; the Largo, with its mock solemnity, by no means unpleasing.

The shocking thing about the symphony is that it marks such a decided regression. Beside it the first, composed when Shostakovitch was 19, is a work of great maturity and substance. In one way or another, and he gets lots of help, Shostakovitch contrives to be the best publicized of living composers. He now has the world anxiously waiting to see what he will do next.

Having played the "Poem of Ecstasy" seven times in his first 15 seasons, Dr. Koussevitzky let it rest for seven more. As he himself admitted the other day, the music had ceased to interest him. Now he returns to it with renewed enthusiasm and yesterday's performance was a tonally gorgeous one, as befits a piece that is so dependent upon mere sound, upon harmonic and orchestral color, glowing and refulgent sonoroties. Having heard them frequently in the interim, it could be seen yesterday how much Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" are indebeted, in their several ways, to this heaven-storming tone poem of the Russian mysticist. The program as a whole was exceedingly well contrasted, and the audience warmed to all of it.

Symphony Plays Condemned '9th' at 66th Opening

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 66th season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and the opening piece was the newly condemned Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovich. Condemned by one Soviet critic, that is. The Friday audience, which is basically conservative, listened attentively and applauded cordially.

Yet it was obvious that a good deal of their approval was directed to conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the magnificent Boston orchestra. It was equally evident that they did not get anywhere near so much of a kick out of Shostakovich as they did from Brahms' First Symphony, which ended the program.

See SYMPHONY Page 14

Symphony

Continued from the First Page

I learned on pretty good authority, last Thursday, that the bitter criticism of the Shostakovich Ninth by I, Nestiev in Culture and Life probably is not official, even though the Soviet newspaper is published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Communist Party central committee.

Nestiev's comments that the Ninth has "ideological weaknesses and does not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people," according to this authority, are likely his own narrow opinions. Nevertheless Shostakovich was once disciplined by the party, and if anything unfavorable to him should appear in Pravda, that likely would mean he again was under a Soviet ban.

Amiable About It All

The mere fact that the Boston audience listened as cordially as they did is a small commentary on the gulf between democratic liberty and authoritarian restriction. I dare say many in the Friday audience think as little of the Soviet political system as I do, and as little of the nonsence that music, an abstract art, can express the ideological side of anything. Yet, they listened and they applauded, and they were amiable about it all.

Heard once at the American premiere at Tanglewood last Summer, and again yesterday, the Shostakovich Ninth still seems clever, flippant, superficial and cheerful. The first movement does indeed reflect a lot of Prokofieff, and the two slow sections are reminiscent of the long slow movement in Shostakovich's own Sixth Symphony. The work probably is too long. Taken all in all, however, it is agreeable and good fun. Why ask more?

It is interesting that Mr. Koussevitzky, following a period when he had no inner enthusiasm for the music of Scriabin, should find "The Poem of Ecstasy" once more does move him. Yesterday he gave it a glorious performance, vivid, glowing, most carefully planned and all details in order. The "Poem" is still an impressive work, a naive esthetic conception expressed in a highly sophisticated orchestral style that owes more than a little to Debussy of the "La Mer" period. You don't need to share Scriabin's half-baked esthetic theories to enjoy the "Poem." It has formal continuity and logic, and therefore it can be enjoyed simply as music.

Affectionate Greeting

Up to this point the Friday listeners had heard the widely differing art of two Russian composers, one who lives under the Soviet regime, the other a subject of the last of the Czars. No doubt it was only because Scriabin is lush and sensuous, where Shostakovich is dissonant, that Scriabin had the bigger hand.

Until Mr. Kousevitzky reached Measure No. 385 (and I'm not joking) in the finale of the Brahms, the performance had been the finest I had ever heard of this grave and monumental symphony. The tone was rich, deep and lustrous, beautiful beyond description; the proportions were perfect, the tempi right; all was neat and clear, and the horn solo of the last movement was absolutely noble. Then, at Measure No. 385 the conductor's passion ran away with him, and in a frenzy of speed the music became confused and threatened to fall apart.

As always at a season's opening, the audience rose in affectionate greeting to Mr. Koussevitzky when he first walked upon the stage. It is an appropriate, even a touching custom. It is also proof that while Bostonians may seem to take their great orchestra and their great conductor for granted, they really have a reverential feeling for the town's musical glory.

Herald

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in its 66th season was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 9 Op. 70. . Shostakovitch
"Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54. . Scriabin
Symphony, No. 1 in C minor Op. 68
Brahams

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Time was when the first concert of a new season had to be reviewed with the tactful reservation that "clearly the orchestra was not yet in mid-season form." But what with Dr. Koussevitzky's long incumbency and the concerts of the Berkshire Festival the Boston Symphony, refreshed by some six weeks' vacation, now enters a new season with complete authority. The superb performance of the Brahms First Symphony was proof enough, even if the less familiar music in the first half of the program had not already demonstrated it.

Shostakovitch's 9th Symphony was played at the opening of the Berkshire Festival and was commented on at length at that time, as it was one of the few unfamiliar works to be given. There were some to profess disappointment in it. Those of us who have never been ecstatic admirers of Shostakovitch's art rejoiced in the symphony's terseness and gaiety, with the effective contrast of a spare and noble slow movement. Just the other day an official critique from the Soviet denounced the new work as lacking "warm ideological conviction." This solemn and official article went on to ask whether this was the time for "a famous artist to take a vacation, to rest from modern problems."

Since I am not writing for the Daily Worker I can say that the 9th Symphony appeals to me a good deal more than his lengthier scores. I suppose the admirers of Shostakovitch are disturbed because the music delves back to the composer's earlier style in the fast movements. But can they deny that the dirge-like second movement in its succinctness and simplicity is a vast improvement on the interminable slow movements of which Shostakovitch has furnished so many examples?

One trouble is that the 9th Symphony is listened to as the composer's final say on World War II, rejoicing at victory, mourning for the fallen and in the middle of the finale reminding us that victory is not all beer and skittles. Frankly, I think more musical pleasure is to be derived from the Symphony by ignoring the program altogether. Then it says its say agreeably to the ear without necessarily being the last musical word on all our current non-musical problems.

Scriabin's tone poem is not everybody's or everyday music. Nor do I think it went particularly well between Shostakovitch and Brahms. "The Poem of Ecstacy" is overblown in the way in which Scriabin's piano music is not. It is a feast from which you emerge not with a sense of well-being, but with the certain feeling that you have overeaten. There is beauty in it, particularly as it was glowingly set forth yesterday afternoon under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, but for all that it remains a bloated sort of beauty.

The audience seemed well pleased yesterday afternoon. There was a rising ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky as he entered onto the platform and there was prolonged applause for each number on the program.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and the 8th Symphony of Anton Bruckner, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his death.

CHRONICLE

OCT 4 1946

Shostakovich Defended by Koussevitzky

Special from the New York Times

BOSTON, Oct. 3—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who believes art is art and not politics, described Dimitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony today as "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works."

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated he spoke from a musical point of view after reading that the Communist party newspaper, Culture and Life, had stated Shostakovich's latest work had ideological weakness and did not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people.

Dr. Koussevitzky said "Shostakovich's classicism is modern, a classicism not in the old understanding. The whole content, the form, the harmony, is contemporary in this symphony."

The symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Friday and Saturday concerts.

Dr. Koussevitzky had disclosed earlier that Shostakovich and Serge Prokofieff had declined invitations to be guest conductors this year.

"It may be that the authorities there feel that these musicians might not be well received here," he commented.

This Clipping From
PRINTERS INK WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 4 - 1946

Jitterbugs vs. Long-hairs

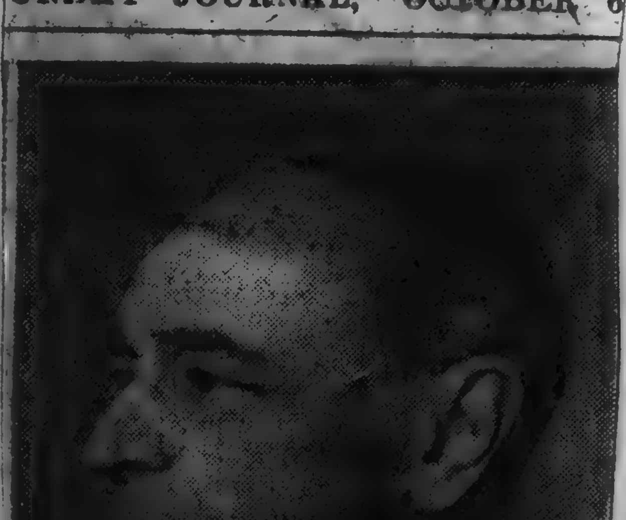
West Hartford

A few weeks ago you published, as an editorial, an article dealing with radio . . . specifically, as regards its misuse by sponsors of so many of today's radio programs.

I happen to be one of the many thousands of Americans with an appreciation for fine music. There was a time, a few years ago, when fine music could be heard via the air waves—but today only a few of the old stalwarts remain, such as The Telephone Hour, The Firestone Program, NBC and CBS Symphonies, International Harvester's "Harvest of Stars," the Ford Sunday Evening Hour and the Longines-Wittnauer "Symphonette."

It seems to me that sponsors of radio programs are taking the wrong slant when they believe, seemingly, that a boogie-woogie program will win more friends for a quality product than a program of Beethoven and Tschaikovsky played by the Boston Symphony. And it would be wonderful if PRINTERS' INK could make these sponsors realize that jitter-bugs are not half as discriminatory when buying merchandise as are lovers of symphony concerts and the opera.—M. PEMBER JACKSON.

UNDAY JOURNAL, OCTOBER '6



ON THE AISLE

Chicago Symphony's 56th Season Opens with Drab Concert in Crowded Orchestra Hall

By Claudia Cassidy

To a reviewer who has the misfortune to have to report what happened rather than what should have happened, the job of covering the Chicago Symphony orchestra becomes increasingly perplexing. In the department of incontrovertible fact, the orchestra began its 56th season in Orchestra hall last night, its fourth under the direction of Désiré Defauw. Bus strike or no bus strike, the place was crowded, and there was an atmosphere of polite applause during the first half of the concert, while Brahms' First Symphony drew more robust response, punctuated by a little feminine squeak of delight not unlike the rapturous tribute paid Frank Sinatra.

Concert by the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Desire Defauw, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Thursday evening, Oct. 3, 1946. The program:
Overture, "Coriolanus" .... Beethoven
Suite No. 3, D major .... Bach
Chorale and Variations in B minor
.... Franck-Defauw
[First performance in America]
Symphony No. 1, C minor .... Brahms

The rest of the evening's manifestations are less simple to set down. Perhaps you remember that when Mr. Defauw was engaged his patrons told the rest of us to wait three or four seasons and give him a chance to show the wonders he could do with our orchestra. This is the fourth season and Mr. Defauw is monarch of all he surveys. He has changed orchestra personnel to suit his taste—and some of it quit to suit its own taste—and he has abolished the post of associate conductor, presumably because he and Hans Lange were incompatible in music. Arbitrary as some of these things might seem, they are a good conductor's privilege if they pay dividends in better music.

But how defensible are they when that music, far from improving, grows steadily worse? Last night's concert was a drab mediocrity in which the strings did what they could to maintain a slipping standard, while the woods were as ragged as an unmended fence, and the conducting was at best a dreary grind organ. Yet most of the program was standard stuff, featuring three of the Bs in music that the orchestra has played superbly more times than most of us can remember. There were just two novelties in and on the program. One was Mr Defauw's article, the first of a series on his trip overseas. The other was his transcription of Franck's organ chorale in B minor, which at its best resembled Fauré, and in general illustrated Mr. Defauw's taste for the sentimental, the pretentious and the bombastic.

Koussevitzky to the Rescue

Serge Koussevitzky yesterday called Dimitri Shostakovich's 9th Symphony "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works," after reading the dispatch from Moscow in which the communist party newspaper, Culture and Life, stated that Shostakovich's latest work had ideological weakness and did not reflect the true spirit of the soviet people. Mr. Koussevitzky, who gave the work its first American performance at his Tanglewood festival last summer, will further illustrate his point at his Boston concerts this afternoon and tomorrow night. The Chicago Symphony will play the Symphony here next week.

Notes

Maurice Evans brings his GI "Hamlet" to the Erlanger for a limited engagement starting Nov. 25. . . . Helen Hayes returned to the stage last night in the Boston opening of Anita Loos' "Happy Birthday." . . . Karl Krueger heard Tito Schipa sing in Paris last spring, and has engaged him as soloist with the Detroit Symphony orchestra Jan. 24 and 25. . . . Vladimir Horowitz will play two Monday evening recitals in Orchestra hall Jan. 27 and Feb. 17. Tickets cost $1.50 in the gallery and from $2.40 to $4.80 on the main floor.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That the first Symphony program would contain Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony and something by Brahms was a foregone conclusion. The Russian work, which he played for the first time in America at Tanglewood last summer, is Dr. Koussevitzky's latest prize. And since the German composer died 50 years ago next April, this is to be a Brahms season. Having announced the Third Symphony, the conductor finally settled for the First. The remaining number is Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The initial verdict on a piece of contemporary music is frequently reversed, or at least modified. But in the case of so transparent a work as the Shostakovitch Ninth, a first impression can easily be a final one as well. The parodistic, flippant mood of much of the music, which annoyed the Russian critic, Nestiev, who found in it "idealogical weaknesses," which do not "reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people," were as apparent yesterday as they were last August. The two movements which offer a relief from this prevailing jauntiness, the attenuated second and would-be portentous fourth, sounded also much as before. The spun-out meagerness of the Moderato, a movement as long as the rest of the symphony put together, was again on the irritating side; the Largo, with its mock solemnity, by no means unpleasing.

The shocking thing about the symphony is that it marks such a decided regression. Beside it the first, composed when Shostakovitch was 19, is a work of great maturity and substance. In one way or another, and he gets lots of help, Shostakovitch contrives to be the best publicized of living composers. He now has the world anxiously waiting to see what he will do next.

Having played the "Poem of Ecstasy" seven times in his first 15 seasons, Dr. Koussevitzky let it rest for seven more. As he himself admitted the other day, the music had ceased to interest him. Now he returns to it with renewed enthusiasm and yesterday's performance was a tonally gorgeous one, as befits a piece that is so dependent upon mere sound, upon harmonic and orchestral color, glowing and refulgent sonoroties. Having heard them frequently in the interim, it could be seen yesterday how much Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" are indebeted, in their several ways, to this heaven-storming tone poem of the Russian mysticist. The program as a whole was exceedingly well contrasted, and the audience warmed to all of it.

Symphony Plays Condemned '9th' at 66th Opening

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 66th season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and the opening piece was the newly condemned Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovich. Condemned by one Soviet critic, that is. The Friday audience, which is basically conservative, listened attentively and applauded cordially.

Yet it was obvious that a good deal of their approval was directed to conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the magnificent Boston orchestra. It was equally evident that they did not get anywhere near so much of a kick out of Shostakovich as they did from Brahms' First Symphony, which ended the program.

See SYMPHONY Page 14

Globe

Symphony

Continued from the First Page

I learned on pretty good authority, last Thursday, that the bitter criticism of the Shostakovich Ninth by I, Nestiev in Culture and Life probably is not official, even though the Soviet newspaper is published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Communist Party central committee.

Nestiev's comments that the Ninth has "ideological weaknesses and does not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people," according to this authority, are likely his own narrow opinions. Nevertheless Shostakovich was once disciplined by the party, and if anything unfavorable to him should appear in Pravda, that likely would mean he again was under a Soviet ban.

Amiable About It All

The mere fact that the Boston audience listened as cordially as they did is a small commentary on the gulf between democratic liberty and authoritarian restriction. I dare say many in the Friday audience think as little of the Soviet political system as I do, and as little of the nonsence that music, an abstract art, can express the ideological side of anything. Yet, they listened and they applauded, and they were amiable about it all.

Heard once at the American premiere at Tanglewood last Summer, and again yesterday, the Shostakovich Ninth still seems clever, flippant, superficial and cheerful. The first movement does indeed reflect a lot of Prokofieff, and the two slow sections are reminiscent of the long slow movement in Shostakovich's own Sixth Symphony. The work probably is too long. Taken all in all, however, it is agreeable and good fun. Why ask more?

It is interesting that Mr. Koussevitzky, following a period when he had no inner enthusiasm for the music of Scriabin, should find "The Poem of Ecstasy" once more does move him. Yesterday he gave it a glorious performance, vivid, glowing, most carefully planned and all details in order. The "Poem" is still an impressive work, a naive esthetic conception expressed in a highly sophisticated orchestral style that owes more than a little to Debussy of the "La Mer" period. You don't need to share Scriabin's half-baked esthetic theories to enjoy the "Poem." It has formal continuity and logic, and therefore it can be enjoyed simply as music.

Affectionate Greeting

Up to this point the Friday listeners had heard the widely differing art of two Russian composers, one who lives under the Soviet regime, the other a subject of the last of the Czars. No doubt it was only because Scriabin is lush and sensuous, where Shostakovich is dissonant, that Scriabin had the bigger hand.

Until Mr. Kousevitzky reached Measure No. 385 (and I'm not joking) in the finale of the Brahms, the performance had been the finest I had ever heard of this grave and monumental symphony. The tone was rich, deep and lustrous, beautiful beyond description; the proportions were perfect, the tempi right; all was neat and clear, and the horn solo of the last movement was absolutely noble. Then, at Measure No. 385 the conductor's passion ran away with him, and in a frenzy of speed the music became confused and threatened to fall apart.

As always at a season's opening, the audience rose in affectionate greeting to Mr. Koussevitzky when he first walked upon the stage. It is an appropriate, even a touching custom. It is also proof that while Bostonians may seem to take their great orchestra and their great conductor for granted, they really have a reverential feeling for the town's musical glory.

Herald

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in its 66th season was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:
Symphony No. 9 Op. 70 .... Shostakovitch
"Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54 .... Scriabin
Symphony No. 1 in C minor Op. 68
Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Time was when the first concert of a new season had to be reviewed with the tactful reservation that "clearly the orchestra was not yet in mid-season form." But what with Dr. Koussevitzky's long incumbency and the concerts of the Berkshire Festival the Boston Symphony, refreshed by some six weeks' vacation, now enters a new season with complete authority. The superb performance of the Brahms First Symphony was proof enough, even if the less familiar music in the first half of the program had not already demonstrated it.

Shostakovitch's 9th Symphony was played at the opening of the Berkshire Festival and was commented on at length at that time, as it was one of the few unfamiliar works to be given. There were some to profess disappointment in it. Those of us who have never been ecstatic admirers of Shostakovitch's art rejoiced in the symphony's terseness and gaiety, with the effective contrast of a spare and noble slow movement. Just the other day an official critique from the Soviet denounced the new work as lacking "warm ideological conviction." This solemn and official article went on to ask whether this was the time for "a famous artist to take a vacation, to rest from modern problems."

Since I am not writing for the Daily Worker I can say that the 9th Symphony appeals to me a good deal more than his lengthier scores. I suppose the admirers of Shostakovitch are disturbed because the music delves back to the composer's earlier style in the fast movements. But can they deny that the dirge-like second movement in its succinctness and simplicity is a vast improvement on the interminable slow movements of which Shostakovitch has furnished so many examples?

One trouble is that the 9th Symphony is listened to as the composer's final say on World War II, rejoicing at victory, mourning for the fallen and in the middle of the finale reminding us that victory is not all beer and skittles. Frankly, I think more musical pleasure is to be derived from the Symphony by ignoring the program altogether. Then it says its say agreeably to the ear without necessarily being the last musical word on all our current non-musical problems.

Scriabin's tone poem is not everybody's or everyday music. Nor do I think it went particularly well between Shostakovitch and Brahms. "The Poem of Ecstacy" is overblown in the way in which Scriabin's piano music is not. It is a feast from which you emerge not with a sense of well-being, but with the certain feeling that you have overeaten. There is beauty in it, particularly as it was glowingly set forth yesterday afternoon under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, but for all that it remains a bloated sort of beauty.

The audience seemed well pleased yesterday afternoon. There was a rising ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky as he entered onto the platform and there was prolonged applause for each number on the program.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and the 8th Symphony of Anton Bruckner, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his birth.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
ILL. STATE JOURNAL

TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, celebrating his 22nd year as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct the orchestra when it resumes radio broadcasts Tuesday.

Oct 5

AMUSEMENTS TH

Koussevitzky Hails Shostakovich Work; Describes 9th Symphony as 'Contemporary'

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 4—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who believes art is art and not politics, described Dimitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony today as "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works."

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated he spoke from a musical point of view after reading the dispatch from Moscow to THE NEW YORK TIMES which reported the Communist party newspaper, Culture and Life, had stated that Mr. Shostakovich's latest work had ideological weakness and did not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people.

I. Nestiev said in the newspaper which is published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Central Committee of the Communist party that the first part of the symphony "seems to be just like the stylization of manner of the ancient classics."

To this, Dr. Koussevitzky declared: "Shostakovich's classicism is modern, a classicism not in the old understanding. The whole content, the form, the harmony, is contemporary in this symphony."

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is entering his twenty-third season as conductor of the orchestra, had disclosed earlier that Mr. Shostakovich and Serge Prokofieff had declined invitations to be guest conductors this year. At first they had signified they would accept, but later had sent regrets, he said.

"It may be that the authorities there feel that these musicians might not be well received here," he commented. "Certainly the propaganda in the papers here against Russia has been terrific. All those who seek for peace and friendship must want good relations with Russia."

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
OCT 6 - 1946

Boston Symphony Opens New Season

Works of Brahms and Strauss will be featured on the first Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast of the 946-47 season over Station WPOR nd ABC Tuesday.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, starting his 3rd season as conductor of the enemble, will be on the podium. Openng the season, he will offer the Symphony No. 3 of Brahms and Strauss' olorful tone poem, Till Eulenspiegel. t will be the 66th season of the rchestra.

The first broadcast will come from phony Hall, Boston, and other broadcasts will be presented from Providence, Cambridge and other cities while the orchestra is on tour.

In addition to Doctor Koussevitzky, the podium will be occupied this season by Bruno Walter, ~~Leonard Bernstein~~, Charles Munch and Richard Burgin. Feature events of the season will be announced later by Doctor Koussevitzky.

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL

OCT 4 - 1946

Koussevitsky Plans to Play Symphony That Irked Reds

New York Times Special to The Globe and Mail. Copyright

Boston, Oct. 3. — Serge Koussevitzky, who believes art is art and not politics, described Dimitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony today as "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works."

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated he spoke from a musical point of view after reading the despatch from Moscow which reported that the Communist Party newspaper, Culture and Life, had stated that Mr. Shostakovich's latest work had ideological weaknesses and did not reflect the true spirit of the Soviet people.

The newspaper, which is published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, said that the first part of the symphony "seems to be just like the stylization of manner of the ancient classics."

To this, Dr. Koussevitzky declared: "Shostakovich's classicism is modern, a classicism not in the old understanding. The whole content, the form, the harmony, is contemporary in this symphony."

The symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is entering his 23rd season as conductor of the orchestra, had disclosed earlier that Mr. Shostakovich and Serge Prokofieff had declined invitations to be guest conductors this year. At first they had signified they would accept, but later had sent regrets, he said.

"It may be that the authorities there feel that these musicians might not be well received here," he commented. "Certainly the propaganda in the papers here against Russia has been terrific. All those who seek for peace and friendship must want good relations with Russia."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

OCT 6 - 1946

Records In Review

By NORMAN NAIRN

TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This new portrayal of the oft-recorded Tschaikowsky Fifth belongs near the top of the list. Here is a wholly satisfying musical experience, as Koussevitzky and his superb aggregation of players offer their usual brilliant tone quality and deep emotional effect. The felicities of phrasing, the blending of sonorities and orchestral balances never want in eloquence. In other words, it is a magnificent offering and well deserves inclusion in one's library. Quality of recording matches that of performance. (Victor, six 12-inch records.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 6 - 1946

Koussevitzky Ignores That Russian Tumult

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

FIGHTING has broken out along the Russian musical front once again. The noise has been heard around the world as far as Boston and will reach Providence a week from Tuesday.

The shooting is all about the Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, which is said to be inharmonious with Russian ideals. I. Nestiev leads the attack in an article in Culture and Life, published by the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. The foremost champion of the defense is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian exile, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Called "Playful Trifle"

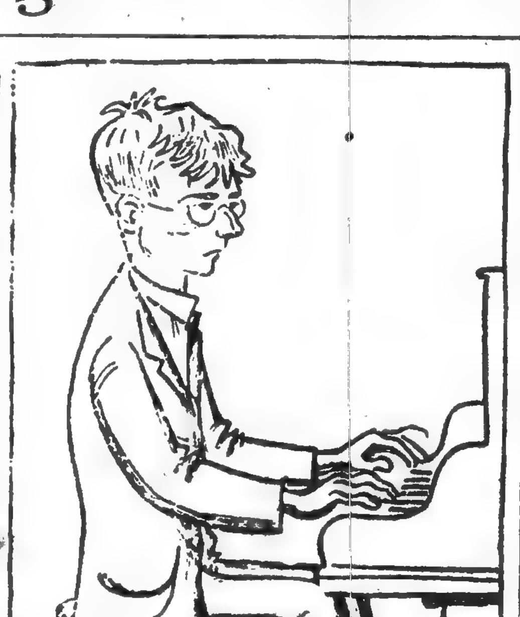
Mr. Nestiev calls the symphony "a certain respite, a facile and light incident among considerable creations of Shostakovitch, a temporary forgetting of big, serious problems for a playful and fanciful trifle." He questions the propriety of a "famous artist" taking a vacation at this time and "resting from modern problems." The symphony furthermore has "ideological weaknesses" and does not express the true spirit of the Soviet people, he says.

Dr. Koussevitzky, on the other hand, says: "I have considered and still consider the Ninth Symphony one of the most beautiful of all contemporary works. Let us leave politics to the politicians and music to the musicians."

So saying, having played the Ninth already at Tanglewood in the Summer, he played it again Friday afternoon in Boston, and will play it again next week in Providence; at that time it will also be broadcast.

Report from Boston Front

The Friday audience in Boston, a notoriously conservative gathering, swallowed the Ninth without any evident distaste for its sound or its ideology. One of our agents, planted in the hall, reported that it received 250 per cent more applause than another Russian opus, 'Le Poeme d'Extase," by Scriabin. A second observer, however, gave the nod to Scriabin in the decibel department.



DMITRI SHOSTAKOVITCH
As Russian cartoonist sees him.

The agent first hereinbefore alluded to reported the following reactions:

A Russian concert pianist: "I hate it."

A music writer and former critic: "It is in the style of Shostakovitch's first period."

A regular subscriber, aged 20: "Well, it's really enjoyable, but I wouldn't call it profound."

A Boston music teacher: "I'd call this a perfect short story that I prefer to some of his long novels."

The playing time, at Koussevitzky tempos, is 32 minutes, considerably shorter than the Brahms first, for instance.

Folks at Home Rebuked Him

Mr. Shostakovitch has received rebukes from the folks at home before. His opera "Lady Macbeth of Mensk" was condemned as "a return to bourgeois ideals" and "a leftist mess."

"The composer evidently did not set himself the task of conforming to the desires and expectations of the Soviet audience," Pravda growled. "He mixes tones promiscuously to interest the formalist-aetheticists who are lacking in good taste."

The favorable views of foreign audiences are accounted for by Pravda as follows: "The opera tickles the perverted taste of the bourgeois audience with its flailing, screaming, neurasthenic music."

But by the time of his Leningrad symphony Shostakovitch had got back into the groove and was praised in Russia as well as abroad.

The present deterioration of relations between Shostakovitch and the home-front critics is emphasized by another incident, although this may be connected with the larger problems of the Russian and Anglo-Saxon tug-of-war. Shostakovitch and Serge Prokofieff were to have come here to be guest conductors of the Boston orchestra this season. They indicated that they would accept the invitation but later sent "regrets."

"Perhaps their Government did not know how they would be received in this country, whether their reception would be good or bad," Dr. Kousevitzky said.

What this has to do with the Dardanelles and the atom bomb we don't know, but there's a connection somewhere.

He oct 5

Symphony Marks New Social Season

By ALISON ARNOLD

Although yesterday was like summer, it marked the official opening of the winter season. For the Symphony concerts began, and from now on until spring, Friday afternoons will be definitely reserved for these important occasions. No Boston hostess ever would think of planning anything to interfere with the Friday Symphony, and luncheon always is early and tea late on that red-letter day. For Symphony tickets are prized highly and are handed down from mother to daughter along with the family portraits and silver.

There were many familiar faces in the huge audience which filled Symphony Hall for the first concert of the 66th season and stood to applaud Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he appeared on the stage. The program included the 9th Symphony by Shostakovitch, which was performed for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last July. And for those who are not too enthusiastic about the Russian composer, there was a Brahms Symphony, always popular with Boston Symphony audiences.

The intermission yesterday was like a family reunion with friends greeting friends after the long summer. Mrs. Allan Forbes was in smart black with sables, and Mrs. Frederick K. Bradlee, Jr., also wore black with a becoming pearl choker. Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, in her favorite black and white and her sable cape, sat in her usual first balcony seat, a much coveted location for Symphony devotees. Mrs. William Dana Orcutt was besieged with questions about her Mornings of Diversion, which begin Oct. 30.

Among the mothers and daughters attending together were Mrs. Charles Higginson and her post-deb daughter, Miss Sally Higginson, and Mrs. George Swift and her daughter, Mrs. Lawrence L. Reeve. With Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs was her daughter, Miss Rebekah Hobbs, and her granddaughter, Miss Genevra Hobbs. Mrs. William Dexter was escorted by her young son, Philip.

Mrs. Parker Converse wore one of the tweed suits that were so popular yesterday. And Mrs. Francis P. Sears' beige-pink felt hat sported a fashionable ostrich feather. Mrs. Frank H. Stewart's hat was fashioned of pale pink feathers. Miss Lucy Cochrane, in a smart tailleur, was hatless, her blonde hair sleek and shining.

Miss Jane Ferguson was being questioned as to when her marriage to Mr. Russell Codman will take place. And another post-deb wearing an engagement ring was Miss Margaret-Louise Whipple. Mrs. Thomas Fabyan Moseley (Louisa Minot), whose wedding Sept. 4 was an important North Shore event, attended yesterday's concert with her sister, Miss Constance Minot.

Among others in the throng were Mrs. Francis B. Crowninshield, Miss Katharine Lane, Mrs. Arthur Bell, Mrs. Palfrey Perkins, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. Edward Harding, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Jr., Mrs. Philip Benson, Mrs. Moses Williams, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Alfred McIntyre, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Jr., Mrs. M. Bernard Fox, Mrs. Paul Clark, Mrs. Henry Prout, Mrs. Howard S. Hayward, Miss Celina H. Lewis, Mrs. Palmer Putnam and Mrs. Horace G. Arnold.

JERSEY CITY, N. J.
JERSEY JOURNAL

OCT 7 - 1946

Works of Brahms and Strauss will be featured on the first Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast of 1946-47 season over WJZ Tuesday, from 9:30 to 10:30 p.m. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, starting his 23rd season as conductor of the ensemble, will be on the podium.

Gene Hamilton, whose conversational but competent annotations have become associated with radio's most famous symphony concerts, celebrates his 15th anniversary as a concert commentator for radio listeners when the Boston Symphony returns to the air Tuesday, over the American Broadcasting System. Gene was commentator for this series for two years before he joined the U. S. Army in 1943. His first symphony broadcast series was the Chicago Symphony in 1931.

Anne Shepherd, star of "Big Sister" made the move from movies to radio with good reason . . . "radio offers more frequent work, more civilized hours, and is more lucrative."

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

OCT. 6 - 1946

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Wherein the Power of Music Is Recalled And the Position of Music Is Restated

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Every so often it seems fitting to remind ourselves of the place of music in our lives and of the amazing development of interest in music which has taken place in this country within a score of years. Whether we have realized it or not, we have taken world leadership in music. This city has become the music center of the world.

We can remind ourselves that today more cities in the United States have symphony orchestras than was ever attained in Europe, that there are more symphony concerts, ballet and opera performances than anywhere else in the world. The claim that more than 15,000,000 men and women in our leading cities now regularly attend these performances has been substantiated. The fact that over a half-million people receive the program of the Brooklyn Academy of Music in the course of the season is indicative of this group.

Yet there are people entirely unaware of one of the most extraordinary cultural expansions this country has ever known. They do not realize how vital music has become to Americans. As Howard Hanson points out, "we may be at the beginning of a new golden age of music which will have its inception in our country."

At the beginning of the most active musical season New York has ever anticipated, I quote from a recent address of Serge Koussevitzky, who means so much to the people of this borough. He sets the ideal and defines the power of music. "More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers and speaks a language accessible to all. On the remotest spots of earth, people experience the same deep emotion when listening to immortal pages written in the universal language of sound.

"In the light of music the soul beholds the good and the beautiful; the heart awakens to faith in man and in his better future. If you deprive men of music—just as they were deprived of honor, dignity, human rights, conscience, faith and freedom—you will witness the decline of the world to a state of brutality and barbarism. Music alone can still tame the beast in man—it is our comfort and hope. Even religion and the churches, having lost their unity, have also lost their moral control and their power over the conscience of men.

"It is our great blessing and deep joy to be serving music at a time when its radiant influence is revealed to the world with such conviction, and when the meaning of music is justifying also the meaning of man's existence . . . Today, in a period of an unprecedented crisis in history, when men find no common contact and means of understanding each other, when all notions and values have lost their former significance, music is the element of unity among men."

Oct. 6

Serge Koussevitzky Tells Of Music for Symphony Season

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Serge Koussevitzky held his annual conference with the local music critics this past week, too late, to be sure, for the results to be announced in last Sunday's pages prior to the opening of the 67th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, but better now than never. We had had, of course, the routine announcement of some of the soloists and the guest conductors, but of the music, new and old, to be offered during the season not much had been hinted. I predicted in this space last week that the season would not be dull and that the 50th anniversary of the deaths of both Bruckner and Brahms would be commemorated. Now the prospects are out and we can proceed to look over the exhibits.

Six brand new symphonies will be heard during the season, if all goes according to plan, that is if in some cases the parts arrive on time. These are: Shostakovitch's 9th, which was heard last summer in Tanglewood and which, it may be noted, has just been condemned in Russia for not being a serious work of "warm ideological conviction;" Aaron Copland's Third; the First by Camargo Guarnieri, the young Brazilian composer, who will conduct his own work as he did three years ago his Overture Concertante; Darius Milhaud's Second, with the composer conducting; Walter Piston's Third; and a symphony by Olivier Messiaen, a leading younger French composer, whose "Offrandes oubliees" was heard here some years ago (October 1936, to be exact). Other works, mainly in shorter forms, new to Boston will be Lukas Foss' "The Song of Songs" for soprano and orchestra; Roy Harris' Variations on a theme of Howard Hanson (this in tactful acknowledgment of Mr. Hanson's 50th birthday on Oct. 28); Richard Strauss' latest composition, "Metamorphosen"; and Francis Poulenc's Concerto in G minor for organ with strings and kettledrums.

This list is not, however, the whole story on modern music for the season. Mr. Koussevitzky pointed out that premieres were common enough but that almost more important were second and third performances. Thus, he reeled off the following works which will in all probability be repeated: Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra; Britten's "Peter Grimes" excerpts; Martin's Symphony No. 1; William Schuman's Symphony No. 3; Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5; Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony and Violin Concerto (the latter with Ruth Posselt as soloist:) Roussel's 4th Symphony; Stravinsky's "Ode" and "Sacre du Printemps;" Shostakovitch's 6th Symphony.

This season looks like one of anniversaries. Bruckner died 50 years ago this month, and consequently we shall hear his 8th Symphony next week and later, when Bruno Walter comes here, the 9th. Brahms also died 50 years ago next April. His symphonies are thrice familiar to all of us nowadays, though there was once a time when they were unpopular. There is, however, an unfamiliar side to Brahms which Mr. Koussevitzky brought to light last summer in the Berkshires. Consequently we shall hear in Boston the superb Double Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra (though with other soloists than Morini and Piatigorsky) and the Rhapsody for alto solo, male chorus and orchestra (with Carol Brice). Finally, the 150th anniversary of the birth of Schubert will be observed by a performance of his 7th Symphony.

Mahler, a composer who, as he himself predicted, is more and more coming into his own, will be represented by his 4th Symphony (conducted by Bruno Walter, the leading Mahler interpreter,) and his 7th (conducted by Leonard Bernstein.) Other important revivals will be Bach's B minor Mass in the spring and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" (with Jascha Veissi as the viola soloist.)

Mr. Koussevitzky outlined what we could expect from the guest conductors. Bruno Walter, who will be with the orchestra for four pairs of concerts, offers the most noted. Leonard Bernstein, who will conduct for three pairs of concerts, will do three 7th Symphonies, those of Schubert, Beethoven and Mahler. He will also lead the revival of Stravinsky's "Sacre," Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Roussel's "Pour une fete de printemps" and one of his own ballets.

Perhaps the most unusual of the guest conductors' programs is the all-French one of Charles Muench, the celebrated conductor of the Paris Conservatory. He will give us a work by one Jaubert, whose name is a new one to me; Messiaen's Ascension Trilogy; Honegger's Symphony for strings (a composer far too much neglected hereabouts); and as the main course, Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3. This about concludes the news of music for the coming season, though perhaps I should add that the conventional symphonic repertoire will not be neglected.

Two important changes in the orchestra's personnel should be noted. Due to the resignation of the veteran Mr. Theodorowicz, for many years the occupant of the second desk in the first violins, Mr. Krips will be moved up to fill that position. Mr. Koussevitzky has also broken with the tradition in choosing an American musician, 28 years old, for the orchetra's new first oboist. He is John Holmes, who studied at the Eastman School at Rochester, N. Y., and also studied with Mr. Gillet, who has just retired as first oboist at Tanglewood. This is the first time in the 66 years of the Boston Symphony's history that a native musician has been selected for an important first desk.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed a thought concerned at the lack of publicity which the orchestra gets locally and, I suppose, that it is true that we all take the preeminent excellence of the Boston Symphony too much for granted. As for us critics, we do from time to time remind our readers of this greatness, particularly at the beginning and end of each season. But since perpetual adoration is the best sustenance for lively readable criticism, some al-

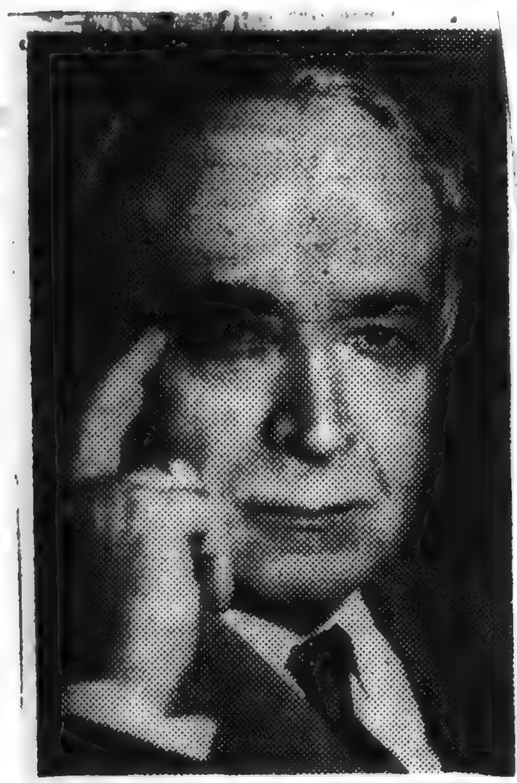
ance should be made if we do
make every review of a Bos-
Symphony concert a hymn of
ise.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Herald Oct. 6.

Koussevitsky To Help Open Jewish Drive

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevtzky, will perform at the pageant, "They Shall Not Die," which will open the 1946 drive of the Combined Jewish Appeal of Greater Boston, Sunday night at Boston Garden.

Speakers will include: Henry Morgenthau, Jr., former Secretary of the Treasury; Rabbi Joshua Loth Liebman and Rabbi Joseph Shubow, with Milton Kahn, vice-chairman of the appeal, presiding.

Plans for large-scale resettlement of homeless Jews from mass shelters and camps to Palestine, and other forms of relief for displaced European Jews, will be disclosed. Admission will be by ticket only, obtainable at Room 712, 333 Washington street.

The women's division of the appeal will open today, with a "sacrifice luncheon" at the Copley-Plaza. More than 1500 women are expected to attend. Mrs. Adele Rosenwald Levy, chairman of the national women's division of the United Jewish Appeal, recently returned from Europe, will speak.

The national goal is $100,000,000.

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

OCT 8 1946

Dial Suggestions:

Koussevitzky And Symphony Return to Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air on a new evening Tuesday (KGKO, 8:30 p.m.). Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his twenty-third season with the orchestra, will conduct Brahm's Symphony No. 3 and the tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss. . . . Henry Morgan, the new comedy sensation, will present his last broadcast as a sustaining (or unsponsored) program Tuesday (KGKO, 7:30 p.m.). Next week he will be sponsored, and the effect, if any, on his ribbing of radio sponsors in general will be worth observing.

KOUSSEVITZKY.

Henry Lie, Norwegian skater with the Ice-Cycles, along with his wife and eighteen other members of the Ice-Cycles cast, will visit George Young, the "Chef of the Air" (KGKO, 1:15 p.m.). A professional chef in his native land when he is not skating, Mr. Lie is a graduate of several Norwegian schools for chefs. . . . Mary Ruth Blake, cellist newly added to the staff of instrumental instruction of the Dallas public schools, will be soloist on "Cadenza" (KGKO, 5:45 p.m.). Accompanied by Marion Flagg, she will play "Gavotte" by David Popper, "Elegie" by Massenet, "Tarantella" by W. H. Squire.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT

OCT 8 - 1946

RADIO DAY BY DAY

Boston Symphony Season Broadcast

By R. M. SHEPHERDSON
Radio Editor, The Peoria Journal

Good news for symphony listeners! The Boston Symphony orchestra which this year observes its 66th season again will be heard weekly over the ABC network starting (WENR) at 8:30 tonight. Broadcasts will cover a period of 40 weeks, including the ensemble' regular winter season, summer "Pops" and Esplanade concerts and some of the Tanglewood Festival programs next summer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his 22nd season as conductor will be on the podium for most of the programs and will direct tonight's concert consisting of Brahm's Symphony No. 3 in F Major and Strauss' colorful tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 9 - 1946

Around New England

'PHENOMENAL YEAR' FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—Some Bostonians may have to go to Providence, R. I., this year to hear their own symphony.

The orchestra management suggested this today, reporting "a phenomenal year" for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's 23rd season with the organization.

Three series of Boston concerts, including 24 Saturday evening performances, are fully subscribed, the orchestra reported, and a fourth—the 24 Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall—is 96 per cent subscribed.

When the remaining four per cent are taken, the orchestra said, the only tickets remaining will be for the symphony's five Providence concerts—if Rhode Islanders leave any seats.

[15]

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

OCT 6 - 1946

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Wherein the Power of Music Is Recalled And the Position of Music Is Restated

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Every so often it seems fitting to remind ourselves of the place of music in our lives and of the amazing development of interest in music which has taken place in this country within a score of years. Whether we have realized it or not, we have taken world leadership in music. This city has become the music center of the world.

We can remind ourselves that today more cities in the United States have symphony orchestras than was ever attained in Europe, that there are more symphony concerts, ballet and opera performances than anywhere else in the world. The claim that more than 15,000,000 men and women in our leading cities now regularly attend these performances has been substantiated. The fact that over a half-million people receive the program of the Brooklyn Academy of Music in the course of the season is indicative of this group.

Yet there are people entirely unaware of one of the most extraordinary cultural expansions this country has ever known. They do not realize how vital music has become to Americans. As Howard Hanson points out, "we may be at the beginning of a new golden age of music which will have its inception in our country."

At the beginning of the most active musical season New York has ever anticipated, I quote from a recent address of Serge Koussevitzky, who means so much to the people of this borough. He sets the ideal and defines the power of music. "More than any other art, music has the driving force, the facility and freedom of crossing social, political, geographical, racial and religious barriers and speaks a language accessible to all. On the remotest spots of earth, people experience the same deep emotion when listening to immortal pages written in the universal language of sound.

"In the light of music the soul beholds the good and the beautiful; the heart awakens to faith in man and in his better future. If you deprive men of music—just as they were deprived of honor, dignity, human rights, conscience, faith and freedom—you will witness the decline of the world to a state of brutality and barbarism. Music alone can still tame the beast in man—it is our comfort and hope. Even religion and the churches, having lost their unity, have also lost their moral control and their power over the conscience of men.

"It is our great blessing and deep joy to be serving music at a time when its radiant influence is revealed to the world with such conviction, and when the meaning of music is justifying also the meaning of man's existence . . . Today, in a period of an unprecedented crisis in history, when men find no common contact and means of understanding each other, when all notions and values have lost their former significance, music is the element of unity among men.

Oct 6 Herald

Serge Koussevitzky Tells Of Music for Symphony Season

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Serge Koussevitzky held his annual conference with the local music critics this past week, too late, to be sure, for the results to be announced in last Sunday's pages prior to the opening of the 67th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, but better now than never. We had had, of course, the routine announcement of some of the soloists and the guest conductors, but of the music, new and old, to be offered during the season not much had been hinted. I predicted in this space last week that the season would not be dull and that the 50th anniversary of the deaths of both Bruckner and Brahms would be commemorated. Now the prospects are out and we can proceed to look over the exhibits.

Six brand new symphonies will be heard during the season, if all goes according to plan, that is if in some cases the parts arrive on time. These are: Shostakovitch's 9th, which was heard last summer in Tanglewood and which, it may be noted, has just been condemned in Russia for not being a serious work of "warm ideological conviction;" Aaron Copland's Third; the First by Camargo Guarnieri, the young Brazilian composer, who will conduct his own work as he did three years ago his Overture Concertante; Darius Milhaud's Second, with the composer conducting; Walter Piston's Third; and a symphony by Olivier Messiaen, a leading younger French composer, whose "Offrandes oubliees" was heard here some years ago (October 1936, to be exact). Other works, mainly in shorter forms, new to Boston will be Lukas Foss' "The Song of Songs" for soprano and orchestra; Roy Harris' Variations on a theme of Howard Hanson (this in tactful acknowledgment of Mr. Hanson's 50th birthday on Oct. 28); Richard Strauss' latest composition, "Metamorphosen"; and Francis Poulenc's Concerto in G minor for organ with strings and kettledrums.

This list is not, however, the whole story on modern music for the season. Mr. Koussevitzky pointed out that premieres were common enough but that almost more important were second and third performances. Thus, he reeled off the following works which will in all probability be repeated: Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra; Britten's "Peter Grimes" excerpts; Martin's Symphony No. 1; William Schuman's Symphony No. 3: Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5; Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" Symphony and Violin Concerto (the latter with Ruth Posselt as soloist;) Roussel's 4th Symphony; Stravinsky's "Ode" and "Sacre du Printemps;" Shostakovitch's 6th Symphony.

This season looks like one of anniversaries. Bruckner died 50 years ago this month, and consequently we shall hear his 8th Symphony next week and later, when Bruno Walter comes here, the 9th. Brahms also died 50 years ago next April. His symphonies are thrice familiar to all of us nowadays, though there was once a time when they were unpopular. There is, however, an unfamiliar side to Brahms which Mr. Koussevitzky brought to light last summer in the Berkshires. Consequently we shall hear in Boston the superb Double Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra (though with other soloists than Morini and Piatigorsky) and the Rhapsody for alto solo, male chorus and orchestra (with Carol Brice). Finally, the 150th anniversary of the birth of Schubert will be observed by a performance of his 7th Symphony.

Mahler, a composer who, as he himself predicted, is more and more coming into his own, will be represented by his 4th Symphony (conducted by Bruno Walter, the leading Mahler interpreter,) and his 7th (conducted by Leonard Bernstein.) Other important revivals will be Bach's B minor Mass in the spring and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" (with Jascha Veissi as the viola soloist.)

Mr. Koussevitzky outlined what we could expect from the guest conductors. Bruno Walter, who will be with the orchestra for four pairs of concerts, offers the most noted. Leonard Bernstein, who will conduct for three pairs of concerts, will do three 7th Symphonies, those of Schubert, Beethoven and Mahler. He will also lead the revival of Stravinsky's "Sacre," Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Roussel's "Pour une fete de printemps" and one of his own ballets.

Perhaps the most unusual of the guest conductors' programs is the all-French one of Charles Muench, the celebrated conductor of the Paris Conservatory. He will give us a work by one Jaubert, whose name is a new one to me; Messiaen's Ascension Trilogy; Honegger's Symphony for strings (a composer far too much neglected hereabouts); and as the main course, Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3. This about concludes the news of music for the coming season, though perhaps I should add that the conventional symphonic repertoire will not be neglected.

Two important changes in the orchestra's personnel should be noted. Due to the resignation of the veteran Mr. Theodorowicz, for many years the occupant of the second desk in the first violins, Mr. Krips will be moved up to fill that position. Mr. Koussevitzky has also broken with the tradition in choosing an American musician, 28 years old, for the orchetra's new first oboist. He is John Holmes, who studied at the Eastman School at Rochester, N. Y., and also studied with Mr. Gillet, who has just retired as first oboist at Tanglewood. This is the first time in the 66 years of the Boston Symphony's history that a native musician has been selected for an important first desk.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed a thought concerned at the lack of publicity which the orchestra gets locally and, I suppose, that it is true that we all take the pre-eminent excellence of the Boston Symphony too much for granted. As for us critics, we do from time to time remind our readers of this greatness, particularly at the beginning and end of each season. But since perpetual adoration is the best sustenance for lively

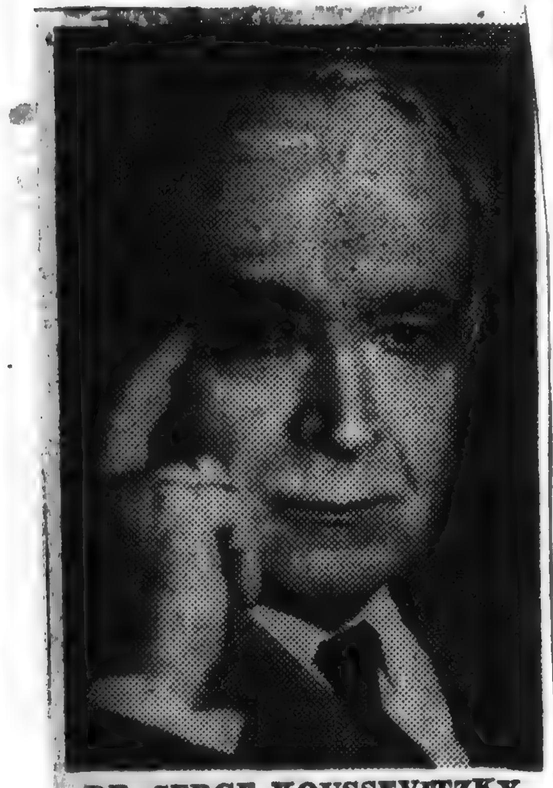
readable criticism, some al-
ance should be made if we do
make every review of a Bos-
Symphony concert a hymn of
ise.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Herald Oct. 6.

Koussevitsky To Help Open Jewish Drive

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevtzky, will perform at the pageant, "They Shall Not Die," which will open the 1946 drive of the Combined Jewish Appeal of Greater Boston, Sunday night at Boston Garden.

Speakers will include: Henry Morgenthau, Jr., former Secretary of the Treasury; Rabbi Joshua Loth Liebman and Rabbi Joseph Shubow, with Milton Kahn, vice-chairman of the appeal, presiding.

Plans for large-scale resettlement of homeless Jews from mass shelters and camps to Palestine, and other forms of relief for displaced European Jews, will be disclosed. Admission will be by ticket only, obtainable at Room 712, 333 Washington street.

The women's division of the appeal will open today, with a "sacrifice luncheon" at the Copley-Plaza. More than 1500 women are expected to attend. Mrs. Adele Rosenwald Levy, chairman of the national women's division of the United Jewish Appeal, recently returned from Europe, will speak.

The national goal is $100,000,000.

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

OCT 8 1946

Dial Suggestions:

Koussevitzky And Symphony Return to Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the air on a new evening Tuesday (KGKO, 8:30 p.m.). Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his twenty-third season with the orchestra, will conduct Brahm's Symphony No. 3 and the tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss. . . . Henry Morgan, the new comedy sensation, will present his last broadcast as a sustaining (or unsponsored) program Tuesday (KGKO, 7:30 p.m.). Next week he will be sponsored, and the effect, if any, on his ribbing of radio sponsors in general will be worth observing.

KOUSSEVITZKY.

Henry Lie, Norwegian skater with the Ice-Cycles, along with his wife and eighteen other members of the Ice-Cycles cast, will visit George Young, the "Chef of the Air" (KGKO, 1:15 p.m.). A professional chef in his native land when he is not skating, Mr. Lie is a graduate of several Norwegian schools for chefs. . . . Mary Ruth Blake, cellist newly added to the staff of instrumental instruction of the Dallas public schools, will be soloist on "Cadenza" (KGKO, 5:45 p.m.). Accompanied by Marion Flagg, she will play "Gavotte" by David Popper, "Elegie" by Massenet, "Tarantella" by W. H. Squire.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT

OCT 8 - 1946

RADIO DAY BY DAY

Boston Symphony Season Broadcast

By R. M. SHEPHERDSON
Radio Editor, The Peoria Journal

Good news for symphony listeners! The Boston Symphony orchestra which this year observes its 66th season again will be heard weekly over the ABC network starting (WENR) at 8:30 tonight. Broadcasts will cover a period of 40 weeks, including the ensemble's regular winter season, summer "Pops" and Esplanade concerts and some of the Tanglewood Festival programs next summer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his 22nd season as conductor will be on the podium for most of the programs and will direct tonight's concert consisting of Brahm's Symphony No. 3 in F Major and Strauss' colorful tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 9 - 1946

Around New England

'PHENOMENAL YEAR' FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—Some Bostonians may have to go to Providence, R. I., this year to hear their own symphony.

The orchestra management suggested this today, reporting "a phenomenal year" for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's 23rd season with the organization.

Three series of Boston concerts, including 24 Saturday evening performances, are fully subscribed, the orchestra reported, and a fourth—the 24 Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall—is 96 per cent subscribed.

When the remaining four per cent are taken, the orchestra said, the only tickets remaining will be for the symphony's five Providence concerts—if Rhode Islanders leave any seats.

HARTFORD, CONN
TIMES

OCT 7 - 1946

Shostakovich Once More Falls from Soviet Grace

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

IT MAY be only a coincidence that two items of music news come treading one on the heels of the other, but as in the case of all news it is not only allowable but reasonable to read them together since they make better sense that way. First we hear that Dmitri Shostakovich is on the outs with officialdom again; secondly, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces that neither Shostakovich nor Prokofieff will appear as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, having declined invitations to come to United States because of "unsettled conditions" between our country and theirs.

Koussevitzky speculates: "Perhaps their government authorities did not know how they would be received in this country—whether their reception would be good or bad. The propaganda in the papers here against Russia is terrific."

Of one thing they could be certain: whether audiences liked their music or not their compositions would not be subjected to the political litmus. Is it possible that Moscow fears exposing Russian creative artists to freedom of expresion?

* * *

IT MUST BE remembered that Shostakovich is of an age to have no recollections of living under anything but a totalitarian regime. He was 10 years old at the time of the Revolution and, while he was precocious, he had not at that age developed sufficient creative power to realize that artistic expression and political restraint are reciprocally poisonous.

He has not fully learned it yet, for time after time he has professed that music has political functions. That is to be expected from a young man nurtured from earliest days on soviet revolutionary precepts. One cannot be surprised at obedience under a rule where personal rights are non-existent and curbing of the individual will is a matter of governmental doctrine.

But if freedom of expression is a sin under the totalitarian concept, it is, to the artist, as ingrained as original sin and the flesh of Shostakovich has been weak no matter how willing the spirit.

* * *

BACK IN 1936 when he was 29 years old, Shostakovich first crossed up the soviet authorities. That was about the time when Moscow officially moved against modernists in all the arts. It was the ballet, "The Limpid Stream," which was found by Pravda to be "un-soviet, unwholesome and cheap." The attack came only a few days after Stalin attended Shostakovich's opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." He didn't like it and walked out before it was over, remarking that the murder and realistic sordidness upon which the opera was based were bourgeois ideas and besides the music was atonal. Shostakovich publicly agreed to behave himself, conceding that Pravda knew more about music than he did.

When the war came along Shostakovich threw himself whole-heartedly into the business of making music for a purpose. With all the zeal of a George Cohan sparking the first World War with his "Over There" or Irving Berlin doing his bit with a whole succession of singable tunes in the Second War, the stony-faced Russian turned out one symphony after another celebrating the various crises of his country's struggle. The propaganda agencies made the most of them and they were ballyhooed the world around far beyond their intrinsic worth. It was usable music; it was used, and that's about all you can say for it.

* * *

BUT MOSCOW apparently can't use his latest symphony, the Ninth. Not Pravda this time, but Culture and Life which is the official organ of the Agitation and Propaganda Committee of the Central Committee of the Communist party has turned loose its critic, I. Nestiev, upon it and he doesn't like it much, indicating that officially and unmistakably Shostakovich is again out of favor with the politicians.

Shostakovich "has not overcome in himself the ironical sceptic." The symphony lacks "warm ideological conviction." The first part is in the manner of the ancient classics, "tiny, archaic, simplified forms, joyful, traditional, classical rhythm, toy-like instrumentation with an abundance of high whistling and screaming timbres."

That's about what it sounded like to American ears. The critical consensus was fairly consistent when the Ninth Symphony was performed at Tanglewood last summer and over the air.

What is the difference, then, between criticism here and that of I. Nestiev? Simply this, that disagreeing with an artist is everybody's privilege in this country while it is the official duty of the literary headsman in Russia. Still more important is the difference that the creative artist here is wholly untrammelled in his expression.

* * *

OF COURSE Shostakovich hadn't anything to say about whether he was to accept the Boston invitation or not. Same with Prokofieff. The latter has been in this country and while he lately has given indications of having pretty well subordinated himself and his music to the Soviet ideology, it must not be forgotten that he was once a free spirit and it might therefore have been considered discreet to take no chances.

In the case of Shostakovich it is entirely understandable that his Moscow masters didn't want to trust so ebullient a soul in the atmosphere of America, especially since he had not yet been able to "overcome the ironical sceptic"!

Third Symphony of Brahms, Shostakovitch Ninth Heard

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Tuesday subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts met orchestra and conductor at Symphony Hall last night and expressed their pleasure in the opening of their season in a manner which in times like these, at once exuberant and anxious, comes easy and unforced.

They were interested in the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 9, which they received as a hand-down from the Friday and Saturday audiences of last week, and they had the satisfaction of thinking they heard the first real Boston exposition of the work, the earlier performances being merely studies and rehearsals.

Indeed it was difficult to regard the symphony as new music, so masterfully did both director and executants handle it. Certainly, too, there was slight chance for anyone to be bothered by the unusual sound. Quite often the trouble with an orchestral novelty is not at all in the composition itself but in the failure of interpreter and instrumentalists to reach its meaning and to surmount its technicalities. So it was not a matter in this case of the audience getting something over with and looking for real music to come in the later part of the program. It was a night of tone on a high plane all the way through.

Truly, more of a surprise, we might say, than the Russian composer was Brahms, whose Symphony No. 3 came to notice after the intermission. For Dr. Koussevitzky, we can hear with plain ears, as someone once said in broken English, has undergone a change of feeling about Brahms and has adopted an altered method of presenting him. Instead of being over-explicit in his treatment of detail, he allows incidental strains of melody and touches of color to take care of themselves. Or rather, he permits listeners to do their own exploring in those magical realms which lecturers on music appreciation call areas of thematic development.

There occur moments of emphasis and climax, nevertheless, when the super-expressive Koussevitzky of another day returns, and the big brass and the percussion just tell what is what. Nor are those moments, for the contrast and variety they bring, unwelcome.

To remark on the balance and quality of the orchestra of 1946-47, the strings stand on a foundation of doublebass and violoncello sonority hardly to be equalled. The top could carry more brilliance and some day will doubtless attain it. In regard to the wind choirs, the woods have a richness, clarity, and transparency that are

---

Symphony Subscriptions

By word from Symphony Hall box office, the only unsold seats for local concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, season of 1946-47, are for Friday afternoons, and these are 96 per cent taken. What remain will be on sale on Monday mornings of the week the concerts occur.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

OCT 10 1946

Billionth Record Made

Special to the World-Telegram.

CAMDEN, Oct. 10.—RCA-Victor's one billionth phonograph record, pressed here yesterday, will be presented to the Marine Corps. The record is a performance of "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

OCT 9 - 1946

Stanley Benson First Portland Man To Be Accepted By Boston Symphony

Served Here 3 Years As Concertmaster

Stanley Benson

Stanley Benson, recently concertmaster of the Portland Symphony Orchestra for three years, has the honor of being the first Portland man to be accepted as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Benson, who spent several years here during the war while employed at the South Portland Shipbuilding Corporation, was coached for several months by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before his audition.

A native of Brockton, Mass., he is known throughout New England, and has studied with leading violin instructors in this part of the Country including Burgin, Krasner and Vidas.

Mrs. Benson, who is also a talented violinist, played in the Portland Symphony Orchestra and actively participated in many musical organizations here. The Bensons and their young son, Peter, lived at Rackleff Street here.

Benson, who came here from a season in concert work in New York, was assistant concertmaster at Carnegie Hall. He has been a member of the Tibor Serley String Orchestra and the Dvorak Symphonietta.

While in Boston he was leader of the WBZ String Ensemble and first violinist in both the New England String Quartet and the Russian Ballet Orchestra. He has instructed both here and in Boston.

Benson was chosen from a group of five violinists who were auditioned for membership in the Boston orchestra, which is now generally accepted as the highest ranking symphony orchestra in the Country.

HOUSTON, TEXAS
PRESS

OCT 10 1946

Notes on Re

RCA-Victor is celebrating the pressing of its
"His Master's Voice" first was heard away bac this information to the public, the Victor pre that a billion records would make a stack 151 started out to play all of them, it would take counting the time used in changing needles.

The billionth record to leave the presses was, appropriately enough, "Stars and Stripes Forever," backed by "Semper Fidelis," both recorded by Serge Koussevitzky waving the baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. What record was the first off back those 45 years ago seems to have been lost in the shuffle. Anyway, it wasn't mentioned

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 10 1946

RCA Makes Billionth Record

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAMDEN, N. J., Oct. 9—RCA-Victor pressed its one billionth phonograph record today, a performance of "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be presented to the Marine

---

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

OCT 12 1946

Note for Historians

Associated Press dispatch from Boston:

A native-born American has been installed as a "first desk" player for the first time in the 66-year history of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is John Holmes, who will play first oboe.

EDNESDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1946

MUSIC

Tuesday Symphony

The first concert in the Tuesday evening subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follow:

Symphony No. 9, Op. 70....Shostakovitch
Symphony No. 3 in F major.
Op. 90..........................Brahms
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks,"
Op. 28..........................Strauss

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

This concert was the first of the Boston Symphony's new series, one hour of which is broadcast; and if it sounded over the air anything like it did in Symphony Hall it should have been a resounding success. The Brahms 3rd Symphony and Strauss' orchestral scherzo (a virtuoso orchestra's field day), "Till Eulenspiegel," were the numbers chosen to fill the hour. Both were played in superb fashion.

It happens to have been a long time since I heard this Brahms Symphony, say five or six years, and last night the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky recreated it as beautifully as to make it sound, for all its familiarity, an entirely fresh piece of music. Its classic dignity and strength, its tenderness and lyricism, were reborn in a way that few in last night's audience will forget. The Strauss work is a splendid war-horse for this orchestra and its conductor. It was a performance of sheer brilliance, but the music as Strauss meant it was not sacrificed to theatrical effect. Last night's capacity audience enjoyed it to the hilt.

That same audience did not appear to relish particularly the Shostakovitch 9th. Perhaps they are weary of the rather academic and politically tinged controversy it has aroused in the Soviet and here. As I said apropos of last Friday's concert, it is merely Shostakovitch returning to the style of his early works, including his First Symphony. To me this is a welcome change, as I found his long, solemn and pretentious later symphonies a good deal of a bore. Furthermore the slow movement of the 9th contains some beautiful wood-wind solos, which were played to perfection last night and last Friday. I, for one, hope that the official rapping over the knuckles that he received will not cause Mr. Shostakovitch to hasten to produce a pompous work of over

[16]

PASTE OVER

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

OCT 1 1 1946

A RECORD THAT MADE A RECORD. RCA Victor in Camden turns out its one billionth record since the old Victor Talking Machine Co. started in 1898. Picked for the billionth was a Boston Symphony recording of Semper Fidelis and Stars and Stripes Forever. To William Fink, right, an employe for 32 years, went the honor of making the billionth disc. Watching are Frank M. Folsom, left, executive vice president of RCA Victor division, and J. W. Murray, vice president of record activities.

Boston—Symphony

Oct. 12, 1946

Mendelssohn and Bruckner Works Fill Second Program

By L. A. Sloper

For the second Friday concert of the Boston Symphony season, Dr. Koussevitzky's program consisted of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Bruckner's Eighth. An interesting conjunction, contrasting through their works two widely disparate composers.

The "Italian" Symphony is a gentlemanly composition, the product of a man of property, education and culture, a happy, carefree man, kind, mannerly, rejoicing in travel, in the magnificent scenery of Italy and Switzerland, in the society of well-bred friends in London. His music, no less than his correspondence, reveals these traits. If the Symphony in A major has nothing Italian in it, except perhaps the Saltarello, it reflects at all events the pleasant outlook of the man of comfort, charm and good will, who so thoroughly enjoyed himself in Italy.

Bruckner's Symphony in C minor reflects just as clearly the Austrian peasant, simple, clumsy, loquacious, often a little boring, but honest, earnest, sincere and gifted. Both men were religious, Mendelssohn conventionally, Bruckner ardently, Mendelssohn's music is aristocratic, graceful, refined; Bruckner's rustic, awkward, redundant. Yet both were creative artists. It is possible to find Mendelssohn a little too exquisite, Bruckner a shade too naïve. It might have been better if Mendelssohn could have had a touch of Bruckner's simplicity, Bruckner some of his cultivation.

The extraordinary thing is that Dr. Koussevitzky understands them both so well and interprets them both so sympathetically. Yesterday the "Italian" Symphony was a marvel of precision, grace and charm; the Bruckner was hearty, fulsome and magniloquent, uniting some of the virtues and many of the faults of Wagner and Tchaikovsky. Even Mendelssohn's Saltarello was gracious. And Bruckner's famous Adagio was revealed in all the fervidity of its emotion.

This is the fiftieth anniversary year of Bruckner's passing. We shall hear more of his music later in the season.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 12 1946

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

HAYDN'S Symphony No. 97, though not one of the works which the Haydn liveliness of mind carries to sheer incandescence, is a delightful work in which that liveliness gives us characteristic surprises—such as the daring harmonic progressions in the coda of the first movement or the agitated coda of the slow movement. The new Victor set (1059; $3.95) offers a performance by Beecham with the London Philharmonic that is exquisite in sonority, in polished execution, in phraseological contour, but without the vivacity, the sharpness of inflection which Haydn's music requires. The performance is excellently reproduced except for the heaviness of bass that seems to be characteristic of English orchestral recording.

No composer has taken more pains than Tchaikovsky to set down in his score what must be done in performance to translate the printed symbols into the shape in living sound that he imagined; and a conductor with proper understanding of his function and with musical competence who plays Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony as the score directs will produce the superb piece of music that Tchaikovsky created. Koussevitzky is not such a conductor; he sets tempos different from those Tchaikovsky establishes by metronome (for example, the excessively slow tempo of the horn solo in the slow movement) and makes retardations and accelerations of pace that Tchaikovsky does not ask for; and in this way he distorts the shape of the work and its character and meaning. But the tasteless musician is a great conductor: the playing of the Boston Symphony under his direction is fabulous in its beauty of sonority and refinement of execution; and it is reproduced with spacious richness, though not invariably with the balance necessary for clarity of contrapuntal texture (Set 1057; $6.85).

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

OCT 1 0 1946

The Music Whirl

By HARRY R. BURKE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provide a new recording of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor (Victor six 12-inch records) which deserves royal welcome. True, it is compelling in its emotional power. Which, one suspects, is what Tschaikowsky intended of his "Fate" Symphony. But that is never attained by distortion or overemphasis. Nothing from the prima donna's bag of tricks is dragged out to send us searching for our handkerchiefs. It's as honest, as sincere as it is emotional. Nothing is inflated. Nothing drags for tear-squeezing. What is manifest throughout is the musical spirit of the great master of a glorious orchestra. Always the tonal texture of the symphonic web is of transparent clarity through which the tone-tints of the lesser voices are perceived. Then the alert and vibrant beauty of those wood-wind choirs, the smooth tone of brass disclosures, and the lift of sonorous and singing strings. A recording to be treasured. It's not the only one of course. The Encyclopedia of Recorded Music lists six others. None that could lure this from us in a trade.

IF TSCHAIKOWSKY could be musically most meaningful as, presumably, he pondered Fate, he could also be most entertaining in music which, after the French tradition, was conceived to entertain. And of this type nothing that he wrote has ever been more popular than "The Nutcracker Suite" which the New York Philharmonic has recorded, Arthur Rodzinski conducting (Columbia three 12-inch records). One has never found Mr. Rodzinski more happy than in company with Tschaikowsky. He seems to understand that Russian's orchestra and his moods. Here mingle charm of fairyland, grotesque puppetries and robust peasant humors—all in the spirit of the theater theatrical—the play that all the audience knows is just a play. In setting forth that spirit he evokes from a great orchestra its excellent best.

THE FRENCH SPIRIT of entertainment, too, is in the album of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid" (Victor three 10-inch discs) which the Boston "Pops" Orchestra has recorded with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Always an orchestra of fine flexibility and specializing in lighter music, its performance here is distinguished.

THE THEATER has a tradition that no reasonably competent actor ever failed as Hamlet. One wouldn't be surprised if musicians felt the same about conductors and the Cesar Franck D Minor symphony. Every guest conductor used to want to do it—as also the Beethoven Fifth, the Brahms' First, the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic," the Dvorak "New World" and the Schubert "Unfinished." Eugene Ormondy with the Philadelphia Orchestra now adds another to the list of album versions (Columbia five 12-inch records)—a list of no less than six available, according to the Encyclopedia of Recorded Music which doesn't include two others in our collection. Quite apart from the splendid orchestra he commands is a contribution by Mr. Ormondy which adds to one's growing respect for his increasing stature as conductor. There is nothing distorted here—no symphony butchered for a showman's holiday. Worth hearing. And having.

20,000 THRONG JEWISH RALLY

Supporters of Palestine Appeal Pac Boston Garden and Big Overflow Meeting in Opera House impressive ceremony by the Massachusetts Posts of the Jewish War Veterans under their Commander, David Lasker, opened the Garden rally by presenting colors. After a brief address by Milton Kahn, chairman of the meeting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presented Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

Musician Applauded

The world-famous musical group had a place of honor in the centre of the Garden floor, with spotlights playing on the tail-coated musicians during their performance. Dr. Koussevitzky was called back three times for bows at the conclusion of the symphony and the orchestra left the Garden to the applause of thousands.

Louis Nizer, authority on affairs and

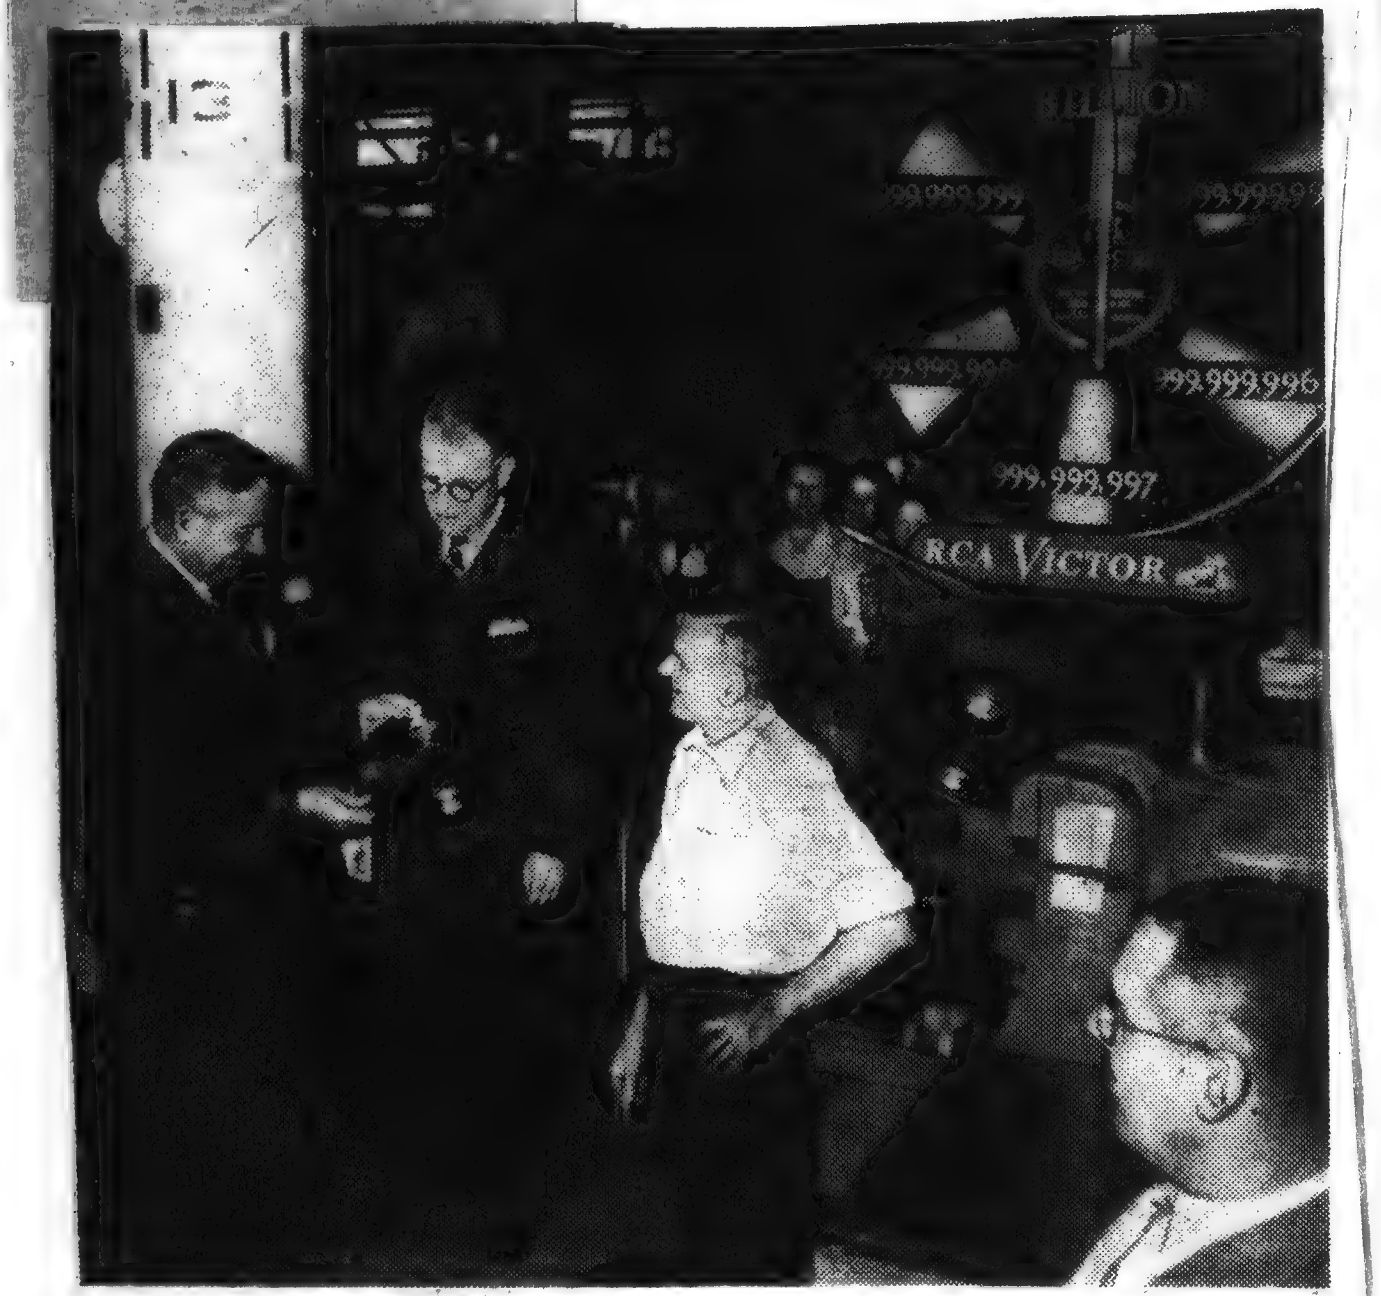
TRENTON, N.J
CITIZEN
10/11/46

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his 22nd year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be on the podium when that ensemble returns to the ABC network on Tuesday.

PASTE OVER

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

OCT 1 1 1946



A RECORD THAT MADE A RECORD. RCA Victor in Camden turns out its one billionth record since the old Victor Talking Machine Co. started in 1898. Picked for the billionth was a Boston Symphony recording of Semper Fidelis and Stars and Stripes Forever. To William Fink, right, an employe for 32 years, went the honor of making the billionth disc. Watching are Frank M. Folsom, left, executive vice president of RCA Victor division, and J. W. Murray, vice president of record activities.

Boston—Symphony

Oct. 12, 1946

Mendelssohn and Bruckner Works Fill Second Program

By L. A. Sloper

For the second Friday concert of the Boston Symphony season, Dr. Koussevitzky's program consisted of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Bruckner's Eighth. An interesting conjunction, contrasting through their works two widely disparate composers.

The "Italian" Symphony is a gentlemanly composition, the product of a man of property, education and culture, a happy, carefree man, kind, mannerly, rejoicing in travel, in the magnificent scenery of Italy and Switzerland, in the society of well-bred friends in London. His music, no less than his correspondence, reveals these traits. If the Symphony in A major has nothing Italian in it, except perhaps the Saltarello, it reflects at all events the pleasant outlook of the man of comfort, charm and good will, who so thoroughly enjoyed himself in Italy.

Bruckner's Symphony in C minor reflects just as clearly the Austrian peasant, simple, clumsy, loquacious, often a little boring, but honest, earnest, sincere and gifted. Both men were religious, Mendelssohn conventionally, Bruckner ardently, Mendelssohn's music is aristocratic, graceful, refined; Bruckner's rustic, awkward, redundant. Yet both were creative artists. It is possible to find Mendelssohn a little too exquisite, Bruckner a shade too naïve. It might have been better if Mendelssohn could have had a touch of Bruckner's simplicity, Bruckner some of his cultivation.

The extraordinary thing is that Dr. Koussevitzky understands them both so well and interprets them both so sympathetically. Yesterday the "Italian" Symphony was a marvel of precision, grace and charm; the Bruckner was hearty, fulsome and magniloquent, uniting some of the virtues and many of the faults of Wagner and Tchaikovsky. Even Mendelssohn's Saltarello was gracious. And Bruckner's famous Adagio was revealed in all the fervidity of its emotion.

This is the fiftieth anniversary year of Bruckner's passing. We shall hear more of his music later in the season.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 12 1946

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

HAYDN'S Symphony No. 97, though not one of the works which the Haydn liveliness of mind carries to sheer incandescence, is a delightful work in which that liveliness gives us characteristic surprises—such as the daring harmonic progressions in the coda of the first movement or the agitated coda of the slow movement. The new Victor set (1059; $3.95) offers a performance by Beecham with the London Philharmonic that is exquisite in sonority, in polished execution, in phraseological contour, but without the vivacity, the sharpness of inflection which Haydn's music requires. The performance is excellently reproduced except for the heaviness of bass that seems to be characteristic of English orchestral recording.

No composer has taken more pains than Tchaikovsky to set down in his score what must be done in performance to translate the printed symbols into the shape in living sound that he imagined; and a conductor with proper understanding of his function and with musical competence who plays Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony as the score directs will produce the superb piece of music that Tchaikovsky created. Koussevitzky is not such a conductor; he sets tempos different from those Tchaikovsky establishes by metronome (for example, the excessively slow tempo of the horn solo in the slow movement) and makes retardations and accelerations of pace that Tchaikovsky does not ask for; and in this way he distorts the shape of the work and its character and meaning. But the tasteless musician is a great conductor: the playing of the Boston Symphony under his direction is fabulous in its beauty of sonority and refinement of execution; and it is reproduced with spacious richness, though not invariably with the balance necessary for clarity of contrapuntal texture (Set 1057; $6.85).

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

OCT 1 0 1946

The Music Whirl

By HARRY R. BURKE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provide a new recording of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor (Victor six 12-inch records) which deserves royal welcome. True, it is compelling in its emotional power. Which, one suspects, is what Tschaikowsky intended of his "Fate" Symphony. But that is never attained by distortion or overemphasis. Nothing from the prima donna's bag of tricks is dragged out to send us searching for our handkerchiefs. It's as honest, as sincere as it is emotional. Nothing is inflated. Nothing drags for tear-squeezing. What is manifest throughout is the musical spirit of the great master of a glorious orchestra. Always the tonal texture of the symphonic web is of transparent clarity through which the tone-tints of the lesser voices are perceived. Then the alert and vibrant beauty of those wood-wind choirs, the smooth tone of brass disclosures, and the lift of sonorous and singing strings. A recording to be treasured. It's not the only one of course. The Encyclopedia of Recorded Music lists six others. None that could lure this from us in a trade.

IF TSCHAIKOWSKY could be musically most meaningful as, presumably, he pondered Fate, he could also be most entertaining in music which, after the French tradition, was conceived to entertain. And of this type nothing that he wrote has ever been more popular than "The Nutcracker Suite" which the New York Philharmonic has recorded, Arthur Rodzinski conducting (Columbia three 12-inch records). One has never found Mr. Rodzinski more happy than in company with Tschaikowsky. He seems to understand that Russian's orchestra and his moods. Here mingle charm of fairyland, grotesque puppetries and robust peasant humors—all in the spirit of the theater theatrical—the play that all the audience knows is just a play. In setting forth that spirit he evokes from a great orchestra its excellent best.

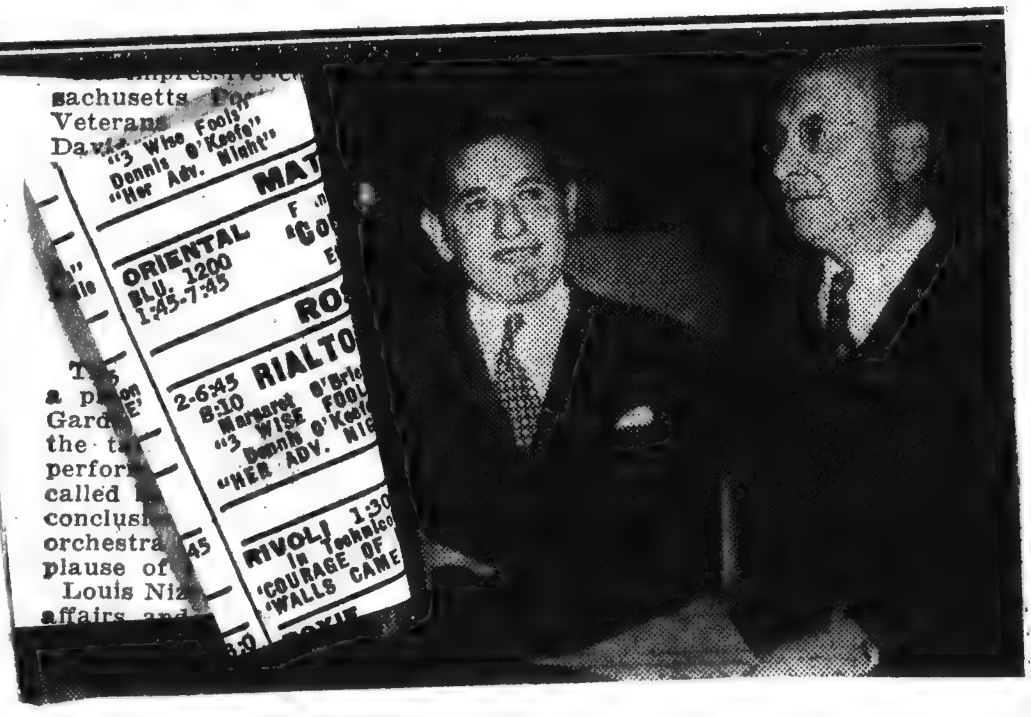
THE FRENCH SPIRIT of entertainment, too, is in the album of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid" (Victor three 10-inch discs) which the Boston "Pops" Orchestra has recorded with Arthur Fiedler conducting. Always an orchestra of fine flexibility and specializing in lighter music, its performance here is distinguished.

THE THEATER has a tradition that no reasonably competent actor ever failed as Hamlet. One wouldn't be surprised if musicians felt the same about conductors and the Cesar Franck D Minor symphony. Every guest conductor used to want to do it—as also the Beethoven Fifth, the Brahms' First, the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic," the Dvorak "New World" and the Schubert "Unfinished." Eugene Ormondy with the Philadelphia Orchestra now adds another to the list of album versions (Columbia five 12-inch records)—a list of no less than six available, according to the Encyclopedia of Recorded Music which doesn't include two others in our collection. Quite apart from the splendid orchestra he commands is a contribution by Mr. Ormondy which adds to one's growing respect for his increasing stature as conductor. There is nothing distorted here—no symphony butchered for a showman's holiday. Worth hearing. And having.

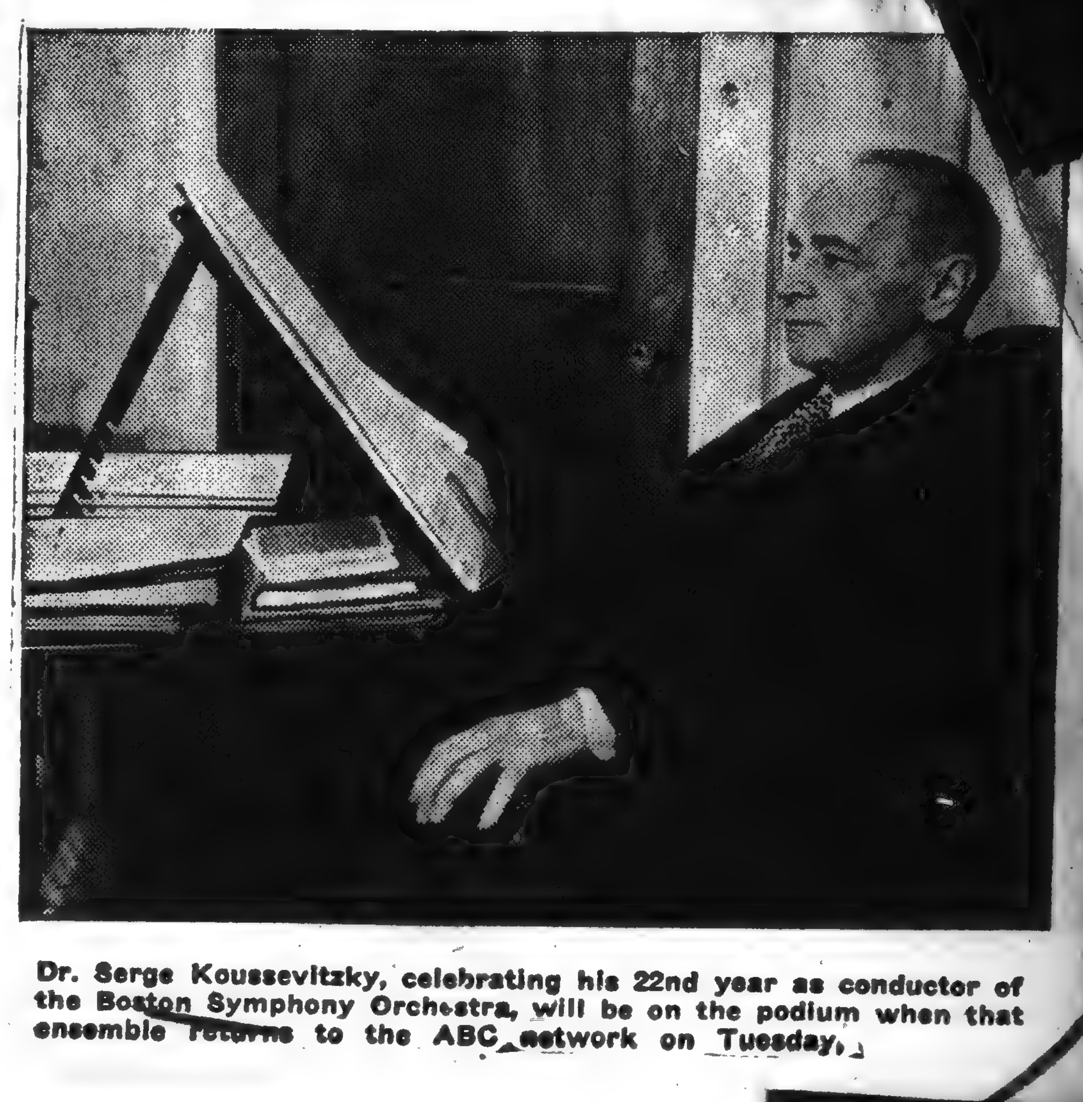
20,000 THRONG JEWISH RALLY

Post Oct 12

Supporters of Palestine Appeal Pac Boston Garden and Big Overflow Meeting in Opera House



TRENTON, N.J
CITIZEN
10/11/46



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrating his 22nd year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be on the podium when that ensemble returns to the ABC network on Tuesday.

LATEST PORTRAIT of Serge Koussevitzky, who opens a series of six Sunday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony hall next Sunday, October 20. This is the twenty-third consecutive year [illegible] conductor at the helm of the orchestra, now in its [illegible]

MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER

OCT 13 1946

Boston Symphony Hires American 'First-Desker'

NEW YORK (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just engaged an American-born "first desk" player for the first time, is about a quarter of a century behind the New York Philharmonic in this respect.

Of 22 "first desk" or leading instrumentalists in the New York orchestra, 16 were born in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, New York City or Washington, D. C. Timpanist Saul Goodman, native New Yorker, has been with the orchestra 20 years, and Theodore Cella, from Philadelphia, has been solo harp since 1920. The remaining six were born in Hungary, France, Russia or Italy.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 13 1946

EVENTS IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce five new symphonies during the current season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Three of them were commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. One is by Oliver Messiaen, contemporary French composer; another is Walter Piston's Third Symphony; the third is Aaron Copland's Third Symphony. Mr. Copland's work will be played in Boston for the first time next Friday. It is a forty-minute score on which the composer has been working for the last two years. It is dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitzky.

The two other symphonies the Bostonians will introduce will be conducted by their composers, Camargo Guarnieri of Brazil and Darius Milhaud, French composer now living in California.

The symphonies don't exhaust the list of new works, however, which will include "The Song of Songs," a work for orchestra and soprano solo based on a biblical text, by Lukas Foss; a set of Variations on a Theme of Howard Hanson by Roy Harris, and "Metamorphosis," a recent work by Richard Strauss. Novelties from other years to be repeated include Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, Martinu's First Symphony, Stravinsky's Ode and Shostakovich's Eighth Symphony.

BOSTON'S BEST BOOK FAIR OCT. 14, SYMPHONY HALL

Boston has had Book Fairs before—they're as much a part of the autumnal scene as the fallen leaves on the Common and the swanboats in drydock—but it has never had any quite like the one to be held at Symphony Hall from Oct. 14 through Oct. 17.

Planned by a committee that is virtually a rollcall of leaders in the religious, civic and educational lives of the community, the 1946 Boston Book Fair will dramatize the theme, "One World Through Books," with speakers that will include some of the greatest names in contemporary writing and exhibits encompassing the year in books.

Through the nine years of the Book Fair, thousands of enthusiastic New Englanders have crowded the speaking sessions to be enlightened and entertained, and this year's program will have something for every member of the family. A "Hobby Afternoon," on Tuesday, Oct. 15, will bring the women expert advice on every subject dear to their hearts, from hats to handwriting. At a forum on creative writing that night, prominent novelists will discuss their craft.

Wednesday night, Oct. 16, which will be devoted to a consideration of "Values for Survival," will bring back a longtime Book Fair favorite, John Mason Brown, in the company of Margaret Halsey, witty author of "Color Blind," and Capt. Ellis M. Zacharias, USN, veteran naval intelligence officer and author of "Secret Missions." The children will

(Continued on Page Ten)

18,000 Hear Jewish Appeal, Goal Here Set at $5,425,000

By LEO SHAPIRO Oct. 13

Giving proof that they feel they are their "brother's keeper," more than 18,000 persons filled Boston Garden and Boston Opera House last night in an unprecedented response to a heart-rending appeal for aid to the naked and hungry remnants of European Jewry.

It was grim fare that was put before this huge audience which came to be informed about the plight of its brethren overseas as the Jewish community, through the 1946 Combined Jewish Appeal of Greater Boston, formally began its drive for $5,425,000, the largest amount of money in history.

See APPEAL Page 4

manity.

It was undoubtedly one of the most impressive events ever staged in the city, from the participation at the Garden of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the most noted musical organization in the world, conducted by its equally world-famous leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to the beautiful blended voices of the 18 New England cantors, and a simple but telling pageant written around the Jews who are still living behind barbed wire in displaced persons camps.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 13 1946

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

AS I WAS reading the article on radio music on the music page last Sunday my eye caught the advertisement of the Prince Matchabelli broadcast of the Stradivari Orchestra that afternoon: "The ONLY orchestra with a string section of priceless Stradivari violins!" Looking to see what these priceless Stradivari were going to play, I found it to be the usual half-hour jumble—the polka from "The Bartered Bride," "Surrender," "Yours Is My Heart Alone," the "Blue Danube" waltz, "Caprice Viennois," "Arkansas Traveller," "Just a-Wearyin' for You," and a group of gypsy airs—which even the Stradivari couldn't tempt me to listen to.

What I did tune in for at 11 o'clock was the performance of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" quartet announced in the American Broadcasting Company's bulletin; but this was not the first time that a quartet announced by A B C did not materialize. And so I didn't discover how A B C got a work that lasts about forty minutes to fit into the assigned half hour. Not that I didn't have an idea of how it would have been done: part of the quartet would have been sliced out in the middle or chopped off at the end.

The intrusion of sales talk into programs is by no means the only annoying consequence of the commercialization of American broadcasting. Another is the division of broadcasting time into salable hours and half hours, and the rigidity of these periods in week-after-week scheduling—which creates difficulties with works that Mozart and Beethoven did not plan to fit exactly into half hours or hours. The Book-of-the-Month Club buys a series of hour-and-a-half periods to broadcast the New Friends of Music concerts; and at the end of the hour and a half the broadcast ends, even if it means breaking off in the middle of the finale of a Schubert quintet or Bach concerto (but that is an improvement over the situation a few years ago, when WJZ, picking up only twenty-five minutes of the New Friends concert at 6:05, was likely to plunge into the middle of one movement of a work and cut off in the middle of the next movement). Allis Chalmers buys a series of one-hour periods from 9:30 to 10:30 to broadcast the second part of the Boston Symphony's concerts; and when the orchestra happens to play Beethoven's Ninth, which lasts longer than an hour and begins before 9:30, the work is broadcast without its first movement. Only as much of the New York Philharmonic's Sunday afternoon concert is broadcast as fits into the hour and a half that was left when C B S, several years ago, chopped off the concluding half hour to sell to an advertiser; and when the Philharmonic gives Bach's St. Matthew Passion C B S broadcasts only the first half.

As for studio programs, when NBC assigned a weekly half hour to Beethoven's quartets, it made the long ones fit the time by omitting a movement. The Book-of-the-Month Club offered a series of one-hour periods in which the Budapest quartet performed the Ravel quartet and only two movements of a Beethoven Opus 18, or a Brahms quartet and only the slow movement of Beethoven's Opus 132. And the Telephone Hour of last Aug. 19—presenting only the first movement of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, which requires about twenty-five minutes for its progression of introductory flourishes leading to exposition of material, involvement of this material in the development and resolution of these involvements in the recapitulation and coda—made it fit into the ten minutes or so that were left of the half-hour period after the several small pieces, the announcements and the commercials, by cutting out the exposition and development and having the introductory flourishes jump to the recapitulation.

The British Broadcasting Corporation would not have CBS's reason for chopping a half hour off the New York Philharmonic's Sunday afternoon concert, and it could add time for the second half of Bach's St. Matthew Passion. Also it could give the Boston Symphony additional time for Beethoven's Ninth, give the New Friends concerts the varying amounts of time they needed, give a studio chamber-music program twenty minutes for a Haydn quartet one week and fifty minutes for a late Beethoven quartet the next week. It could do all these things, and, unless there has been a great change recently, it would do them. For when I was comparing American and English programs a number of years ago it became evident that what was responsible for the BBC's superior handling of music was the fact that the men in control of BBC were people who themselves loved the music of Mozart and Schubert, Berlioz and Debussy, and could therefore believe that other people loved it. They were people whose love and understanding taught them how the music must be treated—taught them, among other things, respect for the integrity of a concert, a work, a movement of a work; so that I can't conceive of any circumstances that would lead them to butcher the first movement of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto as it was butchered on the Aug. 19 Telephone Hour. And the most important consequence of the commercialization of our broadcasting is that it places control of those hours and half hours in the hands of our business men and advertising men—I am referring now to the top-level policy makers—most of whom may have to profess respect for music but really care little and understand less about it. It is their lack of understanding that eventually works into the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts with a three-ring circus in the intermissions, the half hours filled with "Caprice Viennois," "Surrender" and "Yours Is My Heart Alone," the quartets with a movement omitted, the concerto movements with exposition and development sliced out.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 13 1946

Boston Music Fans May Have to Come Here for Concerts

BECAUSE of an unprecedented sell-out of tickets for Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in its home town, many Bostonians will have to come to Providence if they wish to hear their own orchestra, providing seats are still available for the series that starts at the Metropolitan Theater Tuesday night.

The Tuesday evening series of six concerts in Symphony Hall and the Tuesday evening series in Cambridge are fully subscribed. Full up, too, are the Saturday evening series of 24 concerts and the Sunday afternoon series of six, both in Symphony Hall. And reserved seats for the Friday afternoon series of 24 programs in Symphony Hall are 96 per cent sold.

Despite the record-breaking flood of subscriptions, the traditional student rush line for unreserved tickets will be retained.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK

OCT 14 1946

A Noise Like a Communist

"It is a merry little piece," said Dmitri Shostakovich of his Ninth Symphony. "Musicians will love to play it and critics will delight in blasting it." Thus Soviet Russia's most-publicized composer described the work he wrote in the summer of 1945—at a time when the world, and the U. S. S.R. especially, expected that he would produce a triumphant paean of victory to follow the grim melodrama of his Seventh and Eighth Symphonies.

The United States heard the Ninth Symphony for the first time last summer when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played it at the opening of the Berkshire Festival (NEWSWEEK, Aug. 5). Most critics agreed with Shostakovich's own guess about its reception: They did not like it.

Last week Shostakovich could see himself as a crystal-gazer too penetrating for his own good. In Culture and Life, the official oracle of the propaganda committee of the central committee of the Communist party, the music critic Israel Nestyeff accused Shostakovich of forgetting big serious problems for a playful and fanciful trifle. This "facile and light incident" Nestyeff felt was lacking in "warm ideological conviction."

In almost any other country, this attack might be dismissed as the personal opinion of a man who was the official biographer of his accused's greatest rival, for Nestyeff is the avowed protagonist of Serge Prokofieff, held by many critics the world over to be a far greater composer than Shostakovich, his younger compatriot. But Shostakovich and his satiric idiom have been in the Communist doghouse before (in 1936 for the opera "Lady Macbeth" and his ballet "The Limpid Stream").*

There could also be malice aforethought in saying that the Ninth was influenced by Igor Stravinsky—whom music knows as the White Russian modernist who has become an American citizen, but whom Nestyeff describes as "an artist without a fatherland." Whatever the motive, neither Nestyeff—nor any other Soviet critic—has yet produced a satisfactory definition of what Communism ought to sound like in music.

---

*From Boston last week, Koussevitzky, so staunch a friend to Soviet music, said the Ninth was "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works" and let it be known that the Boston Symphony's invitations to both Shostakovich and Prokofieff had been refused until relations between the U. S. S. R. and this country were "more settled."

LATEST PORTRA[illegible] of the Boston Symphon[illegible] third consecu[illegible]

MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER

OCT 13 1946

Boston Symphony Hires American 'First-Desker'

NEW YORK—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just engaged an American-born "first desk" player for the first time, is about a quarter of a century behind the New York Philharmonic in this respect.

Of 22 "first desk" or leading instrumentalists in the New York orchestra, 16 were born in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, New York City or Washington, D. C. Timpanist Saul Goodman, native New Yorker, has been with the orchestra 20 years, and Theodore Cella, from Philadelphia, has been solo harp since 1920. The remaining six were born in Hungary, France, Russia or Italy.

NEW [illegible]
TIMES

OCT 13 1946

EVENTS IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce five new symphonies during the current season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Three of them were commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. One is by Oliver Messiaen, contemporary French composer; another is Walter Piston's Third Symphony; the third is Aaron Copland's Third Symphony. Mr. Copland's work will be played in Boston for the first time next Friday. It is a forty-minute score on which the composer has been working for the last two years. It is dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitzky.

The two other symphonies the Bostonians will introduce will be conducted by their composers, Camargo Guarnieri of Brazil and Darius Milhaud, French composer now living in California.

The symphonies don't exhaust the list of new works, however, which will include "The Song of Songs," a work for orchestra and soprano solo based on a biblical text, by Lukas Foss; a set of Variations on a Theme of Howard Hanson by Roy Harris, and "Metamorphosis," a recent work by Richard Strauss. Novelties from other years to be repeated include Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, Martinu's First Symphony, Stravinsky's Ode and Shostakovich's Eighth Symphony.

BOSTON'S BEST BOOK FAIR OCT. 14, SYMPHONY HALL

Boston has had Book Fairs before—they're as much a part of the autumnal scene as the fallen leaves on the Common and the swanboats in drydock—but it has never had any quite like the one to be held at Symphony Hall from Oct. 14 through Oct. 17.

Planned by a committee that is virtually a rollcall of leaders in the religious, civic and educational lives of the community, the 1946 Boston Book Fair will dramatize the theme, "One World Through Books," with speakers that will include some of the greatest names in contemporary writing and exhibits encompassing the year in books.

Through the nine years of the Book Fair, thousands of enthusiastic New Englanders have crowded the speaking sessions to be enlightened and entertained, and this year's program will have something for every member of the family. A "Hobby Afternoon," on Tuesday, Oct. 15, will bring the women expert advice on every subject dear to their hearts, from hats to handwriting. At a forum on creative writing that night, prominent novelists will discuss their craft.

Wednesday night, Oct. 16, which will be devoted to a consideration of "Values for Survival," will bring back a longtime Book Fair favorite, John Mason Brown, in the company of Margaret Halsey, witty author of "Color Blind," and Capt. Ellis M. Zacharias, USN, veteran naval intelligence officer and author of "Secret Missions." The children will

(Continued on Page Ten)

18,000 Hear Jewish Appeal Goal Here Set at $5,425,000

By LEO SHAPIRO

Oct. 13

Giving proof that they feel they are their "brother's keeper," more than 18,000 persons filled Boston Garden and Boston Opera House last night in an unprecedented response to a heart-rending appeal for aid to the naked and hungry remnants of European Jewry.

It was grim fare that was put before this huge audience which came to be informed about the plight of its brethren overseas as the Jewish community, through the 1946 Combined Jewish Appeal of Greater Boston, formally began its drive for $5,425,000, the largest amount of money in history.

See APPEAL Page 4

manity.

It was undoubtedly one of the most impressive events ever staged in the city, from the participation at the Garden of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the most noted musical organization in the world, conducted by its equally world-famous leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to the beautiful blended voices of the 18 New England cantors, and a simple but telling pageant written around the Jews who are still living behind barbed wire in displaced persons camps.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 13 1946

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

AS I WAS reading the article on radio music on the music page last Sunday my eye caught the advertisement of the Prince Matchabelli broadcast of the Stradivari Orchestra that afternoon: "The ONLY orchestra with a string section of priceless Stradivari violins!" Looking to see what these priceless Stradivari were going to play, I found it to be the usual half-hour jumble—the polka from "The Bartered Bride," "Surrender," "Yours Is My Heart Alone," the "Blue Danube" waltz, "Caprice Viennois," "Arkansas Traveller," "Just a-Wearyin' for You," and a group of gypsy airs—which even the Stradivari couldn't tempt me to listen to.

What I did tune in for at 11 o'clock was the performance of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" quartet announced in the American Broadcasting Company's bulletin; but this was not the first time that a quartet announced by A B C did not materialize. And so I didn't discover how A B C got a work that lasts about forty minutes to fit into the assigned half hour. Not that I didn't have an idea of how it would have been done: part of the quartet would have been sliced out in the middle or chopped off at the end.

The intrusion of sales talk into programs is by no means the only annoying consequence of the commercialization of American broadcasting. Another is the division of broadcasting time into salable hours and half hours, and the rigidity of these periods in week-after-week scheduling—which creates difficulties with works that Mozart and Beethoven did not plan to fit exactly into half hours or hours. The Book-of-the-Month Club buys a series of hour-and-a-half periods to broadcast the New Friends of Music concerts; and at the end of the hour and a half the broadcast ends, even if it means breaking off in the middle of the finale of a Schubert quintet or Bach concerto (but that is an improvement over the situation a few years ago, when WJZ, picking up only twenty-five minutes of the New Friends concert at 6:05, was likely to plunge into the middle of one movement of a work and cut off in the middle of the next movement). Allis Chalmers buys a series of one-hour periods from 9:30 to 10:30 to broadcast the second part of the Boston Symphony's concerts; and when the orchestra happens to play Beethoven's Ninth, which lasts longer than an hour and begins before 9:30, the work is broadcast without its first movement. Only as much of the New York Philharmonic's Sunday afternoon concert is broadcast as fits into the hour and a half that was left when C B S, several years ago, chopped off the concluding half hour to sell to an advertiser; and when the Philharmonic gives Bach's St. Matthew Passion C B S broadcasts only the first half.

As for studio programs, when NBC assigned a weekly half hour to Beethoven's quartets, it made the long ones fit the time by omitting a movement. The Book-of-the-Month Club offered a series of one-hour periods in which the Budapest quartet performed the Ravel quartet and only two movements of a Beethoven Opus 18, or a Brahms quartet and only the slow movement of Beethoven's Opus 132. And the Telephone Hour of last Aug. 19—presenting only the first movement of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, which requires about twenty-five minutes for its progression of introductory flourishes leading to exposition of material, involvement of this material in the development and resolution of these involvements in the recapitulation and coda—made it fit into the ten minutes or so that were left of the half-hour period after the several small pieces, the announcements and the commercials, by cutting out the exposition and development and having the introductory flourishes jump to the recapitulation.

The British Broadcasting Corporation would not have CBS's reason for chopping a half hour off the New York Philharmonic's Sunday afternoon concert, and it could add time for the second half of Bach's St. Matthew Passion. Also it could give the Boston Symphony additional time for Beethoven's Ninth, give the New Friends concerts the varying amounts of time they needed, give a studio chamber-music program twenty minutes for a Haydn quartet one week and fifty minutes for a late Beethoven quartet the next week. It could do all these things, and, unless there has been a great change recently, it would do them. For when I was comparing American and English programs a number of years ago it became evident that what was responsible for the BBC's superior handling of music was the fact that the men in control of BBC were people who themselves loved the music of Mozart and Schubert, Berlioz and Debussy, and could therefore believe that other people loved it. They were people whose love and understanding taught them how the music must be treated—taught them, among other things, respect for the integrity of a concert, a work, a movement of a work; so that I can't conceive of any circumstances that would lead them to butcher the first movement of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto as it was butchered on the Aug. 19 Telephone Hour. And the most important consequence of the commercialization of our broadcasting is that it places control of those hours and half hours in the hands of our business men and advertising men—I am referring now to the top-level policy makers—most of whom may have to profess respect for music but really care little and understand less about it. It is their lack of understanding that eventually works into the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts with a three-ring circus in the intermissions, the half hours filled with "Caprice Viennois," "Surrender" and "Yours Is My Heart Alone," the quartets with a movement omitted, the concerto movements with exposition and development sliced out.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 13 1946

Boston Music Fans May Have to Come Here for Concerts

BECAUSE of an unprecedented sell-out of tickets for Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in its home town, many Bostonians will have to come to Providence if they wish to hear their own orchestra, providing seats are still available for the series that starts at the Metropolitan Theater Tuesday night.

The Tuesday evening series of six concerts in Symphony Hall and the Tuesday evening series in Cambridge are fully subscribed. Full up, too, are the Saturday evening series of 24 concerts and the Sunday afternoon series of six, both in Symphony Hall. And reserved seats for the Friday afternoon series of 24 programs in Symphony Hall are 96 per cent sold.

Despite the record-breaking flood of subscriptions, the traditional student rush line for unreserved tickets will be retained.

[illegible]
NEWS WEEK

OCT 14 1946

A Noise Like a Communist

"It is a merry little piece," said Dmitri Shostakovich of his Ninth Symphony. "Musicians will love to play it, and critics will delight in blasting it." Thus Soviet Russia's most-publicized composer described the work he wrote in the summer of 1945—at a time when the world, and the U. S. S.R. especially, expected that he would produce a triumphant paean of victory to follow the grim melodrama of his Seventh and Eighth Symphonies.

The United States heard the Ninth Symphony for the first time last summer when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played it at the opening of the Berkshire Festival (NEWSWEEK, Aug. 5). Most critics agreed with Shostakovich's own guess about its reception: They did not like it.

Last week Shostakovich could see himself as a crystal-gazer too penetrating for his own good. In Culture and Life, the official oracle of the propaganda committee of the central committee of the Communist party, the music critic Israel Nestyeff accused Shostakovich of forgetting big serious problems for a playful and fanciful trifle. This "facile and light incident" Nestyeff felt was lacking in "warm ideological conviction."

In almost any other country, this attack might be dismissed as the personal opinion of a man who was the official biographer of his accused's greatest rival, for Nestyeff is the avowed protagonist of Serge Prokofieff, held by many critics the world over to be a far greater composer than Shostakovich, his younger compatriot. But Shostakovich and his satiric idiom have been in the Communist doghouse before (in 1936 for the opera "Lady Macbeth" and his ballet "The Limpid Stream").*

There could also be malice aforethought in saying that the Ninth was influenced by Igor Stravinsky—whom music knows as the White Russian modernist who has become an American citizen, but whom Nestyeff describes as "an artist without a fatherland." Whatever the motive, neither Nestyeff—nor any other Soviet critic—has yet produced a satisfactory definition of what Communism ought to sound like in music.

---

*From Boston last week, Koussevitzky, so staunch a friend to Soviet music, said the Ninth was "one of the most beautiful of our contemporary works" and let it be known that the Boston Symphony's invitations to both Shostakovich and Prokofieff had been refused until relations between the U. S. S. R. and this country were [illegible] settled."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

OCT 13 1946

Peter Grimes Rated High Lyric Drama

By Glenn Dillard Gunn

WHEN Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," was produced at Tanglewood last August, Serge Koussevitzky assured a vast audience that they were about to hear the finest lyric drama that had been composed since Bizet gave "Carmen" to the world.

Koussevitzky commissioned the work as a memorial to his wife, the late Natalie Koussevitzky. He may have been a prejudiced witness. Yet the public joined the critics in an enthusiastic reception of "Peter Grimes," whereas "Carmen" failed dismally in Paris. Bizet killed himself in despair. If only he had waited until the Milan premiere! That was a triumph.

* * *

IT IS interesting that Koussevitzky chose "Carmen" as a standard of comparison. It is even more interesting when one recalls that several famous lyric dramas have been composed since Bizet wrote his masterpiece, such as Wagner's "Parsifal," Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande," Charpentier's "Louise," all of the Massenet repertoire, Puccini's "Boheme," or Montemezzi's "Love of Three Kings." The implication that "Peter Grimes" is a better opera than any of these should please Britten, even if it excites a considerable antagonism among music lovers who have their preferences and prejudices.

Such people will be quick to remind us that this high evaluation of a novelty reflects the opinion of only one man. Koussevitzky, of course, is no ordinary music lover. Like every great executive artist he is obliged to be a competent critic. He does not depend on the judgment of others when he makes the programs of the Boston Symphony. These programs set standards for the art especially in the department of modern music.

* * *

THE musical public of Washington, or that portion thereof that supports the National Symphony, already has heard parts of the new Britten score. Kindler played "Four Sea Interludes" from "Peter Grimes" last spring. He repeats them Wednesday night. It may be assumed that these are typical since the whole work, its every mood and inflection, its story and its song, are so many devices to create and sustain an atmosphere dominated by the sea. Its power, its menace, its fleeting serenity, its beauty, and its wrath, form the background of George Crabbe poems from which the libretto has been drawn. One concludes that Britten has been more concerned with these aspects of nature than with the human tragedy that is played in the setting they provide.

Hearing these "Sea Interludes" last season one was impressed with the originality of Britten's imagination. All the "sea images" that other composers have thrown upon the symphonic screen—Weber, Verdi, Mendelssohn, Wagner—have been discarded for a new descriptive vocabulary. In this vocabulary none of the ancient and approved aquatic musical cliches appear. The less obvious figures and images that replace them are not the less vivid because of their novelty. To many they will seem more significant and picturesque.

* * *

TO those who derive their greatest musical satisfactions from new sounds—and there are such strange people—the Britten excerpts will be richly rewarding. The conservatives may be as little pleased as the Frenchmen who first heard "Carmen." Kindler does this new music with understanding and high art, and, it should be added, with courage. Conductors who persistently offend the conservatives may lose valued patrons.

The star of Wednesday night's opening concert will be Kindler's new 100-piece orchestra. For 15 years the conductor worked toward that goal, meeting the competition of older and larger orchestras here and on tour by the force of his personality and the skill of his baton. These same qualities, one may be sure, will quickly weld the new group into an artistic unit.

Other details of the opening concert already have been made known. Dame Myra Hess, most widely recognized of English pianists, will be the soloist, playing the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven. This Kindler will preface with his own transcription of Bach's version of a Vivaldi "Concerto grosso." Later he will play the "Peter Grimes" excerpts, a novelty, "Canto de Invierno," by Leng, and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Symphony Party Line

Dmitri Shostakovitch, the composer, seems to be joining Maxim Litvinov, the statesman, as the victim of ups and downs on that Communistic tightrope which "citizens" of the Soviets, high or low, tread in uneasy balance. "Culture and Life," official publication of the propaganda department of the Communist party's central committee, came out this week with an article violently attacking Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony. The composition, which at first hearing had been hailed in Moscow as "a triumph of our great victory," is now declared by "Culture and Life's" critic to have "ideological impurities and deviations" and to contain tendencies which reflect the "unwholesome influence" of Igor Stravinsky, the Russian-born composer, who is now a citizen of the United States.

Dmitri Shostakovitch, who has figured as a sort of problem child in the odd family life of Soviet art and propaganda, has been both praised and spanked in Russia. "Pravda," in 1936, regarded a ballet and opera of his as "un-Soviet," the adverse criticism appearing after Josef Stalin had attended a performance. On the other hand, Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, written in besieged Leningrad, where the composer served as fire fighter, ditch digger and member of the People's Militia, won complete recognition and applause.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

OCT 14 1946

Richard Tucker

CRITIC KOUSSEVITZKY
The Government, most impassive.

High Art

U.S. radio is proud of the fact that it periodically broadcasts the best music in the world. But Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony, thinks that radio could do far more. Said he last week, in his best English:

"Eet ees not enough good music. For one hour, the people leesten to a symphony orchestra, then for 24 hours they leesten to cheap programs. . . . In a half hour, the good music ees forgotten. . . .

"Eet should be the Government which encourages good music, not the people who want to make money. But the Government ees most impassive. Eet must be a Ministry of Fine Arts, which would encourage good music. Every state should have eets own radio station and eets own symphony orchestra. But everything ees left to private corporations. Eet ees not enough that we have fine roads and bridges and houses. We must have good music for the spirit."

Koussevitzky's classical-music ratio of one hour in 24 was not far wrong. But in that little time, U.S. radio manages to present an impressive parade of talent. Not all of it is sponsored.

The Big Three. Two of the best three classical programs have no sponsors as the season begins. Arturo Toscanini returns to the NBC Symphony (Sun. 5 p.m., E.S.T.) on Oct. 27, minus his General Motors sponsor that paid $1,250,000 for the hour last year. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Tues. 9:30 p.m., E.S.T., ABC) open this week, with no sponsor. But once again U.S. Rubber is underwriting the New York Philharmonic (Sun. 3 p.m., E.S.T., CBS) with Artur Rodzinski conducting.

Other top raters: the Philadelphia Orchestra, unsponsored, with Eugene Ormandy conducting (Sat. 5 p.m., E.S.T., CBS); the Cleveland Symphony, George Szell conducting (Sat. 6 p.m., E.S.T., Mutual); Metropolitan Opera Saturday matinees, returning Nov. 16 (Sat. 2 p.m., E.S.T., ABC); the Telephone Hour, with such artists as Fritz Kreisler, Lily Pons, Yehudi Menuhin (Mon. 9 p.m., E.S.T., NBC).

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD HERALD

OCT 17 1946

New Model: Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich on the air the other night. This is the symphony that has been denounced unsparingly by Russian critics on the ground that it lacks Communist ideology. One critic suggested that Shostakovich had been influenced by Stravinsky—a damning charge since Stravinsky has not lived in Russia since the revolution.

To an unlearned ear, the Ninth Symphony sounded melodious and gay. It has some impressive orchestral climaxes, but much of it was simply lilting. It sounded more like Tsaichovsky that Stravinsky.

But whatever its derivation, if any, most listeners must have wondered what the Russian critics found in it that enraged them so. Is it simply that gaiety is now forbidden in Russia? If so, there has been a change in the party line, for only a few years ago Soviet composers were admonished to stop composing dissonant "modern" music and write tuneful pieces that the people would enjoy.

Perhaps Soviet policy now calls for thundering, overwhelming, smothering music of the Wagnerian sort. It must be great to be a composer in Russia.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

OCT 15 1946

U. S. SEEN SNUBBING 2 RUSSIAN SINGERS

'Indignity' of Treating Them as Foreign Agents Protested by 4 Prominent Musicians

HERE ON 'CULTURAL' TOUR

Artists, With 3 Others, Went Home Rather Than Comply With Washington Order

Four prominent musicians have protested to the Department of Justice, it was announced yesterday, against the "indignity" of asking two Ukrainian singers to register as foreign agents. They are Zoya Haidai, soprano, and Ivan Patorzhinsky, basso, members of the Kiev State Opera and the first Soviet musical artists to visit the United States since the war. With three other Ukrainians they left this country on Saturday rather than comply with the department's request that they register as agents.

The protesters were Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Howard Hanson, head of the Eastman School of Music; Douglas Moore, chairman of the music department, Columbia University, and Aaron Copland, composer.

"It seems inconceivable," the four wrote to Attorney General Tom C. Clark, "that a department of our Government should act in such a way as to set a precedent which will completely block the normal and necessary exchange of cultural representatives between the richly endowed nations of the world."

Plea Sent to President

The four musicians sent copies of their protest to President Truman and Acting Secretary of State Dean Acheson, along with a letter in which they said:

"We feel that this is a matter which cannot be overlooked by this nation or by the world. It seems unrepresentative of the spirit of musical culture in the United States, which has from its very beginning been notably international-minded and hospitable to foreign artists. We therefore hope that you will give the utmost of your personal attention to this action, which, if it is forming the future policy of our Government and our nation toward cultural representatives of the rest of the world, can lead to nothing but similar action on their part and disaster to international culture."

The two musicians came to this country on Sept. 17 after a five-week tour in Canada. They were part of a delegation of five from the Ukrainian Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries. The delegation was invited here by a number of groups, including the American-Soviet Music Society. The two singers were heard in a joint recital at Town Hall on Oct. 5. They did not register, according to one of their spokesmen, because they were on a cultural mission and were not official agents of their government.

The singers were scheduled to remain in this country until the end of this month, appearing in Cleveland, Boston and Pittsburgh. When the matter of registration came up, however, Jacob M. Lomakin, Soviet Consul General, ordered them to make no more public appearances. Shortly thereafter the singers were called home by their Government and they left Saturday by plane from La Guardia Field.

The three other members of the Ukrainian delegation who left with the singers were Semen Stefanyk, a member of the Supreme Soviet and Professor of Jurisprudence at Lwow University, and Luka Malamarchuk and Andrei Malyschko, war correspondents.

Six more Soviet nationals, ordered by their Government to return to Russia, departed from La Guardia Field yesterday aboard a Transcontinental & Western air plane for Paris.

They were Alexander Goundorov, president of the All Slav committee; Alexandre Egournov, deputy executive secretary of the All Slav committee; Temfei Gorbounov, a member of the USSR Supreme Council; Lydia Voinova, secretary of the Anti-Fascist League of Russian Youth; Alexandre Korneitchouk, a playwright, and Gen. Vasili Kozlov.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

OCT 1 3 1946

Peter Grimes Rated High Lyric Drama

By Glenn Dillard Gunn

WHEN Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," was produced at Tanglewood last August, Serge Koussevitzky assured a vast audience that they were about to hear the finest lyric drama that had been composed since Bizet gave "Carmen" to the world.

Koussevitzky commissioned the work as a memorial to his wife, the late Natalie Koussevitzky. He may have been a prejudiced witness. Yet the public joined the critics in an enthusiastic reception of "Peter Grimes," whereas "Carmen" failed dismally in Paris. Bizet killed himself in despair. If only he had waited until the Milan premiere! That was a triumph.

♫

IT IS interesting that Koussevitzky chose "Carmen" as a standard of comparison. It is even more interesting when one recalls that several famous lyric dramas have been composed since Bizet wrote his masterpiece, such as Wagner's "Parsifal," Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande," Charpentier's "Louise," all of the Massenet repertoire, Puccini's "Boheme," or Montemezzi's "Love of Three Kings." The implication that "Peter Grimes" is a better opera than any of these should please Britten, even if it excites a considerable antagonism among music lovers who have their preferences and prejudices.

Such people will be quick to remind us that this high evaluation of a novelty reflects the opinion of only one man. Koussevitzky, of course, is no ordinary music lover. Like every great executive artist he is obliged to be a competent critic. He does not depend on the judgment of others when he makes the programs of the Boston Symphony. These programs set standards for the art especially in the department of modern music.

♫

THE musical public of Washington, or that portion thereof that supports the National Symphony, already has heard parts of the new Britten score. Kindler played "Four Sea Interludes" from "Peter Grimes" last spring. He repeats them Wednesday night. It may be assumed that these are typical since the whole work, its every mood and inflection, its story and its song, are so many devices to create and sustain an atmosphere dominated by the sea. Its power, its menace, its fleeting serenity, its beauty, and its wrath, form the background of George Crabbe poems from which the libretto has been drawn. One concludes that Britten has been more concerned with these aspects of nature than with the human tragedy that is played in the setting they provide.

Hearing these "Sea Interludes" last season one was impressed with the originality of Britten's imagination. All the "sea images" that other composers have thrown upon the symphonic screen—Weber, Verdi, Mendelssohn, Wagner—have been discarded for a new descriptive vocabulary. In this vocabulary none of the ancient and approved aquatic musical cliches appear. The less obvious figures and images that replace them are not the less vivid because of their novelty. To many they will seem more significant and picturesque.

♫

TO those who derive their greatest musical satisfactions from new sounds—and there are such strange people—the Britten excerpts will be richly rewarding. The conservatives may be as little pleased as the Frenchmen who first heard "Carmen." Kindler does this new music with understanding and high art, and, it should be added, with courage. Conductors who persistently offend the conservatives may lose valued patrons.

The star of Wednesday night's opening concert will be Kindler's new 100-piece orchestra. For 15 years the conductor worked toward that goal, meeting the competition of older and larger orchestras here and on tour by the force of his personality and the skill of his baton. These same qualities, one may be sure, will quickly weld the new group into an artistic unit.

Other details of the opening concert already have been made known. Dame Myra Hess, most widely recognized of English pianists, will be the soloist, playing the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven. This Kindler will preface with his own transcription of Bach's version of a Vivaldi "Concerto grosso." Later he will play the "Peter Grimes" excerpts, a novelty, "Canto de Invierno," by Leng, and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

The Symphony Party Line

Dmitri Shostakovitch, the composer, seems to be joining Maxim Litvinov, the statesman, as the victim of ups and downs on that Communistic tightrope which "citizens" of the Soviets, high or low, tread in uneasy balance. "Culture and Life," official publication of the propaganda department of the Communist party's central committee, came out this week with an article violently attacking Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony. The composition, which at first hearing had been hailed in Moscow as "a triumph of our great victory," is now declared by "Culture and Life's" critic to have "ideological impurities and deviations" and to contain tendencies which reflect the "unwholesome influence" of Igor Stravinsky, the Russian-born composer, who is now a citizen of the United States.

Dmitri Shostakovitch, who has figured as a sort of problem child in the odd family life of Soviet art and propaganda, has been both praised and spanked in Russia. "Pravda," in 1936, regarded a ballet and opera of his as "un-Soviet," the adverse criticism appearing after Josef Stalin had attended a performance. On the other hand, Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, written in besieged Leningrad, where the composer served as fire fighter, ditch digger and member of the People's Militia, won complete recognition and applause.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

OCT 14 1946

Richard Tucker

CRITIC KOUSSEVITZKY
The Government, most impassive.

High Art

U.S. radio is proud of the fact that it periodically broadcasts the best music in the world. But Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony, thinks that radio could do far more. Said he last week, in his best English:

"Eet ees not enough good music. For one hour, the people leesten to a symphony orchestra, then for 24 hours they leesten to cheap programs. . . . In a half hour, the good music ees forgotten. . . .

"Eet should be the Government which encourages good music, not the people who want to make money. But the Government ees most impassive. Eet must be a Ministry of Fine Arts, which would encourage good music. Every state should have eets own radio station and eets own symphony orchestra. But everything ees left to private corporations. Eet ees not enough that we have fine roads and bridges and houses. We must have good music for the spirit."

Koussevitzky's classical-music ratio of one hour in 24 was not far wrong. But in that little time, U.S. radio manages to present an impressive parade of talent. Not all of it is sponsored.

The Big Three. Two of the best three classical programs have no sponsors as the season begins. Arturo Toscanini returns to the NBC Symphony (Sun. 5 p.m., E.S.T.) on Oct. 27, minus his General Motors sponsor that paid $1,250,000 for the hour last year. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Tues. 9:30 p.m., E.S.T., ABC) open this week, with no sponsor. But once again U.S. Rubber is underwriting the New York Philharmonic (Sun. 3 p.m., E.S.T., CBS) with Artur Rodzinski conducting.

Other top raters: the Philadelphia Orchestra, unsponsored, with Eugene Ormandy conducting (Sat. 5 p.m., E.S.T., CBS); the Cleveland Symphony, George Szell conducting (Sat. 6 p.m., E.S.T., Mutual); Metropolitan Opera Saturday matinees, returning Nov. 16 (Sat. 2 p.m., E.S.T., ABC); the Telephone Hour, with such artists as Fritz Kreisler, Lily Pons, Yehudi [illegible] (Mon. 9 p.m., E.S.T., NBC).

MORNING WORLD HERALD

OCT 1 7 1946

New Model: Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Ninth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich on the air the other night. This is the symphony that has been denounced unsparingly by Russian critics on the ground that it lacks Communist ideology. One critic suggested that Shostakovich had been influenced by Stravinsky—a damning charge since Stravinsky has not lived in Russia since the revolution.

To an unlearned ear, the Ninth Symphony sounded melodious and gay. It has some impressive orchestral climaxes, but much of it was simply lilting. It sounded more like Tsaichovsky that Stravinsky.

But whatever its derivation, if any, most listeners must have wondered what the Russian critics found in it that enraged them so. Is it simply that gaiety is now forbidden in Russia? If so, there has been a change in the party line, for only a few years ago Soviet composers were admonished to stop composing dissonant "modern" music and write tuneful pieces that the people would enjoy.

Perhaps Soviet policy now calls for thundering, overwhelming, smothering music of the Wagnerian sort. It must be great to be a composer in Russia.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 15 1946

U. S. SEEN SNUBBING 2 RUSSIAN SINGERS

'Indignity' of Treating Them as Foreign Agents Protested by 4 Prominent Musicians

HERE ON 'CULTURAL' TOUR

Artists, With 3 Others, Went Home Rather Than Comply With Washington Order

Four prominent musicians have protested to the Department of Justice, it was announced yesterday, against the "indignity" of asking two Ukrainian singers to register as foreign agents. They are Zoya Haidai, soprano, and Ivan Patorzhinsky, basso, members of the Kiev State Opera and the first Soviet musical artists to visit the United States since the war. With three other Ukrainians they left this country on Saturday rather than comply with the department's request that they register as agents.

The protesters were Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Howard Hanson, head of the Eastman School of Music; Douglas Moore, chairman of the music department, Columbia University, and Aaron Copland, composer.

"It seems inconceivable," the four wrote to Attorney General Tom C. Clark, "that a department of our Government should act in such a way as to set a precedent which will completely block the normal and necessary exchange of cultural representatives between the richly endowed nations of the world."

Plea Sent to President

The four musicians sent copies of their protest to President Truman and Acting Secretary of State Dean Acheson, along with a letter in which they said:

"We feel that this is a matter which cannot be overlooked by this nation or by the world. It seems unrepresentative of the spirit of musical culture in the United States, which has from its very beginning been notably international-minded and hospitable to foreign artists. We therefore hope that you will give the utmost of your personal attention to this action, which, if it is forming the future policy of our Government and our nation toward cultural representatives of the rest of the world, can lead to nothing but similar action on their part and disaster to international culture."

The two musicians came to this country on Sept. 17 after a five-week tour in Canada. They were part of a delegation of five from the Ukrainian Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries. The delegation was invited here by a number of groups, including the American-Soviet Music Society. The two singers were heard in a joint recital at Town Hall on Oct. 5. They did not register, according to one of their spokesmen, because they were on a cultural mission and were not official agents of their government.

The singers were scheduled to remain in this country until the end of this month, appearing in Cleveland, Boston and Pittsburgh. When the matter of registration came up, however, Jacob M. Lomakin, Soviet Consul General, ordered them to make no more public appearances. Shortly thereafter the singers were called home by their Government and they left Saturday by plane from La Guardia Field.

The three other members of the Ukrainian delegation who left with the singers were Semen Stefanyk, a member of the Supreme Soviet and Professor of Jurisprudence at Lwow University, and Luka Malamarchuk and Andrei Malyschko, war correspondents.

Six more Soviet nationals, ordered by their Government to return to Russia, departed from La Guardia Field yesterday aboard a Transcontinental & Western air plane for Paris.

They were Alexander Goundorov, president of the All Slav committee; Alexandre Egournov, deputy executive secretary of the All Slav committee; Temfei Gorbounov, a member of the USSR Supreme Council; Lydia Voinova, secretary of the Anti-Fascist League of Russian Youth; Alexandre Korneitchouk, a playwright, and Gen. Vasili Kozlov.

RADIO & TELEVISION WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 16 1946

Pressing of One Billionth Record Marked By RCA Victor at Ceremonies in Camden

USIC MERCHANTS TO HONOR CORPORATION ON FRIDAY

G. LaMair to Present Certificate of Recognition to RCA Victor at Party in New York on Friday — Historic Disc Presented to Frank M. Folsom — Terms Record a "Triumph of Electronic Research."

CAMDEN, N. J., Thursday — An achievement in American industry as well as in the musical history of this country was chalked up yesterday (Wednesday) when RCA Victor pressed its one billionth phonograph record at the company's plant in Camden.

The historic record, pressed by a veteran employe who, in thirty-two years as a press operator has turned out over three million discs, is a performance of "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The honor of pressing the billionth RCA Victor record went to William Fink.

In accepting the record, Frank M. Folson, executive vice president in charge of the RCA Victor Division, told employes gathered to witness the event that phonograph records "have brought pleasure and enjoyment to people of all ages and all creeds in all nations."

During the war, he said, V-discs, millions of which were processed by RCA Victor personnel, were often the only means of relaxation and entertainment to fighting forces in even the remotest stations and bases, and proved of tremendous morals value.

Pointing out that as far back as 1911, Victor had pioneered in instituting music appreciation classes in schools, he declared that today these courses are standard in most of the school systems of America.

"They have been the means of teching your children and mine," he said, "an appreciation of fine music."

Mr. Folsom took the occasion to announce that RCA Victor this year planned to introduce a complete basic record library for elementary schools. This will comprise twenty-one albums of newly recorded music which provide teachers with a modern tool to carry on well-rounded musical activities in their classes, he said.

Terming the RCA Victor record of today as a "triumph of electronic research," Mr. Folsom declared that his company's scientists and engineers would continue to work toward achieving even finer improvements in sound disc recordings and reproduction.

"There has been much talk about other means of music reproduction for the home beside the flat disc," Mr. Folsom said. "But, in our opinion, no device has yet been developed which has the simplicity, ease of operation and low cost provided by the familiar flat disc.

"We shall continue to make these discs," he declared, "because the public has demonstrated that this is what they want."

The billionth RCA Victor record was presented to Mr. Folsom by J. W. Murray, vice president in charge of record activities. In congratulating employes as participants in this achievement, he declared:

"It is inspiring to realize that the artistry of world-renowned musicians—and actors, too,—can be captured for all time with brilliant fidelity on the records that we make. Moreover, through RCA Victor records these great artists are brought alive into houses everywhere.

"This one billionth record," Mr. Murray declared, "is a symbol of a great achievement. No other company in the phonograph record industry comes anywhere near reaching this impressive total."

To signalize the event, RCA Victor, it was announced, will issue the recording of "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever" on non-breakable, plastic material, the first single Red Seal deluxe record issued by the company.

The first Victor records were made in 1898 when the late Eldridge Johnson converted his small tool shop to the manufacture of talking machines. Unable to convince the musical artists of that era to consider the talking machine and records as more than toys, Mr. Johnson nevertheless persisted and was finally rewarded when Enrico Caruso in 1906 agreed to record regularly. Other artists soon followed. Today, RCA Victor's roster of famous classical and popular recording artists totals more than sixty.

The occasion will be celebrated further at a cocktatil party to be held from 5:30 to 7:00 P. M. on Friday, October 18, in the North Lounge of the Rockefeller Center Luncheon Club in the RCA Building, New York. At that time, the National Association of Music Merchants, through its president, Louis G. LaMair, head of Lyon & Healy, Inc., Chicago, will present to Mr. Murray a certificate in recognition of this signal achievement.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 16 1946

MUSIC

Music Season Opened Formally in City by Boston Symphony

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, formally launched the music season in Providence last evening. A record crowd attended the concert at the Metropolitan Theater. All the seats were taken and with standees, the total attendance was 3100, the largest crowd ever to attend a Boston Symphony concert here. More season subscribers than ever before are reported this year.

A program delightfully put together, was played with such a high degree of interpretive skill that it left nothing unsaid. The opening half of the concert was devoted to Brahms. His Symphony No. 3 in F major was the real meat of the evening's fare. Somehow, the music of Brahms has never seemed more genial. The manner in which he wrote for the reed choir was illustrated beautifully last evening. Smooth clarinet passages were warm and agreeable. The singing quality of the strings swept the sound over the audience in great waves. The horns gave a rare demonstration of tone quality. Not a semblance of brass tone was apparent, yet when they were combined with the trumpets and trombones, the total effect was magnificent. Certainly a Koussevitsky reading of a Brahms score is something to remember for a long time.

The second half of the program was broadcast. This practice begun last night will continue for the succeeding four concerts. Interest centered in the first of the two selections chosen from Russian symphonic literature, the much discussed Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovitch. It proved to be gay and jolly. It had a decidedly young and vigorous style. Reminiscent of the old Chauve-Souris Revue, the single lined solos and thin suggestions of accompaniment in distantly spaced chords, gave the thing a refreshing flavor.

This Shostakovitch is understandable music and contained rhythmic bits from both his first and his fifth symphonies. He still likes scales in contrary motion. It was noticeable in the third movement that the rhythm, the combination of instrumental groups and the scale passages went along in threes. It is much easier to understand, this Russian story in the universal language of music, than the much translated Russian stories in other fields of activity. Shostakovitch speaks plainly.

Scriabin is another story. His work, "Le Pome de L'Extase", seldom played, was most exciting. It should send all the pianists in town to search out the beautiful Etudes and Preludes by this composer which were in vogue some 20 years ago. A little of this rich stuff is good, but not too much. It seemed an endless wait for the resolution of the chords which went on from one to the other in dazzling beauty. Scriabin never seems to use any interval less than a ninth, but he uses these brilliantly. A fine climax, this, to a wonderful evening of orchestral splendor.

Two changes in personnel are of interest. Julius Theodorowicz, who played as assistant concert master for many years, has retired. His place has been taken by Alfred Kripps.

John Holmes, a young man of 28, has been appointed to the place of first oboist. He is a graduate of the Eastman School at Rochester and studied last Summer at the Berkshire Center under Fernand Gillet, the former first desk oboist, who retired this season. Mr. Holmes is the first American born musician ever to occupy a first desk in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 15 1946

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

NEW YORK CITY SYMPHONY, Leonard Bernstein, conductor, concert last night at the New York City Center with Paul Wittgenstein, pianist, as soloist. The program:

Le Tombeau de Couperin .... Ravel
Piano Concerto for the Left Hand .... Ravel
Symphony No. 3, in E flat ("Eroica") .... Beethoven

Paul Wittgenstein

James Kriegsmann

Piano soloist last night with the New York City Symphony

Our Musical Dick Tracy

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, who conducted the New York City Symphony last night at the City Center, would be a delightful conductor if he could ever forget during one piece, or even during one movement of a piece, that he is considered by Warner Brothers to be a potential film star. He has a gift for making music; and as American conductors go, he is not badly educated. He has been considered a good student by Harvard College, the Curtiss Institute, Fritz Reiner and Serge Koussevitzky. His experience, moreover, as a successful composer in both the dramatic and the concert forms has given him a familiarity with the orchestra as a medium of thought communication not easily obtainable by other means.

* * *

Yet with all these advantages, he seems to have turned in the last two years ever more and more firmly away from objective music making and to have embraced a career of sheer vainglory. With every season his personal performance becomes more ostentatious, his musical one less convincing. There was a time when he used to forget occasionally and let the music speak. Nowadays he keeps it always, like the touring Italian bandmasters of forty years ago, a vehicle for the waving about of hair, for the twisting of shoulder and torso, for the miming by facial expression of uncontrolled emotional states.

If all this did not involve musical obfuscation, if it were merely the prima donna airs of a great artist, nobody would mind. Revelations of musical meaning excuse everything. But his conducting today, for all the skill and talent that lie behind it, reveals little except the consistent distortion of musical works, ancient and modern, into cartoons to illustrate the blithe career of a sort of musical Dick Tracy.

* * *

Three works less easily adptable to this end than those that made up last night's program would be hard to find. But our intrepid hero was downed by none. In Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" the consistent subs[illegible] ing rhythms for the author's (straight out of Couperin and out of the harpischord itself, measured ones was sufficient to destroy any dignity in the music that might, if left intact, have triumphed over brashness. In the same composer's Piano Concerto for the Left Hand alone, the soloist, Paul Wittgenshein, offered à hasard. This artist, for whom the work was written, came very near, by old familiarity as well as by false notes, to taking over the piece as his show. Exacerbated gestures from teh conductor recalled to us regularly, however, where we had better look, or else.

Even Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was no match for the intrepid Lennie. He had to wrestle with it some, but he ended by making it sound angry rather than heroic, an interminable old bore that a kind-hearted and sentimental young doctor was keeping alive by sheer genius.

* * *

One wishes Mr. Bernstein well in his chosen career. But one does wish also that it bore more relation than it seem to do at present to the service of music as something ~~just a~~ shade more important to civilization than what it can serve him for.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 16 1946

Music

Record Crowd Hears Boston Symphony Open Music Season

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, formally launched the music season in Providence last evening. A record crowd attended the concert at the Metropolitan Theater. All the seats were taken and with standees, the total attendance was 3100, the largest crowd ever to attend a Boston Symphony concert here. More season subscribers than ever before are reported this year.

A program delightfully put together, was played with such a high degree of interpretive skill that it left nothing unsaid. The opening half of the concert was devoted to Brahms. His Symphony No. 3 in F major was the real meat of the evening's fare. Somehow, the music of Brahms has never seemed more genial. The manner in which he wrote for the reed choir was illustrated beautifully last evening. Smooth clarinet passages were warm and agreeable. The singing quality of the strings swept the sound over the audience in great waves. The horns gave a rare demonstration of tone quality. Not a semblance of brass tone was apparent, yet when they were combined with the trumpets and trombones, the total effect was magnificent. Certainly a Koussevitsky reading of a Brahms score is something to remember for a long time.

The second half of the program was broadcast. This practice begun last night will continue for the succeeding four concerts. Interest centered in the first of the two selections chosen from Russian symphonic literature, the much discussed Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovitch. It proved to be gay and jolly. It had a decidedly young and vigorous style. Reminiscent of the old Chauve-Souris Revue, the single lined solos and thin suggestions of accompaniment in distantly spaced chords, gave the thing a refreshing flavor.

This Shostakovitch is understandable music and contained rhythmic bits from both his first and his fifth symphonies. He still likes scales in contrary motion. It was noticeable in the third movement that the rhythm, the combination of instrumental groups and the scale passages went along in threes. It is much easier to understand, this Russian story in the universal language of music, than the much translated Russian stories in other fields of activity. Shostakovitch speaks plainly.

Scriabin is another story. His work, "Le Pome de L'Extase", seldom played, was most exciting. It should send all the pianists in town to search out the beautiful Etudes and Preludes by this composer which were in vogue some 20 years ago. A little of this rich stuff is good, but not too much. It seemed an endless wait for the resolution of the chords which went on from one to the other in dazzling beauty. Scriabin never seems to use any interval less than a ninth, but he uses these brilliantly. A fine climax, this, to a wonderful evening of orchestral splendor.

Two changes in personnel are of interest. Julius Theodorowicz, who played as assistant concert master for many years, has retired. His place has been taken by Alfred Kripps.

John Holmes, a young man of 28, has been appointed to the place of first oboist. He is a graduate of the Eastman School at Rochester and studied last Summer at the Berkshire Center under Fernand Gillet, the former first desk oboist, who retired this season. Mr. Holmes is the first American born musician ever to occupy a first desk in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

OCT 1 6 1946

essing of One Billionth Record Marked By RCA Victor at Ceremonies in Camden

SIC MERCHANTS TO HONOR CORPORATION ON FRIDAY

G. LaMair to Present Certificate of Recognition to RCA Victor at Party in New York on Friday — Historic Disc Presented to Frank M. Folsom — Terms Record a "Triumph of Electronic Research."

CAMDEN, N. J., Thursday — An achievement in American industry as well as in the musical history of this country was chalked up yesterday (Wednesday) when RCA Victor pressed its one billionth phonograph record at the company's plant in Camden.

The historic record, pressed by a veteran employe who, in thirty-two years as a press operator has turned out over three million discs, is a performance of "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The honor of pressing the billionth RCA Victor record went to William Fink.

In accepting the record, Frank M. Folson, executive vice president in charge of the RCA Victor Division, told employes gathered to witness the event that phonograph records "have brought pleasure and enjoyment to people of all ages and all creeds in all nations."

During the war, he said, V-discs, millions of which were processed by RCA Victor personnel, were often the only means of relaxation and entertainment to fighting forces in even the remotest stations and bases, and proved of tremendous morals value.

Pointing out that as far back as 1911, Victor had pioneered in instituting music appreciation classes in schools, he declared that today these courses are standard in most of the school systems of America.

"They have been the means of teching your children and mine," he said, "an appreciation of fine music."

Mr. Folsom took the occasion to announce that RCA Victor this year planned to introduce a complete basic record library for elementary schools. This will comprise twenty-one albums of newly recorded music which provide teachers with a modern tool to carry on well-rounded musical activities in their classes, he said.

Terming the RCA Victor record of today as a "triumph of electronic research," Mr. Folsom declared that his company's scientists and engineers would continue to work toward achieving even finer improvements in sound disc recordings and reproduction.

"There has been much talk about other means of music reproduction for the home beside the flat disc," Mr. Folsom said. "But, in our opinion, no device has yet been developed which has the simplicity, ease of operation and low cost provided by the familiar flat disc.

"We shall continue to make these discs," he declared, "because the public has demonstrated that this is what they want."

The billionth RCA Victor record was presented to Mr. Folsom by J. W. Murray, vice president in charge of record activities. In congratulating employes as participants in this achievement, he declared:

"It is inspiring to realize that the artistry of world-renowned musicians—and actors, too,—can be captured for all time with brilliant fidelity on the records that we make. Moreover, through RCA Victor records these great artists are brought alive into houses everywhere.

"This one billionth record," Mr. Murray declared, "is a symbol of a great achievement. No other company in the phonograph record industry comes anywhere near reaching this impressive total."

To signalize the event, RCA Victor, it was announced, will issue the recording of "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever" on non-breakable, plastic material, the first single Red Seal deluxe record issued by the company.

The first Victor records were made in 1898 when the late Eldridge Johnson converted his small tool shop to the manufacture of talking machines. Unable to convince the musical artists of that era to consider the talking machine and records as more than toys, Mr. Johnson nevertheless persisted and was finally rewarded when Enrico Caruso in 1906 agreed to record regularly. Other artists soon followed. Today, RCA Victor's roster of famous classical and popular recording artists totals more than sixty.

The occasion will be celebrated further at a cocktatil party to be held from 5:30 to 7:00 P. M. on Friday, October 18, in the North Lounge of the Rockefeller Center Luncheon Club in the RCA Building, New York. At that time, the National Association of Music Merchants, through its president, Louis G. LaMair, head of Lyon & Healy, Inc., Chicago, will present to Mr. Murray a certificate in recognition of this signal achievement.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 1 6 1946

MUSIC

Music Season Opened Formally in City by Boston Symphony

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, formally launched the music season in Providence last evening. A record crowd attended the concert at the Metropolitan Theater. All the seats were taken and with standees, the total attendance was 3100, the largest crowd ever to attend a Boston Symphony concert here. More season subscribers than ever before are reported this year.

A program delightfully put together, was played with such a high degree of interpretive skill that it left nothing unsaid. The opening half of the concert was devoted to Brahms. His Symphony No. 3 in F major was the real meat of the evening's fare. Somehow, the music of Brahms has never seemed more genial. The manner in which he wrote for the reed choir was illustrated beautifully last evening. Smooth clarinet passages were warm and agreeable. The singing quality of the strings swept the sound over the audience in great waves. The horns gave a rare demonstration of tone quality. Not a semblance of brass tone was apparent, yet when they were combined with the trumpets and trombones, the total effect was magnificent. Certainly a Kousevitsky reading of a Brahms score is something to remember for a long time.

The second half of the program was broadcast. This practice begun last night will continue for the succeeding four concerts. Interest centered in the first of the two selections chosen from Russian symphonic literature, the much discussed Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovitch. It proved to be gay and jolly. It had a decidedly young and vigorous style. Reminiscent of the old Chauve-Souris Revue, the single lined solos and thin suggestions of accompaniment in distantly spaced chords, gave the thing a refreshing flavor.

This Shostakovitch is understandable music and contained rhythmic bits from both his first and his fifth symphonies. He still likes scales in contrary motion. It was noticeable in the third movement that the rhythm, the combination of instrumental groups and the scale passages went along in threes. It is much easier to understand, this Russian story in the universal language of music, than the much translated Russian stories in other fields of activity. Shostakovitch speaks plainly.

Scriabin is another story. His work, "Le Pome de L'Extase", seldom played, was most exciting. It should send all the pianists in town to search out the beautiful Etudes and Preludes by this composer which were in vogue some 20 years ago. A little of this rich stuff is good, but not too much. It seemed an endless wait for the resolution of the chords which went on from one to the other in dazzling beauty. Scriabin never seems to use any interval less than a ninth, but he uses these brilliantly. A fine climax, this, to a wonderful evening of orchestral splendor.

Two changes in personnel are of interest. Julius Theodorowicz, who played as assistant concert master for many years, has retired. His place has been taken by Alfred Kripps.

John Holmes, a young man of 28, has been appointed to the place of first oboist. He is a graduate of the Eastman School at Rochester and studied last Summer at the Berkshire Center under Fernand Gillet, the former first desk oboist, who retired this season. Mr. Holmes is the first American born musician ever to occupy a first desk in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 15 1946

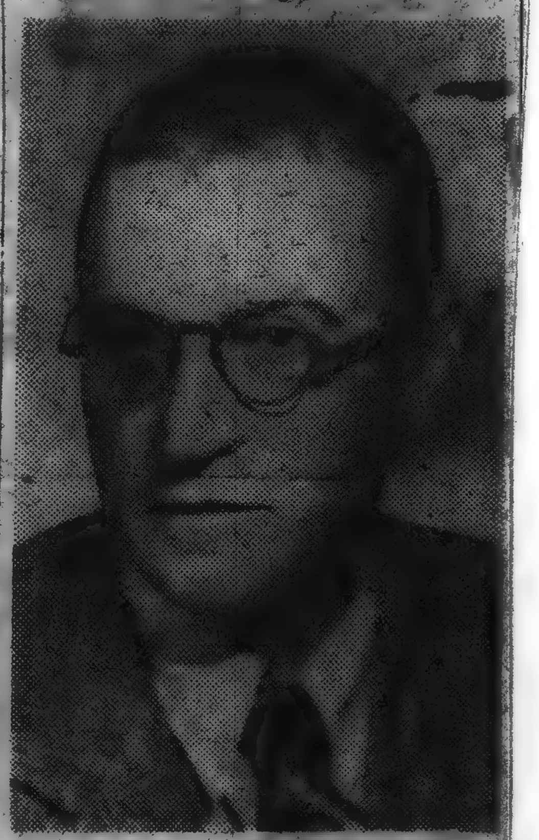
MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

NEW YORK CITY SYMPHONY, Leonard Bernstein, conductor, concert last night at the New York City Center with Paul Wittgenstein, pianist, as soloist. The program:

Le Tombeau de Couperin................Ravel
Piano Concerto for the Left Hand........Ravel
Symphony No. 3, in E flat ("Eroica")
Beethoven

Paul Wittgenstein



James Kriegsmann

Piano soloist last night with the New York City Symphony

Our Musical Dick Tracy

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, who conducted the New York City Symphony last night at the City Center, would be a delightful conductor if he could ever forget during one piece, or even during one movement of a piece, that he is considered by Warner Brothers to be a potential film star. He has a gift for making music; and as American conductors go, he is not badly educated. He has been considered a good student by Harvard College, the Curtiss Institute, Fritz Reiner and Serge Koussevitzky. His experience, moreover, as a successful composer in both the dramatic and the concert forms has given him a familiarity with the orchestra as a medium of thought communication not easily obtainable by other means.

* * *

Yet with all these advantages, he seems to have turned in the last two years ever more and more firmly away from objective music making and to have embraced a career of sheer vainglory. With every season his personal performance becomes more ostentatious, his musical one less convincing. There was a time when he used to forget occasionally and let the music speak. Nowadays he keeps it always, like the touring Italian bandmasters of forty years ago, a vehicle for the waving about of hair, for the twisting of shoulder and torso, for the miming by facial expression of uncontrolled emotional states.

If all this did not involve musical obfuscation, if it were merely the prima donna airs of a great artist, nobody would mind. Revelations of musical meaning excuse everything. But his conducting today, for all the skill and talent that lie behind it, reveals little except the consistent distortion of musical works, ancient and modern, into cartoons to illustrate the blithe career of a sort of musical Dick Tracy.

* * *

Three works less easily adptable to this end than those that made up last night's program would be hard to find. But our intrepid hero was downed by none. In Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" the consistent substitution [illegible]ing rhythms for the author's (straight out of Couperin and out of the harpischord itself, measured ones was sufficient to destroy any dignity in the music that might, if left intact, have triumphed over brashness. In the same composer's Piano Concerto for the Left Hand alone, the soloist, Paul Wittgenshein, offered a hasard. This artist, for whom the work was written, came very near, by old familiarity as well as by false notes, to taking over the piece as his show. Exacerbated gestures from teh conductor recalled to us regularly, however, where we had better look, or else.

Even Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was no match for the intrepid Lennie. He had to wrestle with it some, but he ended by making it sound angry rather than heroic, an interminable old bore that a kind-hearted and sentimental young doctor was keeping alive by sheer genius.

* * *

One wishes Mr. Bernstein well in his chosen career. But one does wish also that it bore more relation than it seem to do at present to the service of music as something just a shade more important to civilization than what it can serve him for.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 1 6 1946

Music

Record Crowd Hears Boston Symphony Open Music Season

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, formally launched the music season in Providence last evening. A record crowd attended the concert at the Metropolitan Theater. All the seats were taken and with standees, the total attendance was 3100, the largest crowd ever to attend a Boston Symphony concert here. More season subscribers than ever before are reported this year.

A program delightfully put together, was played with such a high degree of interpretive skill that it left nothing unsaid. The opening half of the concert was devoted to Brahms. His Symphony No. 3 in F major was the real meat of the evening's fare. Somehow, the music of Brahms has never seemed more genial. The manner in which he wrote for the reed choir was illustrated beautifully last evening. Smooth clarinet passages were warm and agreeable. The singing quality of the strings swept the sound over the audience in great waves. The horns gave a rare demonstration of tone quality. Not a semblance of brass tone was apparent, yet when they were combined with the trumpets and trombones, the total effect was magnificent. Certainly a Koussevitsky reading of a Brahms score is something to remember for a long time.

The second half of the program was broadcast. This practice begun last night will continue for the succeeding four concerts. Interest centered in the first of the two selections chosen from Russian symphonic literature, the much discussed Ninth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovitch. It proved to be gay and jolly. It had a decidedly young and vigorous style. Reminiscent of the old Chauve-Souris Revue, the single lined solos and thin suggestions of accompaniment in distantly spaced chords, gave the thing a refreshing flavor.

This Shostakovitch is understandable music and contained rhythmic bits from both his first and his fifth symphonies. He still likes scales in contrary motion. It was noticeable in the third movement that the rhythm, the combination of instrumental groups and the scale passages went along in threes. It is much easier to understand, this Russian story in the universal language of music, than the much translated Russian stories in other fields of activity. Shostakovitch speaks plainly.

Scriabin is another story. His work, "Le Pome de L'Extase", seldom played, was most exciting. It should send all the pianists in town to search out the beautiful Etudes and Preludes by this composer which were in vogue some 20 years ago. A little of this rich stuff is good, but not too much. It seemed an endless wait for the resolution of the chords which went on from one to the other in dazzling beauty. Scriabin never seems to use any interval less than a ninth, but he uses these brilliantly. A fine climax, this, to a wonderful evening of orchestral splendor.

Two changes in personnel are of interest. Julius Theodorowicz, who played as assistant concert master for many years, has retired. His place has been taken by Alfred Kripps.

John Holmes, a young man of 28, has been appointed to the place of first oboist. He is a graduate of the Eastman School at Rochester and studied last Summer at the Berkshire Center under Fernand Gillet, the former first desk oboist, who retired this season. Mr. Holmes is the first American born musician ever to occupy a first desk in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE JEWISH WEEKLY
TIMES
BROOKLINE, MASS.
10/17/46

MUSIC: Moses Smith

The new season's symphonic programs have taken to the air again, if a little stumblingly. The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its debut on schedule on Tuesday night of last week, the setup being changed from commercial to sustaining and the evening from Saturday to Tuesday. Otherwise the program seemed unchanged: one hour consisting mostly of music direct from concert-hall, not too much talk and not particularly good broadcasting.

SMITH

The Philharmonic of New York has given two Sunday broadcasts with the same format as during recent seasons, the intermissions being given over to science talks. The broadcasting seems even better this season than in the past. Last Sunday, for example, the Philharmonic sounded exceptionally brilliant. And while some of the difference may have been due to imagination, I think much of it was due to remarkably fine pickup.

The NBC Symphony, which, like the Boston Orchestra, is now without a sponsor, will be in as usual on Sundays at five, with Toscanini presently in charge. During recent months it has appeared under various leaders. Last Sunday, though, it yielded its position to a promotional show of NBC. If anything on the radio schedule has to be kicked around, it's most likely to be good music.

The day before I set my dial at 590 to hear the Philadelphia Orchestra in its returned sustaining hour's program—Saturday at five. But "CBS in Boston" began to broadcast something that was definitely not the Philadelphia Orchestra. So I hurriedly turned my dial through the range of kilocycles hoping to pick the orchestra up from a distant station—not easy on an ordinary set. The only symphonic music I could get through was that being played by the orchestra of the ABC network—WCOP in Boston. (Ironically, could get this program on distant stations.) I still don't know what happened to the Philadelphia Orchestra broadcast.

ABC has been building up its orchestra in recent months, during which it has been broadcasting what it calls Saturday Symphony under changing conductors. Last Saturday's conductor, Bernard Green, presented a modest but rather charming program containing Toch's neglected "Pinnochio" Overture, Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra and Brahms's Serenade in A.

The playing was no more spectacular than the program, but it was good, clean most of the time, and wholesome. The broadcasting was good—better than the same network gives the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a rule. The one fly in the ointment is that this program is scheduled at exactly the same time as the Philadelphia Orchestra's. Once the latter organization is available again (Remember, I still don't know what happened on Saturday), I can't imagine where the ABC audience is coming from.

And yet ABC is the very organization responsible for shifting the Boston Symphony broadcasts from Saturday to Tuesday and thus relieving the glut of weekend symphonic broadcasts. Does this make sense? You tell me!

~~Oct 19~~

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The audience had a good time at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. It liked Aaron Copland's new Third Symphony. Or, at least, the end of it, in which the clanging of bells was added to the din of brass and assorted percussion. It liked also Erica Morini, notable violinist, who was making her first local appearance with the orchestra in the Concerto of Tchaikovsky. No less did it like the Concerto itself, with its excitements and its fruity tunes, and most of the members were probably not disturbed by the fact that the Concerto had been heard at Symphony Hall a little less than a year ago, when Mischa Elman was the soloist and Paul Paray conducted. A negligible minority wished that Miss Morini had chosen for her vehicle something a bit more substantial.

There was substance in Mr. Copland's Symphony, but the first impression was that it was not always his own substance. And when it was that, it was not peculiar to this particular work. One recalled Mr. Copland's hit-piece of last season, the music from the ballet, "Appalachian Spring." And not even Mr. Copland can resist the temptation to copy a composer very much in the limelight today, one whose peculiar way of treating the orchestra has become something of an epidemic.

To overstate the case a bit fancifully, you might title the Symphony "Shostakovitch in the Appalachians." Into this mountain retreat come the boys from Mr. Copland's "Rodeo" and also Richard Strauss with the score of his "Thus Spoke Zarathustra" open to the Fugue, "Of Science." In the end, the whole company is transported to Russia to participate in the restoration of the Great Gate at Kiev to music a la Moussorgsky-Ravel ("Pictures at an Exhibition"). Such a summary, while suggestive, is not quite kind to a composer who can handle the materials of composition as well as Mr. Copland can. And, while there are reminiscences and resemblances, as aforesaid, the work is no mere stylistic hodge-podge. It has physiognomy. It is, on the whole, a rather quiet and reflective symphony, with an initial slow movement, a Shostakovitichian touch and another and rather tenuous slow division later on. At intermission time there were those who were prepared to state that the Symphony was a landmark in American music. As to that we must wait and see.

Speaking again of the audience, one member of it suggested that, this being a season of anniversaries, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" ended the program as a mark of disrespect to the recently-executed Nazis. Till, you know, dies on the scaffold. Anyway, Dr. Koussevitzky had already produced him at the first Tuesday evening concert and he will be on the job again Sunday afternoon.

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

OCT 19 1946

Boston Symphony Broadcast From Cambridge Theater

Moving to the Sanders theater in Cambridge, Mass., for its third Radio Station KWNO broadcast of the season, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in two familiar numbers Tuesday at 8:30 and 9:30 p. m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again will be on the podium and again the Russian school will not be overlooked. He has chosen Tchaikovsky's No. 4 in F. Minor as the symphony for the evening. Prefacing it will be Ravel's "Pavane Pour une Infante Defuncte."

Following its visits to Providence and Cambridge, the orchestra will return to Symphony hall in Boston for next week's broadcast.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL

OCT 20 1946

Moving to the Sanders Theater in Cambridge, Mass., for its third WBIR broadcast of the season, the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra will be herd in two familiar numbers on Tuesday, Oct. 22, at 9:30 to 10:30 p. m.

'Caesar'—Copland Music Heard in Première

Oct. 19, 1946 Christian Science Monitor

Composer's Third Symphony Conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky

Harold Stein

Aaron Copland, whose Third Symphony was given its first performance yesterday at the Boston Symphony concert.

By L. A. Sloper

Aaron Copland's Third Symphony had its first performance anywhere at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, the first of the season's third pair. The other items of the program were the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, with Erica Morini as soloist, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The definition of the term "symphony" has become in modern times very elastic. Let us not repine because Mr. Copland begins this new work with a slow movement, proceeds to a scherzo and then to an Andantino which leads into an allegro. He has ample precedent for his unconventionality. What is important is, in his own words, what the music "is meant to express." Here he follows another custom, saying that he prefers to let the music speak for itself. Yet he says also that Harold Clurman put his meaning well when he wrote that music is "a reflection of and response to specific worlds of men: it is play, it is speech, it is unconscious result and conscious statement all at the same time."

But this is less clear than the music itself, which, as usual with Mr. Copland, is well made and transparent. Thus although the composer also insists that it contains no folk or popular material, it obviously expresses the new approach which began with the score for the ballet, "Appalachian Spring." Indeed, the first movement of the symphony reflects not only the mood but the form of that score. The intervals are very characteristic of the mature Copland, whom I find more interesting than the earlier one.

The scherzo is clever and amusing and full of tricky rhythms. The Andantino is playful and straightforward, free in form. The last movement begins with the "Fanfare for the Common Man" which Mr. Copland wrote for Eugene Goossens and the Cincinnati Orchestra. This leads into the final allegro, which is roughly in sonata form, and which rises to a smashing climax at the end.

* * *

This climax and similar noisy passages in the scherzo represent a less beguiling aspect of Mr. Copland's talent. What with the stridency of the brass and the clangor of a large battery, the music itself becomes inaudible. In fact, the final measures of this symphony are not unworthy to rank with those of Tchaikovsky's Fourth (which, by the way, is scheduled for next week). Dr. Koussevitzky is not the man to miss such an opportunity, and the new work had a resounding popular success, with the composer bowing several times from the platform. The performance was brilliant, though not impeccable in details of execution.

* * *

No one can complain that the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto has been overplayed at these concerts in recent years. It is true that it was performed only a year ago with Mischa Elman as soloist, but before that it had been heard only once in more than 20 years. And oddly enough Miss Morini, who first came to this country 25 years ago, seems to have been making her first appearance with the Boston Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, although she played with them at Tanglewood last summer.

She has a singing tone of great beauty which she allowed to be heard in the slow movement and in a few passages elsewhere. She also has a notable technique, which she displayed abundantly yesterday. Apparently she has considered the nature of this concerto, decided that it is more a vehicle for virtuosity than for musical expression, and has acted accordingly. She played with reckless speed and with great bravura, and she won an ovation.

Globe

Boston Symphony Programs

The first Sunday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at 3:30 today in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Weber's Overture to "Oberon," "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" by Ravel, "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss and Brahms' First Symphony.

At the Cambridge concert in Sanders Theater, Tuesday at 8:30, the program will be: Ninth Symphony, Shostakovich; "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," Ravel; Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky.

Mr. Koussevitzky will give first performance of Roy Harris' Variations on a Theme by Howard Hanson at the "regular" Symphony Hall concerts Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8:30. The other numbers will be Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and the Fourth Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

Richard Burgin will conduct the next Tuesday concert at Symphony Hall, Oct. 29 at 8:30. His program: Handel: Concerto Grosso in D minor, No. 10; Prokofieff: "Chout" Suite; Alexei Haieff: Divertimento; Sibelius: First Symphony.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 19

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance yesterday of a new and remarkable modern score, the Third Symphony by Aaron Copland. Thereafter came the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Erica Morini, the soloist, appearing with this orchestra for the first time in Boston. The program ended with Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr. Copland's Third Symphony was composed between August of 1944 and last Sept. 29 (barely in time for the parts to be copied). It takes its place with the Third Symphony of Roy Harris as the two finest works in the form by American composers. Conservatives may find it difficult at first, although yesterday's reception, in which Mr. Copland himself shared, was one of the warmest I ever have heard from the conservative Friday audience.

The new Symphony is full-sized, in four movements for a very large orchestra. It is big both in size and ideas, the texture is heavy apart from the slow movement. Occasionally it is rhythmically tricky and contrapuntally involved, and it is not exactly sensuous or caressing. But it is beautifully clear and ordered, logical, with admirable development and continuity. Although there are still traces of Mr. Copland's academic or "pattern-music" style, it is mostly vigorous and theatrical in the sense that his "Appalachian" Suite and "Quiet City" are theatrical.

You could not call it passionate, in spite of the terrific sound it makes much of the way. Call it, then, cool and poised but never dry. Possibly Mr. Copland has overwritten, especially the long last movement. Possibly he will make some cuts himself after awhile. Nevertheless, I think that with the Third Symphony, Mr. Copland has hit his stride in the big forms. We may expect even finer things from him in the future.

Miss Morini gave the well-worn Tchaikovsky Concerto a marvelously fine-grained and musicianly performance. Her technique was clean, her expression thoroughly in style without exaggeration. The orchestra was in top form, too, apart from just a few loose technical hairs, and it never overbore the solo violin. This was a performance in a thousand. The audience gave Miss Morini, the conductor and all hands a really tumultuous round of applause and stamping.

As for "Till Eulenspiegel," that was re-created with uncanny orchestral virtuosity. Such rare, intense and crystal-clear playing makes you wish time could stand still and forever preserve the combined beauties of music, performance and interpretation.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

OCT 22 1946

LETTERS —TO THE EAGLE—

Criticizes Koussevitzky's Claims for Music

To the Editor of the Eagle:

Permit me to voice a disagreement with the eminent Serge Koussevitzky as quoted by Miles Kastendieck in Sunday's Eagle, Oct. 6.

"Unfamiliar though I be with the technique and finesse of musical composition, I think it is entirely too presumptuous of Mr. Koussevitzky or any other person to state: "Music alone can still tame the beast in man—it is our comfort and hope. Even religion and the churches, having lost their unity, have also lost their moral control and their power over the conscience of men."

How little this musician knows of his fellow beings!

It is very true "music hath charms." And what charms! But the scope of the power of music, like all other art, is definitely limited when it comes to the conscience of men and the bestial tendencies within them.

E. R. COSTELLO-BURNS.

Oct 19

HE BOSTON HERALD, SAT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 3rd concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Erica Morini, violinist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3	Copland
Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 35	Tchaikovsky
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"	Strauss

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Aaron Copland's new Symphony, his Third, which was given its first performance yesterday afternoon, is an impressive score in any comparison of modern music and is also, I do not doubt, his strongest and most serious work. Of late he has written charming symphonic music of a rather lighter character; but this Symphony is a lengthy stride from that and yet is not a return to the recondite angularity of his earlier compositions. He was in the audience yesterday and came onto the platform to acknowledge the applause which was both sincere and prolonged.

The Symphony makes no claim to be anything else than pure music. I found it throughout fascinating to listen to. The linear simplicity of the first movement, the brilliance and vigor of the scherzo with its delightfully contrapuntal trio, the deftly contrasted third movement and the brazen power of the finale, all flowed as a single creation and yet provided amazing contrast and variety for the ear.

There is a tendency, whenever a striking new work is performed, to search diligently for reminiscences of other men's music and to rejoice at the "discovery" of a bit of Strauss here or, of Stravinsky there. Copland's Symphony does awaken such echoes. (For example, much of the writing for woodwinds seemed to me distinctly French in the manner of d'Indy or Roussel.) But Mr. Copland has undoubtedly absorbed a vast quantity of material, which he has had the courage and ingenuity to make his own. In the best sense of that much abused term this Symphony is original.

For all its clarity and rhythmic vitality the Symphony is not an easy piece to play. There are hundreds of details which must be brought out without damaging the larger melodic line. No critic can say of a new work that the performance is perfect, but it seemed to me all the same that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did a splendid job in presenting it and making it clear to all of us.

I have dwelt on Mr. Copland's success, because it is the rarer phenomenon in the concert hall. After the intermission Miss Erica Morini richly earned the commoner kind in the ovation she received for her performance of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto. The work, cadenzas and all, was tossed off with an effortless bravure that was astonishing. Those of us who were at Tanglewood to hear her play in the Brahms Double Concerto knew that she was a fine musician. Yesterday taught us that she was a remarkable virtuoso as well.

Lastly came the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel," in which the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky had their turn to prance in something which all could recognize for a superb feat of interpretation. It was suggested to me by an eminent musician that this piece, with its description of a hanging, was chosen as a comment on the recent executions in Nuremberg! But Strauss' Till is much too genial a rogue to be confused with the scurvy nazi leaders!

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Roy Harris' Variations on a theme by Howard Hanson and Tchaikovsky's 4th Symphony.

SEASON OF BRAHMS

His Anniversary Will Be Observed and Bruckner's Will Not Be Ignored

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

JOHANNES BRAHMS and Anton Bruckner, rival symphonists in the Vienna of the '80s and '90s, died respectively on April 3, 1897, and Oct. 11, 1896. All the conductors are seizing the opportunity to make this a Brahms season. Just as legitimately is it a Bruckner season, but no such advantage will be taken of the fact. Conductors and orchestras thrive on public support. Brahms is a great favorite, thanks to a long course of education in his music. Bruckner, harder to perform and harder to get, is still a relative stranger in these parts.

Whatever his colleagues may do or fail to do, Dr. Koussevitzky has not overlooked his immediate responsibility toward Bruckner. He gave us the Eighth at the concerts of week before last, and Bruno Walter will accomplish the long-overdue revival of the Ninth later in the season. In view of the latter's reverence for Bruckner we may expect something in the nature of a revelation. In the meantime, Dr. Koussevitzky did not do so badly himself, though some regretted his extensive cuts, particularly in the sublime Adagio. If a modern audience cannot stand some 20 minutes of exalted beauty, even in slow tempo, things have come to a sorry pass.

* * *

If Bruckner emptied American concert halls in the old days, so, too, did Brahms. I personally have never seen a Bruckner symphony coldly received and I believe that his special merits would be greatly prized if he were to be cultivated more extensively. Nor is it enough to play two or three of the more prominent symphonies and neglect the rest.

To continue on the personal tack, I have heard only the 4th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 2nd. To hear the last of these I had to go to Holland and I still treasure the experience. Nos. 3 and 5 were each done here in 1901. The 6th, highly praised in some quarters, seems to be unknown in this country.

* * *

The recent performance of No. 8 was our first Bruckner since 1939, when that particular work was last done here. On some of us, at least, the music made a profound impression, if only because so much that was vastly inferior to it has been heard in the meantime, including the 7th and 8th symphonies of Shostakovitch. These have given new significance to the terms "rambling," "diffuse" and 'spun-out," so long applied to poor Bruckner, who, to be sure, did take his time. Being essentially a mystic instead of a practical man, he said things in his own peculiar way.

However, one could hardly make out much of a case for Bruckner merely on the grounds that he is less of a bore than someone else. Let us therefore look into his special merits. To begin with, he has written the greatest of symphonic adagios. "The light that goes up in us from the chanting of the clear, high, loud orchestra in those movements," wrote Paul Rosenfeld, "is not, we are somehow positive, the light that comes from the sun . . . It is the dazzling shine that some dreaming men have suddenly seen piercing at them from an opaque wall, or seen flooding upward at night from earth strewn thick with leaves."

* * *

Bruckner's mighty scherzi are in the true Beethoven tradition, while their trios are likely to recall Schubert. Granted that his allegros tend to lack both continuity and momentum, their themes are superb in their strength and beauty. As a harmonist he is also supreme; his modulations have the ease of Schubert's, his chords the plangency of Wagner's. With the latter composer he shares a richness and splendor of orchestration. Are such things not enough to cause us to overlook his sequential repetitions, his "terraced progress" and other idiosyncracies? Here, you might say, is the crux of the Bruckner question.

* * *

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

OCT 21 1946

Speaking of rare records, every guest at the dinner given by the Victor Division of the Radio Corporation of America at Camden, N. J. last Monday night—the dinner at which Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett presented Victor with a plaque commemorating the striking off of the company's billionth record—was given a duplicate of that record. It was a double record in the new non-breakable plastic and had on one side the Sousa march, Semper Fidelis, and on the other Sousa's even more famous Stars and Stripes, recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. In the same package was a duplicate of the first master record ever turned out by RCA. This had on the one side Semper Fidelis as recorded by Sousa himself and on the other side the Floradora Sextette.

The original billionth record, gold-plated, was presented to the United States Marine Corps, whose official march is Semper Fidelis.

Too late to be reviewed in last Monday's column, Myra Hess, England's first lady of the piano, played her first recital here in several years. Honoring the great artist and intrepid woman who had brought free music to London's millions during the worst of the blitz, the audience rose as one man when Miss Hess walked upon Town Hall stage. Bravo's followed her every selection, and everyone lingered for encore after encore until it was obvious that even the vitality that had withstood the rigors of war without faltering was being unduly taxed. Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, the three deities of the keyboard so often invoked to lift the morale of a war-weary people, constituted the greater part of the program.

E BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—MONDAY, OCTOBER 21, 194

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Sunday afternoon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday at Symphony Hall. A capacity audience had gathered for the initial program, which consisted of four masterpieces, tried and true; Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss, and the First Smphony of Brahms. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

In most respects this was an afternoon of high virtuosity, both in the conductor's interpretation and the orchestra's playing. These four pieces cover a lot of expressive ground, they all differ each from the other in style as well as in what they have to say. That each was so vital, glowing and fresh testifies to the musicianly care of all concerned. It is possible for an indifferent orchestra to rob even the greatest masterpieces of their sheen and magic. That is something that virtually never happens at Symphony Hall.

We fortunately have space to mention the solo playing of the new first oboe, John Holmes, and the new leader of the second horn quartet Mr. Stagliano. Both these instruments have good opportunity to show their mettle in the Brahms C minor Symphony.

Mr. Holmes produces a large tone and one, for the oboe, that is uncommonly luscious. That great horn solo in Brahms' finale was superbly voiced by Mr. Stagliano, whose tone also is large and beautifully poised and firm.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 21 1946

To Give Shostakovitch Work

Philharmonic Bills First Ninth Symphony Performance Nov. 7

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will give the first New York performances of Dmitri Shostakovitch's ninth symphony on Thursday night, Friday afternoon, Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, Nov. 7, 8, 9 and 10 in Carnegie Hall under Artur Rodzinski's direction, it was announced yesterday.

The work was warmly praised by Russian critics after its first performance in Leningrad last November, but was recently assailed in Russia in the Communist Party magazine, "Culture and Life," for ideological weakness and unwholesome influences. It was first played in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in the opening concert of last summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 25. A repetition on Aug. 10 was broadcast, and the Philharmonic performance of Nov. 10 will also go on the air.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

OCT 20 1946

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, celebrating his 22nd year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on the podium when that ensemble returned to the air on Tuesday, October 8th., via WTJS-ABC. This outstanding orchestra is heard each Tuesday night at 8:30.

[22]

E BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, OCTOBER 21, 19

MUSIC

Sunday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was heard in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon in the first of the Sunday afternoon series, playing the following program:

Weber	Overture to "Oberon"
Ravel	"Pavane pour une Infante defunte"
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned roguish manner in Rondo Form," Op. 28
Brahms	Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

By DORIS SPERBER

A pleasant potpourri of familiar selections made up the opening program of the Sunday afternoon series, played in Symphony Hall yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. By now the gentlemen of the orchestra must be thoroughly tired of Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegel," which was given its third performance in as many days. However, except for an occasional fuzziness in the brasses, the work had all the impish sparkle which makes it one of Koussevitzky's best minor offerings.

Returning to the repertory after an absence of several seasons, the overture to "Oberon" was given a glowing performance. Although the selection as a whole lacks unity, the shimmering fairy tale quality of the slow introduction was brilliantly set off by the verve of the following passages. Ravel's exquisitely haunting "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte" proved once again that this orchestra has few peers in the performance of the late French master. The richly sensuous tonal quality and deeply emotional projection of the work left little to be desired.

It is hard to realize, when witnessing the enthusiastic audience response to Brahms' First Symphony, that Boston's music lovers once walked out on his music. Certainly the symphony was the most popular selection on yesterday's program, and after the breathtaking sweep of the finale, both orchestra and conductor received a warm ovation.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 20 1946

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Step-up in Recording Companies Bring Releases of Quality Discs

By MILES KASTENDIECK

More recording companies appear to be the order of the day. One of the newer organizations, Concert Hall Society, Inc., plans to make available outstanding but seldom heard works, some of them by contemporary composers, others by recognized masters of the classic and pre-classic period. It regards its function as that of filling gaps in the recorded music literature which the major companies cannot or will not undertake to present. Its product will be of the highest quality possible in the series of 12 albums limited to 2,000 subscribers. Such a policy is indeed welcome in the recording field.

The first release, Prokofieff's String Quartet in F, played by the Gordon String Quartet, is reassuring. The work, the performance and the recording of vinylite discs are superior. In reproduction the performance is quite lifelike. The work reflects the influence of folk material of the Eastern Caucasus where the composer lived in 1942. For that reason it introduces a Prokofieff less well-known but none-the-less interesting. It may appeal only to discriminating music lovers, but then the whole series is of that nature.

In the next eight months the following works are to be issued: Copland's Piano Sonata, "Our Town" suite; Purcell's "The Gordian Knot" suite, Barber's Capricorn Concerto, Bowles' Sonata for Two Pianos, Stravinsky's Sonata for Two Pianos, Brahms' Sonata No. 1 in C Major, Op. I, Bartok's String Quartet No. 4, Beethoven's Scotch Songs, Debussy's Sonata for Violoncelo and Piano, Schuman's Symphony for Strings and Bartok's Sonata No. 2 for Violin and Piano. Obviously their appeal is limited, but the fact that there is such a recording company to produce such works is good news.

Meanwhile, the regular companies follow their standard repertory. Victor has released a new version of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, this time a performance by the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitzky conducting. Its value is obvious. Haydn's Symphony No. 97, played by the London Philharmonic under the direction of Sir Thomas Beecham, is another worthy undertaking in the category of the tried and true. Still another is Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 as played by Arthur Rubinstein and the N. B. C. Symphony under Vladimir Golschmann. None of these calls for any special comment. They have the hallmark of standard brand in the Victor tradition.

On the lighter side there is Dorothy Kirsten's album of Victor Herbert's Melodies. These are recorded in the best Sunday night radio program style, for better or for worse.

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD

OCT 22 1946

Music And Politics

Serge Koussevitzki, the famous Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the outstanding living conductors, recently invited two Russian composers to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra with their own works during a tour through the United States.

Both composers, Dimitri Shostakovich and Serge Prokofieff, after having already approved, finally declined the invitation.

Reason: They prefer to wait until the political relations between Russia and the United States are more consolidated.

It is more than regrettable that the Russian composers, no matter if ordered by the Kremlin or by their own will, have refused to come to the United States.

The appearance of these two famous Russian composers could undoubtedly have contributed to the improvement of human, and therefore, political relations between Russia and the United States. Much more than 78 days Paris Peace conference and a lot of speeches.

They could have been the real ambassadors of the Russian people, the interpreters of Russian art, music and culture.

And more than that, their appearance could have become the beginning of a cultural exchange between our countries it could

But it did not. The Russians are not coming.

It is regrettable that politics and music are thrown in one pot, that even the sound of a 100-piece orchestra with wonderful melodies is defeated by the question of Trieste and the Dardanelles.

It is regrettable, but it is not the fault of the United States.

There's a whale of a lot of difference between the "gazelle boy" who can run 50 miles an hour and the average office boy.

LAMENT FOR MUSIC

By MORRIS C. HASTINGS

CLINGING to the radio industry by one's little toe, as I am at the moment, has its advantages. This parlous connection—this quasi-disassociation, if you will—relieves me of a moral obligation I had back in the days when I worked in radio. Nowadays, happily, I can pick my own shows.

But what I want most to hear is fine, absorbing, challenging music; and radio is offering me only the most casual kind of co-operation. Sure, there are WQXR and WNYC and a handful more, with their first-class record programs and their orchestral concerts conducted by so able a musician as Leon Barzin. But suppose I moved far away from the purlieus of New York City. Then I would be almost completely at the mercy of the networks.

Week-end Deluge

Of course, the networks make it possible for me to listen to the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Metropolitan Opera, the Philadelphia Orchestra and so on. I'm still not satisfied.

In the first place, the networks crowd all these into less than forty-eight hours on week-ends, with the result that the devoted music-lover, over-gorging himself, feels on Monday morning that he has been eating too much mince pie. ABC alone has had the kindness to relieve musical indigestion this year by presenting the Boston Symphony broadcasts on Tuesday evenings rather than on the accustomed Saturday nights.

In the second place, many of the programs I have mentioned are, or recently have been, or soon may be, ringed round with commercialism. And it is my guess that commercialism has come just about as close to advancing fine music on the air as Billy Conn did to harming Joe Louis in their second fight.

The god of radio advertising agencies is the Hooper rating. And when the boys in the triple-breasted suits, as a friend of mine calls "the hucksters," see that a symphony orchestra has a rating several fathoms lower than Bob Hope or Walter Winchell, they realize that something must be done. That even a low rating may mean one of the most devoted audiences in radio is unimportant.

And so, to attain that end, they cannot let things be. There must be change. To entice huge numbers of people into listening, they must trick a symphony concert into something resembling a variety show—in a dignified way, of course. Intermission spots must be filled with discussion of inventions, science or American history—anything but music. And then, music continuity—the program notes read by the announcer—must be dynamized and filled with "hep."

House Bands

All this might not be so lamentable if it were not for one fact. The networks, left to themselves, can and have put on more stimulating, more adventurous music programs than any supervised by the radio advertising agencies. They have good, and in some instances excellent, "house" orchestras. They employ skillful conductors of inquiring minds, such as Bernard Herrmann of CBS and Sylvan Levin of Mutual; they enjoy the services of such fine program-planners and producers as James Fassett of CBS and Oliver Daniel of ABC; they can rely upon such script writers as Ben Hyams of CBS and David Hall of NBC for authoritative, unhackneyed program notes.

With all these assets, the networks still are not making the most of them. It wasn't always so. A few years ago, the networks took pride in what they could do for music. Not only did they resurrect and perform almost forgotten but worthy music from the past. They also were a kind of present day Medici or Esterhazy, commissioning works from the most significant of living composers.

Of the many purely radio concerts that networks once presented without going outside their own resources, only one of genuine artistic stature remains. That is CBS' year-round, half-hour show, "Invitation to Music," and it illustrates what a network can achieve and where it fails.

Achievement

The program content of this radio series is lmost incredibly intelligent. Bernard Herrmann and his colleagues have presented enough world premières and first American performances—scores by Shostakovich, Vaughan Williams, Rogers, Prokofieff and dozens of others—to make any musician's mouth water. They have dusted off and given vital readings of unfamiliar Mozart and Schubert symphonies, cantatas by Bach, a concert suite made from Berg's "Wozzeck"—these and many more. The presentation itself is equally intelligent, for Ben Hyams, "Music Annotator" of the program, is easy, informative and pleasant in his manner of introducing each work.

And yet, how does the network handle a program of this unquestioned distinction? It shunts it off to an hour that cannot be sold—11:30 to 12 Wednesday evening. Time, and good evening time, can be found for unsponsored comedians, popular singers and plays. Time that no sponsor would buy and that is inconvenient for even the most enthusiastic listeners is good enough for fine music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 22 1946

TO PLAY SHOSTAKOVICH

New York Philharmonic to Offer Ninth Symphony Nov. 7

Dmitri Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony, which recently was severely criticized in Russia for its want of "warm ideological conviction," will be performed in New York for the first time on Nov. 7 by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under Artur Rodzinski, at Carnegie Hall.

"I prefer to present the Shostakovich Ninth to the music lovers of New York and to radio listeners for appraisal," Mr. Rodzinski said in announcing the work. "History alone can sit in final judgment on any artistic effort; only through familiarity can humanity weigh its value."

The controversial work had its American première this summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Berkshire Music Festival.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

OCT 23 1946

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS 2 MARCHES

Released by RCA Victor as October National Special

For its first release of a single 12-inch Red Seal de luxe non-breakable record, RCA Victor has chosen the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, to interpret two marches by John Philip Sousa.

Introduced to the public last year by the same orchestra in a reading of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," the non-breakable discs have until this time been available only in album form.

The latest release of "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever" by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony adds additional laurels to the plastic discs.

Selection of the two marches as a featured October release has historical significance to the Camden firm. On Oct. 9 RCA Victor celebrated the manufacture of its one billionth record. It turned out to be one of the first pressings of the new Boston Symphony release.

There have been a number of versions of both "Semper Fidelis" and "Stars and Stripes Forever" in the RCA Victor catalogue. The former was recorded by John Philip Sousa and his band for Victor as early as 1902. Subsequently other recordings of it were made by the Victor Fife, Drum and Bugle Corps, the Philadelphia Rapid Transit Band, the Goldman Band, and earlier this year, by Sigmund Romberg and his orchestra.

While usually associated with military bands, the tune proves rapidly adaptable to a full-size symphony orchestra, and the men of the Boston Symphony, under their distinguished conductor, give the stirring march music its full due.

SURVEY OF MUSICIANS AT WORK

Employment in Movies, Concert Halls, Theatre, Radio and Records

A GENERAL over-all view of the extent of employment of musicians in the United States and Canada is provided in the recent annual report of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians.

The document takes up individually most industries engaging instrumentalists and shows what is paid out for the rendition of melody. As will be seen, the figures do not always cover the same period of time, but none the less they do provide the first comprehensive picture of the income of musicians as a group.

The figures must be read, however, with several major reservations. Since their preparation, the union has moved on every front for increases in pay scales or in number of musicians regularly employed, or both. Future totals, accordingly, will show a decided increase. The widely scattered hotel and cafe industry also is not included.

Herewith the report:

MOTION PICTURE STUDIOS

The statistics that follow cover services rendered for the following eight major motion picture studios from July 1, 1944, to June 30, 1945: Columbia Pictures Corp., Loew's, Inc.—M.G.M. Studio, Paramount, R.K.O. Radio Pictures, Inc, 20th Century-Fox Films Corp., Republic Pictures, Universal Pictures Co., Inc., and Warner Brothers.

These studios employed 239 musicians under contract with a minimum yearly guarantee of $5,200 each. The gross earnings of these men were $1,932,754.66. The gross earnings of the above-mentioned guarantee men and extra men employed by the studios, amounting to 5,518 musicians, were $5,572,344.67.

These musicians were employed in the making of 288 feature subjects, 117 one-reel shorts and 117 two or more reel shorts.

The gross income mentioned above includes the earnings of recording musicians, orchestra managers, side-line musicians, orchestrators, conductors, arrangers, copyists, librarians and featured units, such as traveling or name bands, hill-billy groups, cowboy groups, etc.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS, 1944-1945

Twenty-four orchestras are classified as major symphony orchestras for the reason that the musicians employed in these orchestras are engaged at a regular weekly salary.

One thousand nine hundred seventy-three musicians are employed in the twenty-four major symphony orchestras in the regular season of from fifteen to thirty-three weeks.

Five hundred and twenty-five musicians are imported from other locals in twenty-one orchestras.

Six hundred and fifty-two musicians are employed in ten of the symphony orchestras in the summer season of from four to seventeen weeks.

The average regular season is twenty-three weeks.

The average summer season is eight and one-half weeks.

The average weekly minimum scale for the regular season is $65.75.

The average weekly minimum scale for the summer season is $61.17.

It is interesting to note that the cities of San Francisco, Indianapolis and Baltimore appropriate either through municipal grant or city and county taxes, $40,000, $50,000 and $54,600 respectively for the operation of their symphony orchestras.

The twenty-four orchestras referred to are the Boston, New York Philharmonic, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, San Francisco, Indianapolis, San Antonio, Houston, St. Louis, Denver, Rochester, Kansas City, Baltimore, Oklahoma City, Buffalo, New Orleans and Toronto.

RADIO EMPLOYMENT FOR 1944

This survey covers employment by radio stations only and does not include commercial broadcasting by musicians employed by sponsors and advertising agencies.

Number of men, weeks per year, stations and salaries for staff musicians for 1944. Every local was sent a simple questionnaire. Five hundred and three replied; 360 locals reported no employment, 143 locals reported employment as follows:

STEADY STAFF EMPLOYMENT

No. of Men	No. of Weeks	No. of Stations	Gross Salaries
2,353	50-52	261	$9,395,942
116	40-49	18	229,673
221	30-39	26	349,663
29	Less than 30	9	20,217
2,719	Variable	314	$9,995,495

The following amount is for miscellaneous employment which includes extra men, librarians, arrangers, record turners, copyists and single engagements, which a number of locals reported. It is not possible to determine the number of weeks they were engaged. This is simply a lump sum figure which the locals listed as miscellaneous employment. Total of miscellaneous employment, $1,916,486.

The grand total of steady staff employment and miscellaneous employment is $11,911,981.

THEATRICAL EMPLOYMENT, 1945

The following is a survey on local employment of theatrical musicians in the United States and Canada and is based upon information and figures supplied by the locals of the American Federation of Musicians. This survey does not include traveling orchestras, but deals exclusively with local employment.

The 307 theatres out of a total of 9,547 with seating capacity of 500 or more that employ musicians are scattered throughout the jurisdictions of 102 locals, and only seventy-five of these theatres use men on a fifty-two-week basis. The balance of these theatres (232) employ musicians for lengths of time varying from one day to forty-five weeks.

NUMBER OF MUSICIANS EMPLOYED

Burlesque	224
Dramatic and Musical	1,209
Vaudeville and Presentation	1,162
Opera and Ballet	303
Organ	10
	2,908

TOTAL EARNINGS
Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 1945.

Burlesque	$728,287
Dramatic	529,325
Musical	2,325,781
Vaudeville and Presentation	2,494,415
Opera and Ballet	796,022
Organ	76,122
	$6,949,952

PHONOGRAPH RECORDS AND ELECTRICAL TRANSCRIPTIONS

The following production figures encompass only phonograph records pressed from masters made under the provision of the recently executed contract with the recording companies. They do not include the number of records pressed currently from masters made prior to the execution of the agreement. The figures on electrical transcriptions include only transcriptions and employment compiled since the execution of the electrical transcription contracts. These production figures represent the output of 302 companies that were signatories to the master recording and transcription agreement with the American Federation of Musicians as of Dec. 31, 1945.

PHONOGRAPH RECORDS
Sept. 20, 1943, up to and including Dec. 31, 1945

Total number of leaders employed once or more	1,446
Total number of sessions (including overtime)	2,655
Total number of sidemen employed once or more	16,646
Total number of hours employment	8,634½
Total number of masters recorded	10,206
Total number of pressings sold	*163,748,494
Total earned by leaders and men	$1,841,899.00
Royalties paid to Federation	$947,713.02

*These figures do not include:
(A) 1,067,100 records made from American masters sold in foreign countries.
(B) 638,238 records that were not reported to AFM office in time to be included in its statistical charts.

These earnings are base on flat union scale and do not include royalty payments paid directly to the leader.

ELECTRICAL TRANSCRIPTIONS
Oct. 20, 1943 up to and including Dec. 31, 1945.

Number of units employed	4,220
Total number of man appearances (Men)	26,976
Total number of man appearances (Leaders)	4,387
Total number of hours' employment	10,344½
Total number of transcriptions recorded	12,104
Total earned by leaders and men	*$1,485,885.00
Royalties paid to Federation	$32,688.22

*These earnings are based on flat union scale and do not include royalty payments paid directly to the leader.

PRODUCTION STATISTICS FOR PHONOGRAPH RECORDS

Number of 35c records produced	10,737,857
Number of 50c records produced	[illegible]309,668
Number of 75c records produced	[illegible]6,543
Number of $1 records produced	[illegible]467,286
Number of $1.50 records produced	[illegible]7,228
Number of $2 and over records produced	[illegible]7,250
Total	165,445,832
Gross sales of all above records	$95,825,795.80

MUSIC:.

Moses Smith

Jewish Weekly Times

One of the more important events of recent symphonic seasons was the premiere of Aaron Copland's Third Symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts last week. Copland has arrived at the position, until recently rare for an American composer, where a major work of his is eagerly awaited.

SMITH

In the present case, it was worth waiting for. It is also a pleasure to report that the new Symphony not only won recognition from critics and musicians but also an audience success.

The more talented and progressive American composers of the period since the end of the first World War have not been particularly at home in the symphony. There has been an exception like Walter Piston, working comfortably in the broad surfaces and controlled lines that the symphonic form properly demands. Or Roy Harris, whose Third Symphony was a landmark in the development of American music. Others, like Howard Hanson, for example, have written works which pretended to be new symphonies but were mainly restatements of other composers' (European composers') music. For the rest, the American composer has found happiest expression in smaller forms or in forms allied to literary or dramatic ideas. This has hitherto been true of Copland.

Copland had, it is true, written two earlier symphonies. The first, composed when he was a very young man, was brought out here by Koussevitzky during his Boston season, early in 1925, and repeated, in revised form, ten years later. As I recall, it was not really a symphony at all, although clearly exhibiting an exceptional talent. Copland's Second Symphony, written in the mid-thirties, has received several performances in Mexico, but only one—a broadcast under Stokowski—in this country, a couple of years ago. Since I

Continued on Page Eight

LETTER BOX

WANTED! — LOST DONORS

Dear Editor:

The Brookline Junior Division of the 1946 Combined Jewish Appeal is looking for Lost Donors. A large force of solicitors is trying to visit every young adult in Brookline. We are looking for those who have not made their contribution.

Can anyone who does not have to receive afford not to give—and GIVE GENEROUSLY.

Please, Lost Donors, contact us.

Urgently yours,
Irma Kramer—Bea. 2258
Shirlee Herwitz—Bea. 0956
Sol Silberman—Asp. 6837
Ruth Kra—Asp. 3695
Elaine Horblit—Asp. 7302

MUSIC

Continued from Page Six

haven't heard it, I cannot very well express an opinion about it. It was said, however, to be a complex and aggressive work.

Meanwhile, Copland has developed, through changing style and content, into one of the leading composers of the world, not merely of this country. His second important work, "Music for the Theatre," relied heavily on jazz allusions, style and content, as did much of his music prevailingly during many following years. In contrast, as a result of his writing for the movies and later for the ballet, his music later became more simple and more lyrical. It is even possible to apply to a work like the "Appalachian" Suite the adjective "sweet."

The new Third Symphony seemed to me, on the basis of a single hearing, to be largely a judicious amalgam of the several earlier styles of Copland. It had great vigor—the vigor of ideas forcefully presented, not merely of loud sounds. The forms were more compact and symphonic, even though the lovely slow third movement digressed too frequently. Overall, the expression seemed new and different, not a disguised copy of what other composers had said before or even of what Copland himself had said before.

It was fitting that the performance under Koussevitzky should have carried such great conviction. The conductor was simply living up to his practice of giving a new composition, particularly one by an American composer, everything he's got.

He was reaffirming, for the nth time, his faith in the talent of Aaron Copland, a talent which he recognized when Copland was a raw, unknown youth, and which, far more than any other conductor, he has assisted and nurtured. Without the recognition and aid of Koussevitzky, indeed, it is hard to see how Copland could have arrived where he is today.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 2 - 1946

Two Russian Composers Reject Invitations to U.S.

Prokofieff, Shostakovitch Wait for 'Settled' Conditions

BROOKLINE, Mass., Oct. 1 (UP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky revealed tonight that two of Russia's most prominent symphonic composers have declined to serve as guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra until conditions between the two nations are "more settled."

Dr. Koussevitzky, a Russian-born American citizen, told a news conference he had invited Serge Prokofieff and Dmitri Shostakovitch to lead the Boston Orchestra in their own compositions.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CALL BULLETIN

OCT 28 1946

In commemoration of RCA Victor having pressed its billionth recording, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have recorded a dramatic and stirring performance of John Philip Sousa's exciting march, "STARS AND STRIPES FOREVER," one of those electric thrillers which never fails to bring the house down. The colorful resources of the world's leading orchestra under the inspired direction of its famed conductor, certainly do it justice!

Backed with the equally stirring "SEMPER FIDELIS," this record, in its glowing, ruby red color, truly represents a RCA Victor achievement.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

OCT 26 1946

For the first time since the appearance of the vinalyte records from RCA-Victor, a single platter has been issued. Heretofore, this type of record has been used only in albums. However, in observance of its billionth record, the company has released The Stars and Stripes Forever and, on the reverse, Semper Fidelis, two of John Philip Sousa's finest marches, played by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky. Aside from the Sousa band's own interpretation, these two readings are the best recordings made of the marches.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

OCT 27 1946

Recorded Music

This month RCA Victor, makers of phonograph records for 48 years, pressed its billionth disk, an unparalleled mark. The billionth record is a 12-inch plastic one, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" and "Semper Fidelis" with their usual virtuosity. The former march Koussevitzky gives an individualistic interpretation with his predilection for sharp contrasts in volume.

Three statistics on one billion records: Laid edge to edge they would encircle the world six and a half times, stacked they'd reach 1515 miles high. To play that many would take 12,489 years, if you want to try it.

Curley Spares Symphony Hall

Preservation of the architectural beauty of Boston's famed Symphony Hall yesterday influenced Mayor Curley to change plans of the city to widen Huntington ave. 10 feet between Norway and Gainsboro sts.

Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitsky pleaded with the mayor not to take four steps off the entrance to the hall to make the 10-foot widening, and Curley ordered the street to be widened only four feet at that point.

Curley told the conference that as soon as city finances permit he intends to extend the underpass at [illegible] to the Opera House.

MEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

OCT 30 1946

RICHARD BURGIN . . . Associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard as its first guest conductor, October 29. He is also the husband of Ruth Posselt, Medford violinist par-excellence, who is scheduled to appear at Jordan Hall, Sunday afternoon, November 3. "One of the greatest violinists of our time," says Serge Koussevitzky.

End—Two Novelties Heard at Symphony Concert

New Works by Roy Harris And Howard Hanson Played

By L. A. Sloper

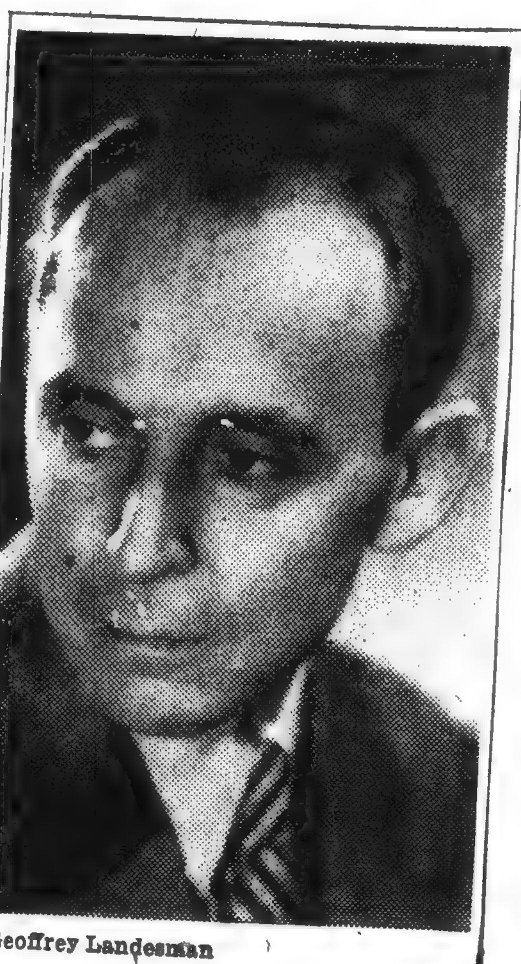
Besides opening the fourth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony (unheard at these concerts for more than nine years), Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday produced another surprise in the shape of a second novelty, which had not been announced and for which, because of lack of time, no program notes had been provided.

The principal novelty, heard yesterday for the first time anywhere, was Roy Harris' "Celebration," Variations on a Theme by Howard Hanson. The other one, unheralded, was a Serenade for solo flute, harp and strings, by Dr. Hanson himself, played for the first time in Boston. The final number listed on the program was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

Whether Dr. Koussevitzky thought that Mr. Harris' birthday present to Dr. Hanson merited an acknowledgement, or whether he merely needed another short piece to fill out his program, we may never know. Probably the latter, since the acknowledgement preceded the gift on the program.

The theme which Mr. Harris uses for his "Celebration" is that for the tympani in the Scherzo of Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony. It is a lively theme, from which Mr. Harris develops a Scherzo which is perhaps even livelier than that which Dr. Hanson himself devised. It has the breeziness of the open plains, and its Trio has the line and the sentiment of cowboy song. Altogether a pleasant work to listen to. The audience especially enjoyed the suggestion of "Happy Birthday to You" toward the close. The composer was called to the stage to receive the plaudits of the house.

Hanson's own contribution to the concert was written last December, and has been heard over the radio and in concert elsewhere. It is dedicated to "Peggie," and in view of Dr. Hanson's recent marriage, there has been speculation that it was written for his bride; but this had not been confirmed, up to the time of writing. The Serenade is a simple, agreeable piece which consists mostly of a flute solo with accompanying chords. It was played with the expected virtuosity and expression by Georges Laurent, who received a deserved tribute from conductor, orchestra and audience.



Geoffrey Landesman

Roy Harris

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
OCT 27 1946

RCA Victor's Billionth Disk Long Step from "Toy" of '98

By Col. L. R. Boals

In Camden, N. J., home of the world's largest manufacturer of records, employees of the RCA Victor Record Division paused briefly in their around-the-clock production of popular and Red Seal records to celebrate the manufacture of the company's 1,000,000,000th disk.

The record came off a press in the Camden plant Oct. 14, at a time when hundreds of other presses in the same plant were turning out thousands of records to meet the demand for recorded music that has accompanied the first year of manufacture unhampered by wartime restrictions since 1941.

The billionth disk was a 12-inch non-breakable Red Seal de luxe recording of John Philip Sousa's "Semper Fidelis," coupled with his "Stars and Stripes Forever," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The start on the long road to the "billionth" began in 1898, when the first flat phonograph record for a mechanical talking machine came out of a small machine shop in Camden. Even after the turn of the century, the talking machine and the phonograph record were considered toys by serious musicians. Concert singers, as a rule, would not use their own names for their recordings. It was not until 1905, when the great Enrico Caruso signed a contract with Victor to sing for their Read Seal label that people in general began to take records seriously.

Caruso in 1905

If I might be permitted to tell my personal experience: In the spring of 1905, I heard Caruso three times during the week's stay of the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Auditorium in Chicago, and immediately became a confirmed Caruso fanatic. Back in Youngstown I inquired concerning Caruso records and was able to find but one Red Seal record—Caruso singing "Celeste Aida" with piano accompaniment.

The storekeeper offered to order any records that I would check mark in the catalogue. When they came, he loaned me, over the week-end, the only talking machine he had in the store. This was a box 12 or 14 inches square with a morning glory horn. One like it came for me a few days later. I then lived with the family of Miss Myra McKeown, who was as enthusiastic about the records as I was. But when her musical friends saw a talking machine in her music room, they were somewhat horrified—that is, until they heard Caruso records.

Overcome Prejudices

The point of the story is that, when I moved to New York the next year, taking my machine and records with me, the storekeeper

---

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 28 1946

Copland's Third

The Boston Symphony's Serge Koussevitzky hurried offstage, excitedly kissed several dowagers who had come up to congratulate him. He had just conducted the world première of Aaron Copland's Third Symphony. Said he: "There is no doubt about it—this is the greatest American symphony. It goes from the heart to the heart. He is the greatest American composer. Of course."

In the same auditorium 19 years ago Dr. Koussevitzky had led the first performance of Brooklyn-born Aaron Copland's raucous Jazz Concerto. On that evening Bostonians had hissed; some had laughed out loud; some had accused Dr. Koussevitzky of insulting them.* In those days, Aaron Copland was the kind of cacophonous enfant terrible in the U.S. that Igor Stravinsky had once been in Paris. If audiences were no longer disturbed by these terrible children, it was for different reasons. Igor Stravinsky had waited for the public ear to become attuned to his jazzy dissonances. Aaron Copland had modified his harmonies to please the public.

If 45-year-old Copland could be considered the top U.S. composer, the small stature of his colleagues had something to do with it. His technical competence far outshone his inventiveness. His first popular success, El Salon Mexico (1936), was full of Mexican folk tunes. He borrowed folk and hymn themes for his ballet scores (Billy the Kid, Appalachian Spring) and his movie music (Our Town). The Third Symphony, which Boston heard last week, varied from tenderness to brassy choirs which led a Boston Post critic to call it "Shostakovich in the Appalachians."

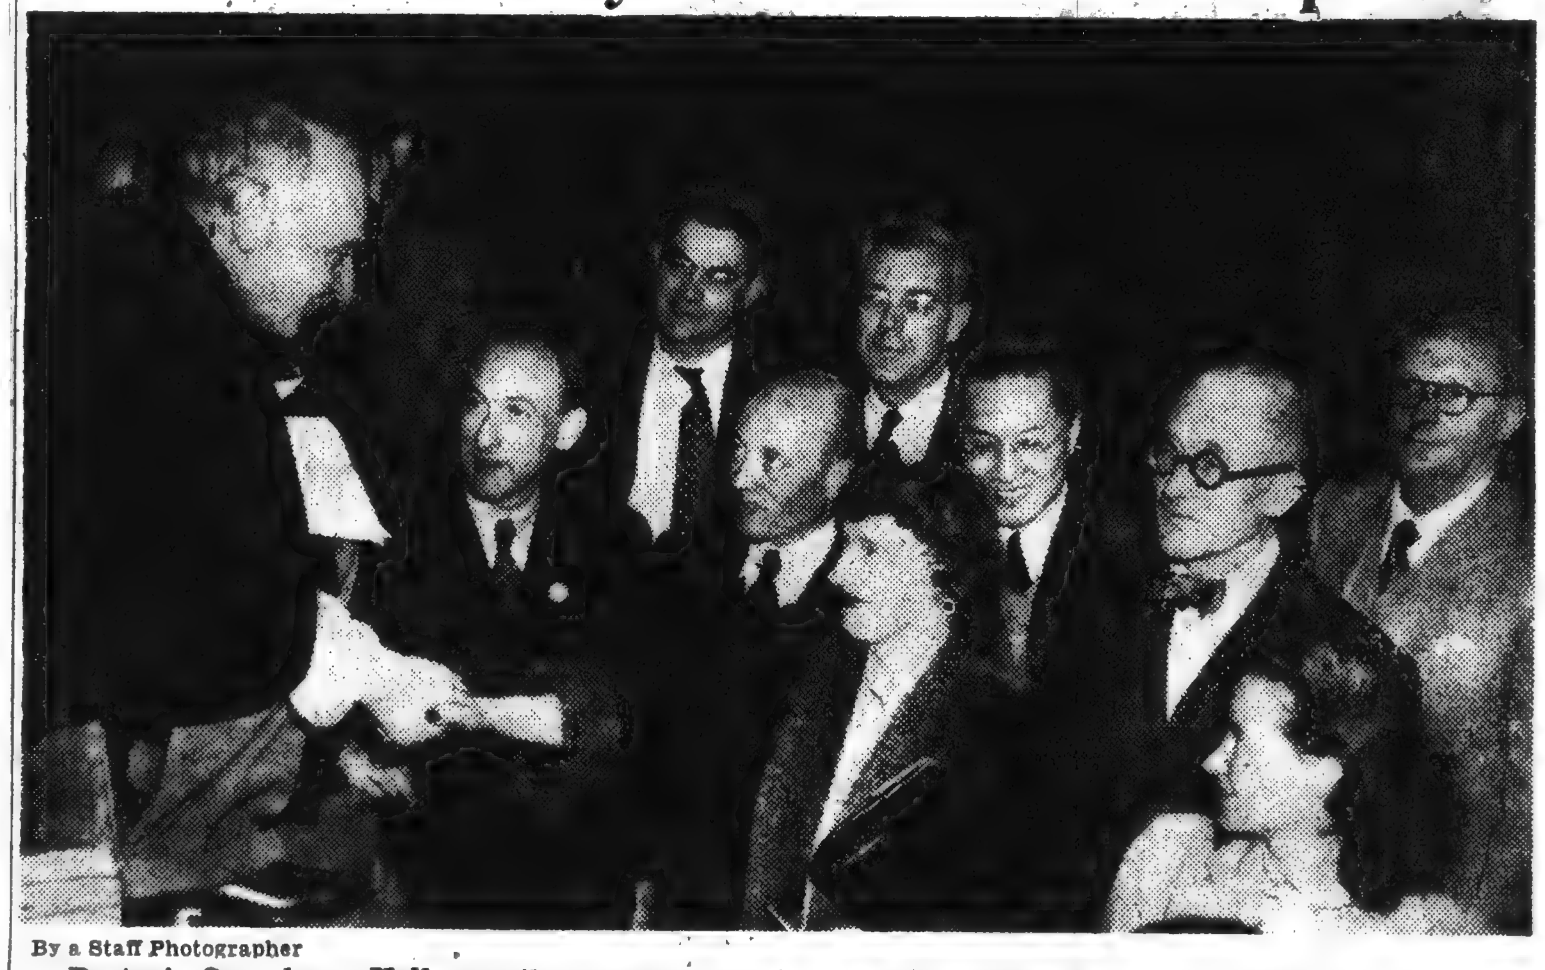
More often than he borrowed from others, Aaron Copland has borrowed from himself. The Third's opening movement uses a tonal device from Appalachian Spring (1944); the fourth movement intricately develops the theme of Fanfare for the Common Man (1942). Yet there was enough original music in the Third's 40 minutes, and so skilled a reworking of the old, that it would undoubtedly add to Aaron Copland's popularity—a kind of popularity that seemed to keep him too busy to be a great composer.

---

* Copland's Jazz Concerto, unheard since 1930, was programed this week by Pianist Leo Smit and Leonard Bernstein's New York City Symphony.

† Jack Hotop, Gate Frega, Joe Mooney, Andy Fitzgerald.

Koussevitzky Greets U. N. Group



By a Staff Photographer

Boston's Symphony Hall was the scene of an informal meeting today when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky met some of the United Nations personnel here on a site-seeking mission. They are, from left to right: Dr. Koussevitzky; Serge Wolff, interpreter; Matthew Gordon, press attaché; N. Bossov, Russia; Erwin D. Canham, Editor of The Christian Science Monitor, and Chairman of the Massachusetts U. N. Executive Committee; Miss Mercedes Laurence, secretary, shaking hands with Dr. Koussevitzky; K. W. Yu, China; Charles Le Corbusier, France; Miss Josee Pilot, secretary, and Francisco Aguirre, Cuba.

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1946 Art—Music—Theater *9

nd—Two Novelties Heard at Symphony Concert

New Works by Roy Harris And Howard Hanson Played

By L. A. Sloper

Besides opening the fourth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony (unheard at these concerts for more than nine years), Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday produced another surprise in the shape of a second novelty, which had not been announced and for which, because of lack of time, no program notes had been provided.

The principal novelty, heard yesterday for the first time anywhere, was Roy Harris' "Celebration," Variations on a Theme by Howard Hanson. The other one, unheralded, was a Serenade for solo flute, harp and strings, by Dr. Hanson himself, played for the first time in Boston. The final number listed on the program was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

Whether Dr. Koussevitzky thought that Mr. Harris' birthday present to Dr. Hanson merited an acknowledgement, or whether he merely needed another short piece to fill out his program, we may never know. Probably the latter, since the acknowledgement preceded the gift on the program.

The theme which Mr. Harris uses for his "Celebration" is that for the tympani in the Scherzo of Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony. It is a lively theme, from which Mr. Harris develops a Scherzo which is perhaps even livelier than that which Dr. Hanson himself devised. It has the breeziness of the open plains, and its Trio has the line and the sentiment of cowboy song. Altogether a pleasant work to listen to. The audience especially enjoyed the suggestion of "Happy Birthday to You" toward the close. The composer was called to the stage to receive the plaudits of the house.

Hanson's own contribution to the concert was written last December, and has been heard over the radio and in concert elsewhere. It is dedicated to "Peggie," and in view of Dr. Hanson's recent marriage, there has been speculation that it was written for his bride; but this had not been confirmed, up to the time of writing. The Serenade is a simple, agreeable piece which consists mostly of a flute solo with accompanying chords. It was played with the expected virtuosity and expression by Georges Laurent, who received a deserved tribute from conductor, orchestra and audience.

Geoffrey Landesman

Roy Harris

CHICAGO, ILL.

OCT 28 1946

Copland's Third

The Boston Symphony's Serge Koussevitzky hurried offstage, excitedly kissed several dowagers who had come up to congratulate him. He had just conducted the world première of Aaron Copland's Third Symphony. Said he: "There is no doubt about it—this is the greatest American symphony. It goes from the heart to the heart. He is the greatest American composer. Of course."

In the same auditorium 19 years ago Dr. Koussevitzky had led the first performance of Brooklyn-born Aaron Copland's raucous Jazz Concerto. On that evening Bostonians had hissed; some had laughed out loud; some had accused Dr. Koussevitzky of insulting them.* In those days, Aaron Copland was the kind of cacophonous enfant terrible in the U.S. that Igor Stravinsky had once been in Paris. If audiences were no longer disturbed by these terrible children, it was for different reasons. Igor Stravinsky had waited for the public ear to become attuned to his jazzy dissonances. Aaron Copland had modified his harmonies to please the public.

If 45-year-old Copland could be considered the top U.S. composer, the small stature of his colleagues had something to do with it. His technical competence far outshone his inventiveness. His first popular success, El Salon Mexico (1936), was full of Mexican folk tunes. He borrowed folk and hymn themes for his ballet scores (Billy the Kid, Appalachian Spring) and his movie music (Our Town). The Third Symphony, which Boston heard last week, varied from tenderness to brassy choirs which led a Boston Post critic to call it "Shostakovich in the Appalachians."

More often than he borrowed from others, Aaron Copland has borrowed from himself. The Third's opening movement uses a tonal device from Appalachian Spring (1944); the fourth movement intricately develops the theme of Fanfare for the Common Man (1942). Yet there was enough original music in the Third's 40 minutes, and so skilled a reworking of the old, that it would undoubtedly add to Aaron Copland's popularity—a kind of popularity that seemed to keep him too busy to be a great composer.

* Copland's Jazz Concerto, unheard since 1930, was programed this week by Pianist Leo Smit and Leonard Bernstein's New York City Symphony.

† Jack Hotop, Gate Frega, Joe Mooney, Andy Fitzgerald.

VINDICATOR

OCT 27 1946

RCA Victor's Billionth Disk Long Step from "Toy" of '98

By Col. L. R. Boals

In Camden, N. J., home of the world's largest manufacturer of records, employees of the RCA Victor Record Division paused briefly in their around-the-clock production of popular and Red Seal records to celebrate the manufacture of the company's 1,000,000,000th disk.

The record came off a press in the Camden plant Oct. 14, at a time when hundreds of other presses in the same plant were turning out thousands of records to meet the demand for recorded music that has accompanied the first year of manufacture unhampered by wartime restrictions since 1941.

The billionth disk was a 12-inch non-breakable Red Seal de luxe recording of John Philip Sousa's "Semper Fidelis," coupled with his "Stars and Stripes Forever," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The start on the long road to the "billionth" began in 1898, when the first flat phonograph record for a mechanical talking machine came out of a small machine shop in Camden. Even after the turn of the century, the talking machine and the phonograph record were considered toys by serious musicians. Concert singers, as a rule, would not use their own names for their recordings. It was not until 1905, when the great Enrico Caruso signed a contract with Victor to sing for their Read Seal label that people in general began to take records seriously.

Caruso in 1905

If I might be permitted to tell my personal experience: In the spring of 1905, I heard Caruso three times during the week's stay of the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Auditorium in Chicago, and immediately became a confirmed Caruso fanatic. Back in Youngstown I inquired concerning Caruso records and was able to find but one Red Seal record—Caruso singing "Celeste Aida" with piano accompaniment.

The storekeeper offered to order any records that I would check mark in the catalogue. When they came, he loaned me, over the week-end, the only talking machine he had in the store. This was a box 12 or 14 inches square with a morning glory horn. One like it came for me a few days later. I then lived with the family of Miss Myra McKeown, who was as enthusiastic about the records as I was. But when her musical friends saw a talking machine in her music room, they were somewhat horrified—that is, until they heard Caruso records.

Overcome Prejudices

The point of the story is that, when I moved to New York the next year, taking my machine and records with me, the storekeeper

---

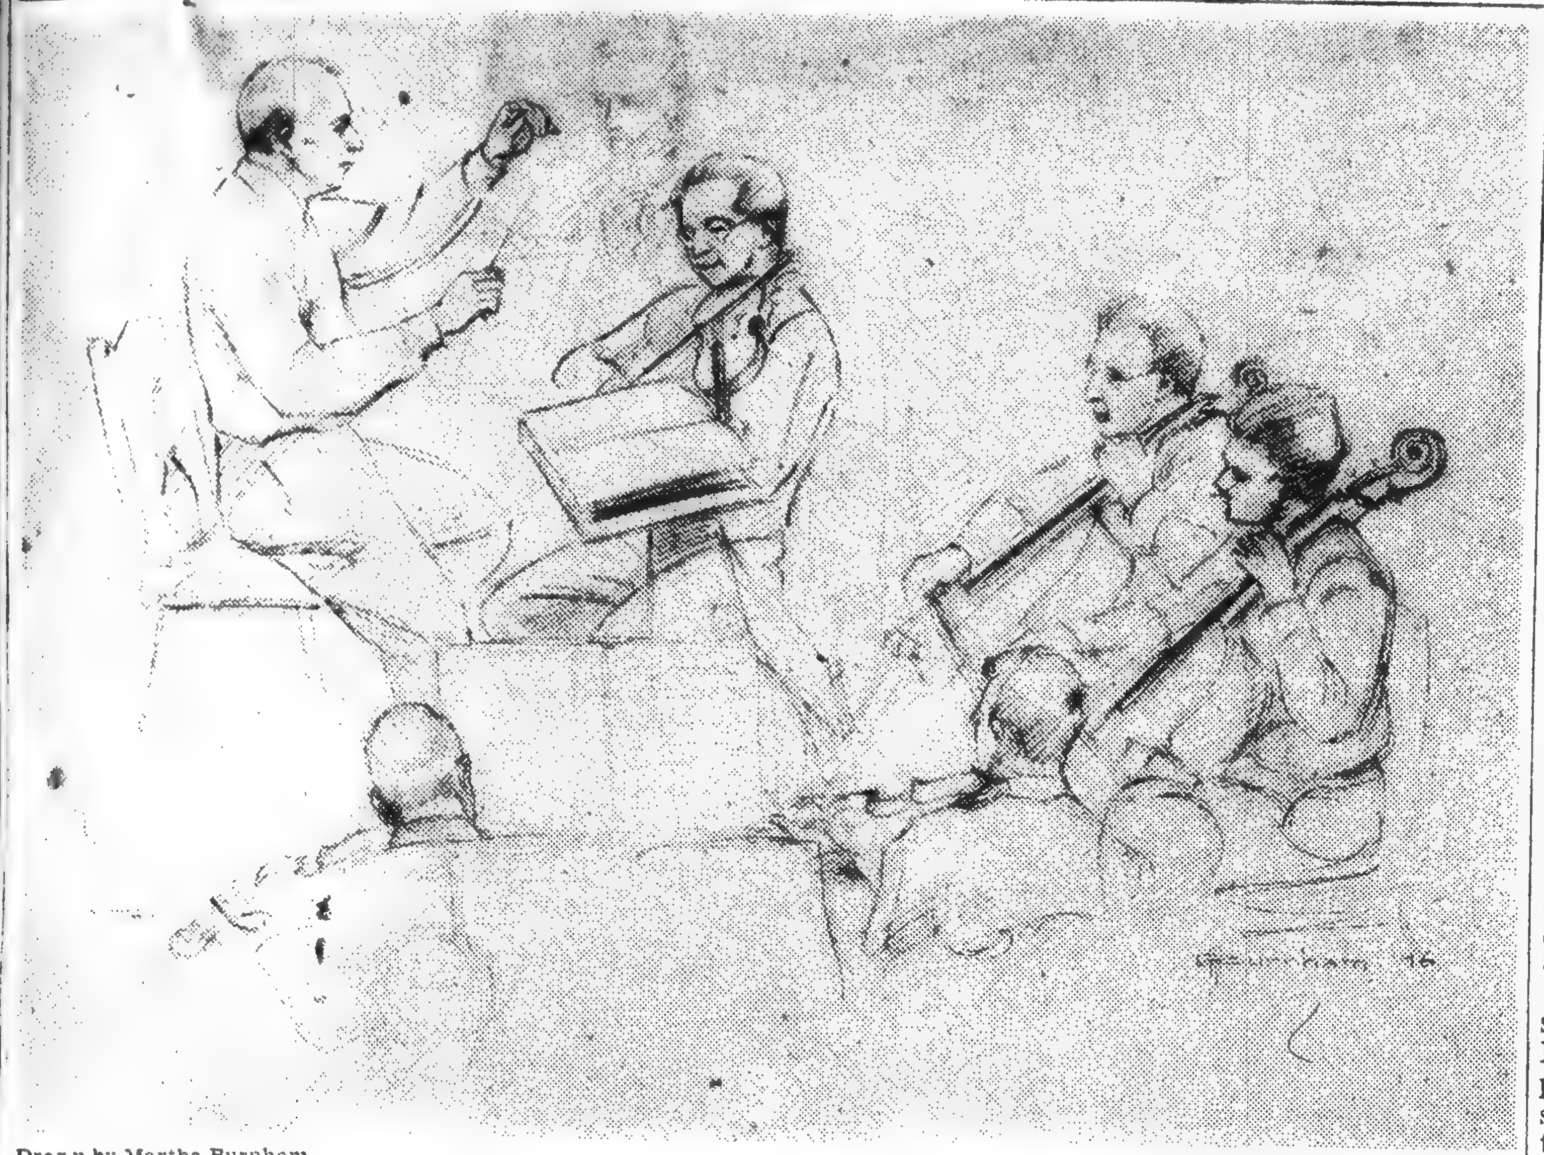
Koussevitsky Greets U. N. Group

By a Staff Photographer

Boston's Symphony Hall was the scene of an informal meeting today when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky met some of the United Nations personnel here on a site-seeking mission. They are, from left to right: Dr. Koussevitzky; Serge Wolff, interpreter; Matthew Gordon, press attaché; N. Bossov, Russia; Erwin D. Canham, Editor of The Christian Science Monitor, and Chairman of the Massachusetts U. N. Executive Committee; Miss Mercedes Laurence, secretary, shaking hands with Dr. Koussevitzky; K. W. Yu, China; Charles Le Corbusier, France; Miss Josce Pilot, secretary, and Francisco Aguirre, Cuba.

Christian Science Monitor Oct 30-1946

Novelties in View for the Symphony Season



Drawn by Martha Burnham

Rehearsal scene showing Dr. Koussevitzky and some of the first-desk string players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concertmaster, Richard Burgin, is invisible behind the conductor. The others, reading clockwise, are A. Krips, the assistant concertmaster, moved up from the ranks this season to replace Mr. Theodorowicz; Jean Bedetti and Alfred Zighera, cellists, and J. Cauhapé and Jean Lefranc, violists.

Dr. Koussevitzky Announces Many New Works and Revivals

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Among the new works which Serge Koussevitzky is admitting into the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is the Symphony No. 1 of the Brazilian composer, Camargo Guarnieri. Among thevisiting conductors, too, who will lend Dr. Koussevitzky a hand in the run of the winter, Mr. Guarnieri numbers. It happens that the young Brazilian holds a high place in Dr. Koussevitzky's rating of modern men of music. Excellent as composer and very capable indeed as an orchestral leader is about how the citation would read if formally set down; and in proof of the estimate, Dr. Koussevitzky has invited Mr. Guarnieri to come to town and interpret his First Symphony for the Friday and Saturday subscribers—date to be announced—in his own way.

Another novelty entered in the schedule is Symphony No. 2, by Darius Milhaud; again the composer conducting. Mr. Milhaud's style, as both composer and interpreter, is fairly familiar to Boston Symphony audiences. We are used to classifying his music as of the French school. Another composer of that school in its most modern aspect is Olivier Messiaen. He will be represented by his "Ascension" Trilogy; and he comes from Paris to direct presentation of that and also of works by Jaubert and Honegger.

Still other fresh additions, to be set before the public either by Dr. Koussevitzky himself or by his associates in the season's conducting, are Symphony No. 3, by Walter Piston; "The Song of Songs" for soprano and orchestra, by Lukas Foss; Variations on a Theme of Howard Hanson, by Roy Harris; "Metamorphosen,". by Richard Strauss, and Concerto in G minor for organ with strings and kettledrums, by Francis Poulenc.

In response to the complaint of certain listeners and in satisfaction to his own conscience as well, Dr. Koussevitzky is repeating a number of modern works that seem worth further hearing. Under consideration stand Concerto for Orchestra, by Bartók; "Peter Grimes" excerpts, by Britten; Symphony No. 3, by William Schuman; "Mathis der Mahler" Symphony, by Hindemith; Symphony No. 4, by Roussel; and Symphony No. 6, by Shostakovitch. Assured are Mahler's No. 4 (Walter conducting); and Mahler's No. 7, Stravinsky's "Sacre," and Hindemith's Violin Concerto (Bernstein conducting). Further, Bach's B minor Mass returns; also Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with Jascha Veissi in the solo viola part.

Anniversary dates are seized upon for what popular interest they may excite; in which category fall revivals of Symphonies No. 8 and 9 by Bruckner, and titles from the Brahms catalogue, including the Concerto for Violin and Violoncello. The biographical dictionary, however, need not be called upon in behalf of the one master as long as the Bruckner Society thrives; nor in behalf of the other anyway, since every Boston Symphony season of the past 50 years and longer has been more or less a Brahms celebration.

---

would necessitate listing nearly everyone in the cast. The ensemble is close to being flawless. Each role is a full-bodied theater creation.

And yet, when one has suggested its manifold accomplishments of craft and technique, there seems to be little to say about the play as a comment on life or about the characters as people. Out of the depths, out of cynicism, irony, and sensitive pessimism, Mr. O'Neill seems to be crying a hollow cry. He has, as it were, succumbed to some of the false pity against which Hickey inveighs.

One cannot quarrel with Mr. O'Neill for choosing to show the frustration, the self-deception, and the decay of society—if that is what he is doing—by examining its dregs. But in the course of its extensive character studies and grotesqueries, "The Iceman Cometh" never seems to establish a sufficiently firm connection between the sodden alcoholics of the passing story and the better days at least some of them have seen. The play is often sad, sometimes comic, but never truly tragic.

Because of his skill, Mr. O'Neill does not permit the spectator's attention to lag very often or for very long. But it seemed doubtful that the audience at the Martin Beck was often finding itself genuinely moved by the depressing spectacle on the stage. If he had chosen, Mr. O'Neill might have contrived a sharper, harder, and more concentrated drama by lopping off the equivalent of about an act. The business would not have been any less grim, drab, or dreary by being somewhat curtailed. As it is, he insists that we hear out all the variations of his fairly montonous theme to their harsh and bitter conclusion.

MUSIC

Nov 23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

An oddly-assorted but highly interesting program was that in which Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It began with Haydn of the C minor Symphony, No. 95 (the so-called "London" Symphony), and continued with Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements; "Le Tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

This Symphony of Haydn is comparatively rare these days. It was last performed in these Boston Symphony series in 1943, and before that, in 1916. It is late and great Haydn, almost Beethovenesque in the way it is put together and the way it sounds: more personal than some earlier Haydn and a good deal more fanciful. Yesterday's performance was admirably clear, balanced and appropriate in style, without fussing over details or exaggeration of any sort. Like the Stravinsky which followed, it was an example of orchestral forthrightness and interpretive simplicity.

There are those who delight in finding a comparison between the modest music of the 18th Century and the brightness, the 'bite" and casual manner of the later Stravinsky. The latter's Symphony in Three Movements, introduced here by the composer last February, is certainly bright and full of "bite." But is also musicians' "head" music and decidedly abstract, dry as a bone and not in the least emotional.

This work is far from negligible as a reflection of the modern composer's craft in spinning lively rhythms, brittle patterns of tone, with unobtrusive emphasis upon repeated notes, and upon shrewdly calculated dissonance. But what, when it is all over, has it amounted to as an expression of art or feeling? So far as this minority is concerned: Nothing, with an upper-case N. And somehow, it does suggest to me an afternoon at the dentist's.

With the greatest admiration for Mr. Burgin's considerable gifts as conductor, I venture to say that "Le Tombeau de Couperin" is not now his proper dish. This dainty and artificial evocation of a past time in music, was not so clearly articulated as it ought to have been, and it was on the heavy side. This music needs super-super interpretation from a virtuoso of the baton; it must be light as a souffiee, pungent as old but slightly coarse brandy, and at the same time it ought to have a subtle quality of polished irony. None of these attributes was present yesterday.

Apart from certain details of tempo, in the repeated statement of that "how dry I am" theme, the Strauss tone poem was eloquent and rich of tone.

Koussevitzky Tells U. N. Boston Is 'Truly Unique'

Boston's deep-rooted culture, refinement, good will and hospitality make it a "truly unique city," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told the U. N. site subcommittee at the state dinner in the Harvard Club last night. The full text of Dr. Koussevitzky's address follows:

You may know that I am a musician, and as a musician I may, perhaps, speak freely, carried away by enthusiasm. If there is one thing I have not learned in Boston, it is to moderate my temperament to match the over-modesty of my fellow Bostonians.

As a musician, I have always searched for harmony, not only in music but also in life. Before I came to Boston, I felt a "wanderer" upon this earth. I lived in Russia, then in France, traveled in England and all the countries of the continent. In 1924, I was invited to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I expected to remain two, three or five years at the most, yet stayed 23 years instead. More than that, I feel a Bostonian at heart.

Why should this happen to one who considered himself a "wanderer"? It is because I found deep satisfaction in my life and work here. As Plato said: "Human life is in need of harmony and dignity." This I found in Boston in the fullest measure.

Boston, indeed, is a center of culture. Not by mere accident do we have the great, three-century-old Harvard University, the world-famous Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston University and a number of outstanding colleges and institutions, of which we are justly proud. The brilliant minds in the field of science, philosophy and the arts, gathered in- and around Boston, tend to enrich and ennoble life.

These factors, combined with the refinement, good will, and hospitality of those born and bred here, make of Boston a truly unique city.

I cannot pass by in silence the principal factor in my own life—my work and association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Let me not be modest at this point and say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is considered the greatest orchestra in the world today. . . . To attain its present position, the orchestra needed the right soil, the right atmosphere, the right environment. All this, we owe to Boston and its deep-rooted culture.

It is a great privilege to greet our distinguished guests tonight.

It is also a great happiness to me to speak of Boston, and to voice my belief that the momentous task of the United Nations can be fruitfully carried on in the atmosphere of serenity, beauty and culture in a site blessed with "harmony and dignity."

Koussevitzky on Boston

(These remarks were made to the visiting United Nations delegates at the Harvard Club of Boston dinner.)

"You may know that I am a musician, and as a musician I may, perhaps, speak freely, carried away by enthusiasm. If there is one thing I have not learned in Boston, it is to moderate my temperament to match the over-modesty of my fellow Bostonians.

"As a musician, I have always searched for harmony, not only in music but also in life. Before I came to Boston, I felt a 'wanderer' upon this earth. I lived in Russia, then in France, travelled in England and all the countries of the continent. In 1924, I was invited to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I expected to remain two, three or five years at the most, yet stayed 23 years instead. More than that, I feel a Bostonian at heart!

"Why should this happen to one who considered himself a 'wanderer?' It is because I found deep satisfaction in my life and work here. As Plato said: 'Human life is in need of harmony and dignity.' This I found in Boston in the fullest measure.

"Boston, indeed, is a center of culture. Not by mere accident do we have the great three-century-old Harvard University, the world-famous Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston University and a number of outstanding colleges and institutions, of which we are justly proud. The brilliant minds in the field of science, philosophy and the arts, gathered in and around Boston, tend to enrich and ennoble life.

"These factors, combined with the refinement, good will and hospitality of those born and bred here, make of Boston a truly unique city.

"I cannot pass by in silence the principal factor in my own life—my work and association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Let me not be modest at this point and say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is considered the greatest orchestra in the world today. . . . To attain its present position, the orchestra needed the right soil, the right atmosphere, the right environment. All this, we owe to Boston and its deep-rooted culture.

"It is a great happiness to me to speak of Boston, and to voice my belief that that the momentous task of the United Nations can be fruitfully carried on in the atmosphere of serenity, beauty and culture in a site blessed with 'harmony and dignity.'"

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1946

[26]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 27 1946

A BROADCAST . . . PERHAPS!

—PHOTOS BY H. RAYMOND BALL

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the first broadcast by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from here. Single boom mike suffices.

Morton Blender, of Columbia's WPRO, lends rival ABC a boom to save day when cable suspending two microphones breaks. On piano, taping wire, is ABC engineer Harold "Soupy" Campbell.

A tense moment. Producer Oliver Daniel (left) and Campbell huddle in hallway with loudspeaker, wondering whether, after several vexations, the program is or is not going to be broadcast.

Mikes Dropped All Over the Place and the Boys Were Mighty Worried at First Symphony Concert

ABOUT 2 o'clock in the afternoon "Soupy" Campbell, ABC engineer, arrived at Metropolitan Theater to set up the microphones and other apparatus. The broadcast, the first by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Providence, was to be at 9:30 in the evening. There seemed to be plenty of time, and there was no reason for "Soupy" to think that he would have any more difficulty than he had had on scores of similar jobs, except that, owing to the trucking strike, it had been impossible to bring the portable soundproof booth from New York; the broadcasters would have to work in the open, just offstage at the right.

After he had opened his seven boxes of equipment, "Soupy" directed stagehands in stringing a thin, strong cable across the theater about a dozen feet out from the footlights. This was to carry, with additional bracing, the two ribbon microphones that would pick up the orchestra. Hardly had the mikes been raised when the cable broke and the delicate instruments plunged among the empty seats. Probably the mikes were now useless, and there was only one other, for the announcer.

Somebody remembered that the CBS station upstairs, WPRO, had a boom mike stand. Morton Blender gladly agreed to lend it to the rival network and helped to set it up in the orchestra pit. Meanwhile, Oliver Daniel, producer of the symphony broadcast, came in; he thought it would be safer to charter a plane and have another mike flown from New York, the nearest place to obtain the particular kind, than to depend on the announcer's mike. The boom stand was set up, however, and everything looked secure, so he canceled the order for the plane. Other equipment was arranged on tables in the wings. Matters seemed to be going well.

Then the boom arm dropped, smashing the microphone against the stage and probably breaking it. That left no dependable mike and no time to obtain another, with WFCI and 215 other stations in this country and Canada prepared to broadcast the program and millions expecting to hear it. "Soupy," Daniel, and Gene Hamilton, the announcer, decided they'd have to take a chance that the microphones would work. One of the original ones was attached to the boom and the other was set up for Hamilton. There would be no opportunity to give them a test, or even test the correctness of the boom mike's position, until the orchestra arrived. If the mike didn't work, there would be no symphony program outside the theater.

Daniel, having nothing else to do for the moment but sweat, explained some of the ordinary problems of his calling. He is a skilled musician, having been a concert pianist and teacher before he entered radio.

"The human ear," he said, "is sensitive to sounds too faint for the microphone, and it will also tolerate sounds so loud that they would shatter the microphone. 'Soupy', at the amplifier, builds up the low sounds and reduces the loud ones. I sit by with a score to direct him when to do this and when to make adjustments for a crescendo, let's say, so that the radio listener will get the crescendo effect even though we can't take the top volume of the orchestra."

When it was suggested that the listener received a sort of producer's interpretation of the conductor's interpretation, he smilingly denied it.

"WHAT we try to give the listener is what the conductor himself hears," he remarked, and in this connection explained that a change of one inch in the angle of the microphone produces a decided change in what it picks up, and that certain instruments, such as horns and harps, are difficult to bring out. The difficulty is often overcome by slightly rearranging the orchestra to put an instrument melodically important in a certain score nearer the mike. No mikes are placed in the orchestra.

It was now about 6 o'clock, so the broadcasters went out to fortify themselves against what might be a harrowing night. By half-past 7, harp and cello trunks were being unloaded backstage and the musicians were tuning up, talking, strolling, glancing at the apparatus that was to send their music to persons on the plains and prairies, in the mountains, on the seas—perhaps. Dr. Koussevitzky came in. The theater was filling.

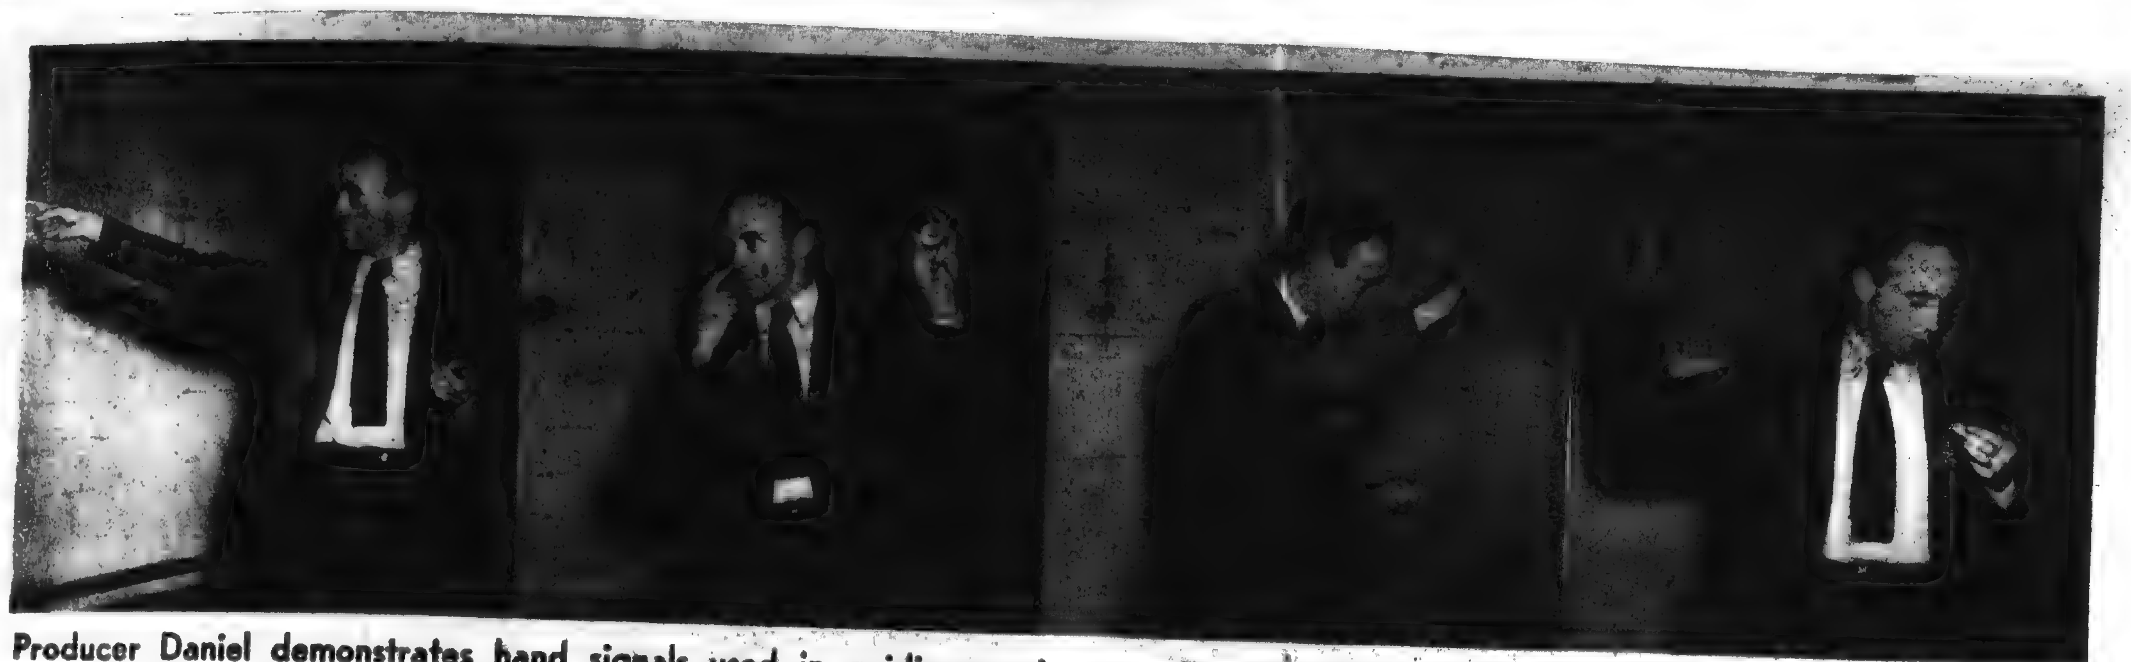
As soon as the Brahms third was started, Daniel and "Soupy" hastened out to a loudspeaker set up in a hallway. The microphone was working! It was even adjusted at the best angle.

At intermission some of the cellos began to complain because the radio folks had to keep the door onto the stage open. The cellos alleged draughts on the back, but finally they were pacified, though an aroused cello is no laughing matter.

At 9:30, Hamilton (one-time boxer, singer, and leading citizen of Lower Basin Street) addressed his microphone with cultivated ease:

"Good evening. This is Gene Hamilton speaking from Metropolitan Theater in Providence, Rhode Island."

Nobody would have suspected that putting on a broadcast was not the most carefree business in the world.



Producer Daniel demonstrates hand signals used in guiding engineer and announcer. From the left: "Begin," "On the nose," meaning that program is proceeding strictly according to time schedule, "Fade out applause," and "Give good old ABC a plug."

Announcer Hamilton, Dr. Koussevitzky, Daniel confer backstage.

Men (Campbell, Daniel, Hamilton) at work on national h

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There is something for nearly every taste in this week's Symphony program and in its first hearing yesterday afternoon everything was served up in capital style by Assistant Conductor Richard Burgin. There was a classical symphony, Haydn's No. 95 in C minor, one of his best, but not one of the most familiar. After it came a modern symphony, that of Stravinsky in three movements, introduced here last February by the composer himself. The delightful orchestral set of four that Ravel made from his piano suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," led off the second half of the concert, and Richard Strauss' youthful but still potent tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," brought it to a dramatic close.

This performance of "Death and Transfiguration" was on the whole the most satisfactory we have heard in some time. In his endeavor to underscore the pathos of the beginning and the exaltation of the close, Dr. Koussevitzky of late years has been taking both sections far too slowly. Mr. Burgin permitted nothing to drag, but in the general excitement he once or twice let both tone and tempo get out of hand.

Anyway, the audience rose to Strauss, and rather unpredictably it made quite a fuss over Stravinsky. The cynical might say that this was relief at matters having finally come to an end, or possibly commendation for conductor and orchestra, who have some hard rhythmic nuts to crack. Unless you are completely allergic to modern music, you are bound to find Stravinsky's Allegro interesting and even gripping at times, while the Andante, except for a rather dreary middle section, is light, deft and frankly pleasing. The final Con moto comes as close to pure abstraction as any music can.

Two members of the orchestra were made to take bows yesterday, Jean Bedetti for his 'cello solo in the delicious trio of Haydn's Minuet, and the new first oboe, John Holmes, for his solo in the Rigaudon of Ravel. The latter also did nobly in the important passages assigned to him in Strauss' tone poem.

League Fetes Koussevitzky Next January

Will Also Honor Milhaud, Kodaly in Its Concerts in Modern Art Museum

Zolton Kodaly, Darius Milhaud and Serge Koussevitsky will be honored in three concerts to be given by the League of Composers this season at the Museum of Modern Art. The first of these, Sunday evening, Dec. 1, will be devoted to works of the Hungarian composer, Kodaly, now here on a visit, who will also be guest speaker at this event, discussing the subject of "how to popularize serious music." On Dec. 29, Mr. Milhaud will direct United States premieres of his music and will also speak.

The fifth anniversary of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation will be marked on Jan. 12 with a program of American works that it has commissioned during its existence. The concert will be followed by a reception in honor of Dr. Koussevitsky at the Museum.

Events to be sanctioned by the League include a program of contemporary works for violin and piano to be given by Jacques de Menasce, composer-pianist, and Angel Reyes, violinist, and, on another occasion, the premiere of a new piano work by Roger Sessions, to be performed by Andor Foldes. There will also be local programs of chamber music by young Americans.

A work that the League of Composers commissioned Lukas Foss to write for Ellabelle Davis, soprano, is scheduled for its world premiere by the Boston Symphonv in Boston on March 7. This is part of the League's national expansion program which is now being pursued by members of the national composers committee of which Aaron Copland is chairman. This program includes among its projects the setting up of an educational division. Randall Thompson is now engaged in considering the educational outlets for League activities.

"Modern Music," the League's quarterly publication, is again included among the organizations activities.

Dame Myra Hess With Symphony

Given Ovation in Beethoven Concerto

By L. A. Sloper

Debussy and Beethoven provide the music for this week's subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first of which was given yesterday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky had made the following selections: "Nuages," "Fêtes," and "La Mer"; the Fourth Piano Concerto in G major and the "Egmont" Overture. Dame Myra Hess is the soloist.

Dr. Koussevitzky has a partiality for the music of Debussy These two Nocturnes and "La Mer" are favorites of his, and he is famous for his interpretations of them. He has played them often, the last time only three years ago.

The performances yesterday were admirable as demonstrations of orchestral virtuosity. The tone was superb, the colors resplendent. But was not the maestro's left hand a shade heavy? The poetry might be more compelling if the dynamic contrasts were less sudden and less extreme. Perhaps these pieces need to be laid on the shelf for a while, and then restudied.

The Debussy items had a big popular success, but the event of the day, of course, for artistic as well as news value, was the appearance as soloist of Dame Myra Hess after an absence of more than seven years. The Friday Symphony audience, like that of her recent recital, rose in her honor when she entered, and gave her an ovation when she had finished playing.

This reception was well deserved, for her performance was marked by power and depth as well as by charm and delicacy. Her tone was limpid, her phrasing fluent, and her imaginative recreation vivid. Dr. Koussevitzky

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Fresh—and not so fresh—from a Western trip of unusual length and, apparently, of unprecedented artistic and popular success, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra yesterday afternoon gave the first of the ninth pair of "regular" Symphony concerts. Under the circumstances a program of novel or unfamiliar music was out of the question. Possibly because he thought that we could not get it the first time, the conductor gave us another chance at the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland, which he introduced to the world last October. Gregor Piatigorsky was again soloist in the little Concerto of Haydn, and the remaining numbers, repeated from last spring, were Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger."

The first performance of the Copland Symphony found press and public divided. This reviewer spoke for the opposition and a rehearing of the work did not cause him to regard it with any more favor. As before, the two slow movements seemed decidedly on the meagre side and the two fast ones anything but distinguished, though because there is more going on they are easier to listen to. The noisily empty conclusion is of a nature to incite an audience to applause and again there was a considerable show of enthusiasm at the end. The Symphony as a whole leans heavily on Mr. Copland's previous music and there are suggestions of other composers. My personal feeling is that his inventive powers are not up to filling successfully a canvas of these dimensions. As pure sound the Symphony is not always agreeable. Violins and trumpets are kept over-long in the high register and there is a rather too liberal use of percussion instruments.

One would rather have heard the gigantic Mr. Piatigorsky in a concerto a little nearer his size—referring to his musical, not his physical stature. That he gave this amiable 18th century trifle the benefit of a superior performance of the solo part goes without saying. Dr. Koussevitzky's Wagner may sound well, but somehow it doesn't always sound just like Wagner. Having got all shrilled up in the Copland, the trumpets couldn't get unshrilled again and they lent an un-Wagnerian blare to the climaxes of the two Preludes.

KOUSSEVITZKY'S JEWISH DILEMMA

By BERNARD LERNER

THE dynamic figure of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has dominated the world of music for more than three decades. In three great capitals—In Moscow up to the time of the Revolution; in Paris, shortly after World War I; in Boston, after 1924—he has been virtually a legendary figure. But besides being one of the great musical interpreters of our generation, Koussevitzky has also been a force of inestimable importance in the music of our times. As a conductor, as a publisher, and as founder of the Koussevitzky Foundation, he has been the passionate protagonist of the modern composer, and has done more to bring recognition to the music of our times than any other single musician. As the founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center he has brought about the existence of one of the most progressive centers of music culture in the world. In short, Koussevitzky has not only made music history; he is an inextricable part of music history.

For a long time Koussevitzky's racial origins and ellegiances have been obfuscated by contradictory rumors, which Koussevitzky himself did little to dispel. Now, at last, these rumors are dissipated by facts, facts which the well-known music critic of Boston, Moses Smith, has assembled in his informal biography of Koussevitzky to be published on January 20, 1946, by Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc. These facts not only highlight Koussevitzky's Jewish origin, but show dramatically how, after having denied his race for many years, Koussevitzky has suddenly repented.

Koussevitzky's father, Alexander, was a klesmer musician, a common type of Jewish musician in old Russia. Explains Mr. Smith: "Klesmers played at weddings and social parties, at amusement parks where a small circus troupe might be visiting. They were a varied class, in proficiency as well as duties. Many of them worked in small cooperative groups, twelve to fifteen constituting a large orchestra. Their remuneration was slight and their financial position insecure. Yet a klesmer could be identified in a community of Jews because he was always cleanly dressed in a European suit. He had a cultured air. He taught his profession to apprentices, as he had himself been taught by a master. For the klesmer usually had some theoretical training; he was virtually an outcast among his colleagues if he did not play from notes."

Serge Koussevitzky, as a child, was brought up in a home where "the parental discipline was severe. It was necessarily strict in the matter of religious practices, for Alexander Koussevitzky insisted upon his children's rigid observance of Orthodox Judaism. This demanded regular, frequent, and what must have been for young Serge wearisome attendance at religious services. In later life and in the presence of an intimate he has occasionally referred to his boyhood attendance to chedar. . . . He has also alluded to the fact that as a boy he used to wear a skull-cap at meals."

Shortly before his first marriage, Koussevitzky was converted to the Christian faith, and therefore, for many years he vigorously denied (at least publicly) that he was Jewish. However, the rise of Hitler in 1933 stirred Koussevitzky profoundly and awakened in him feelings that had for so long been asleep. One evening, in Boston, he went to an anti-Nazi meeting at which Rabbi Stephen S. Wise was the principal speaker. The speech made a profound impression on Koussevitzky, who suddenly felt that he could no longer deny to himself—and to the world—that he was a Jew, too. At another meeting in which Wise was the principal speaker, Koussevitzky generously contributed his services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the first time that Koussevitzky had openly allied himself with a Jewish cause.

Moses Smith reveals that at one concert, in which Koussevitzky directed a Hebraic work by Ernest Bloch, he was accosted by one of his great admirers who congratulated him on his magnificent performance. "Why should I not play the work well," Koussevitzky asked, "since my own Jewish blood responds so personally to Bloch's message?"

Since then Koussevitzky has made it a point to identify himself wherever possible with the Jewish race, although he has not returned to the Jewish faith.

* * *

Some remarks are in order about Allen, Towne, and Heath, publishers of the book on Koussevitzky. It is a new publishing house, devoted exclusively to the publication of books on music for the layman—the first project of its kind anywhere—has just been launched.

* * *

The guiding principle of the new firm is "to provide sound, authoritative, non-technical books in all branches of music—books which will not only be informative but entertaining as well, and its list embraces a wide range of books on popular music as well as serious: biographies, histories and reference works; anthologies of all kinds; juvenile literature; even fiction, when good musical fiction is available."

Its director, David Ewen, requires little introduction, for he has been during the past two decades one of the best known and most widely read writers on music in this country. He has written more than fifteen books which have been translated into foreign languages, and reprinted into the Armed Services Editions.

Mr. Ewen's writings on music have been widely praised by famous musicians everywhere, including Deems Taylor, Walter Damrosch, Sigmund Spaeth, Howard Hanson, Eugene Ormandy, John Erskin, and many, many others. Indeed, he has become — as one critic said — "music's interpreter to the American people."

The Koussevitzky biography will be the first book to be published by Allen, Towne & Heath.

Books to be published subsequently include Music Comes to America, by David Ewen (February); Horn of Plenty: The Story of Louis Armstrong; Robert Goddin (March); Verdi: A Novel of the Opera, by Franz Werfel (April); The Columbia Book of Musical Masterworks, edited by Goddard Lieberson (May).

MUSIC

"The Marriage Of Figaro"

"The Marriage of Figaro," an opera in four acts by Mozart, libretto by Lorenzo de Ponte after the comedy by Beaumarchais, presented in English in Jordan Hall by the New England Opera Theater, Boris Goldovsky director, scenery designed by Richard Rychtarik, costumes by Van Horn & Son of Philadelphia, with the following cast:

Count Almaviva............Robert Gay
Countess Almaviva........Phyllis Curtin
Figaro, the Count's Valet.Francis Bernard
Susanna, the Countess' maid
Margaret Goldovsky
Cherubino, page.........Mildred Mueller
Bartolo ....Matthew Lockhart
Marcellina, housekeeper...Eunice Alberts
Don Basilio, music teacher and Count's Secretary
Don Curzio, judge........Luigi Vellucci
Antonio, the gardener; also Susanna's uncle ....Ernest Eames
Barbarina, Antonio's daughter
Marilyn Shotz

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The New England Opera Theater, as we had all profoundly hoped, got off to an auspicious start last night with an animated performance of Mozart's "Figaro." Mr. Goldovsky had promised beforehand good theater and a full measure of music. He did not promise the moon in voices or scenery. But with the former we heard at the least well-trained youthful competence and at the best a charming projection of some of Mozart's loveliest arias. The set was one of those stylized affairs that did duty for the various scenic requirements of all four acts. As the company establishes itself we shall undoubtedly get an improvemnet along these lines. And in this connection we did get fresh and attractive costumes.

The main thing is that Mr. Goldovsky's venture has proved its worth. Boston has in the past been frightened by so many inferior and half-baked operatic experimnets or touring troupes that it was well to show the public right off the bat that the New England Opera Theater could set a high musical and theatrical standard. The main credi tfor this goes, of course, to Mr. Goldovsky in person. He had an admirable orchestra of the size that Mozart himself employed in Prague. And Jordan Hall is about the same size as the opera house in that city. There was no question at any time of not hearing clearly the words of the recitatives or the detials of the orchestration.

In so complicated a plot as "Figaro" the advantage of singing it in English that can be understood in every part of the hall is obvious. I have heard the Sadler's Wells company do it in London and the results in Prof. Dent's excellent translation were absolutely satisfactory. I don't think that Mr. Goldovsky will have to fight the "opera in English" battle.

Theatrically the opera moved at a delightful pace last night. In fact the recitatives took on a new meaning as Mr. Goldovsky had trained his singers to give them. And the arias fitted into their place with complete naturalness. Vocally the best performances were Robert Gay's Count, Francis Barnard's Figaro and Mildred Mueller's Cherubino. Miss Curtin was a little too nervous as the Countess, though she did not do too badly with her big aria in the third act. Miss Goldovsky as Susanna was a little uneven, but at her best she gave a vivacious and musically pleasing account of the part.

This production of "Figaro" will be repeated this afternoon. In view of its success there is every reason to give it again in the near future, as the house was sold out last night and is also sold for the matinee today.

Symphony Concert

The 7th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor No. 95.....Haydn
Symphony in Three Movements
Stravinsky
"Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite ....Ravel
"Death and Transfiguration," Tone Poem, Op. 24..........Strauss

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

This concert was beautifully presented yesterday by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra and contained a wide variety of music to suit all tastes. The Haydn Symphony is one of the tersest of his later works. Sir Donald Tovey has it that when Haydn wrote a work in the minor mode he made it shorter and more formal. Yet for all that this C minor Symphony is no dry expression of the classical style. It is full of choice things and interesting developments. One of the most charming features is the lovely cello solo in the trio of the scherzo. The Symphony is certainly one to be welcomed back into the repertoire with open arms.

Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements struck me yesterday as a much more impressive and eloquent work than it did when the composer conducted it last winter. I think actually Mr. Burgin gave it a much more graceful and rhythmical performance. Stravinsky's interpretations of his own music are apt, though not invariably, to be dry and precise and angular. At any rate, the form of the Symphony, which is most unusual, became clearer to me. The music came to life as expressive sound. Before I went to the concert I had it in the back of my mind to state the wish that something else of Stravinsky's had been revived instead ,but now I am glad that Mr. Burgin has awakened and renewed an interest in a remarkable work.

Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" Suite is a perpetual delight as performed by the Boston Symphony. The perfection of its orchestration and the charm of its wryly archaic character do not pall as the years proceed. By contrast Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" sounded as heavy as lead. Yet there are glowing and imaginative pages in the tone poem. Only the long saccharine conclusion really arouses me to revolt.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns to conduct Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov. Also the Brazilian composer, Camargo Guarnieri, will conduct the first performance of his Symphony.

Symphony Concert

Monitor

Burgin's Program Ranges From Haydn to Stravinsky

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin is conducting the Boston Symphony concerts of this week. For the seventh program of the season he has chosen Haydn's Symphony in C minor, No. 95, Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." The Ravel was substituted for the Mozart Adagio for strings first announced.

Variety here to suit many tastes, and each work delivered yesterday afternoon with precision, balance and the proper style. Mr. Burgin is in command of his music and his orchestra, and he secured excellent performances, except for a single violin which got out of line for an instant in the Finale of the Stravinsky symphony.

The revival of the Haydn Symphony in C minor was welcome. Mr. Burgin himself disinterred it three years ago from the library shelf where it had lain since Dr. Muck's time. It is a delightful work, full of the master's inspiration, ingenuity and high spirits. Mr. Bedetti again played the solo in the Trio of the Minuet delectably, and was called on for a special bow.

Our new first oboist, Mr. Holmes, was also called to his feet in recognition of his playing of the solo passage in Ravel's Rigaudon. Mr. Holmes has been carrying on unobtrusively since the beginning of the season, but this is the first time an occasion has arisen to bring him to public attention. He has a pure tone, a good feeling for rhythm, and he phrases lyrically.

The Stravinsky Symphony in Three Movements was introduced to us under the direction of its composer last season. This is the symphony which, according to Ingolf Dahl, who seems to be its official spokesman, represents the exact opposite of traditional symphonic form, being made up of "blocks" or "planes" of sound, and constituting a musical "Guernica." And the composer himself, of course, avers that the work has no program. Thus it appears that the symphony is neither a symphony nor a symphonic poem, but a musical painting, with no story to tell.

But these are words, and it is interesting to reflect that Haydn, for example, did not find it necessary to issue a manifesto with each new composition. Nor did Bach or Mozart or Beethoven or Brahms. But Wagner did. Is there some esoteric significance in that?

Whether it has a program or not, it is difficult to listen to this symphony of Stravinsky's without imagining a ballet to accompany it. It is of the same essence as "Pétroushka" and the "Rite of Spring," as dancical as can be. Could not Léonide Massine be persuaded to invent some choregraphy for this score, instead of molesting any more of the symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, which, being real symphonies, do not need his aid? He might turn out something as good balletically as "Nobilissima Visione," even if the music should seem to be less novel than Hindemith's.

The Ravel was played with an elegant charm, and the Strauss with the utmost in tonal glory and eloquence.

Laura Coombs Hills

Pastels of flowers by Laura Coombs Hills will be on exhibition at the Guild of Boston Artists to Nov. 30. There are included 20 new drawings made last summer by this artist.

Miss Hills has been known and loved for many years. She has won recognition, honors, prizes for many decades. She has worked tirelessly and independently in the world of art. Her pictures have continued to attract us and hold our interest because they are made so skillfully and in such good taste.

These flowers bloom before our eyes because they have been visualized faithfully and understandingly. Never has Miss Hills indicated weariness or boredom; never has she represented her theme as though it had become a stock and standard performance. The blossoms brighten under her touch: they are fresh and fragrant, graceful and elegant. Miss Hills treats them affectionately and arranges them thoughtfully in pottery or copper as the relationship of color and texture and weight seems happiest. Often a single bloom languishes in a little vase in solitary distinction.

Among her floral studies shown currently are: pink camellia, syringa, petunias, poppies, Harrison roses, apple blossoms, Briar Cliff rose, yellow freezia, tulips, larkspur, and lilies. One flower mixture is tellingly entitled "Florist's Flowers."

D. A.

Concerts AT THE INSTITUTE

Koussevitzky's 23rd Season

On Friday evening, November 15, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the Institute to present the first of the five concerts scheduled for the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In his twenty-third successive year as conductor of the orchestra, as in every previous one, he will bring before the public the great works of musical literature, illuminated as always by his "incandescent performances" and those of the "best-sounding, best balanced, integrated, and coordinated symphonic group in the country."

His sponsorship of new and unfamiliar works will again be evident in the music announced for performance this season in Boston, some of which will undoubtedly be reflected in the Brooklyn programs. There will be new symphonies by Camargo Guarnieri, Darius Milhaud, and the brilliant young French composer, Olivier Messiaen. Works by native composers will include symphonies by Aaron Copland and Walter Piston, and shorter compositions by Lukas Foss and Roy Harris.

It is a source of immense satisfaction to share with Dr. Koussevitzky his joy in resuming this past summer his directorship of the annual festival at the Berkshire Music Center, which had been interrupted by the war. Although frequently compared with the festival at Salzburg, it differs in that the one is traditional, exalting masters of the past, whereas the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of our national culture and is creative in purpose.

Lotte Neustein

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Closely associated with it is the Music School which, together with the festival, has in large part realized the dearest hope of the conductor, the hope of a creative musical center "where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. The most eminent thinkers and scholars will lecture there. A free cooperation of such an élite will certainly result in a creation of new and great values of art; in the radiation of the beams of culture over a nation and over the whole world; and finally, in the education and training of a new generation of American artists."

Festival of "Hebraica"

"Hebraica," a colorful festival of Jewish music and dance, panoramic in scope and spectacular in execution, will usher in this season's series of Concert and Dance Varieties on Tuesday evening, November 19.

Max Helfman, distinguished musicologist, director of the program as well as of the participating choruses, has called upon noted concert soloists and ensembles to recapitulate the stirring musical customs and rich folklore of Jews throughout their troubled and eventful history.

Among the soloists featured in the program will be Abraham Shapiro, tenor, cantor of Temple Bnai Abraham in Newark, Katya Delakova and Fred Berk, dancers, Jerome Rappaport, pianist, and Harold Freeman clarinetist. Ensembles will include eighty members of the People's Philharmonic Choral Society of New York, the Temple Singers, the Hebrew Arts Youth Chorale, the Stuyvesant String Quartet, and the Hebrew Arts Dance Company.

The pageant will comprise three scenes and two episodes. The first scene will open with the Temple Singers who, with Cantor Shapiro, will present music of the synagogue ranging from the early traditional liturgy to the contemporary "Hashkivenu" by the brilliant young conductor-composer, Leonard Bernstein.

BOSTON HERALD, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30,

Pops Opening Certain Sign Spring Has Come to Boston

By ALISON ARNOLD

IN SPITE of cold winds and near-zero temperatures, spring has come to Boston. For the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall began their 62nd season last night and with the blossoming magnolia trees and the swanboats, they are unfailing signs of spring.

The perennial pale salmon gladioli were banked around the front of the stage with lemon yellow added this year, but the familiar lattice at the back of the stage was absent. Gilt chairs were clustered closely about the small tables on the floor and waitresses in trim gray uniforms dispensed light refreshments.

It seemed as if hot coffee should have taken the place of the tall pitchers of Pops punch last evening, but the traditional punch was much in evidence, along with mounds of ice-cream topped with cherries or strawberries. And the music was punctuated with the occapopping of corks.

THE PROGRAM, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, included a wide variety of offerings, which ranged from Wagner's Tannhauser overture to the popular "Open the Door, Richard," which caused such an ovation that there was an encore. Another favorite was "Old MacDonald Had a Farm" and the audience seemed delighted to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra quacking, grunting, squealing and chirping.

The New England Grenfell Association benefited from this opening performance and pretty debutante flower vendors in gay printed frocks, headed by Miss Jane Kennard, sold fragrant gardenias and cakes of maple sugar. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, chairman of the benefit committee, was on hand, wearing a springlike print of black and white with touches of green.

Attending together were Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Bradley and their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Sluder. With Mrs. Edward Harding was her youngest daughter, Josephine; Mrs. Robert C. Terry and Mrs. James R. Carter, 2d, arrived together, and in a foursome were Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Bowditch and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Bowers.

AMONG OTHERS in the large audience were Mr. and Mrs. John Perrin, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert King, Miss Gertrude Peabody, Mr. and Mrs. Albert P. Gould, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Keller, Mr. Edward C. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus W. Soule and their son, Mr. Winsor Soule, 2d, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Toppan, Mrs. Parker Hayden, Mrs. Gardiner Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout, Mr. Henry C. Everett and his daughter, Miss Claire Everett; Mrs. Lea S. Luquer, Dr. and Mrs. Lendon Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Henderson, Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. Harold Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bainbridge, Mrs. Morris LaCroix, Mr. and Mrs. Powell Robinson, Jr., and the latter's younger brother, Mr. Graves Hewitt; Mrs. John Alles and her daughter, Miss Jane Alles; Miss Barbara Shaw, Mrs. Fred B. Lund, and Mrs. Margaret Lane and her son, Mr. Thomas Lane, and her daughter, Miss Jean Harriet Lane

Concerts
AT THE INSTITUTE

Koussevitzky's 23rd Season

On Friday evening, November 15, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the Institute to present the first of the five concerts scheduled for the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In his twenty-third successive year as conductor of the orchestra, as in every previous one, he will bring before the public the great works of musical literature, illuminated as always by his "incandescent performances" and those of the "best-sounding, best balanced, integrated, and coordinated symphonic group in the country."

His sponsorship of new and unfamiliar works will again be evident in the music announced for performance this season in Boston, some of which will undoubtedly be reflected in the Brooklyn programs. There will be new symphonies by Camargo Guarnieri, Darius Milhaud, and the brilliant young French composer, Olivier Messiaen. Works by native composers will include symphonies by Aaron Copland and Walter Piston, and shorter compositions by Lukas Foss and Roy Harris.

It is a source of immense satisfaction to share with Dr. Koussevitzky his joy in resuming this past summer his directorship of the annual festival at the Berkshire Music Center, which had been interrupted by the war. Although frequently compared with the festival at Salzburg, it differs in that the one is traditional, exalting masters of the past, whereas the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of our national culture and is creative in purpose.

Lotte Neustein

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Closely associated with it is the Music School which, together with the festival, has in large part realized the dearest hope of the conductor, the hope of a creative musical center "where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. The most eminent thinkers and scholars will lecture there. A free cooperation of such an élite will certainly result in a creation of new and great values of art; in the radiation of the beams of culture over a nation and over the whole world; and finally, in the education and training of a new generation of American artists."

Festival of "Hebraica"

"Hebraica," a colorful festival of Jewish music and dance, panoramic in scope and spectacular in execution, will usher in this season's series of Concert and Dance Varieties on Tuesday evening, November 19.

Max Helfman, distinguished musicologist, director of the program as well as of the participating choruses, has called upon noted concert soloists and ensembles to recapitulate the stirring musical customs and rich folklore of Jews throughout their troubled and eventful history.

Among the soloists featured in the program will be Abraham Shapiro, tenor, cantor of Temple Bnai Abraham in Newark, Katya Delakova and Fred Berk, dancers, Jerome Rappaport, pianist, and Harold Freeman clarinetist. Ensembles will include eighty members of the People's Philharmonic Choral Society of New York, the Temple Singers, the Hebrew Arts Youth Chorale, the Stuyvesant String Quartet, and the Hebrew Arts Dance Company.

The pageant will comprise three scenes and two episodes. The first scene will open with the Temple Singers who, with Cantor Shapiro, will present music of the synagogue ranging from the early traditional liturgy to the contemporary "Hashkivenu" by the brilliant young conductor-composer, Leonard Bernstein.

BOSTON HERALD, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30,

Pops Opening Certain Sign Spring Has Come to Boston

By ALISON ARNOLD

IN SPITE of cold winds and near-zero temperatures, spring has come to Boston. For the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall began their 62nd season last night and with the blossoming magnolia trees and the swanboats, they are unfailing signs of spring.

The perennial pale salmon gladioli were banked around the front of the stage with lemon yellow added this year, but the familiar lattice at the back of the stage was absent. Gilt chairs were clustered closely about the small tables on the floor and waitresses in trim gray uniforms dispensed light refreshments.

It seemed as if hot coffee should have taken the place of the tall pitchers of Pops punch last evening, but the traditional punch was much in evidence, along with mounds of ice-cream topped with cherries or strawberries. And the music was punctuated with the occapopping of corks.

THE PROGRAM, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, included a wide variety of offerings, which ranged from Wagner's Tannhauser overture to the popular "Open the Door, Richard," which caused such an ovation that there was an encore. Another favorite was "Old MacDonald Had a Farm" and the audience seemed delighted to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra quacking, grunting, squealing and chirping.

The New England Grenfell Association benefited from this opening performance and pretty debutante flower vendors in gay printed frocks, headed by Miss Jane Kennard, sold fragrant gardenias and cakes of maple sugar. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, chairman of the benefit committee, was on hand, wearing a springlike print of black and white with touches of green.

Attending together were Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Bradley and their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Sluder. With Mrs. Edward Harding was her youngest daughter, Josephine; Mrs. Robert C. Terry and Mrs. James R. Carter, 2d, arrived together, and in a foursome were Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Bowditch and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Bowers.

AMONG OTHERS in the large audience were Mr. and Mrs. John Perrin, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert King, Miss Gertrude Peabody, Mr. and Mrs. Albert P. Gould, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Keller, Mr. Edward C. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. Augustus W. Soule and their son, Mr. Winsor Soule, 2d, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Toppan, Mrs. Parker Hayden, Mrs. Gardiner Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Prout, Mr. Henry C. Everett and his daughter, Miss Clara Everett; Mrs. Lea S. Luquer, Dr. and Mrs. Lendon Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Henderson, Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. Harold Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bainbridge, Mrs. Morris LaCroix, Mr. and Mrs. Powell Robinson, Jr., and the latter's younger brother, Mr. Graves Hewitt; Mrs. John Alles and her daughter, Miss Jane Alles; Miss Barbara Shaw, Mrs. Fred B. Lund, and Mrs. Margaret Lane and her son, Mr. Thomas Lane, and her daughter, Miss [illegible] Lane

ROTO BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD ROTO

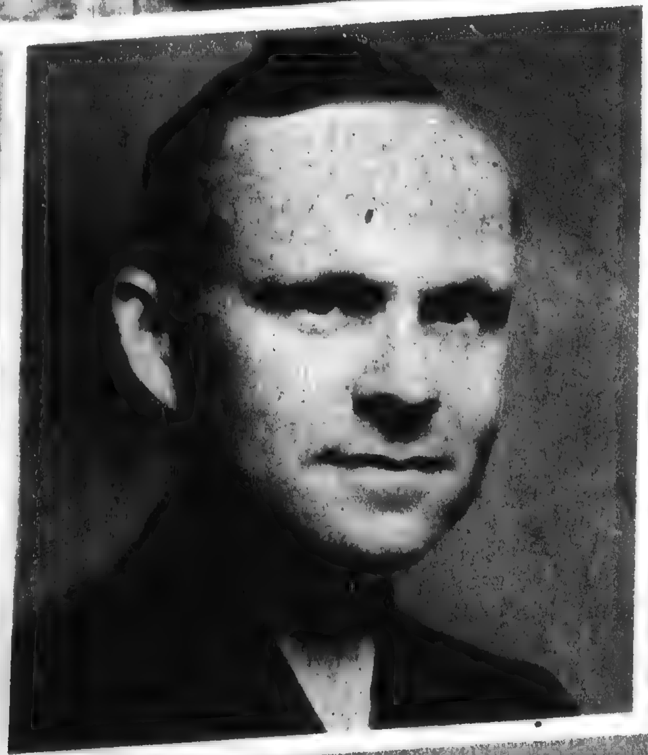
BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1946

★ ★ ★

[31]

ELIZABETH HAWES, author of "Fashion is Spinach" and "Wenches with Wrenches," will speak at the Fair.



QUINCY HOWE, of the famous writing Howe family of Boston, will discuss current affairs.

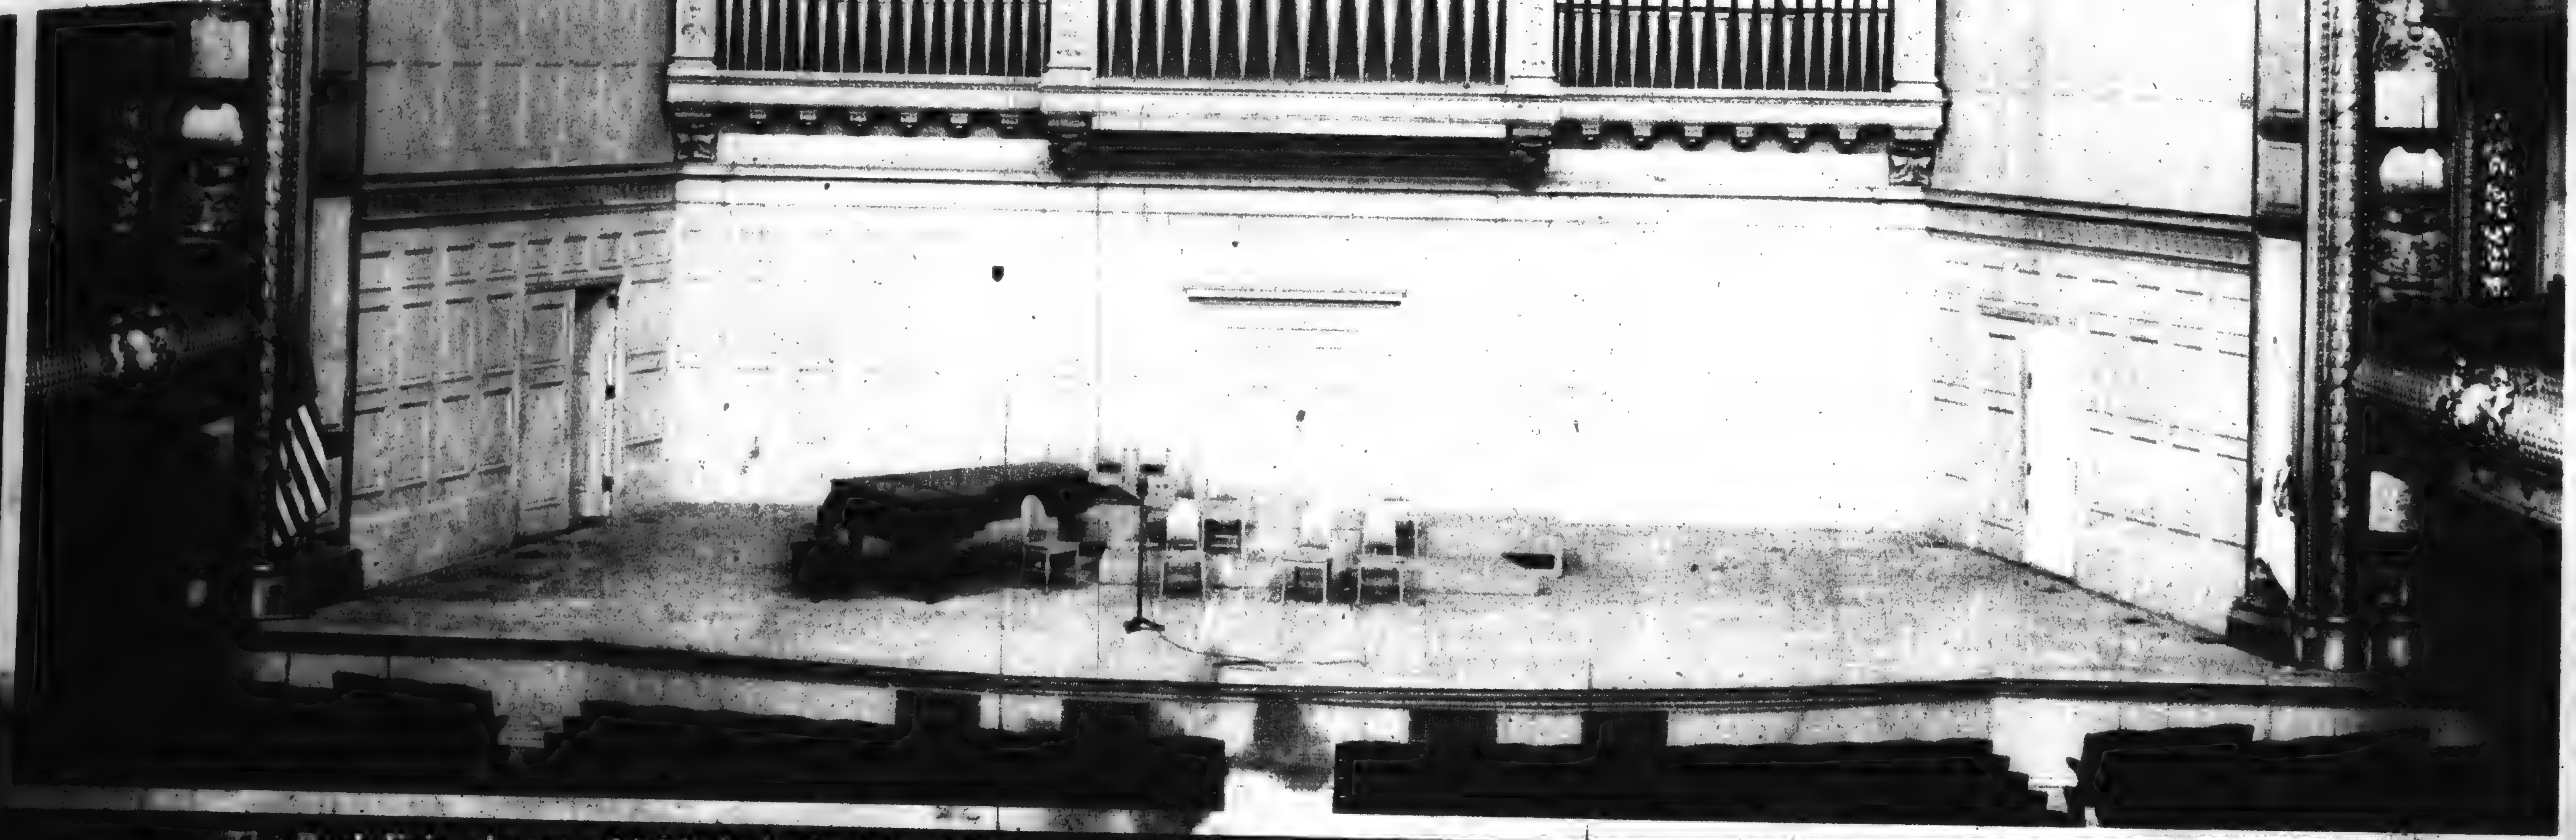
MILTON E. LORD, director of the Boston Public Library, is honorary chairman of the Committee of Arrangements.

ALICE DIXON BOND, Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements and Mistress of Ceremonies for the Boston Book Fair.

JOHN MASON BROWN, long a favorite with Book Fair audiences, will speak again this year. His latest book is "Seeing Things."

MAUREEN DALY, glamorous young author and editor of a column for teen-agers, will speak at a special session for young people.

BOSTON BOOK FAIR



THE STAGE of of Symphony Hall where distinguished authors from all parts of the world will give their views on literature and the world during the four days of the Fair.

The Book Fair, always a highlight in the life of Boston in the Fall, will be held at Symphony Hall from October 14 through October 17, with two speaking sessions daily. Truly Boston's own, this year's Book and intellectual life of the city, who have arranged programs that will feature some of the outstanding writers of our day. Tickets for the Fair are obtainable at the Book Fair boxoffice, 80 Mason street, Boston, [illegible] Book Fair, always a highlight in the life of Bost[illegible] Fall, will be held at Symphony Hall from October 14 through [illegible]ber 17, with two speaking sessions d[illegible]y. Truly Boston's own, this year's Book Fair has been planned by a committee made up of leaders in the civic and intellectual life of the city, who have arranged programs that will feature some of the outstanding writers of our day. Tickets for the Fair are obtainable at the Book Fair box office, 80 Mason street, Boston, [illegible] at Symphony Hall and all co-operating local bookstores.

KEN McCORMICK, brilliant editor-in-chief of Doubleday and Company, will serve as chairman at one of the sessions.

ODELL SHEPARD, Pulitzer Prize winning biographer, who, with his son, Willard Shepard, has written a new historical novel, "Holdfast Gaines," is another speaker.

MARGARET HALSEY, witty author of "With Malice Toward Some," will speak at one of the sessions. She has just completed "Color Blind."

ELLIOTT ROOSEVELT, author of a book about his father, the late President Roosevelt, "As He Saw It," will be a Book Fair speaker.

CAPTAIN ELLIS M. ZACHARIAS, USN, who has told of his years as an Intelligence Officer in Japan in "Secret Missions," will be among the distinguished speakers.

MERLE MILLER, former editor of Yank and author with Abe Spitzer of "We Dropped the A-Bomb," is one of the veterans who will speak at the Fair.

RUSSELL JANNEY, author, playwright and producer, whose book "The Miracle of the Bells" has had the largest first printing of any first novel, will speak.

PART OF THE ENTHUSIASTIC CROWD that jammed Symphony Hall for every session of the Fair last year. These people are examining the exhibits which have always provided an exciting background of the Fair.

[32]

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

NOV 1 -1946

Boston Symphony Concert Is Canceled at Rutgers

NEW BRUNSWICK—For the first time in 30 years a performance in the annual Rutgers University Concert Series will be postponed. Dr. Howard B. McKinney, music department head, said today in announcing cancellation of the November 14 program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. McKinney also said the December 13 Paul Robeson concert would be postponed until January 8 to inaugurate the concert series.

Delay in construction of the university commons building was stated as the cause.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

NOV 1 - 1946

University Cancels Concert Scheduled By Boston Symphony

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled to open the annual Rutgers University Concert series here Thursday, November 14, has been cancelled, according to Dr. Howard B. McKinney, head of the music department. The concert was cancelled because the gymnasium, where the concerts are held, is presently being employed as a cafeteria until the new university commons is completed.

The Paul Robeson concert scheduled for Friday, December 13, has been postponed until Wednesday, January 8, inaugurating the season's series, Dr. McKinney added.

In making the announcement Dr. McKinney pointed out that it was the first time in 30 years that a concert had been cancelled, adding that "the shortage of building materials, the series of labor difficulties, and the tightly booked schedule of this world famous organization have made this the only possible solution of a difficult problem. We are sure all our subscribers will understand the reluctance with which the university makes this announcement. It is anticipated that the Boston Symphony will open our program next year as usual."

Herald Nov 2

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 5th concert in its regular series yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10........Handel
Divertimento........................Haieff
Suite from the Ballet, "Chout" ("Buffoon"), Op. 21..............Prokofieff
Symphony No. 1 in E minor Op. 39 Sibelius

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

For some reason and at the last moment the new Revueltas piece was pulled from the program and Alexei Haieff's Divertimento substituted. Thus we heard precisely the same program which was given Tuesday night. I see no reason to add further comment on the Haieff Divertimento. Though it sounds better on a second hearing, it is still not music of much consequence. The Aria is perhaps the best movement. Any of a dozen or more contemporary composers could have tossed it off, which is not to Mr. Haieff's discredit. He aimed at saying a few things agreeably in music and in that he succeeded.

I do not know why Mr. Burgin discarded the Revueltas; probably it did not sound well when they got down to the job of rehearsing it. But almost any modern piece in the light vein would have suffered by being followed immediately by Prokofieff's amusing "Chout" Suite. In Haieff's case it was as though a Liberty ship tried to race the Queen Elizabeth.

"Chout" is now 31 years old, but is still delightfully fresh and witty. The discords in it are a deliberate and calculated effect to suit the farcical caricature of the ballet's story. Time was when critics grew indignant at "Chout," for they felt that Prokofieff was pulling their leg. But, as in so many similar instances in musical history, it is the composer of a deft and original score who has triumped, since repeated performances have proved his point.

The performances yesterday were fine, except that Mr. Burgin took the andante of the Sibelius 1st Symphony and the Air from the Handel Suite too slowly. The Sibelius First will, I believe, live on its andante and scherzo. The finale I find least satisfactory, with its scraps of Tchaikovsky and its characteristic Sibelian tricks of style which he was to make more effective and more his own in later works. By and large we in Boston have had rather too much Sibelius in the last 12 years. Certainly we do not stand in any dire need of having the 1st, 2nd, 5th and 7th Symphonies repeated, even though, as Koussevitzky has observed, the 5th is probably his most enduring work.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Myra Hess will be the soloist in Beethoven's 4th Piano Concerto in G major. Debussy's Two Nocturnes and "La Mer" and Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" complete the program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 2 1946

EXTRA CONCERT PLANNED

Boston Symphony to Play Here Nov. 14 at Hunter College

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving an extra concert for those on its New York waiting list. The more than 2,000 persons who applied for season tickets the orchestra could not furnish will receive the first chance to obtain tickets for the concert in their honor.

It will be held Thursday evening, Nov. 14, in the Hunter College auditorium. Those on the waiting list were notified of the concert last Monday, which gave them a week's notice ahead of the general public.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The program will include Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahms' First Symphony.

9106 NOV 2

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

When at rehearsal Richard Burgin and the gentlemen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tackled the announced new piece for this week—Silvestre Revueltas' "Cuanahac"—they found so many copyist's errors in the parts Mr. Burgin decided to postpone the performances. Accordingly, for the program of yesterday afternoon and tonight he reverted to the list he had offered last Tuesday.

This consists of the D minor Handel Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 10, by Handel; the new Divertimento by Alexei Haieff; Prokofieff's "Chout" Suite and the First Symphony of Sibelius.

It is good to hear a Handel Concerto Grosso as concert-opener occasionally. Such grave and gracious music, so beautifully written, is undervalued today, although it makes a pleasing alternate to the Brandenburg Concertos of Bach.

As for Haieff's bubbling little sequence of five movements, they are modern and alive, with quite a little Stravinsky in their family tree. They are hardly notable, but in their modest way they serve as a tonal bracer.

Perhaps I am growing old, for I found the "Chout" Suite a long and noisy bore, for all the brilliance of Prokofieff's orchestration. The real reason, however, is probably the fact that this is theatre music, and it needs the stage action of the ballet to go with it. As pure concert fare, "Chout" is too much of a muchness.

Mr. Burgin, making his first appearance this season in the "regular" series, again gave a fine account of his gifts as conductor. The Sibelius Symphony, especially, was rich of sound and expressively intense. Handel was appropriately opulent and the Haieff and Prokofieff were colorful and bursting with rhythm.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As it turned out, yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, conducted by Richard Burgin, was no more than a repetition in every respect of that of last Tuesday evening.

We had been promised one new piece in the shape of Revueltas' "Cuanahuac," which would have introduced to Symphony Hall a Mexican composer of considerable repute. But at the last minute it went by the board and in its stead we had the pleasing Divertimento of Haieff, which had its Boston premiere on Tuesday and was duly discussed in these columns the following morning.

For the rest this list, like its predecessor, contained Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Opus 6, No. 10, the Suite from Prokofieff's Ballet, "Chout" (Buffoon) and the First Symphony of Sibelius.

Of all the great composers Handel seems today to be the one least honored by actual performances, aside from the inevitable "Messiah." This year, however, his music is having something of a renaissance. The People's Choral Union will prepare his "Samsom" for its spring concert and last Wednesday the Conservatory Orchestra gave us the delightful Handel-Beecham Suite from "The Faithful Shepherdess." The Concerto Grosso of yesterday, of Tuesday and this evening, is an admirable vehicle for the display of the rich tonal properties of the Boston strings.

More than some ballet music, this "Chout" of Prokofieff seems to require, in the concert hall, the explanation by way of the action that it would receive in the theatre. Heard just as music, it impresses chiefly by its brilliant and highly original orchestration.

As for Sibelius, Mr. Burgin has long been both an admirer and convincing interpreter of his music. But since all the symphonies, save only Nos. Three and Four, were played here last season in honor of the Finn's 80th birthday, would it not have been better to play one or the other of these two neglected works instead of repeating the First so speedily? By harping on his most familiar pieces, the composer's friends may be doing him less service than they imagine.

Post - Nov 2

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 3 - 1946

Shaw Leads Collegiate Chorale In Songs Illuminating Peace

Youthful Conductor, Hailed as U. S. Best, Built His Group on Theory That 'You Don't Have To Be a Great Singer to Do Great Singing'

Blending their voices in a musical supplication for peace, Robert Shaw's renowned Collegiate Chorale made its fourth New York Herald Tribune Forum appearance at the final session Wednesday evening.

◆

The sixty-five members of the amateur choral group illuminated the Forum theme of justice and peace with an inspiring aurora of music, which happily obliterated racial and religious shadows to shed its full light on man's most fervent hope.

The passage and the trend of time were hight lighted by the contrast to "The Song of Victory" which the chorale rendered on the same platform a year ago. The program last Wednesday was deeply religious in character, attuned to its thoughtful motif. It was also interdenominational and interracial.

The opening composition was Palestrina's "Kyrie Eleison." This was followed by a group of two songs, a white-folk spiritual, "I Have a Mother in Heaven," and a Negro spiritual, "Soona Will Be Done." The concert closed with two suitably chosen Bach chorales, "Break Forth O Beauteous Heavenly Light" and "Dona Nobis Pacem," or "Give Us Peace."

Wants World to Sing

The Collegiate Chorale is the physical embodiment of Robert Shaw's consuming desire to have the whole world sing. It represents a personal philosophy which the world might well apply to its search for peace and justice among mankind.

"You don't have to be a great singer to do great singing," Mr. Shaw says. "Take a bunch of people who are sensitive to one another and to music, and you've got something bigger than any one could do alone. Even Toscanini doesn't feel any deeper than every one else put together."

His actions have borne out his words. Mr. Shaw has taken an assorted group of stenographers, secretaries, teachers, policemen and clerks, pulled them together with the common bonds of their sheer joy of singing and raised them to the eminence of American choral music. His success is attested by his selection as the greatest choral conductor in the United States by the National Association of Composers and Conductors.

The last year has been one of Mr. Shaw's busiest and most productive. He gave seven major concerts with the Collegiate Chorale in New York last season. He became a member of the staff of the Juilliard School of Music. He was guest conductor for the radio symphony orchestras of the Columbia Broadcasting System, National Broadcasting Company and American Broadcasting Company. And he has formulated plans to take his organization on tour next year, certainly in the United States, and possibly to Europe.

Mr. Shaw was born a little over thirty years ago at Red Bluff, Calif., a member of a family of ministers.

He worked his way through Pomona College in California by doing any odd jobs that turned up. Mr. Shaw's entire preliminary training was a single year's course in elementary harmony. But the professor who taught him to beat time forecast his future when he called him the greatest choral conductor in the nation, possibly in the world.

Won Guggenheim Award

When the director of the Pomona Glee Club took a year's leave of absence Mr. Shaw stepped onto the podium in his place.

"You can't spoil a thing like the Glee Club in a year, you know," he reflected.

His student work was noticed by Fred Waring, who offered him a post as director of the famed radio glee club. The job brought him to New York, where he found time also to train choruses to sing under Koussevitsky, Stokowski, Alexander Smallens, Leon Barzin and Sir Thomas Beecham.

In 1944 he won the Guggenheim award "to assist him to study theory and the technique of instrumental and choral conducting and to prepare a book on the development of choruses for the performance of modern choral music."

Mr. Shaw joined the Navy in April, 1945, went to boot camp at Sampson, N. Y., and was honorably discharged in July. He is married and the father of a son, Peter, and a daughter, Johanna.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS LIGHT

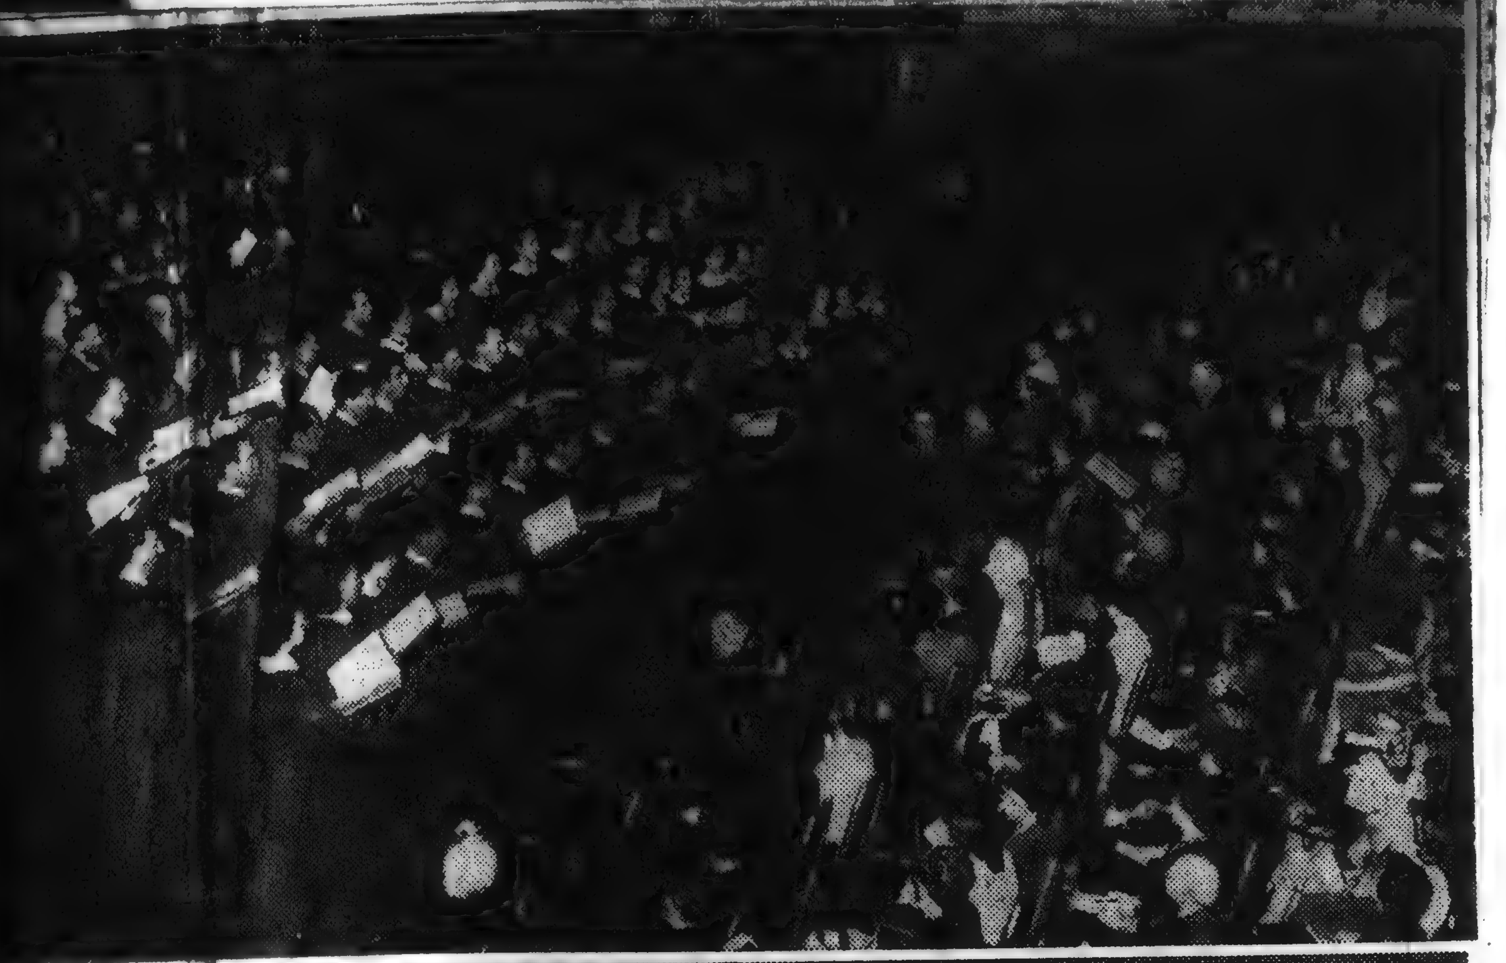
NOV 3 - 1946

Billionth Record

To celebrate the pressing of its billionth record (laid edge to edge a billion records would encircle the earth 6 1-2 times), RCA Victor has issued its first single non-breakable Red Seal record, on which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra present two famous Sousa marches. (All other plastic discs have been in albums only.)

"Semper Fidelis," which the Boston now gives its full due once more, was first recorded by John Philip Sousa and his own band for Victor back in 1902. Collectors of Sousa music also may possess subsequent recordings by the Victor Fife, Drum and Bugle corps, the Philadelphia Rapid Transit band, the Goldman band and, the recording earlier this year, by Sigmund Romberg and orchestra. On the reverse side of the commemorative record, the Boston Symphony plays "Stars and Stripes Forever", which must come in for comparison with a very stirring job turned in on the same piece by Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony orchestra some months ago.



Herald Tribune—Rosenberg

ORUM SINGERS—The Collegiate Chorale appearing at the urth session, Wednesday night

Herald Tribune—Warman

DIRECTOR OF COLLEGIATE CHORALE—Robert Shaw

LA PORTE, IND.
HERALD-ARGUS

NOV 5 - 1946

The World of Music

New York, Nov. 5—(UP)—Among the distinguished foreign musicians visiting the United States in the steady post-war influx is Manuel Rosenthal, French composer and conductor of the National Radio Orchestra of Paris.

Rosenthal, making his first visit, will be guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 5 and 6. He will lead an all-French program, including his own "La Fete du Vin" and his arrangement for orchestra of Lully's "Noce Villageoise." Rosenthal's whimsical composition on food, "Musique de Table," was warmly received when it was played for the first time recently by the Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski.

Rosenthal was a friend and pupil of Maurice Ravel. He served as a corporal in the infantry during the war, won the Croix de Guerre, was taken prisoner by the Germans and freed in March, 1941. Later he joined the French resistance movement.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra finds such an enthusiastic audience demand in New York that it is giving an extra concert this season to take care of the overflow.

An announcement mailed to the orchestra's "waiting list" said the concerts have been regularly over-subscribed and approximately 2,000 have applied for season tickets which could not be furnished. The extra concert will be given on Nov. 14 in the assembly hall of Hunter College and those on the waiting list were given first chance before tickets were put on general sale.

The Musical Fund Society of Philadelphia is sponsoring another competition to select prom ising young artists to make their formal debut at an expense-free recital. Schools and conservatories in Philadelphia, New York and Baltimore have been notified of the competition, which is open to all students of piano, stringed instruments and woodwinds, as well as organized ensembles.

Applicants selected for recitals, the entire costs of which will be borne by the society, also will receive an honorarium of $200.

Jasch Horenstein, conductor, who returned recently from appearances in Buenos Aires, Montevideo and Lima, Peru, again has been engaged as guest conductor with the Havana Philharmonic in February for a series of six concerts with the Colon Orchestra in Buenos Aires in January. In March Horenstein will return to Europe for guest appearances with the Conservatoire Orchestra in Paris, with the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Holland and also will be heard in Stockholm and Zurich.

Charles L. Wagner has announced that he had signed a three-year contract for opera and concert appearances with Marquerite McClelland of Memphis, Tennessee. Miss McClelland, who was a runner-up in the recent "Miss America" contest at Atlantic City, was graduated from Louisana State University last June.

During the coming year, the young lyric coloratura soprano will study in New York City under Paul Althouse, former leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera. She will make no public appearances until the fall of 1947.

Vladimir Horowitz is beginning this year's concert tour early in January after on December appearance in Newark. His concerts include the following cities: Brooklyn, Boston, Pittsburgh, Akron, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Chicago, Bloomington, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond and New York.

Dame Myra Hess, the pianist, who returned from England after an absence of seven years and opened her season with a sold-out concert at New York's Town Hall last montth, continues in great demand. Her second and last New York recital at Carnegie Hall on Dec. 14 was sold out two months in advance. Reports from Baltimore, Washington, Boston and Chicago have indicated sold-out houses.

This year's limited tour will be followed next season by a four-month tour beginning in Nov. 1947.

David William Nadien, 20-year-old violinist, has won the seventh annual contest of the Edgar M. Leventritt Foundation. The award is an appearance as soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under George Szell on Dec. 22 at Carnegie Hall.

The competition this year was open to violinists only. Of 26 entrants, three were heard at the finals. The judges were Arturo Toscanini, Nadia Reisenberg, Adolf Busch, Nathan Milstein, Arthur Judson, Rudolf Serkin, John Corigliano and Isaac Stern.

CLAREMONT, N. H.
EAGLE

NOV 5 - 1946

Statues Organized But Work All Hours

Boston —(AP)— Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation," she said.

GASTONIA, N. C.
GAZETTE

NOV 6 - 1946

STATUES'ORGANIZED BUT WORK ALL HOURS

BOSTON—(AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall. first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation," she said.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

NOV 6 - 1946

Statues Improve Music Hall Acoustics

Boston—(AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation," she said.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1946

Dame Myra Hess Took Ribbing When Nazi Rudolf Hit Scotland

By CYRUS DURGIN

"Let's have a funny interview. Ask me why I was born," laughed Dame Myra Hess gaily as she sat down at the Hotel Vendome yesterday afternoon.

But the assembled reporters never got an answer to that. They wanted to hear from her own lips about the famous noontime National Gallery concerts in London which the famed English pianist helped to found and maintain during the war. For that work Miss Hess was decorated with the Order of the British Empire, and at the investiture at Buckingham Palace, King George halted the ceremony for a moment because he had a message to Miss Hess from Queen Elizabeth.

"The Queen," said King George, "asked me to tell you how much she personally has enjoyed your concerts." And the Queen herself later said to Miss Hess: "I think the National Gallery concerts have been of national importance."

"That was the most democratic ceremony I have ever attended," continued Miss Hess. "It was democratic because, though the investiture was at Buckingham Palace and the King was in full dress uniform, we who were decorated filed in simply in the order of our merit. A little able seaman walked before a Knight, and I saw an airman whose heroism placed him in front of a Lord."

'Helped the Taxi Drivers'

Miss Hess is deeply appreciative of the royal honor, but what she likes to think of most is that her National Gallery concerts "helped the taxi drivers of London to like Mozart and Beethoven."

"People who never had gone to concerts before told me what those daily programs meant to them. And best of all, there are indications that even though the war is over and some of the tension removed from daily life, many of them are going to keep on liking music."

Miss Hess is in Boston to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow and Saturday in the G major Piano Concerto of Beethoven. She has just come from Chicago, where she received a tumultuous ovation from the public and a fanfare from the musicians of the Chicago Orchestra. She must be back in England by the last of December, to broadcast 21 concertos of Mozart on the new "Third Program" of the B. B. C.

Her wartime travels were full of excitement. The night that Nazi Rudolf Hess landed near Glasgow, Miss Hess was in Aberdeen, Scot. The following night, just before she was to play in Glasgow, she realized that she would have to take some teasing over the name Hess.

"How devoted your brother must be to you to fly all the way to Scotland," joked pianist Benno Moiseivitch in a wire to Dame Myra.

"And a Russian paper, I think, got it all so mixed up that they said they couldn't understand why Frau Hess was allowed to be playing the piano all over England," laughed Miss Hess.

Jokes About Bombings

On the concert stage Miss Hess looks dignified and perhaps a bit sedate. But she has a lively sense of humor, as she showed yesterday. She could even joke about the bombs which did substantial damage to her own London home.

"No, I wasn't bombed out, but the sun room walked away and had to be drawn back." (Air-blast suction did that.) "And when the buzz-bombs came I couldn't practice at home, which was an inconvenience. They didn't make much noise, and if I was practicing, my housekeeper couldn't hear the buzz-bombs and warn me if one seemed to be drop-

---

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

NOV 6 - 1946

Statues Organized But Work All Hours

BOSTON—(AP) Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acuostical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation,"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 7 - 1946

28 PAGE ONE AWARDS

Newspaper Guild of New York to Make Presentations Jan. 6

The Newspaper Guild of New York will make twenty-eight Page One awards for achievements in a dozen fields of endeavor at its annual Page One Ball at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on Jan. 6, it was announced yesterday.

Among the prize-winners are John Hersey, foreign correspondent, who will receive the Page One award in journalism for his report on atom-bombed Hiroshima; and Henry Wallace, Trygve Lie and the late Sidney Hillman, who will be honored for their roles in public affairs. Special citations were voted to Gov. Ellis Arnall of Georgia, Senator Claude Pepper of Florida, Brig. Gen. Evans Carlson, Bishop Bernard J. Sheil and the "Roosevelt Sons."

Others include Marc Blitzstein, composer; Camilla Williams, soprano; Serge Koussevitsky, conductor; Henry Morgan and Fred Allen, radio entertainers; Howard K. Smith and William Gailmor, commentators; "Superman" radio program; Laurence Olivier, actor; "Call Me Mister," a Broadway revue; Jimmy Savo and Peter Lind Hayes, comedians; Woody Herman's dance band; Fred Astaire and Pearl Primus, dancers.

Also "Thunder Out of China," a book on the Far East by Theodore H. White and Annalee Jacoby; Dr. Louis Slotin, atomic bomb scientist who lost his life at Los Alamos, and Myrll Frost and Joe Louis, athletes. Special awards were voted to Alan Corelli of the Theatre Authority and James Sauter of USO Camp Shows, and to Hannah Baker, Warren Hall and Leonard Smith for their work in connection with the annual Page One functions of the Guild.

FREEHOLD, N.J
TRANSCRIPT
11/8/46

Boston Symphony Concert Cancelled

NEW BRUNSWICK—The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled to open the annual Rutgers University Concert series here Thursday, Nov. 14, has been cancelled, according to an announcement today by Dr. Howard B. McKinney, head of the music department. The concert was cancelled because the gymnasium, where the concerts are held, is presently being employed as a cafeteria until the new University commons is completed.

The Paul Robeson concert scheduled for Friday, Dec. 13, has been postponed until Wednesday, Jan. 8, inaugurating the season's series, Dr. McKinney added.

In making the announcement Dr. McKinney pointed out that it was the first time in 30 years that a concert had been cancelled, adding that "the shortage of building materials, the series of labor difficulties, and the tightly booked schedule of this world famous organization have made this the only possible solution of a difficult problem. We are sure all our subscribers will understand the reluctance with which the university makes this announcement. It is anticipated that the Boston Symphony will open our program next year as usual."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

NOV 1 0 1946

Boston Concert Orchestra Here

THE WORLD FAMOUS Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. ~~Serge Kousse~~vitzky, is on its way to Milwaukee for its third concert in as many seasons.

The musicians from Boston will be heard at the Milwaukee Auditorium on Saturday night, Dec. 7, under Arion Musical Club auspices. Because the orchestra must fulfill a weekly radio broadcast date over a coast to coast hookup, the Milwaukee concert will begin early—at 7:30 p. m.

The Boston Symphony program will be one of the Arions' "extra" concerts of the year, and is not to be part of the season music series sponsored by the club.

Relief for Burns

For quick relief from a light kitchen burn, rub the spot with moist soap.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 8 - 1946

Statues Organized But Work All Hours

Boston—(AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberations," she said.

HIBBING, MINN.
TRIBUNE

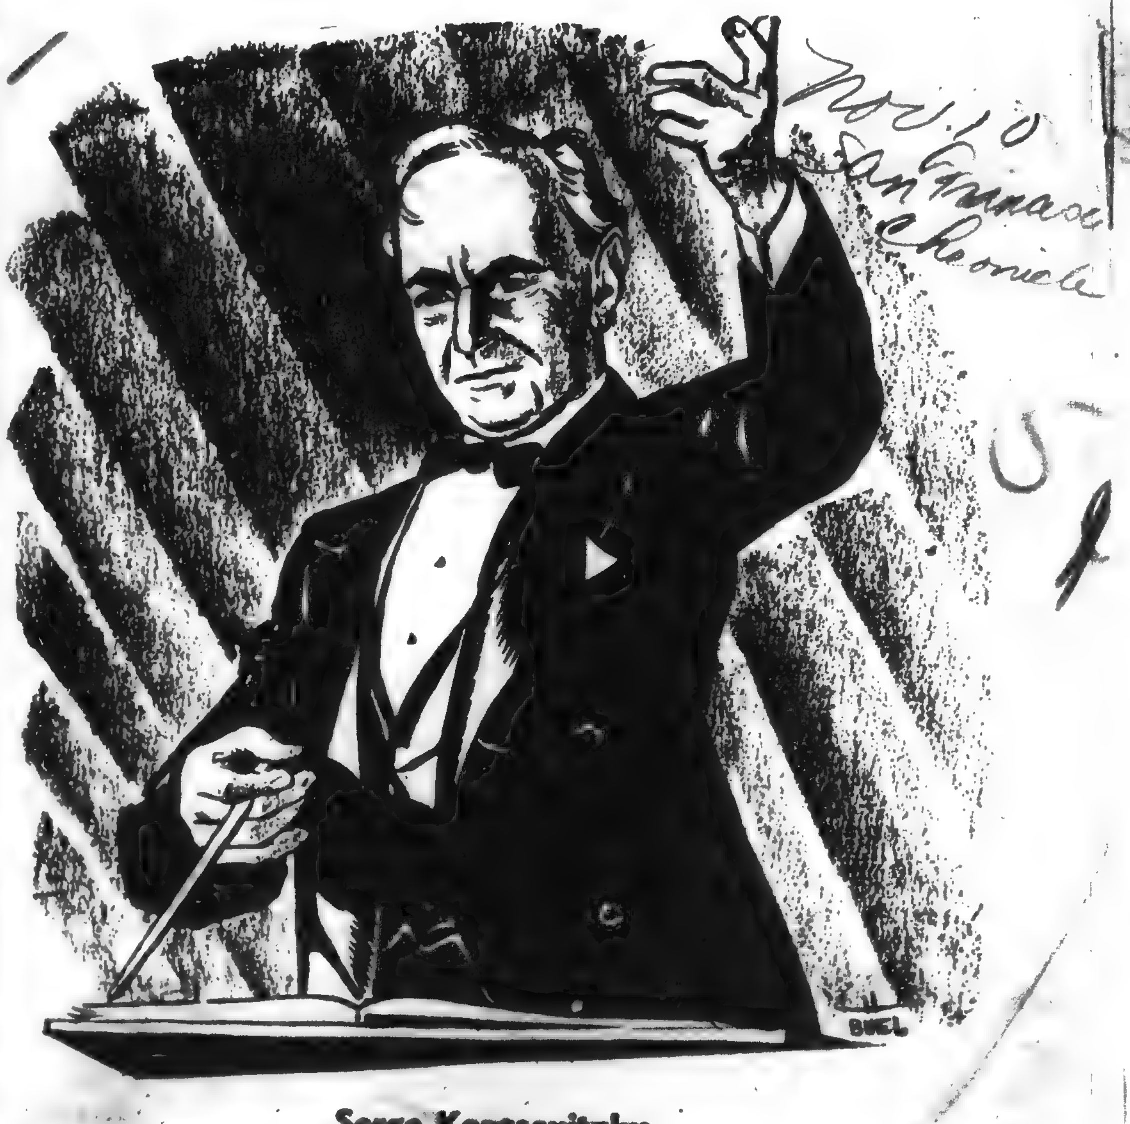
NOV 9 1946

parking.

STATUES ORGANIZED BUT WORK ALL HOURS

BOSTON (AP) — Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation," she said.



Serge Koussevitzky

Nov. 10
San Francisco
Chronicle

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

NOV 1 0 1946

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S Boston Symphony orchestra finds such an enthusiastic audience demand in New York that is is giving an extra concert this season to take care of the overflow.

An announcement mailed to the orchestra's "waiting list" said the concerts have been regularly oversubscribed and approximately 2,000 have applied for season tickets which could not be furnished. The extra concert will be given on Nov. 14 in the assembly hall of Hunter college and those on the waiting list were given first chance before tickets were put on general sale.

ANDERSON, IND.
BULLETIN

NOV 7 - 1946

Statues Have Job At Sympony Hall

Boston — (AP) — Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation," she said.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert may be described as a combination of Debussy, Beethoven and Dame Myra Hess, with the English pianist capturing the audience's fancy to a degree very nearly unprecedented. There are no thunderous octaves in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, no great climaxes. Rather, it is a work marked by graciousness and charm and in the slow movement by poetry of a type unique in music. The excitement over Dame Myra was, to be sure, partly personal. Always a favorite in this city, she is now more loved than ever before because of her self-sacrificing service to the cause of music and of public morale in her native country during the whole period of the war.

As at her recent recital in Jordan Hall, the audience rose in greeting when Dame Myra came upon the stage. The ovation at the end of the Concerto brought her back repeatedly, first alone and then with Dr. Koussevitzky, who plainly did not want to intrude upon her triumph. There were also interchanges not customary at symphony concerts. The conductor kissed the pianist's hand and she returned the compliment. Then he kissed her on the cheek and again she reciprocated.

When she was plain Miss Hess, Dame Myra played this particular Concerto with the Boston Orchestra. But as was observed the other day, there is now a new quality in her playing, a new depth, a new artistry. Yesterday's performance is one that might well go down in history.

Repeating an experiment made three years ago, when these works were last done at these concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky offered yesterday Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fetes," and after them his succeeding orchestral piece, "The Sea." The six years that intervened between them worked a considerable change in the composer's style, affording the necessary contrast even when they are heard together. Yet it is all recognizably Debussy. You could find no finer performances of either than those given by Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians and yesterday they outdid themselves, as they did also in the orchestral portion of the Concerto and in Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," which brought a memorable concert to a thrilling conclusion.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 10 1946

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Continuing a distinguished musical tradition which extends for more than half a century, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its current Brooklyn season Friday at 8:30 p.m. in the Academy of Music.

Two features are prominent in an outstanding program by this d-famous ensemble—the return to the borough of Dame Myra lebrated British pianist, and a performance of the latest third, by Brooklyn-born Aaron Copland.

played last at the Academy on Dec. 5, 1938, when she was tically received and recalled to the platform time and again. S fter that concert she left for England, where she won the hearts of all by dropping her personal artistic work to appear for the sufferers of London bombings, as well as giving concerts, planning programs and assisting in boosting the morale of civilians and Allied soldiers.

She was made a Dame of the British Empire for her war work.

On Friday Dame Hess will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. The program will be completed by the Copland symphony, which had its premiere Oct. 18 in Boston, and the Strauss tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel."

Dates for the remaining Boston concerts are Jan. 10, Feb. 14, March 14 and April 11.

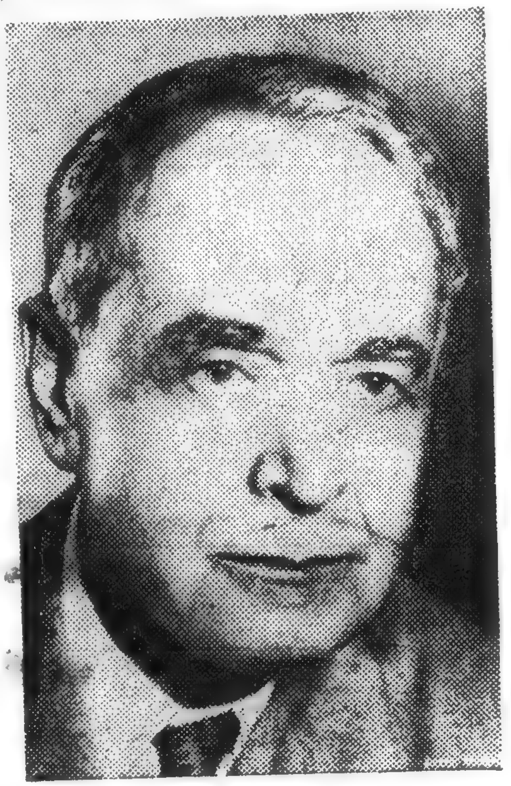
It will be a week replete with orchestral music for city music lovers. The Boston group will also play in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night and on Saturday afternoon, repeating the Brooklyn program on the latter date. The Philharmonic-Symphony will offer its three regular concerts in Carnegie Hall, Mischa Elman being soloist Thursday night and Friday afternoon in the Beethoven Violin Concerto. And the New York City Symphony has scheduled programs at the City Center for Monday and Tuesday nights, presenting Werner Lywen, concertmaster, and works by Purcell, Walton and Elgar.

There is activity in the operatic field, too. Elsewhere on this page is described the opening tomorow night of the Metropolitan Opera Association season. At the Academy of Music Alfredo Salmaggi will present "Aida" on Saturday night, with Giovanni Breviario, Italian dramatic tenor who arrived in this country last month. Then again, the City Center will close its operatic season with seven productions this week, including a new production of Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin" on Thursday and Sunday nights.

In the recital world, the week is featured by appearances of Marian Anderson tonight and Alexander Brailowsky in the second of a Chopin series Friday night, both in Carnegie Hall, and of Giuseppe De Luca on Saturday night in Town Hall.

For a novelty, there is the "Jazz at the Philharmonic" program Wednesday night in the Academy of Music.

I. C.



BATONIST—Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Academy of Music on Friday night, first in the orchestra's regular series of five concerts in borough.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST

NOV 13 1946

any immediate

Statues In Music Hall Real Aid To Concerts

BOSTON, Nov. 13—(AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's forty-six-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose. She said:

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation."

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

NOV 11 1946

HEADING FOR POPULARITY

On the whole those who attended the opening concert of the Boston orchestra's ~~Berkshire~~ Festival series, last summer, gave approval to inclusion on the program of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony. They were a little surprised at the composition, to be sure, for instead of thundering down lengths of sound, the work was light and the opening movement so gay that it could be likened to good-natured laughter. These thought the composition could be heard again with profit.

However, there were some in the audience who said that Serge Koussevitzky in presenting it was guilty of giving expression to Russian propaganda. These, no doubt, were surprised when reading the other day that the Communist party publication "Culture and Life" had denounced the work, saying that it "lacked in warm ideological conviction."

Brought to the attention of the public by hostile camps of opinion for once united, the Ninth symphony promises to become popular for a season.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 6th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Myra Hess, pianist. The program was as follows:

Two Nocturnes, "Nuages, Fetes" . . Debussy
"La Mer," Three Symphonic Sketches . . . . Debussy
Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major Op. 58 . . . . Beethoven
Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84 . . Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

This concert yesterday was a tremendous popular success, and deservedly so. All the music on the program was first class, and the performances throughout the afternoon were superb. The center of the proceedings was Dame Myra Hess, who was again greeted by a rising ovation when she came out onto the platform. After she finished the Beethoven Concerto the applause was deafening and finally Mr. Koussevitzky expressed the affection and admiration which all felt for her by bestowing a kiss on her cheek. At this unprecedented event the crowd roared. The memory of the oldest subscriber must have been taxed to recollect a demonstration of comparable warmth.

Perhaps owing to the stimulus of playing with the orchestra Dame Myra seemed to me in better form even than her recent recital. She played this lovely work with the utmost grace and charm, a performance that was matched at every point by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky. I have never heard a more poetic reading of that wonderful dialogue between orchestra and piano which does duty as a slow movement and leads into the finale. All in all it was a performance to be remembered.

The first half of the concert was equally fine in its way. The counterweight of Debussy for Beethoven might have seemed odd on paper, but, as so often with Koussevitzky's programs, it worked exceedingly well in practice. I wish that once again in Boston we could hear the third Nocturne, "Sirenes." The work needs to be rounded out, as "Fetes" is really not the perfect end that Debussy conceived. "Sirenes" is beautiful music too and a most interesting contrast as the third nocturnal mood. The trouble is that it requires a female chorus, which, to be sure, sings no words but is nonetheless an essential musical element. Still, that is not an insuperable difficulty, and the piece really ought to be restored to the repertoire.

"La Mer" is one of those rare works that is both a virtuoso piece for a crack orchestra and a great work of art. If there is such a thing as the painters' term "impressionism," in music, which I am not prepared to argue, this work is the sum and essence of it. Mr. Koussevitzky has always had a particularly sensitive feeling for "La Mer" and he and the orchestra have recorded it in masterly fashion. Yesterday it was once more recreated for us in the most glowing and intense manner. It was an interpretation which for sheer beauty of sound and perfection of orchestral playing could rarely, if at all, be equalled in the world today.

Finally we had Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, which was just the right sort of piece to follow the ovation for Myra Hess. I doubt if anyone left Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon either tired or displeased.

The orchestra will be on tour next week. For the 7th concerts on Nov. 22 and 23 Mr. Burgin will conduct Haydn's Symphony No. 95, Stravinsky's Symphony, Mozart's Adagio from the G minor Quintet and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

NOV 13 1946

Waiting List Set For Waiting List

Boston, Nov. 13—(UP)—A waiting list to get on a waiting list was established today by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The orchestra's annual Carnegie Hall series in New York was oversubscribed and a waiting list was created for any possible turned in tickets. Then Conductor Serge Koussevitzky announced that a special concert would be give at Hunter College, New York, Thursday night for the waitees.

And now there's a new waiting list to the waiting list concert.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky, pianist Myra Hess and the gentlemen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday contrived among them an afternoon of music-making absolutely magnificent. Miss Hess, returning to play with this orchestra for the first time since the war, received a welcome of what seemed unprecedented warmth.

On her first entrance the entire audience rose—something I have never seen happen before to a soloist at these concerts. When she had finished Beethoven's G major Concerto there was a sudden rush of applause, stamping and cheering that went on for minutes.

She was called back time and again and finally, after Mr. Koussevitzky had kissed her hand more than once, she kissed him back twice, smack on the lips.

Debussy and Beethoven made the rest of the program: the Frenchman's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals," and "The Sea," before intermission; the latter's "Egmont" Overture serving as closing piece.

The afternoon is best described, in terse fashion, as four masterpieces gloriously re-created. Often the orchestra sounds as well, as rich and colorful, but seldom does it sustain through a whole concert such an exalted peak of technical perfection. This is the sort of music-making that cannot be described: it has to be heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the three nature-pieces by Debussy has undergone a change. Still he plays them with an uncanny ear for sensuous qualities of sound with a superb feeling for the shifting of colors and rhythms and moods. But now there is more transparency in the balance of his orchestra and much more sense of form and construction.

Age and long experience must have something to do with this: it is most unlikely that a young man, however gifted, could muster all these qualities in such proportion.

Miss Hess, as always, played with remarkably clear articulation of all the notes. Everything was neat, precise, phrases roundly turned and rhythms given full value. Yet she was inclined to a more romantic and elastic tempo than conductor and orchestra, with the result that, especially in the first movement, there was some negligible see-sawing of entrances. All the same, Beethoven's Fourth Concerto received, pianistically and orchestrally, a performance of extraordinary style and authority.

"Egmont," coming at the end of all these excellences and high emotional tensions, may have been a little overblown, but nothing to damage its essential character.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

13 1946

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra thrilled its audience last evening with a superb performance of Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in the second concert of the current Woolsey Hall series. As the final number on the program, this symphony stood head and shoulders above the remainder of the evening's music, with its sweeping introduction and beautiful slow movement both set off by the magnificent intensity of the orchestra's string section.

Particularly in the second and final movements, the playing of this symphony last evening fulfilled the expectation to which one is entitled when Serge Koussevitsky and his orchestra set their hand to the performance of a genuinely great musical composition. Here the result was beyond the technical cleanness and interpretative authority which marked the entire concert; it was living, throbbing music of irresistible vitality.

The Mendelssohn A major, or "Italian," Symphony was the opening number on the program, replacing the previously announced orchestral arrangement of a C. P. E. Bach concerto. The change was a distinct improvement, from the point of view of the average concert-goer, providing a solid symphony of considerable amiability, full of the melodic beauty which is characteristic of Mendelssohn's works. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was at once jaunty and suave.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss, first performed in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra fifty years ago this year, was back with its perennial freshness in a not-too-exciting presentation. The treatment of the beautiful section near the end in the strings was exquisitely sensitive.

Howard Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings was played with Georges Laurent, flutist, and Bernard Zighera, harpist. In cool arpeggio work the combination of flute and harp is a happy one. Mr. Hanson's use of it is adroit, and Messrs, Laurent and Zighera made the most of it, though the composition is not exceptionally rewarding in other respects.

This was a well-balanced concert, offering first rate performance of a light symphony, two widely different works in the nature of tone poems, and a memorable presentation of a major symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 14 1946

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky gave its first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The program comprised Mendelssohn's 4th "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and Tchaikovsky's 4th Symphony.

Despite the convention-bound program it was a highly rewarding experience to hear this matchless aggregation of musicians play. Such ceasely sensuous sounds cannot be produced by any other orchestra now to be heard hereabouts.

Whether in the glibly elegant Mendelssohn Symphony, in the multicolored and surging sonorities of Debussy's "La Mer" or in the seething romanticism of Tchaikovsky, the ears were saturated with tonal gorgeousness.

Nor was the evening one of aural delights alone; for Mr. Koussevitzky approached each of these works with stylistic assurance.

J. D. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

NOV 13 1946

Z
Z
Z
Z
Pitoti

When the Boston Symphony Concert series at Carnegie Hall was oversubscribed, Conductor Serge Koussevitsky announced that a special concert would be played at Hunter College Thursday night to take care of the great number of disappointed persons on the waiting list. And now there's a heavy waiting list for the waiting list concert.

CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL-REPUBLIC

NOV 14 1946

The World Of Music

Manuel Rosenthal, French Composer Making U. S. Debut—Bostonians Find Wide New York Audience

New York, Nov. 14—(UP)—

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra finds such an enthusiastic audience demand in New York that it is giving an extra concert this season to take care of the overflow.

An announcement mailed to the orchestra's "waiting list" said the concerts have been regularly oversubscribed and approximately 2,000 have applied for season tickets which could not be furnished. The extra concert will be given on Nov. 14 in the assembly hall of Hunter College and those on the waiting list were given first chance before tickets were put on general sale.

The Musical

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 10 1946

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Continuing a distinguished musical tradition which extends for more than half a century, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its current Brooklyn season Friday at 8:30 p.m. in the Academy of Music.

Two features are prominent in an outstanding program by this world-famous ensemble—the return to the borough of Dame Myra Hess, celebrated British pianist, and a performance of the latest [illegible] third, by Brooklyn-born Aaron Copland.

[illegible] Hess played last at the Academy on Dec. 5, 1938, when she was enthusiastically received and recalled to the platform time and again. Shortly after that concert she left for England, where she won the hearts of all by dropping her personal artistic work to appear for the sufferers of London bombings, as well as giving concerts, planning programs and assisting in boosting the morale of civilians and Allied soldiers.

She was made a Dame of the British Empire for her war work.

On Friday Dame Hess will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. The program will be completed by the Copland symphony, which had its premiere Oct. 18 in Boston, and the Strauss tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel."

Dates for the remaining Boston concerts are Jan. 10, Feb. 14, March 14 and April 11.

It will be a week replete with orchestral music for city music lovers. The Boston group will also play in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night and on Saturday afternoon, repeating the Brooklyn program on the latter date. The Philharmonic-Symphony will offer its three regular concerts in Carnegie Hall, Mischa Elman being soloist Thursday night and Friday afternoon in the Beethoven Violin Concerto. And the New York City Symphony has scheduled programs at the City Center for Monday and Tuesday nights, presenting Werner Lywen, concertmaster, and works by Purcell, Walton and Elgar.

There is activity in the operatic field, too. Elsewhere on this page is described the opening tomorow night of the Metropolitan Opera Association season. At the Academy of Music Alfredo Salmaggi will present "Aida" on Saturday night, with Giovanni Breviario, Italian dramatic tenor who arrived in this country last month. Then again, the City Center will close its operatic season with seven productions this week, including a new production of Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin" on Thursday and Sunday nights.

In the recital world, the week is featured by appearances of Marian Anderson tonight and Alexander Brailowsky in the second of a Chopin series Friday night, both in Carnegie Hall, and of Giusepe De Luca on Saturday night in Town Hall.

For a novelty, there is the "Jazz at the Philharmonic" program Wednesday night in the Academy of Music.

I. C.

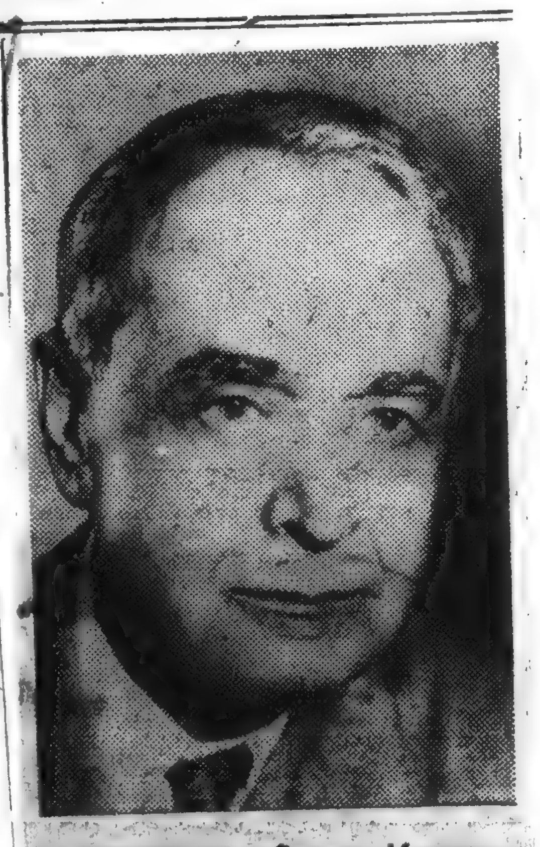
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST

NOV 13 1946

Statues In Music Hall Real Aid To Concerts

BOSTON, Nov. 13—(AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's forty-six-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose. She said:

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation."



BATONIST—Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Academy of Music on Friday night, first in the orchestra's regular series of five concerts in borough.

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

NOV 11 1946

HEADING FOR POPULARITY

On the whole those who attended the opening concert of the Boston orchestra's ~~Berkshire~~ Festival series, last summer, gave approval to inclusion on the program of Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony. They were a little surprised at the composition, to be sure, for instead of thundering down lengths of sound, the work was light and the opening movement so gay that it could be likened to good-natured laughter. These thought the composition could be heard again with profit.

However, there were some in the audience who said that Serge Koussevitzky in presenting it was guilty of giving expression to Russian propaganda. These, no doubt, were surprised when reading the other day that the Communist party publication "Culture and Life" had denounced the work, saying that it "lacked in warm ideological conviction."

Brought to the attention of the public by hostile camps of opinion for once united, the Ninth symphony promises to become popular for a season.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

NOV 13 1946

Waiting List Set For Waiting List

Boston, Nov. 13—(UP)—A waiting list to get on a waiting list was established today by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The orchestra's annual Carnegie Hall series in New York was oversubscribed and a waiting list was created for any possible turned in tickets. Then Conductor Serge Koussevitzky announced that a special concert would be give at Hunter College, New York, Thursday night for the waitees.

And now there's a new waiting list to the waiting list concert.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 6th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Myra Hess, pianist. The program was as follows:

Two Nocturnes, "Nuages, Fetes" . . Debussy
"La Mer," Three Symphonic Sketches . . . . Debussy
Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major Op. 58 . . . . Beethoven
Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84 . . Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

This concert yesterday was a tremendous popular success, and deservedly so. All the music on the program was first class, and the performances throughout the afternoon were superb. The center of the proceedings was Dame Myra Hess, who was again greeted by a rising ovation when she came out onto the platform. After she finished the Beethoven Concerto the applause was deafening and finally Mr. Koussevitzky expressed the affection and admiration which all felt for her by bestowing a kiss on her cheek. At this unprecedented event the crowd roared. The memory of the oldest subscriber must have been taxed to recollect a demonstration of comparable warmth.

Perhaps owing to the stimulus of playing with the orchestra Dame Myra seemed to me in better form even than her recent recital. She played this lovely work with the utmost grace and charm, a performance that was matched at every point by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky. I have never heard a more poetic reading of that wonderful dialogue between orchestra and piano which does duty as a slow movement and leads into the finale. All in all it was a performance to be remembered.

The first half of the concert was equally fine in its way. The counterweight of Debussy for Beethoven might have seemed odd on paper, but, as so often with Koussevitzky's programs, it worked exceedingly well in practice. I wish that once again in Boston we could hear the third Nocturne, "Sirenes." The work needs to be rounded out, as "Fetes" is really not the perfect end that Debussy conceived. "Sirenes" is beautiful music too and a most interesting contrast as the third nocturnal mood. The trouble is that it requires a female chorus, which, to be sure, sings no words but is nonetheless an essential musical element. Still, that is not an insuperable difficulty, and the piece really ought to be restored to the repertoire.

"La Mer" is one of those rare works that is both a virtuoso piece for a crack orchestra and a great work of art. If there is such a thing as the painters' term "impressionism," in music, which I am not prepared to argue, this work is the sum and essence of it. Mr. Koussevitzky has always had a particularly sensitive feeling for "La Mer" and he and the orchestra have recorded it in masterly fashion. Yesterday it was once more recreated for us in the most glowing and intense manner. It was an interpretation which for sheer beauty of sound and perfection of orchestral playing could rarely, if at all, be equalled in the world today.

Finally we had Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, which was just the right sort of piece to follow the ovation for Myra Hess. I doubt if anyone left Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon either tired or displeased.

The orchestra will be on tour next week. For the 7th concerts on Nov. 22 and 23 Mr. Burgin will conduct Haydn's Symphony No. 95, Stravinsky's Symphony, Mozart's Adagio from the G minor Quintet and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky, pianist Myra Hess and the gentlemen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday contrived among them an afternoon of music-making absolutely magnificent. Miss Hess, returning to play with this orchestra for the first time since the war, received a welcome of what seemed unprecedented warmth.

On her first entrance the entire audience rose—something I have never seen happen before to a soloist at these concerts. When she had finished Beethoven's G major Concerto there was a sudden rush of applause, stamping and cheering that went on for minutes.

She was called back time and again and finally, after Mr. Koussevitzky had kissed her hand more than once, she kissed him back twice, smack on the lips.

Debussy and Beethoven made the rest of the program: the Frenchman's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals," and "The Sea," before intermission; the latter's "Egmont" Overture serving as closing piece.

The afternoon is best described, in terse fashion, as four masterpieces gloriously re-created. Often the orchestra sounds as well, as rich and colorful, but seldom does it sustain through a whole concert such an exalted peak of technical perfection. This is the sort of music-making that cannot be described: it has to be heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the three nature-pieces by Debussy has undergone a change. Still he plays them with an uncanny ear for sensuous qualities of sound with a superb feeling for the shifting of colors and rhythms and moods. But now there is more transparency in the balance of his orchestra and much more sense of form and construction.

Age and long experience must have something to do with this: it is most unlikely that a young man, however gifted, could muster all these qualities in such proportion.

Miss Hess, as always, played with remarkably clear articulation of all the notes. Everything was neat, precise, phrases roundly turned and rhythms given full value. Yet she was inclined to a more romantic and elastic tempo than conductor and orchestra, with the result that, especially in the first movement, there was some negligible see-sawing of entrances. All the same, Beethoven's Fourth Concerto received, pianistically and orchestrally, a performance of extraordinary style and authority.

"Egmont," coming at the end of all these excellences and high emotional tensions, may have been a little overblown, but nothing to damage its essential character.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 14 1946

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky gave its first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The program comprised Mendelssohn's 4th "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and Tchaikovsky's 4th Symphony.

Despite the convention-bound program it was a highly rewarding experience to hear this matchless aggregation of musicians play. Such ceasely sensuous sounds cannot be produced by any other orchestra now to be heard hereabouts.

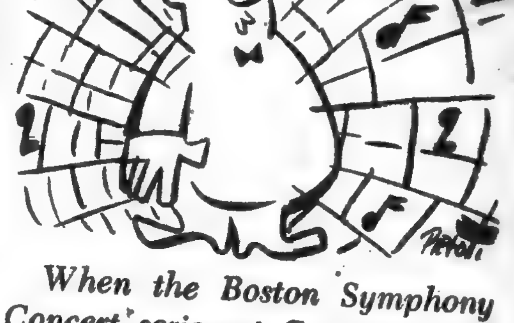
Whether in the glibly elegant Mendelssohn Symphony, in the multicolored and surging sonorities of Debussy's "La Mer" or in the seething romanticism of Tchaikovsky, the ears were saturated with tonal gorgeousness.

Nor was the evening one of aural delights alone; for Mr. Koussevitzky approached each of these works with stylistic assurance.

J. D. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

NOV 13 1946



When the Boston Symphony Concert series at Carnegie Hall was oversubscribed, Conductor Serge Koussevitsky announced that a special concert would be played at Hunter College Thursday night to take care of the great number of disappointed persons on the waiting list. And now there's a heavy waiting list for the waiting list concert.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 13 1946

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra thrilled its audience last evening with a superb performance of Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in the second concert of the current Woolsey Hall series. As the final number on the program, this symphony stood head and shoulders above the remainder of the evening's music, with its sweeping introduction and beautiful slow movement both set off by the magnificent intensity of the orchestra's string section.

Particularly in the second and final movements, the playing of this symphony last evening fulfilled the expectation to which one is entitled when Serge Koussevitsky and his orchestra ~~set their hand~~ to the performance of a genuinely great musical composition. Here the result was beyond the technical cleanness and interpretative authority which marked the entire concert; it was living, throbbing music of irresistible vitality.

The Mendelssohn A major, or "Italian," Symphony was the opening number on the program, replacing the previously announced orchestral arrangement of a C. P. E. Bach concerto. The change was a distinct improvement, from the point of view of the average concert-goer, providing a solid symphony of considerable amiability, full of the melodic beauty which is characteristic of Mendelssohn's works. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was at once jaunty and suave.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss, first performed in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra fifty years ago this year, was back with its perennial freshness in a not-too-exciting presentation. The treatment of the beautiful section near the end in the strings was exquisitely sensitive.

Howard Hanson's Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings was played with Georges Laurent, flutist, and Bernard Zighera, harpist. In cool arpeggio work the combination of flute and harp is a happy one. Mr. Hanson's use of it is adroit, and Messrs, Laurent and Zighera made the most of it, though the composition is not exceptionally rewarding in other respects.

This was a well-balanced concert, offering first rate performance of a light symphony, two widely different works in the nature of tone poems, and a memorable presentation of a major symphony.

CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL-REPUBLIC

NOV 14 1946

The World Of Music

Manuel Rosenthal, French Composer Making U. S. Debut—Bostonians Find Wide New York Audience

New York, Nov. 14—(UP)—

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra finds such an enthusiastic audience demand in New York that it is giving an extra concert this season to take care of the overflow.

An announcement mailed to the orchestra's "waiting list" said the concerts have been regularly oversubscribed and approximately 2,000 have applied for season tickets which could not be furnished. The extra concert will be given on Nov. 14 in the assembly hall of Hunter College and those on the waiting list were given first chance before tickets were put on general sale.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

NOV 14 1946

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra

By EDWARD O'GORMAN

Serge Koussevitzky and the visiting Boston Symphony played last night at Carnegie Hall, and it seemed to me, during the course of a rather warm symphonic session, that all of the qualities and characteristics of performance expected of this organization were plainly evident, but they just didn't seem to be there in the usual potent doses.

Dr. Koussevitzky had put together a typical program, shunning tid-bits and fripperies, relying on those solid masterworks which are the stock in trade of The Boston Symphony. The concert began with Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, continued with Debussy's "La Mer," and closed with the Tchaikovsky symphony No. 4.

In the "Italian" symphony, what the discriminating listener expects of the Bostonians, I think, is that kind of polished virtuosity and bright precision-work that makes such an elegant and pleasant experience of a Mendelssohn symphony.

As the hall grew warmer and Dr. Koussevitzky's manner more apoplectic, however, what came out of the orchestra seemed cooler and cooler. This "La Mer" was by no means the "La Mer" Dr. Koussevitzky had given us in the past. It had all of the finish and tonal brilliance the orchestra could invest it with, but the punch was weak.

VINELAND, N. J.
TIMES-JOURNAL

NOV 14 1946

STATUES ORGANIZED BUT WORK ALL HOURS

Boston (AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation," she said.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 14 1946

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES 'LA MER'

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG.

At several stages in last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, its first of the season, an aural hypnosis took possession of the happily benumbed listener, in which he little cared what the sound meant. The Boston Symphony often has that effect, especially in so typically Koussevitzkian a program as this one.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Tchaikovsky Fourth are no strangers, nor is Koussevitzky's treatment of them unfamiliar. The conductor is not noted for ascetic adherence to a musical text, nor is his fondness for emphasizing the dramatic elements of a composition unexpected. Even if a work is deficient in those qualities, Koussevitsky will find them. Mendelssohn's symphony, certainly, is not an epic, and one wondered if the grand volume of sound that emerged was a happy match for the slender score. The orchestra might easily have been reduced in size without penalty to the music.

There are orchestral showpieces for such purposes, however, and the "Italian" Symphony is not one. "La Mer" is. Of course, its wonderful orchestral hues do not minimize its stature as great music, and in this performance both aspects of the score were displayed. Debussy's picture of the sea has been well scanned by the conductor. He knows every splash, every swell, every whitecap, and he drenched the audience with tonal sprays. This was "La Mer" at its most oceanic, both A and P.

Alternating between drama and melodrama, Tchaikovsky's symphony was compounded in varying amounts of the composer and the conductor.

Tchaikovsky, if the score is to be accepted, never intended a ritard at the end of the first movement, and the arbitrary slackening of the pace there not only distorted the rhythm but gave an opposite effect to what was intended—flabbiness replacing intensity. A small point, perhaps, in view of the exciting moments before; yet it is that last cadence that lingers. The inner movements were played with the polish that the orchestra so easily commands, and the finale was whipped to a fury not inconsiderable even in these days of nuclear energy.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 15 1946

KOUSSEVITZKY AT HUNTER

He Conducts Boston Symphony Before 2,000 in College Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an extra concert last night in the Hunter College Assembly Hall for people who could not be accommodated at the orchestra's regular New York series at Carnegie Hall.

A waiting list of more than 2,000 persons took advantage of this opportunity to hear Serge Koussevitsky conduct a program consisting of Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," Strauss' "Tyll Eulenspiegel" and Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

NEW YORK, N.
TIMES

NOV 14 1946

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

Koussevitzky Launches New Year at Carnegie Hall With Well-Played Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership, opened its New York season of 1946-47 last night in Carnegie Hall, with the customary concomitants of these occasions. The auditorium was packed with the most distinguished musical audience that this city affords. The performances were received with intense satisfaction, manifested, however, with restraint. After the first movement of the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony, performed in well-nigh matchless fashion, a brave person cried "bravo," while others began to applaud. They were promptly corrected for this by the action of the leader, who plunged into the second movement, which silenced them if it also in some measure dampened the reception of the symphony. But this hieratic if not snobbish procedure is now customary at our orchestral concerts, where the audiences are if not well-bred. The applause waited till the symphony's end.

Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program of three of the orchestra's most popular and renowned performances—those of the Mendelssohn symphony aforesaid, of Debussy's "La Mer," and of Tchaikovsky's Fourth. Some may have asked why this orchestra, whose concerts are over-subscribed before its New York season begins and which therefore has no particular need to bait program traps for an unwary public, should have spent its magnificent resources entirely upon familiar works of its repertory. In former seasons we could confidently look to the Boston Symphony programs for new works and modern repertory.

The answer last night, acceptable in varying degrees to different people who listened, was in the sheer glory of the playing—playing, which had a finish, a lustre, a color and exuberance of completeness that in themselves represented an art. To have played anything as these works were played would have represented a triumph, and an irresistable joy to the listener.

The music was reborn in the performances. With the Tchaikovsky symphony, equally far from Mendelssohn's formalism and Debussy's impressionistic style, Dr. Koussevitzky played one of his most popular pieces, and reaped the expected success. In an imperfect world, where there are no values immune to argument and no truths which are not relative, the concert came as near as anything could to perfect orchestral playing.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 16 1946

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony in Academy Concert

The 1946-47 concert season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened last night with Serge Koussevitzky offering a triple-threat program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Opening the concert was the first performance in New York City of Aaron Copland's new symphony, his third. Competing successfully for top honors was the Beethoven "Fourth Piano Concerto," with Dame Myra Hess as soloist. Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was programmed as the final work to be heard. It is a pleasure to report that a capacity house saw everything come off in fine style.

Mr. Copland's symphony was written on a commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and completed late in 1946. It bears a dedication to the conductor's late wife, Natalie Koussevitzky. The new symphony was an auspicious choice with which to begin the season, particularly in view of the fact that Mr. Copland hails from Brooklyn and was on hand in person to listen to his own music and take a bow if called upon to do so. He was called and had to acknowledge the applause several times.

The new symphony is in the usual four movements with a great deal of freedom in so far as internal structure is concerned. Mr. Copland did not feel himself bound by any headmaster's rules while writing his new work and scored his music as he felt necessary without too much concern for formal rote. The symphony is much more listenable than a good many other modern works which require the artistic equivalent of bicarbonate of soda for their digestion. The music flows evenly with harmonies which, while definitely up to date, do not offend with too liberal use of dissonance.

Myra Hess Scores

The concert was graced with the presence of the distinguished British pianist, Dame Myra Hess, who appeared as soloist in Beethoven's "Fourth Piano Concerto" in G Major. This is the same work in which Dame Myra made her debut 39 years ago almost to the day. The virtuosity of this esteemed artist has never been seriously challenged since that occasion; her performance last night showed once again that she is a masterful pianist.

The Beethoven concerto is filled with lovely lyrical passages in addition to the runs and scales which are the virtuoso's delight and the desperation of almost any one else. Dame Myra played with a somewhat smaller tone than the piano is capable of producing upon occasion, but within the framework which she set up, she did a masterly job.

During the slow middle movement, the audience paid her the tribute of a remarkable quiet and absolute attention. When the final cadenza had rippled off the keyboard in impeccable style. Dame Myra and the orchestra received a more than generous measure of applause.

Till Eulenspiegel, the merry prankster, was back on the program again in his familiar guise. Under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton he danced through his celebrated adventures in brisk fashion up to and including the final escapade which results in his hanging. The orchestral execution proceeded as usual with Till's gayety preserved, perhaps, by the sure knowledge that he is bound to be alive again shortly, due to his perennial popularity wherever orchestras play.

The orchestra's next appearance in Brooklyn will be on Jan. 10, 1947.

J. B. Jr.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

NOV 15 1946

Koussevitzky at Carnegie

Meanwhile, at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony were giving their first New York concert of the season. Thanks to the BMT and careful timing, it was possible to hear the performance of Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, which closed their program, and be back again at the Met for the last act of Figaro.

Since Dr. Koussevitzky has a special gift for making Tchaikowsky sound better than any other conductor I know of can, and since the orchestra remains the finest extant, the present performance was a memorable one. The dramatic poetry of the score was set forth with nobility and eloquence, the Boston ensemble responding to the conductor's every wish like the impeccable virtuoso instrument it is.

—ROBERT A. HAGUE

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 17 1946

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS AT CARNEGIE

Dame Myra Hess Is Soloist in Beethoven's 4th Concerto—Copland Symphony Heard

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, gave its first Saturday afternoon concert of the season, yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Dame Myra Hess was the soloist in the Fourth piano concerto of Beethoven at this event, and Aaron Copland's Third symphony received its initial New York hearing, on an engaging program completed by Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The performance of the Beethoven Fourth concerto was outstanding in its perfect fusion of the orchestral and soloistic elements in the composition. Dr. Koussevitzky and Dame Myra saw eye to eye as to the intentions of the music, and its symphonic character was completely realized. With the simple, thoughtful statement of the opening phrases, the eminent English pianist at once established the lyric atmosphere of the concerto, its prevailing mood of tranquility, and loftiness of spirit. And in the ensuing expositional statement by the orchestra, the conductor showed how sympathetically he and the soloist moved in an interpretation that proved remarkably unified and finely integrated.

The refinement of color, the purity of subtly graded tone, the clarity and precision of Dame Myra's playing were as praiseworthy as the poetic and admirably restrained nature of a reading that reached its climax of effectiveness in the wonderful andante. In this division, the hushed, tender responses of the piano to the fateful unison passages of the orchestra worked with unusual impressiveness, and were led to a truly dramatic climax before the haunting closing measures.

Dame Myra employed Beethoven's own cadenzas in the first and last movements, and succeeded in making them an integral part of the work as an entity, entirely forgetful of mere display here as in all of the rest of her beautifully sincere and elevated account of the masterpiece.

Preceding the concerto, which brought on a prolonged demonstration of approval, Dr. Koussevitzky gave a resplendent presentation of Mr. Copland's Fourth symphony. The new opus, written on a commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, is in five movements, all of which proved polished in their workmanship. There was a wealth of fascinating orchestration in each of the clearly defined divisions. But many pages, on the contrary, had a bleak and scrawny sound.

Likewise, all of the movements, except the unconvincing andantino, had moments of power and communicativeness, offset by others when the content became almost completely cerebral. The first two movements had the most to impart, the second, a scherzo, being quite compelling in its rhythmic strength and in the climactic impact of its closing section. But, on the whole, the symphony was overlong for what it had to say, and was spotty in effect, despite its frequent pages of inspiration.

The concert closed with a superb delivery of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," given with the utmost virtuosity and gorgeousness of tone, and equally masterly in its depiction of the humorous, amorous and dramatic aspects of the vivid musical characterization.

—N. S.

LONGVIEW, TEXAS
NEWS

NOV 17 1946

STATUES ORGANIZED BUT WORK ALL HOURS

BOSTON, (AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 17 1946

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, with Myra Hess, pianist, as soloist. The program:
Symphony No. 3 ....Copland
First performance in Manhattan.
Piano Concerto No. 4, in G major...Beethoven
Till Eulenspiegel..............Richard Strauss

Boston's Recovery

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to have undergone a rejuvenation over the summer. Of recent years it has given somewhat the effect of a marvellously intricate but bloodless automaton. Today its sound is live again. Its precision of balance and pitch, its purity of color are not diminished but heightened rather. And a bloom of health has replaced the waxen texture that has caused to more listeners than this one inquietude.

Real life has come back to its programs, too, if that of Saturday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall may be taken (hopefully) to indicate a trend. For not only did Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, give us a new work; but that work was a mature full-length symphony by America's No. 1 composer, Aaron Copland.

* * *

For good measure there was Myra Hess, too, playing Beethoven's passionate and lyrical Fourth Piano Concerto. And she did play it beautifully, every bit of it careful and sweet and intelligent and perfect as to taste, with no false notes and no banging. If her interpretation was conditioned by her lack of ability to play loud, she at least did not essay a dynamic range that is not part of her technical equipment. Everything came off clean and genuinely musical; and the work was all there, if somewhat small and short of fervor.

The only fault that this listener remarked (for the respecting of one's technical limitations is no fault, a virtue rather) was overpersonalization of the slow movement. Dr. Koussevitzky apparently understood the mood of this (and correctly, I think) as one of mystery. Dame Myra seemed to consider it one of sadness. She took the metrical liberties appropriate to sorrow. Unfortunately, metrical liberties of any kind destroy the effect of mystery, which requires a rigid observance of time values, especially during silences. The result was a loss of expressivity through the disagreement between soloist and conductor as to what the nature of the piece is.

* * *

Aaron Copland's Third Symphony is a commanding and original work. It ranks with the Third Symphonies of Roy Harris and of Charles Ives in the urgency of its communication, and that communication is related to the emotional substance of those works. Beethoven and Shostakovitch are also present, I think, in the author's thought. Here is at once a pastorale and a heroic symphony. The pastoral expression, though early American in melodic and contrapuntal contour, is Beethoven's by its tender, jolly descriptions of landscape and birds and country dancing. Shostakovitch's example is present in the use of brass instruments and drums to express a frankly military thesis, a procedure new to Copland's symphonic writing.

There is not space in a simple concert review to analyze the work further. I shall do that next Sunday. But I should like to go on record right now as full of gratitude to the composer, to the conductor and to the executant musicians. The symphony has some minor faults, but it has such major virtues that the former need not worry us, I think. It is the reflected work of a mature artist, broadly conceived and masterfully executed. There is nothing insincere about it, nothing tentative. Also, much of it is very beautiful; and all of it is, or will be when the novelty of its sounds has worn off, clear.

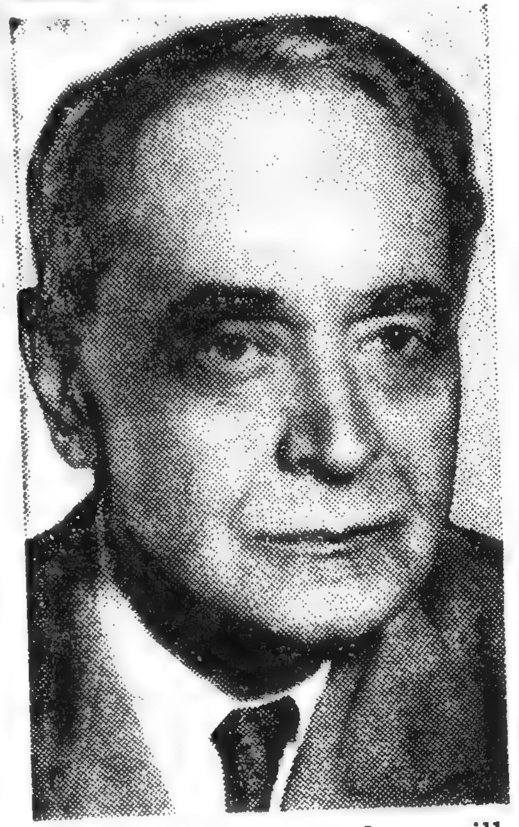
Dame Myra Hess

Piano soloist yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

NOV 17 1946



Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert under Arion Musical Club auspices at the Milwaukee Auditorium Saturday night, Dec. 7. The concert will be given at 7:30 p. m. so that the orchestra may keep a nationwide radio broadcast date. It will be an "extra" concert, not on the regular Arion season series.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 17 1946

League Fetes Koussevitzky Next January

Will Also Honor Milhaud, Kodaly in Its Concerts in Modern Art Museum

Zolton Kodaly, Darius Milhaud and Serge Koussevitsky will be honored in three concerts to be given by the League of Composers this season at the Museum of Modern Art. The first of these, Sunday evening, Dec. 1, will be devoted to works of the Hungarian composer, Kodaly, now here on a visit, who will also be guest speaker at this event, discussing the subject of "how to popularize serious music." On Dec. 29, Mr. Milhaud will direct United States premieres of his music and will also speak.

The fifth anniversary of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation will be marked on Jan. 12 with a program of American works that it has commissioned during its existence. The concerts will be followed by a reception in honor of Dr. Koussevitsky at the Museum.

Events to be sanctioned by the League include a program of contemporary works for violin and piano to be given by Jacques de Menasce, composer-pianist, and Angel Reyes, violinist, and, on another occasion, the premiere of a new piano work by Roger Sessions, to be performed by Andor Foldes. There will also be local programs of chamber music by young Americans.

A work that the League of Composers commissioned Lukas Foss to write for Ellabelle Davis, soprano, is scheduled for its world premiere by the Boston Symphonv in Boston on March 7. This is part of the League's national expansion program which is now being pursued by members of the national composers committee of which Aaron Copland is chairman. This program includes among its projects the setting up of an educational division. Randall Thompson is now engaged in considering the educational outlets for League activities.

"Modern Music," the League's quarterly publication, is again included among the organizations activities.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 18 1946

KOUSSEVITZKY DOES NEW COPLAND OPUS

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Offering an opinion of so massive a work as Aaron Copland's new third symphony after a single hearing—it occupied all of the first half of the Boston Symphony's matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday—is like describing the Empire State Bulding after a ride up and down in the elevator. It is long and it is well built, one would know—but how broad and how well proportioned?

However, one could hardly confuse the Empire State Building with the neighborhood church, and, similarly, this symphony with any other. It shows a Copland more masterful in the command of his craft than ever before, writing with lucidity and logic, with an almost unfailing sense of what to do with the hundred and more men he called upon to help him. The scherzo, in particular, is as organic a piece of music as the native literature can show.

With the æsthetic of the work, I find less satisfaction. The opening movement, reflective in mood, evokes an atmosphere not unlike certain sections of Copland's own "Billy the Kid," in a more spacious way. The scherzo, as indicated, is completely successful.

In the succeeding two sections, it appeared that Copland found as much difficulty in solving the riddle of the four-movement symphony as most of his predecessors back to Beethoven himself. The intentionally thin scoring of the third may be acoustically thinner than the composer intended. But the last movement, with its heavy brass writing and rather synthetic assertiveness, left one unconvinced. I should like to think we have a composer capable of an affirmative utterance on so grand a scale, but the clamorous ending, in particular, suggested that the gentlemen doth protest too much.

The Performance.

For a change, there was some dissatisfaction to be expressed with a Koussevitzky performance. Without any other rationale than pure intuition, there was an aura of tentativeness in some of the playing, an insufficient emphasis on some strands of the thought which should have been meaningful, but weren't. However, this would not seriously affect the sub-strata faults (to borrow a geological term), but rather the magnitude of them. The applause that greeted the composer's appearance was about the average in cordiality, without much judicial implication.

The symphony was followed by a playing of Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in which Myra Hess was the soloist. It was a seminar in musical sophistication and cultured artistry within the dynamic limitations imposed by Dame Myra's piano tone. As such, it was quite inimitable—fine-grained, intimately musical, exquisitely turned. Koussevitzky's chamber-style accompaniment was likewise of exhilirating perfection. The concert ended with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 18 1946

Music

Boston Symphony Plays Copland's Third

Koussevitzky Directs; Dame Myra Hess Also on Program

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Top music news of the week end was the Carnegie premiere Saturday afternoon of Aaron Copland's Third Symphony, unboxed with the greatest care by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Featured along with the rousing novelty was a brilliant reading of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto by that most gracious Lady of the Keys—Dame Myra Hess. This was modernism and classicism in warmest rapport.

Before reviewing the Copland score itself, one word about the over-all playing at the Carnegie matinee. Whether in the Copland or Beethoven music the orchestra sang like one voice, a human, varicolored voice of myriad cadence. And Miss Hess's own was like a plea for cosmic calm.

My feeling about Copland's Third Symphony is that it tops all his earlier efforts in scope and idiom. Thanks to it, I would say he now measures up in full stature beside the best symphonists of our time.

Freest Outburst.

There is greater breadth here, almost a liberation, as if Copland had overcome any remaining inpediments of speech. This is his freest outburst to date, and, paradoxically, his best disciplined, too.

Analyze any one of the movements, and a sense of fierce logic grows from them, and then go one step further and analyze the symphony as a whole, and the same logic seems quadrupled into a firm synthesis.

Where there is harshness here, it is part of the plan, enmeshed in the growing web of contrast and conflict, without which no music can breathe. The chorale-like brasses bring moments of deft repose amid the seething rhythms.

Copland's range is wide here, whether in emotion or technic. The moods travel all the way from the meadowland calm of a sunny day to the shrieking storm of some fearsome protest. And there are spells of spoofing in between, or gargoylish satire.

Borrowed Liberties.

The temptation there and in one or two other places in the score is to whisper "Shostakovich!" to a neighbor. The identification is true, but only insofar as both the Russian and the Americans find the same means of freeing fresh stores of feeling.

Just as Shostakovich long ago found Mahler a good guide in some phases of technic, without aping him, so Copland permits himself one or two borrowed liberties of idiom without in the least sounding imitative. Shostakovich may still return the compliment, if he hasn't already.

Actually, the symphony is all-Copland, and being all-Copland, it is all-American. For this man is steeped in the native lore of city and country. He may disavow folk-lorist intentions, but the multiple beat of the land he loves hums through the Third Symphony.

It throbs through the giant strides of the first and last movements, through the broad fun of the scherzo, through the oddly telescoped variations of the nostalgic theme of the slow third movement. From the ground up this music is as close home as Carl Sandburg.

A Personal Note.

There was a personal note for Mr. Koussevitzky in Saturday's premiere, for Copland dedicated the score "To the Memory of My Dear Friend Natalie Koussevitzky," having been commissioned to write it by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

And you felt the conductor's personal commitment in the special zeal going into every phrase. "Con amore" might have been the score's sole instruction, for the care of a friend and confirmed believer pulsed through the reading.

The same applied to Miss Hess and her reading of the concerto. It was as if Beethoven had inscribed on the score: "To be played only by a woman of deep feeling and infinite grace." By that token the Fourth Concerto was all hers on Saturday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

NOV 18 1946

New Copland Symphony

Saturday afternoon's Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky listed two events of ~~uncommon~~ interest and promise. One was the local premiere of a new work by an outstanding American composer — Aaron Copland's recently completed Third Symphony. The other was the appearance with the orchestra of Dame Myra Hess in the Fourth Piano Concerto of Beethoven. That this listener came away slightly disappointed with both performances may perhaps be blamed on his too great feeling of anticipation when he entered the hall.

For Mr. Copland's Third Symphony is a thoughtful and undeniably sincere work of considerable breadth and depth, power and originality. Large in design, clear in form, imaginative in detail and brilliant in orchestration, its four movements offer an abundance of melody, color, harmonic and rhythmic invention, and are swept along by an expressive flow of ever-changing emotion. There are moments of tenderness and majesty, of light gaiety and intense drama, of quiet beauty and resounding turmoil. If, on first hearing, it did not add up to a completely moving or satisfying experience for this listener, he feels that greater familiarity with it may result in greater appreciation.

Dame Myra's notably sensitive and subdued piano playing and the orchestra's equally delicate collaboration in the Beethoven Concerto made for a beautifully polished and translucent performance of that ingratiating work. But it was noticeably lacking in incisiveness and vitality. It was like getting a drink of fresh, cool spring water when one was expecting something a bit more intoxicating.

—ROBERT A. HAGUE

Svet Svanholm, tenor who made his Met debut Friday evening singing the title role in Siegfried, talks over the score with conductor Fritz Stiedry before the performance. Stiedry also made his first appearance at the Met Friday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 15 1946

Boston Symphony at Hunter

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had opened its regular Carnegie Hall subscription series on Wednesday night, gave an extra concert last night at Hunter College, where Serge Koussevitzky conducted Weber's overture to "Oberon," Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahms's first symphony. The concert, given particularly for the waiting list of intending subscribers to the Bostonians' Carnegie Hall concerts, was heard by a capacity audience.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 18 1946

Dr. Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Welcomed By Large Audience at Academy

A capacity audience welcomed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night, at the opening concert of their current Brooklyn season in the Opera House of the Academy of Music.

The program consisted of the new Symphony No. 3 by Aaron Copland, Brooklyn-born composer, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, and the tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," by Richard Strauss. The soloist in the concerto was Dame Myra Hess, celebrated British pianist.

Seated in Box No. 1 was Mrs. William H. Good and her guests: Justice and Mrs. George E. Brower, Justice and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Roulston, and Rudolph Reimer

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, hostess in Box No. 2, entertained Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, Mrs. William E. Robertson, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett, and Mrs. Theodore Frohne.

Box No. 3 was occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince and her guests: Dr. and Mrs. Miles Kastendieck, Mrs. Eugene Coleman Savidge, Mrs. Karp P. Mikhalenkoff, Miss Helen Wright, Leslie Hodgson, and Eugene W. Bolling.

Members of the Brooklyn Women's Club were seated in Box 4: Miss Mary E. Tuthill, president; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, vice president; Mrs. B. Parks Goden, Mrs. William E. Howes, Mrs. Robert F. Ives, Mrs. Harry Wilbur Gross, Miss Lois Pinney Clark, and Mrs. Henry J. Nauer.

Seated in Box N. 5 were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, Miss Jessie Lockitt and her guest, Mrs. Henry V. Raymond, and Mrs. William B. Parker and her guests, Miss Pamela Thirkfield, Miss Joan Lang, and Miss Katherine Parker.

Box N. 7 was occupied by delegates of the United Nations. This box was a gift of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Haughton Bell, executive chairman.

Tickets for Box No. 8 were distributed to fficers of the United States Army by Colonel Frank C. Scofield of Fort Hamilton. This box was a gift of the Institute.

The second concert of the 1946-1947 series will take place on Jan. 10. The series is presented each season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 20 1946

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Presents Dame Myra Hess at Met Theater

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented Dame Myra Hess as soloist last evening at the second concert of the series at the Metropolitan Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky conducted and as at the opening concert, even standing room was at a premium. The audience stood as the distinguished English pianist came on the stage. The record of her wartime concerts in the National Gallery is a legend by now. The record of her musicianship is still being written and a brilliant page of the story was reached last evening as she played the Beethoven Concerto in G with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

The program:

Beethoven
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Mendelsshon
Symphony in A major, No. 4, "Italian." Op. 90
I. Allegro vivace
II. Andante con moto
III. Con moto moderato
IV. Saltarello: presto
INTERMISSION
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
Nuages
Fetes
Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 4 in G major. Op. 58
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante con moto
III. Rondo. vivace

Soloist
DAME MYRA HESS

The "Egmont" Overture made a splendid opening for the concert. The solid writing of the Beethoven score settled the listeners into a receptive mood and the familiar themes were clearly presented.

The Mendelssohn Symphony was never more skillfully played. The affable and pleasant first movement was followed by the wistful Andante. Viola tones of exquisite quality shared the honors with the two flutes. It was in the Saltarello that the orchestra outdid itself in virtuosity. The clever phrases were tossed about from choir to choir with breathless speed. This performance brought an ovation for the orchestra.

A reading of the two Debussy Nocturnes, quite up to the usual standard, followed and this delightful excursion away from the romantic school of writing served its clever purpose. It afforded the opportunity to let one's imagination wander with the gossamer clouds and the carnival crowds.

When the stage was arranged for the piano concerto, there was a breathless moment until the entrance of Dame Myra. She played the Beethoven as it will seldom be heard in a lifetime of concert going. Clarity, tonal beauty and rhythmic verve seem trite phrases to use. It was in the slow movement that the greatness of her art was apparent. In simple fashion she stated anew the lasting qualities of beauty. Her statement somehow included Beethoven, Koussevitzky, the orchestra and us.

NOV 22 1946

A Woman's New York

How They Saved a Symphony

By ALICE HUGHES

One of my favorite sources of amusing stories is my French brother-in-law, who fiddles for Serge Koussevitsky in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His English grows worse every year, but his stories about life in the outstanding musical band of the country grow funnier all the time.

The protocol of the United Nations is casual compared with the hierarchy in the circles where Koussy conducts.

Although the Boston Symphony plays here several times a season, the New York performances are always momentous and not the slightest irregularity must be permitted to jar Koussevitsky, who is sensitive, nervous and high-strung.

A Lost Trunk

It happens that this week my brother-in-law's trunk containing his dress suit got left in Boston. The thought of Koussy looking up at Carnegie Hall and seeing one of his men wearing street clothes instead of black-tie could so unnerve him that he might get off beat.

For Pierre to stay away from the performance would be equally upsetting. He plays first second-violin, sits close to Koussy's elbow and would be missed.

The men in the band solved the dilemma by electing one of the fiddlers who sits to the rear and is about the same size as Pierre to give up his dinner suit and get a night off from the opening concert.

The fit was none too good, sleeves too long, pants belt too loose, but Koussevitsky was undisturbed; knew from nothing.

And It Worked

I can scarcely recall a New York performance of the Boston Symphony when the critics don't fall flat on their faces in abject ecstasy over this New England band. Here is what N. Y. Times critic Olin Downes wrote about the concert when Pierre wore the borrowed dress suit.

"In an imperfect world where there are no truths which are not relative, the Boston Symphony Concert came as near as anything could to perfect orchestra playing." Is that praise, I ask you?

No House-for-Auto Swaps

Hurrah for the OPA! Such fragments of it as still exist have clapped down a ruling that landlords who accept a new car at ceiling price or yacht or trip to Florida or what-have-you in return for renting an apartment, are simply extortionists violating the OPA ceiling on rents.

This form of bribery has filled newspaper want-ad columns disgracefully. Finally steps have been taken; publishers' representatives will refuse to accept such ads and homeless veterans will not experience the additional cynicism of reading about apartments that are available if one has a car to sell at ceiling, in exchange. Seems to me our lawbreakers are cleverer at breaking laws than our lawmakers are at making them stick.

New Bridal Flower

Happiest girl I've seen for months is Bette Blum, whom I ran into a couple days before her marriage to Edward Marcus, one of the four sons of the Marcus family which owns America's most luxurious store in Dallas, Texas.

Bette's delight was a new flower her florist had discovered for her bridal bouquet.

It's called Fleur d'Amour, looks like a double white violet and has a fragrance of combined rose, gardenia and carnation.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA., PROGRESS

NOV 22 1946

A Woman's New York

By Alice Hughes

One of my favorite sources for amusing stories is my French brother-in-law who fiddles for ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His English grows worse every year but his stories about life in the outstanding musical band of the country grow funnier all the time. The protocol of the United Nations is casual compared with the hierarchy in the circles where Koussy conducts. Although the Boston Symphony plays here several times a season, the New York performances are always momentous and not the slightest irregularity must be permitted to jar Koussevitszky who is sensitive, nervous and high-strung.

It happens that this week my brother-in-law's trunk containing his dress suit got left behind in Boston. The thought of Koussy looking up at Carnegie Hall and seeing one of his men wearing street clothes instead of black-tie could so unnerve him that he might get off-beat. For Pierre to stay away from the performance would be equally upsetting. He plays first second-violin, sits close to Koussy's elbow and would be missed. The men in the band solved the dilemma by electing one of the fiddlers who sits to the rear and is about the same size as Pierre, to give up his dinner suit and get a night off from the opening concert. The fit was none too good, sleeves too long, pants belt too loose, but Koussevitzky was undisturbed, knew from nothing.

I can scarcely recall a New York performance of the Boston Symphony when the critics don't fall flat on their faces in abject ecstacy over this New England band. Here is what NY Times critic Olin Downes wrote about the concert when Pierre wore the borrowed dress suit. "In an imperfect world where there are no truths which are not relative, the Boston Symphony Concert came as near as anything could to perfect orchestra playing." Is that praise, I ask you?

PA POLLOCK IS PROUD — A happy family man is Pa Pollock, whose 24-year-old wife Janice won the title "Mrs. America" for being the prettiest in a field of twenty young married women from ten states. The Pollocks live in Columbus, Ohio; the contest winners are in Jackson, Miss., and there's a festive 6-months tour and a money prize of $2500 in it. But Mrs. Pollock will have none of all that. She would rather go home to her husband and four children. Smart woman, Mrs. Pollock! Proud husband, Pa Pollock!

NO MORE HOUSE-FOR-AUTO SWAPS—Hurrah for OPA! Such fragments of it as still exist have clapped down a ruling that landlords who accept a new car at ceiling price or yacht or trip to Florida or what-have-you in return for renting an apartment, are simply extortionists violating the OPA ceiling on rents. This form of bribery has filled newspaper want-ads columns disgracefully. Finally steps have been taken; publishers' representatives will refuse to accept such ads and homeless veterans will not experience the additional cynicism of reading about apartments that are available if one has a car to sell at ceiling in exchange. Seems to me our law breakers are cleverer at breaking laws than our law makers are at making them stick.

NEW BRIDAL FLOWER —Happiest girl I've seen for months is Bette Blum, whom I ran into a couple days before her marriage to Edward Marcus, one of the four sons of the Marcus family which owns America's most luxurious store in Dallas, Texas. Bette described her white satin princess wedding gown, her grandma's rose-point veil, her honeymoon to Bermuda with excitement. But what seems to delight her most is the new flower her florist had discovered for her bridal bouquet. It's called Fleur d'Amour, looks like a double white violet, and has a fragrance of combined rose, gardenia and carnation. I can't imagine what this blossom can be; maybe it's an old-fashioned posy by a new name. In any case it's a high spot in Betty's happy marriage.

FORT WORTH, TEX. EVENING STAR TELEGRAM

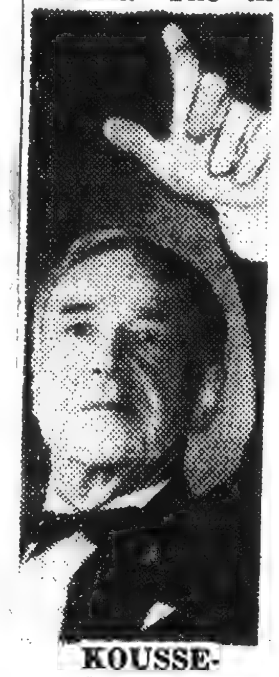
NOV 22 1946

A WOMAN'S NEW YORK

Koussy Demands Perfection, Even in Fiddler's Clothes

BY ALICE HUGHES.

NEW YORK, Nov. 22.—One of my favorite sources for amusing stories is my French brother-in-law who fiddles for Serge Koussevitzky in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His English grows worse every year but his stories about life in the outstanding musical band of the country grow funnier all the time. The protocol of the United Nations is casual compared with the hierarchy in the circles where Koussy conducts. Although the Boston Symphony plays here several times a season, the New York performances are always momentous and not the slightest irregularity must be permitted to jar Koussevitzky, who is sensitive, nervous and high-strung.



KOUSSEVITSKY.

It happens that this week my brother-in-law's trunk containing his dress suit got left behind in Boston. The thought of Koussy looking up at Carnegie Hall and seeing one of his men wearing street clothes instead of black-tie could so unnerve him that he might get off-beat. For Pierre to stay away from the performance would be equally upsetting. He plays first second-violin, sits close to Koussy's elbow and would be missed. The men in the band solved the dilemma by electing one of the fiddlers who sits to the rear and is about the same size as Pierre, to give up his dinner suit and get a night off from the opening concert. The fit was none too good, sleeves too long, pants belt too loose, but Koussevitzky was undisturbed; knew from nothing.

I can scarcely recall a New York performance of the Boston Symphony when the critics don't fall flat on their faces in abject ecstasy over this New England band. Here is what NY Times critic Olin Downes wrote about the concert when Pierre wore the borrowed dress suit. "In an imperfect world where there are no truths which are not relative, the Boston Symphony Concert came as near as anything could to perfect orchestra playing." Is that praise, I ask you?

FOOTLIGHTS TO FISH.

Miss Peggy-Ann Reid, who danced in George White's Scandals when Ann Pennington, Harry Richman, Tom Patricola and Willie and Eugene Howard were its stars, has just acquired an interest in a swell seafood restaurant called The Fishery. An odd switch for a chorine, but she's in it for profit and does her own buying. She travels east, west, north and south for Dungeness Bay crabs, Columbia River salmon, Colorado brook trout, Gulf and Florida water pompano, snapper and mackerel, Maine lobsters and Chesapeake Bay and Long Island oysters. The fish she angles for land on the table, not in a net. Her net is a handsome profit.

QUINTS BOBBY-SOXERS.

Just back from Ontario is Renee Long, who has written books on style counsel, and is now fashion directrice for a raincoat house which has just made five slipper satin raincoats for the Quintuplets. Renee went out to measure the little French Canadian girls, now 12 years old, and no longer babies. They've passed their early dimpled cuteness; are now robust bobby-soxers with hints of waistline and bosoms and they take a faint interest in boys. They are still inclined to dress alike, in similar cut but different color clothes, and despite the terrific spotlight of publicity on their birth, they are growing up as nice, healthy, normal children.

(Copyright, 1946, King Features Syndicate, Inc.)

FLINT, MICH. JOURNAL

NOV 24 1946

Boston Symphony Booked

Opens Detroit Series Dec. 10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, will open the ~~first Major~~ Symphony Series being held at Masonic Auditorium in Detroit, on the evening of Dec. 10. Other orchestras to appear are the Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

There are, in a sense, two dimensions to the enormous increase in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's public in recent years. One is its extended activity in the Summer season, and the other is the manifold means which carry the orchestra to the country at large and other parts of the world by radio and phonograph.

At the conclusion of the Boston Orchestra's regular season, which lasts from early October until the end of April, the Summer Pops Concerts take possession of Symphony Hall nightly until the middle of July.

The Boston Symphony has been a pioneer in this Country both in the making of phonograph records and in broadcasting. The first Victor recording of a symphony orchestra was made in 1918 under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. This orchestra was the first to broadcast when, in 1926, sponsored concerts were given over Station WNAC. A large portion of the standard repertory more recently has been recorded on the stage of Symphony Hall.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA. OKLAHOMAN

NOV 23 1946

A Violinist In Any Other Suit Plays the Same

By ALICE HUGHES

NEW YORK—One of my favorite sources for amusing stories is my French brother-in-law who fiddles for Serge Koussevitzky in the Boston Symphony orchestra. His English grows worse every year but his stories about life in the outstanding musical band of the country grow funnier all the time. The protocol of the United Nations is casual compared with the hierarchy in the circles where Koussy conducts. Although the Boston Symphony plays here several times a season, the New York performances are always momentous and not the slightest irregularity must be permitted to jar Koussevitzky who is sensitive, nervous and high-strung.

It happens that this week my brother-in-law's trunk containing his dress suit got left behind in Boston. The thought of Koussy looking up at Carnegie Hall and seeing one of his men wearing street clothes instead of black-tie could so unnerve him that he might get off-beat. For Pierre to stay away from the performance would be equally upsetting. He plays first second-violin, sits close to Koussy's elbow and would be missed. The men in the band solved the dilemma by electing one of the fiddlers who sits to the rear and is about the same size as Pierre, to give up his dinner suit and get a night off from the opening concert. The fit was none too good, sleeves too long, pants belt too loose, but Koussevitzky was undisturbed; knew from nothing.

I can scarcely recall a New York performance of the Boston Symphony when the critics don't fall flat on their faces in abject ecstacy over this New England band. Here is what NY Times critic Olin Downes wrote about the concert when Pierre wore the borrowed dress suit, "In an imperfect world where there are no truths which are not relative, the Boston Symphony concert came as near as anything could to perfect orchestra playing." Is that praise, I ask you?

[40]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JV 24 1948

Preview of New Symphony

Nov. 27, 1946

Guarnieri Work to Have Première

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Camargo Guarnieri, Brazilian composer, has come north to the United States for the express purpose of presenting his Symphony No. 1 at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Mr. Guarnieri at home has supervision of the Municipal music activities of São Paolo, and in that capacity he looks after a chorus, a string quartet, a trio, and an orchestra. He is in the routine of conducting and he appears in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening directing the Boston Symphony players in his own work only. Other doings of the two occasions are in Dr. Koussevitzky's charge.

Mr. Guarnieri is very content to be in Boston just now because of the cool weather which a town in the North Temperate Zone enjoys in November—quite the reverse of conditions in São Paolo; and he is happy to have his music welcomed to the Boston Symphony repertory.

* * *

Two symphonies constitute Mr. Guarnieri's record in the field of large orchestral composing. Symphony No. 1, written in 1944, has been performed in São Paolo, in Buenos Aires, in Montevideo, and in Santiago, Chile. Symphony No. 2 remains to be brought out. No. 1, in three movements, dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, and now bidding for a hearing before audiences in the United States, looks, from the score, like a fairly strict classic construction; and at the same time like something modern in manner and in feeling. The idea of themes and developments pervades the pages. The material shows inventiveness and individuality; whether all-round originality or not, listeners will have to decide.

The movements could in all reason be designated Allegro, Adagio, and Molto Allegro; but instead of these usual generalizations the composer has chosen three captions that he thinks better indicate his purpose — first movement, Rude; second movement, Profondo; and third movement, Radioso.

* * *

It may not be widely known that most conductors are singers. But in their way they are. Composers, perhaps, are not. But a conductor can sing a passage to his players and give them quite a notion of how it ought to go. Now Mr. Guarnieri in character of conductor opened out the score of his Symphony No. 1 at his hotel room the other morning and sang the first movement right through — introduction, statement of subjects, variations, coda, and everything, with rhythm, shading, and understandable symphonic effect. All the more interesting, too, because the movement closes with a fugue, based on the second theme, which in its nature is of marked, heavily accented outline.

Mr. Guarnieri does not take the classic form so seriously as to think he must have a diversion in comic vein for contrast or whatever else. Nor does he dodge the responsibility of writing a slow movement. The Profondo is a tuneful episode in what the music-appreciation people call song form, with air, middle division, and return, plus a coda. Scholarship enters here in unmasked guise, the second theme being treated in what the theorists denote as a canon in the "fourth above."

The Finale is bright and swift, radiating something like humor if not boisterous fun; and the accents are there in Brazilian plenitude. But something enters here that borders on the sentimental, and that is perhaps as much North as South American, if not also European. It is a strain at once familiar and pulled out of the sky. Mr. Guarnieri says it goes in the hypophrygian mode and after a sixteenth-century or seventh-century style of composing.

* * *

The endings of the movements in Symphony No. 1 are deliberate and prepared, though in no case long drawn out. The work has comprehensible shape and proportion. There seems to be little waste sound and no gratuitous decoration in the instrumental parts. What is written should be heard—strings, brass, wood, throughout, and even piano, which happens to figure in the ensemble.

Mr. Guarnieri has calculated the performing time of the three movements down to minutes and seconds. That, of course, shows him in the role of conductor. To reproduce his notations on the score, minutes only—first movement, 8; second, 13; third, 8.

At the SYMPHONY

MUSIC

Koussevitsky Returns to Carnegie in Fine Program

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Formally opening its New York season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, hung a landscape, a seascape and a self-portrait in Carnegie Hall last evening. These were, respectively, the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony, the Debussy "La Mer," and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

These canvases are all familiar to us in the Boston versions, but they have been away for a spell, and now they return as the first three in the band's Gotham exhibition.

Here, in these works, are three different styles, three separate approaches to musical painting, three distinct products, long established and, as creations of recognizable periods, probably timeless.

Italian in Name Only.

The Italian Symphony is, perhaps, Italian in name only. True, it has a saltarello, that graceful, tripping last movement, which could pass for not only music of the Boot Peninsula, but also anything else early 19th Century. And there is not much more in the symphony which could reasonably be described as Italian. This landscape, then, may be explained as a refined German's idea of Italian geography, expressed in quite international terms.

"Le Mer," of course, is the epitome of the impressionistic viewpoint. Nobody ever gets even his feet wet in Debussy's ocean. And no matter how susceptible one may be toward this water color it always seems a little far off, like a Mediterranean veiled in mists and legends.

High-Gloss Performance.

Tschaikowsky, alone of the three composers represented, tells all in his autobiographical brushwork. It is music of deep melancholy, the product of an overwrought, neurotic, self-castigating artist. Its emotion is personal emotion and its song is always heavy-hearted.

Such were the pictures of last night's concert. Their qualifying differences were all too clearly brought out by the sharp light of the performances given them.

The Boston Symphony and its leader were magnificent. None could have found anything but the most elegant orchestral playing in this three-part program, the one-purpose, complete-ensemble, high-gloss playing of the Bostonians at their best.

Licia Albanese will sing the role of Cio-Cio-San in Puccini's "Madama Butterfly," tonight at the Metropolitan Opera.

—Journal Photos, Frank J. Farley

Mr. Arthur M. Allen, Dame Myra Hess, Miss Gunn and Mrs. Allen. Upper left, Assistant Secretary of the Navy John Nicholas Brown and Mrs. Brown.

AT THE SEASON'S SECOND CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night in ~~the Metropolitan Theater, Dame~~ Myra Hess, distinguished English pianist, was guest artist with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

AMONG THE GROUP OF ADMIRERS to greet Dame Myra after her performance of the Beethoven Concerto in G Major were Mr. and Mrs. Allen. Shown with Dame Myra is her British secretary, Miss Gunn. Early arrivals at the concert were Mr. and Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Carpenter, escorted by Mr. Bertenshaw. Miss Mayo, director of Columbine Hill of the Mary C. Wheeler School, greets Mrs. Hazard who was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Potter.

Mr. Charles G. Bertenshaw and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter.

Miss Lucy S. Mayo, Mrs. Frederick R. Hazard and Mr. and Mrs. E. Sheldon Potter.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 29 1946

CONDUCTOR — Serge Koussefitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts Monday and Tuesday evenings at the Mosque under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 29 1946

IN PERSPECTIVE

Music Over There

Listening to Myra Hess in her recent appearance here with the Boston Symphony set me to thinking back over the musical adventures I enjoyed during my term with the army overseas. I had considerable luck in this direction, and the English pianist was part of it.

Dame Myra's magnificent labors as impresario of the lunchtime concerts at London's National Gallery are by now almost a legend among people who are fond of music. She arranged and ran the whole show, and played herself in something like 140 of the concerts. I managed to squeeze into half a dozen of her performances (which were always jammed), and recall each of them with delight. One, however, particularly sticks in my memory, because in addition to the music, it provided the most dramatic moment I have ever experienced in a concert hall.

* * *

The National Gallery concerts went on uninterrupted during the buzzbomb era, even when cloudy weather hampered interception along the coast and made it likely that things would be noisy. On just such an afternoon I paid my shilling and shouldered my way into a Hess performance. Sure enough, shortly after the concert started, an alert sounded. V-1 was an old story by then, and I don't believe a single person left the Gallery.

The first buzzer came in just after Dame Myra began to play—a Chopin prelude, if I remember correctly. Artist and audience ignored the thing to begin with, but that soon became impossible. The bomb seemed headed straight for us (a common illusion), and its tooth-rattling clatter began to drown out the music. Suddenly the pianist broke off in the middle of the prelude, and sat immobile, with one hand resting on the piano above the keyboard. The roar of the buzzbomb grew louder and louder, then cut off into that skin-prickling silence that always preceded the explosion. Still Dame Myra sat motionless, her back to the audience. The blast came, fairly close at hand, echoing and re-echoing. As the noise died away, Myra Hess lifted her hands and began the prelude again, exactly as though she d just come on stage. If she had been ffled, her music never betrayed it.

* * *

My musical luck in the army began the y I reached London. Two other GI's and yself got permission to find our own livg quarters. Completely by accident, we countered a British couple who wanted sublet their apartment—flat, they called —in Earl's Court to a "suitable" tenant. suitable, they meant somebody who uld take good care of their magnificent stom-built radio-phonograph and their cellent collection of records. That was Within 24 hours, we had signed a lease ntaining one sentence in capital letters—ENANTS AGREE TO USE ONLY CTUS NEEDLES ON LESSOR'S AMOPHONE."

For the next five months, I spent the maity of my evenings stretched out on a ch in front of a coal fire, listening to zart, Chopin, Beethoven and Brahms. we used to say in the army, I never had o good.

* * *

he day eventually came when I had to e London for Germany, but even in that ered and unhappy land there were mu l interludes. By all odds the most memble was the evening I heard Walter Gieseking.

Gieseking, certainly one of the finest pianists now living, was holed up at the time near my outfit's headquarters outside Wiesbaden. He had co-operated enthusiastically with the Nazis, and the high American brass was considering the wisdom of putting his name on an artists' blacklist—an almost cosmic piece of stupidity since unhappily consummated. While the decision was still pending, however, we asked him to play at the Biebrich Officers' Club, and of course he jumped at the chance.

Our energetic Special Services officer dug up in Wiesbaden a concert grand and a man to tune it (you could find the most incredible things in Germany if you really looked). Suggestions were solicited as to program. Friends were invited from other units. It was a real occasion.

The night of the concert was a typical late Summer evening in southern Germany—warm, quiet and—outside the ruined city—lovely. When I arrived at the club with some friends, we found the small room already filled. So we went around to the terrace outside, just under the window beside the piano. Walther, the young German waiter, produced a bottle of cool white wine. We had just filled our glasses when Gieseking appeared, bowed obsequiously, and began to play.

I doubt that I shall ever enjoy another concert quite so much. For nearly three hours we sat there as twilight deepened into dark and listened to that liquid, golden stream of music pour forth. Cesar Franck, Mozart, Schubert, Bach, Beethoven—above all, Beethoven. Nazi or not, nobody can play Beethoven like that man.

J. B.

Mr. Charles G. Bertenshaw and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter.

Miss Lucy S. Mayo, Mrs. Frederick R. Hazard and Mr. and Mrs. E. Sheldon Potter.

—Journal Photos, Frank J. Farley

Mr. Arthur M. Allen, Dame Myra Hess, Miss Gunn and Mrs. Allen. Upper left, Assistant Secretary of the Navy John Nicholas Brown and Mrs. Brown.

AT THE SEASON'S SECOND CONCERT by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night in ~~the Metropolitan Theater, Dame~~ Myra Hess, distinguished English pianist, was guest artist with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

AMONG THE GROUP OF ADMIRERS to greet Dame Myra after her performance of the Beethoven Concerto in G Major were Mr. and Mrs. Allen. Shown with Dame Myra is her British secretary, Miss Gunn. Early arrivals at the concert were Mr. and Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Carpenter, escorted by Mr. Bertenshaw. Miss Mayo, director of Columbine Hill of the Mary C. Wheeler School, greets Mrs. Hazard who was accompanied by her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Potter.

MUSIC

Koussevitsky Returns to Carnegie

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Formally opening its New York season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, hung a landscape, a seascape and a self-portrait in Carnegie Hall last evening. These were, respectively, the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony, the Debussy "La Mer," and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

These canvases are all familiar to us in the Boston versions, but they have been away for a spell, and now they return as the first three in the band's Gotham exhibition.

Here, in these works, are three different styles, three separate approaches to musical painting, three distinct products, long established and, as creations of recognizable periods, probably timeless.

Italian in Name Only.

The Italian Symphony is, perhaps, Italian in name only. True, it has a saltarello, that graceful, tripping last movement, which could pass for not only music of the Boot Peninsula, but also anything else early 19th Century. And there is not much more in the symphony which could reasonably be described as Italian. This landscape, then, may be explained as a refined German's idea of Italian geography, expressed in quite international terms.

"Le Mer," of course, is the epitome of the impressionistic viewpoint. Nobody ever gets even his feet wet in Debussy's ocean. And no matter how susceptible one may be toward this water color it always seems a little far off, like a Mediterranean veiled in mists and legends.

High-Gloss Performance.

Tschaikowsky, alone of the three composers represented, tells all in his autobiographical brushwork. It is music of deep melancholy, the product of an overwrought, neurotic, self-castigating artist. Its emotion is personal emotion and its song is always heavy-hearted.

Such were the pictures of last night's concert. Th differences were a brought out by the the performances g
The Boston Sym
leader were magn

Licia Albanese will sing the role of Cio-Cio-San in Puccini's "Madama Butterfly," tonight at the Metropolitan Opera.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

NOV 29 1946

CONDUCTOR — Serge Koussefitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts Monday and Tuesday evenings at the Mosque under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 29 1946

IN PERSPECTIVE

Music Over There

Listening to Myra Hess in her recent appearance here with the Boston Symphony set me to thinking back over the musical adventures I enjoyed during my term with the army overseas. I had considerable luck in this direction, and the English pianist was part of it.

Dame Myra's magnificent labors as impresario of the lunchtime concerts at London's National Gallery are by now almost a legend among people who are fond of music. She arranged and ran the whole show, and played herself in something like 140 of the concerts. I managed to squeeze into half a dozen of her performances (which were always jammed), and recall each of them with delight. One, however, particularly sticks in my memory, because in addition to the music, it provided the most dramatic moment I have ever experienced in a concert hall.

* * *

The National Gallery concerts went on uninterrupted during the buzzbomb era, even when cloudy weather hampered interception along the coast and made it likely that things would be noisy. On just such an afternoon I paid my shilling and shouldered my way into a Hess performance. Sure enough, shortly after the concert started, an alert sounded. V-1 was an old story by then, and I don't believe a single person left the Gallery.

The first buzzer came in just after Dame Myra began to play—a Chopin prelude, if I remember correctly. Artist and audience ignored the thing to begin with, but that soon became impossible. The bomb seemed headed straight for us (a common illusion), and its tooth-rattling clatter began to drown out the music. Suddenly the pianist broke off in the middle of the prelude, and sat immobile, with one hand resting on the piano above the keyboard. The roar of the buzzbomb grew louder and louder, then cut off into that skin-prickling silence that always preceded the explosion. Still Dame Myra sat motionless, her back to the audience. The blast came, fairly close at hand, echoing and re-echoing. As the noise died away, Myra Hess lifted her hands and began the prelude again, exactly as though she had just come on stage. If she had been ruffled, her music never betrayed it.

* * *

My musical luck in the army began the day I reached London. Two other GI's and myself got permission to find our own living quarters. Completely by accident, we encountered a British couple who wanted to sublet their apartment—flat, they called it—in Earl's Court to a "suitable" tenant. By suitable, they meant somebody who would take good care of their magnificent custom-built radio-phonograph and their excellent collection of records. That was us. Within 24 hours, we had signed a lease containing one sentence in capital letters—"TENANTS AGREE TO USE ONLY CACTUS NEEDLES ON LESSOR'S GRAMOPHONE."

For the next five months, I spent the majority of my evenings stretched out on a couch in front of a coal fire, listening to Mozart, Chopin, Beethoven and Brahms. As we used to say in the army, I never had it so good.

* * *

The day eventually came when I had to leave London for Germany, but even in that battered and unhappy land there were musical interludes. By all odds the most memorable was the evening I heard Walter Gieseking.

Gieseking, certainly one of the finest pianists now living, was holed up at the time near my outfit's headquarters outside Wiesbaden. He had co-operated enthusiastically with the Nazis, and the high American brass was considering the wisdom of putting his name on an artists' blacklist—an almost cosmic piece of stupidity since unhappily consummated. While the decision was still pending, however, we asked him to play at the Biebrich Officers' Club, and of course he jumped at the chance.

Our energetic Special Services officer dug up in Wiesbaden a concert grand and a man to tune it (you could find the most incredible things in Germany if you really looked). Suggestions were solicited as to program. Friends were invited from other units. It was a real occasion.

The night of the concert was a typical late Summer evening in southern Germany—warm, quiet and—outside the ruined city—lovely. When I arrived at the club with some friends, we found the small room already filled. So we went around to the terrace outside, just under the window beside the piano. Walther, the young German waiter, produced a bottle of cool white wine. We had just filled our glasses when Gieseking appeared, bowed obsequiously, and began to play.

I doubt that I shall ever enjoy another concert quite so much. For nearly three hours we sat there as twilight deepened into dark and listened to that liquid, golden stream of music pour forth. Cesar Franck, Mozart, Schubert, Bach, Beethoven—above all, Beethoven. Nazi or not, nobody can play Beethoven like that man.

J. B.

[42]

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

NOV 30 1946

Tanglewood's Net Deficit Totals $9184

Festival Had Surplus, Berkshire Music Center, Deficit

The income from Berkshire Festival concerts last summer totaled $179,167.43 while expenses were $152,951.44 leaving a net credit of $26,215.99. The Berkshire Music Center on the other hand showed a deficit of $35,400.08. Its income including $41,445.00 from tuition totaled $41,834.75 and expenses were $90,520.76. The operating deficit of $46,686.01 was reduced by $13,285.93, gifts from the friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

These figures are contained in the current program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They show a net deficit for the Berkshire enterprises of the orchestra of $9184.09.

Other Figures

Income for the 1945-46 season from Symphony, Pops and Esplanade concerts totaled $1,033,484.50 and expenses were $1,093,402.28 leaving a deficit before contributions of $59,917.98. Gifts totaled $59,849.02 and income from endowment and free funds, $21,572.35. The amount of $12,319.30 was transferred to the reserve fund.

A more detailed report on income fro mSymphony, Pops and Esplanade concerts follows: Ticket sales all concerts, $674,506.82; Victor record royalties, $112,477.49; broadcasting (gross) $235,690.15; programs, $10,810.04. Expenses, players, conductors and soloists, $751,589.29; other concert costs, $158,467.19; administrative and general expenses, $140,157.96; Symphony Hall, $43,188.04.

Income from Berkshire Festival concerts included: Ticket sales, $150,521.58; broadcasting (gross) $28,645.85. Expenses were: Players, conductors, soloists, $108,099.97; administrative and general $37,221.03; construction charged to operations, $7630.44 (Total construction costs amounted to $53,752.20. Of this amount $15,000 has been charged to reserves accumulated to prior years. The sum of $31,121.76 is to be prorated over the next four years.)

Expenses of the Berkshire Music Center included: faculty salaries and allowances, $41,309.58; other administrative and general expenses, $49,211.18.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 23 1946

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

VICTOR takes the opening of the Metropolitan Opera season as the occasion for the release of a large number of operatic recordings. One is Eri tu from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," sung by Leonard Warren (11-9292; $1). This is one of the times when Warren is content not to bawl but really to sing and to phrase with discretion and taste; and the splendor of his voice ravishes the ear. On the reverse side is the Credo from Verdi's "Otello," which Warren sings with more, but not excessive, power. Another excerpt from "Un Ballo in Maschera," the third-act Ma se m'è forza perderti, and O Paradiso! from Meyerbeer's "Africaine" are excellently sung by Jan Peerce (11-9295; $1). Zinka Milanov's phrasing and style in Casta diva from Bellini's "Norma" are superb, but the performance happens to be one of the occasions when her voice is not under control and is therefore clouded by tremolo and not securely on pitch. On the reverse side of the record (11-9293; $1) she sings Suicidio! from "La Gioconda." Blanche Thebom's voice is opulent in Waltraute's Narrative from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," which I find myself disliking as much this time as the last for its Wagnerian portentous mumbo-jumbo (11-9296; $1). For this excerpt Frieder Weissman produces the Wagnerian orchestral ebb and flow satisfactorily, but he imparts no force to the accompaniments for the Italian excerpts. The performances are beautifully reproduced, except for the almost inaudible woodwind (?) figuration in the transition from the introductory recitative to the beginning of Casta diva; and my copies of Waltraute's Narrative and O Paradiso! suffer from wavering pitch. On another single (11-9294; $1) are the Anvil Chorus from Verdi's "Trovatore" and the Bridal Chorus from Wagner's "Lohengrin" excellently sung and performed by the Victor Chorale and Orchestra under Robert Shaw, and excellently reproduced.

A volume called "A Treasury of Grand Opera" (Set 1074; $4.85) contains additional recordings—some previously issued, some new—of an excerpt from each of seven operas. There are the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," superbly performed by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony; Il mio tesoro from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," sung without musical style by James Melton with an orchestra under Breisach; Ritorna vincitor from Verdi's "Aida," cut and somewhat hurried to fit on one side, beautifully sung by Milanov with an orchestra under Weissmann; Un di felice from Verdi's "Traviata," well sung by Peerce and Albanese with an orchestra under Weissmann; the Habanera from Bizet's "Carmen," acceptably sung by Gladys Swarthout with chorus and orchestra under Leinsdorf; the Soldiers' Chorus from Gounod's "Faust," well-sung and performed by the Victor Chorale and Orchestra under Shaw; the Prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci," sung by Warren with an orchestra under Weissmann. When the "Lohengrin" performance was issued I mentioned that it was recorded with liveness and brilliance on top but with insufficient body down below and with automatic limitation of volume, so that the climax did not have the depth and massiveness, nor the entire performance the organic proportions, that they have on the older record of Toscanini's performance with the New York Philharmonic. The other performances are well-recorded.

Another set (1073; $3.85) offers several excerpts from Russian operas sung by Kipnis with an orchestra under Berezovsky. They are Prince Gremin's aria from Tchaikovsky's "Eugen Onegin," the Song of the Viking Guest from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," the aria of Prince Galitzky from Borodin's "Prince Igor," the Miller's aria from Dargomijsky's "Russalka," and a bit of the Inn Scene from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" (with Anna Leskaya and Ilya Tamarin)—to which is added Mussorgsky's "Song of the Flea." The music is enjoyable; but in the arias there is much mouthing and chewing of the big bass sonorities, and in "The Flea" there is dramatic over-emphasis and distortion to the point of horrible caricature. The orchestral parts are well-done, and the performances are excellently reproduced.

On one side of a Victor plastic record (18-0053; $2) Koussevitzky shows how he plays Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." The pace is a little faster than Toscanini's; and after the brilliant opening the quiet passages are done with the orchestra's characteristic refinement of sonority and execution that is right for Ravel but a little odd and amusing in Sousa; but the Koussevitzky thumb-print on the performance is the huge retardation introducing the concluding statement. On the reverse side is "Semper Fidelis." The recorded sound of the performances is magnificent, but clouded by reverberation.

Why Glazunov's ballet suite "The Seasons" should be recorded I don't know; but it has been by Dorati with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra (Set 1072; $4.85). Performance and recording are good.

Columbia has issued a set (648; $3.85) of Beethoven's Sonata Opus 13 ("Pathétique") played by Serkin. The feeble, dull sound of the piano as it began to come from the first record was almost unbelievable; and so was Serkin's performance—his lack of power even in the introduction, his fleet-fingered rattling off of the fast movements, his inability to create any phraseological continuity from one sound to the next in the melody of the slow movement.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Camargo Guarnieri conducted the first performance in the United States of his own Symphony at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the remainder of the program, which consisted of two 19th Century Russian works: the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantschina," and "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

At the age of 39 Mr. Guarnieri is regarded by some authorities as the leading contemporary composer of Brazil. He had been known here by his "Abertura Concertante," which he conducted at Symphony concerts in 1943, and other music.

The Symphony, which is his first and is dedicated to Serge Koussevitsky, and which won first prize in the Luiz Alberto Penteado de Rezonde contest "for the best modern symphony expressing the Brazilian sentiment," is a work of much cleverness and spirit. The three movements are entitled Rude (which means without polish), Profundo and Radioso, (bright). They are all of that. They also are heavy in orchestration, boldy adventurous in the use of dissonant counterpoint, and probably too long for what they have to say. Yet about the work as a whole is a definite sense of emotional feeling as well as of "pattern music" and an impression of formal logic.

Apart from a slow, march-like section in the slow movement, which suggests the jungle or at least primitive life, the Symphony sounds European to one North American. Guarnieri might have studied the scores of Hindemith, perhaps Ravel, maybe Copland. It is difficult to spot the sources of Buarnieri's style. But it is easy to see that he has a contemporary point of view and a distinct musical personality.

Mr. Guarnieri seemed content to beat the tempo and hand out cues. There was little attention to nuances. The orchestra played well for him in what seemed to be a painstaking and conscientious performance. Yet I suspected that he was following the orchestra rather than they him. It is possible that another conductor might make more of the Symphony than did its creator. At any rate, Mr. Guarnieri and his music received a good hand.

As if for the millionth time intent on displaying the supreme virtuosity of his orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky drew a performance of the "Khovantschina" Prelude that was a marvel of sustained pianissimo, every detail just about perfect. As for "Scheherazade," that model of solid but colorful orchestration was never more eloquent than yesterday.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Camargo Guarnieri, distinguished Brazilian composer, conducted at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the initial performance in the United States of his First Symphony, dedicated to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The latter led the first and third numbers of the current Boston Symphony program, namely, Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

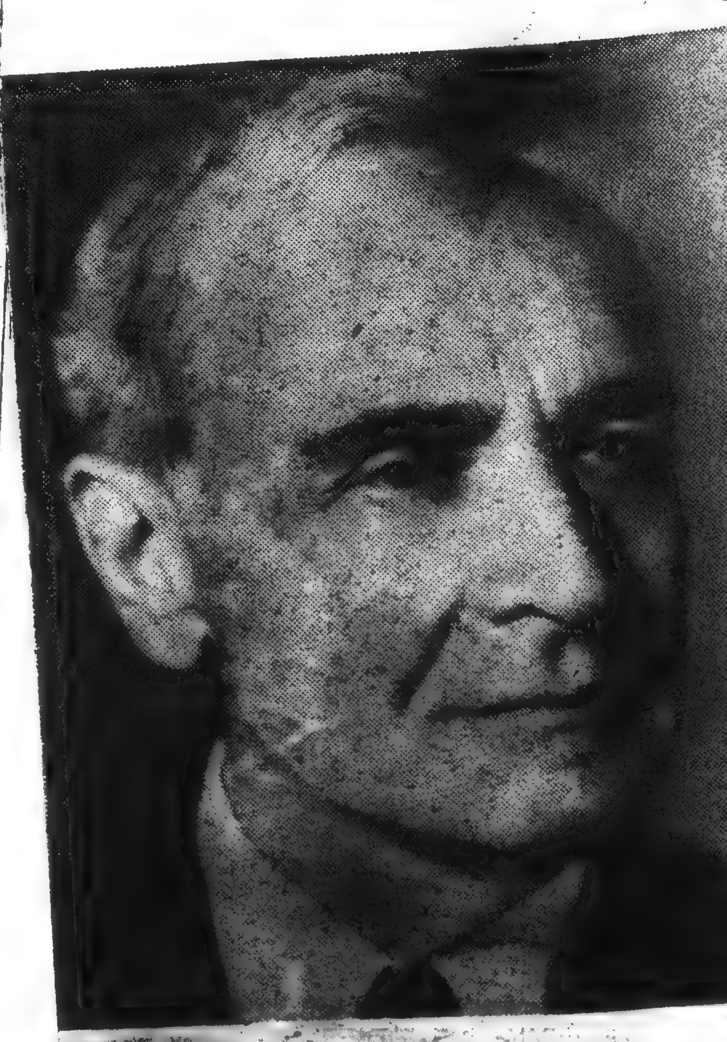
This was not Mr. Guarnieri's first visit to Boston. In 1943 he conducted here his "Abertura (Overture) Concertante." Not before, however, had we heard a Latin-American symphony. The "Sinfonia India" and "Sinfonia de Antigona" of Chavez are not symphonies in the conventional sense. That of Mr. Guarnieri runs in three movements, which bear the respective designations: "Rude," "Profound" and "Bright" (Rude, Profundo, Radioso).

The music of this Brazilian, whose surname betrays his half-Italian parentage, bears little resemblance to that of his countryman, Villa-Lobos, with which we are tolerably familiar. There is nothing about it that is vague, amorphous, impressionistic. Mr. Guarnieri does not use color for its own sake. In fact, his tonal palette is on the drab side. Praised for his skill in counterpoint, he indulges freely in fugatos and canons. His music is sinewy, tough-fibred. Folk material, primitive rhythms, etc., are employed, but everything is fitted into the symphonic design.

Though this folk material is Brazilian, there was a hint in the first movement of the music of the American Indian and elsewhere passages that suggest our Deep South. Nevertheless, the work was awarded the first prize in a contest for the "Best Modern Symphony" expressing the Brazilian sentiment and spirit. Mr. Guarnieri and his music were well received yesterday, though probably many in the audience shared the feeling of this particular observer that the piece was interesting rather than absorbing.

Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution was hardly of great musical significance. He has played the Moussorgsky Prelude times without number, and no later than last April. He does it beautifully, of course. That other war horse, "Scheherazade," he rode a bit hard yesterday, and while there was plenty of excitement the performance was by no means the most glamorous that we have heard from him.

DEC 1 1946



Serge Koussevitzky will direct his Boston orchestra at the Auditorium Saturday.

[43]

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1946

Symphony Concert

The 8th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Camargo Guarnieri was guest conductor of the first performance of his own new Symphony. The program was as follows:

[illegible] "Khovanstchina" Moussorgsky
[illegible] Guarnieri
[illegible] "Scheherazade." Rimsky-Korsakov

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

We had all been induced to expect a good deal from Mr. Camargo Guarnieri's new Symphony, which had its first performance yesterday with the composer conducting. What with Mr. Copland's glowing words in the program and the facts that it was a prize-winning composition in Brazil and was dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, I awaited the Symphony with impatience convinced that here would be a fresh and stimulating new score. I may say at once that I was grievously let down.

It is not hard to see why the Symphony won a prize. Its form throughout must have been perfectly clear and familiar to the judges, and nothing upsets them more than unconventionality of form. The fact that the composer introduced a fugue on the recapitulation of the second subject in the first movement probably did him no harm either. I assume, too, that they were Brazilian judges who could readily recognize the use of native thematic material. But the winning of a prize merely predicates that the composer is competent and knows his way around, especially on paper.

Mr. Guarnieri's Symphony did not, for me, come off in the concert hall. was in fact a bore. I do not for a moment suggest, though, that the slow movement was as monumental a bore as the long slow movements of Shostakovitch. But for all that neither the first nor the second movements had much to say, beyond a classically correct and mildly dissonant manner of saying it. The finale had more to it and some agreeable tricks of orchestration to give the material spice. But by and large I am afraid the new Symphony is neither an impressive nor a provocative work.

Russian music thoroughly familiar to the public filled the rest of the program. Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" was played as recently as last spring and its atmospheric charm needs no further comment at this time. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" is one of the most astonishing tours de force in orchestral music, since it makes such an extraordinary variety of use and keeps it up so long with so little thematic material. It is practically a musical re-enactment of the miracle of the loaves and fishes. Because of its many solos it needs a virtuoso orchestra to perform it, so that Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra are in their element in projecting it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away on what it sometimes naively refers to as its "western" tour.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
DEC 1 1946

Home-Grown Talent

NEW YORK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just engaged an American-born "first desk" player for the first time, is about a quarter of a century behind the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in this respect.

Of 22 "first desk" or leading instrumentalists in the New York orchestra, sixteen were born in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, New York city or Washington, D.C.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
DEC 1 1946

Boston Orchestra to Give Concerts Here Tomorrow and Tuesday Nights

By J. FRED LISSFELT
Sun-Telegraph Music Critic

THE ARRIVAL of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two concerts, tomorrow and Tuesday nights in Syria Mosque, is the signal for great rejoicing among Pittsburgh music lovers.

There seem to be no limitations to the expressions of beauty in the Boston orchestra, what with the long tenure of service among its players, their excellent instruments, and an imaginative director in Serge Koussevitzky.

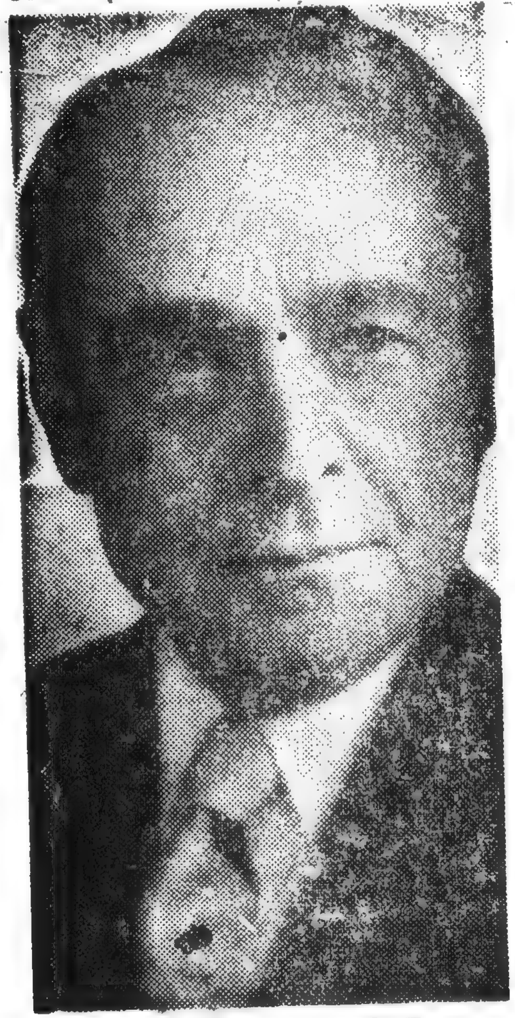
Programs Different

Two different programs are the offering, for tomorrow night Mendelssohn's sparkling "Italian Symphony," Debussy's "La Mer," a specialty of the orchestra, and Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony; for Tuesday night, Aaron Copland's "New Third Symphony," Ravel's "Pavane" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade Suite."

Particular interest centers about the Copland Symphony, for he is one of the leading exponents of American music, having written in all forms, including music for the radio.

We have heretofore known only Copland's shorter works for orchestra, such as he makes out of Mexican music.

* * *

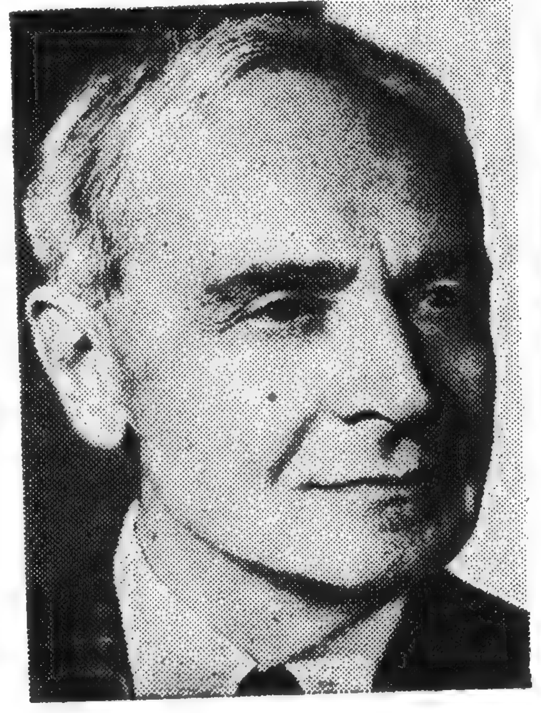


CONDUCTOR—

Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at concerts tomorrow an Tuesday nights at the Syri Mosque. There will be two di ferent programs.

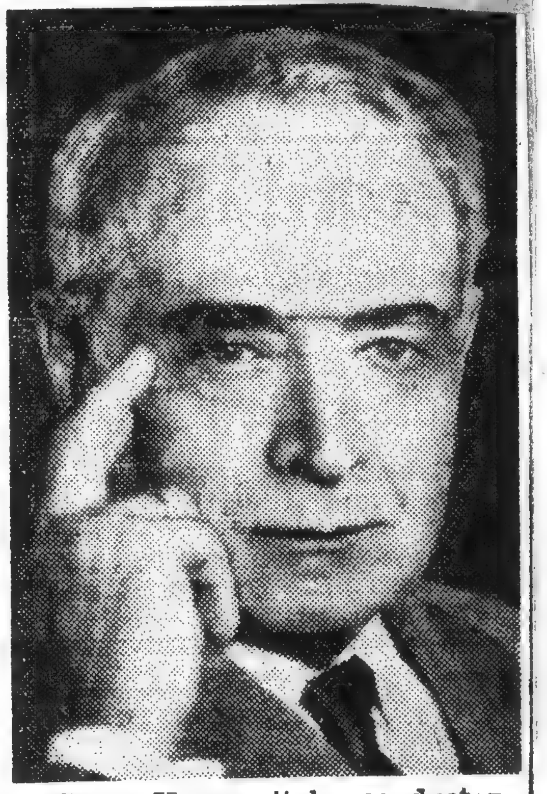
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 1 1946

CONDUCTOR



Serge K[illegible] conducts the Boston orchestra in two Orchestra hall concerts, Friday evening and next Sunday afternoon.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
DEC 2 1946

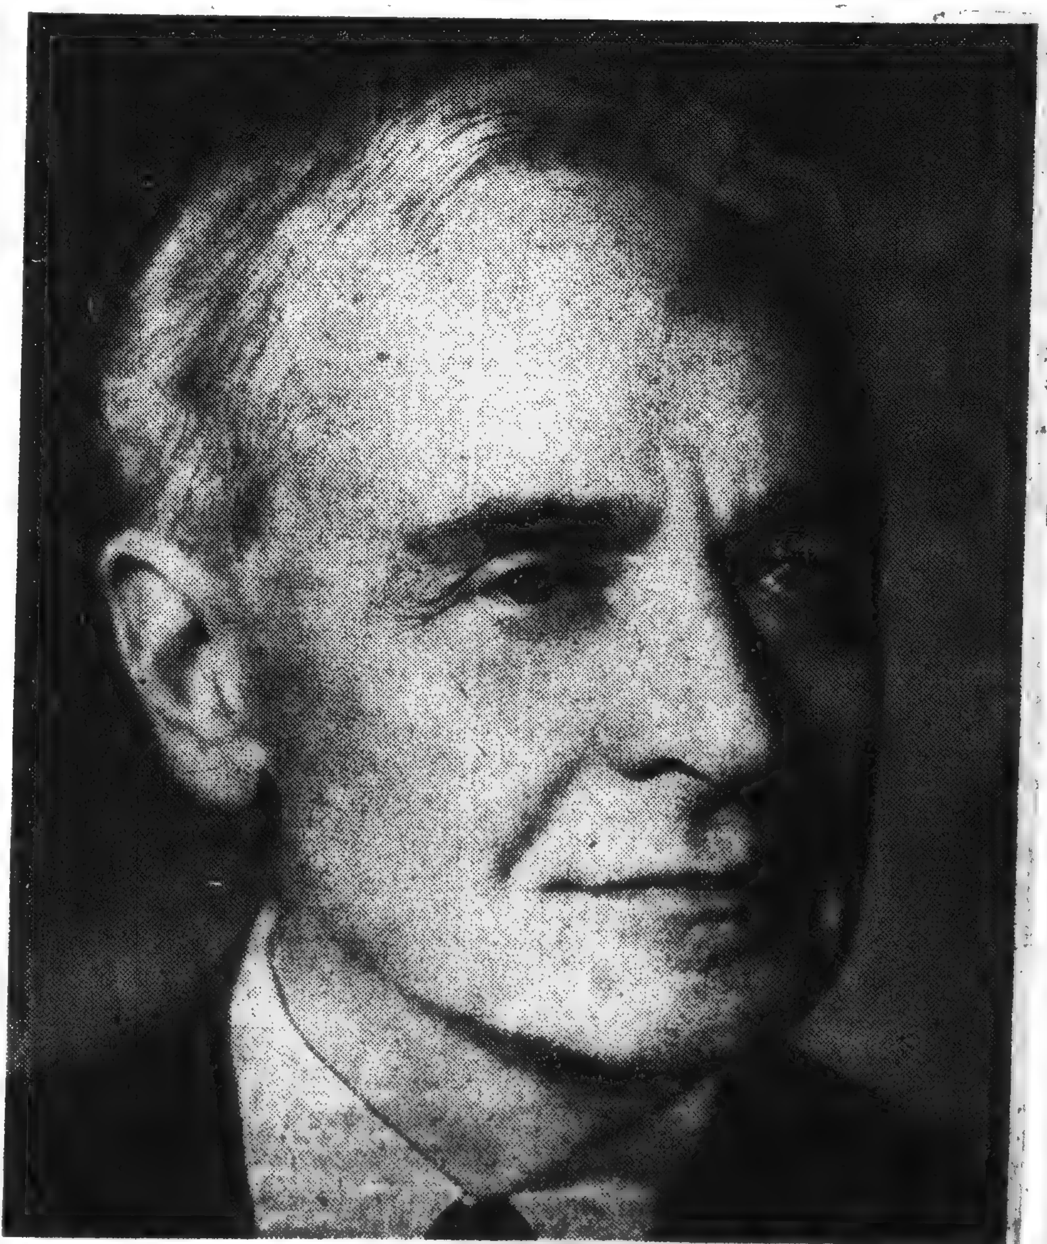


Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring his musical organization to the Masonic Temple Auditorium Dec. 10 for a concert at 8:20 p. m., the first in the series of four by visiting orchestras sponsored by Masonic Auditorium Concerts.

-1 1946

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directs the orchestra today, to be heard at 11 a. m. over WSAI.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
DEC 1 1946



ON THE PODIUM

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night, Sunday afternoon at Orchestra Hall.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
DEC 1 1946

THE CHICAGO SUN, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1946

Music Jottings and Notes

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its concerts at Orchestra Hall this week, members of the orchestra, who also are on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will hold auditions for students of orchestral instruments for the Music Center orchestra. These will be held at Orchestra hall on Saturday—strings at 10 a.m.; woodwinds, 11, and brass, 11:30.

A new orchestra, sponsored by the Chicago Park District, has been organized as the West Side Symphony Orchestra. It is directed by Hans L. Heniot, who will rehearse it on Sundays at Garfield Park, Gold Dome Bldg. from 2 to 4:30 each Sunday. Prospective new members will be auditioned at these rehearsals.

* * *

Manuel de Falla, famous Spanish composer who died at Alta Gracia, Brazil, Nov. 14, has requested in his will that his last work, the cantata, "Atlantida," be first performed at the Colon Theater, Buenos Aires, and under the baton of his friend, Jose Juan Castro. As the latter is not on speaking terms with the management of the house, from which he resigned in 1943, and which he has refused to enter since, there will be difficulty in carrying out the composer's intentions. Manuel de Falla left his estate to the Catholic Church and to charitable institutions.

* * *

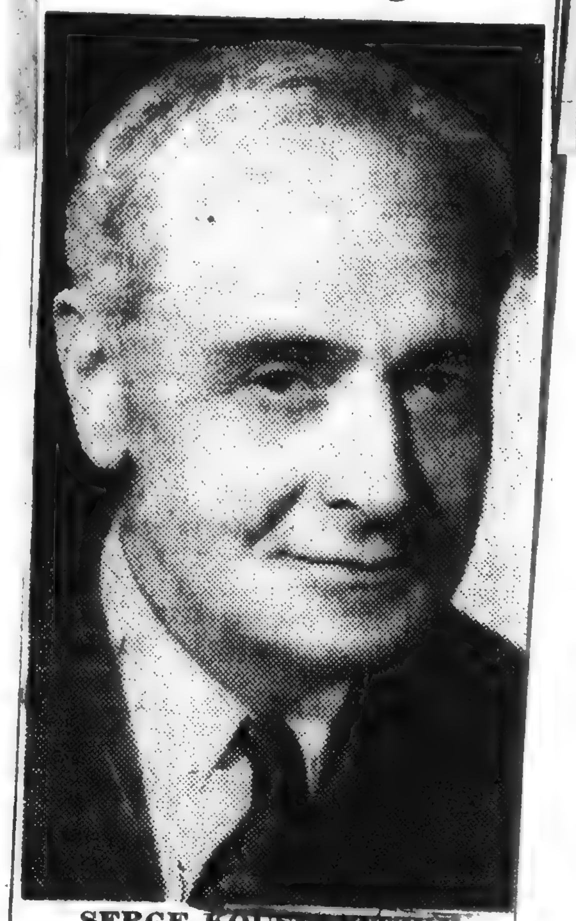
The Lake Forest Public Library has begun a series of three chamber music concerts, which Alfred E. Hamil, president of the library's directorate, says was inspired by the popularity and success of the Newberry Library's concerts last season.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 2 1946

Boston Symphony Here Two Nights



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The famed maestro will bring his equally famed Boston Symphony Orchestra to Syria Mosque for a concert tonight and another one tomorrow night. An hour of the Tuesday program will be broadcast coast-to-coast direct from the Mosque, by the way.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

DEC 2 1946

Tanglewood Shows $9,184 Season Loss

Festival Concerts Had $26,215 Profit—Music Center's Deficit of $35,400 Offsets It.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, last summer, produced a net profit of $26,215.99, but the Berkshire Music Center, operated at Tanglewood by the orchestra, went in the hole $35,400.08, leaving a net deficit of $9,184.09 for the Tanglewood season.

The figures are contained in a report issued at Boston by the Symphony orchestra.

The Festival concerts had income of $179,167.43 of which $150,521.58 was from ticket sales and $28,645.85 came from broadcasting. Expenses totaled $152,951.44. The Music Center had income of $41,834.75, mostly from tuition, and its expenses were $90,520.76. Gifts totaling $13,285.93 from friends reduced the operating deficit of the center to $35,400.08.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

DEC 3 - 1946

Composer Sues Barrington School For $100,000

Bohuslav Martinu, well-known Czech composer and violinist and faculty member at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, has filed a $100,000 tort action against the Barrington School, Great Barrington. He is represented by Atty. Frederick M. Myers of this city.

Martinu was a guest last summer at the Barrington School which he states was being operated as an inn. He claims to have sustained permanent injury in a fall at the school which he states resulted from carelessness and negligence on the part of the school in not keeping its premises safe.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

DEC 3 1946

Praise Here For Boston Orchestra

By J. FRED LISSFELT

This year's visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings us two concerts, the first of which Serge Koussevitsky directed in Syria Mosque last night. It was a "standing room only" audience.

The music was from among the best in this director's repertory, Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer", and Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

To speak of the orchestra is only to repeat platitudinous praise, and yet with each program one is assured again that it stands without equal in the world. Each man may well be a virtuoso but the blending of instrumental voices and their tone colors has been so perfect an accomplishment, that in the classics especially, one hears new voices with every repetition.

There are so many "asides" in the Mendelssohn symphony which come so beautifully to the fore among secondary instruments, inner voices which speak so modestly yet clearly. There is a brilliance never obscured by breathlessly fast tempi.

In Debussy, while conscious every moment of structure, Mr. Koussevitsky omits no opportunity for the most flexible expression of melody or realistic effect.

In a Tchaikowsky symphony the gamut of expression runs from the most plaintive folk tune to the most frenzied personal emotional spasms. The "Fourth" is especially happy in these nuances.

Tonight's program includes Copland's Third Symphony, Ravel's Pavane, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" Suite.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 3 - 1946

Koussevitzky To Lead Boston Orchestra In 17th Concert Here

Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony orchestra in the sixth concert of the Choral Union series at 8:30 Monday evening in Hill auditorium.

The program marks the 17th consecutive year that the orchestra has appeared in the Choral Union series.

Organized in 1881 by Georg Henschel, Boston resident, the orchestra since has been directed by Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Carl Muck, Pierre Montaux, and since 1924, by Koussevitsky.

A native of Russia, Koussevitzky came to the United States from Paris, where he had conducted the Concerts Koussevitsky for five years. He previously had conducted his own symphony orchestra in Russia, touring the Volga River cities and other principal music centers of Russia.

Recognized as the dean of orchestra conductors, Dr. Koussevitzky has brought the Boston group to the height of artistic fame, Dr. Sink says. Not only does he include the established classics in his programs, but he has been a leader in providing opportunities for modern composers to present their works to present day audiences.

The orchestra's program here will include Haydn's "Symphony in C minor," No. 95, the Suite from the ballet, "Chout" (Buffoon), Opus 21, by Prokofieff, and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 1 in E minor."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 3 1946

Koussevitzky And String Section Lauded

Boston Symphony Heard in Exceptional Concert at Mosque

By Donald Steinfirst

I tried to analyze the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance last night at Syria Mosque to determine if possible why, in so many respects it is the greatest symphonic organization in the world. It was a more or less hopeless task and it interfered considerably with my enjoyment of the music.

It was difficult, too, because every time I had determined in my own mind just what was so good, something happened on the stage to make me change my mind. But it was nonetheless a rewarding task.

Certainly the orchestra itself seemed to be the same as it always has been. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky was conducting, as he has for so many years. Some men of the orchestra have been in their seats so long they must seem like old friends to consistent listeners of the orchestra's annual Pittsburgh concerts.

Familiar Program

The program was a familiar one, consisting of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and "La Mer" of Debussy. This is a list that any symphony-goer listens to with pleasant remembrances and one that the Boston Symphony members can probably play with their eyes closed.

I think that the answer to my query lies in the tone quality of the string section around which Dr. Koussevitzky has built his magnificent structure. The woodwinds, good as they are, occasionally play out of tune and the brass with the individual warm muffled tone of this particular orchestra, plays brilliantly but unobtrusively. The French horns occasionally muff a note, after the habit of French horns the world over, but the strings are incredible. They play with an effulgence and sonority that carries all before it. There is a mellowness that has the aura that age imparts to everything intrinsically fine. It is an ineffable joy to hear them.

Shows His Musicianship

Added, too, are the additional, perhaps, primary virtues that are Dr. Koussevitzky's. Given an orchestral instrument that is split-second in its response and attentions to the conductor, it is in the use of these powers and prerogatives that his musicianship shines. He could use them unwisely. He does not. When he calls for a crescendo he gets a magnificent surge of music or by a flick of the finger he gets a diminuendo so soft one can almost hear the bows slowing on the strings.

But his direction is never mannered nor for that matter peculiarly stylistic. It was as embracing in the happy joie-de-vivre of the bouncy slow section of the Mendelssohn as it was in the fiery Saltarello of the last movement. It was as evident in the diaphanous Debussy as it was in revealing all the details of the thrice-familiar Tschaikowsky.

All three major works were sensitively led even to the very last measure. Each was exciting in a different way, the Mendelssohn "Italian" for its very simple and likable tunefulness, the Debussy for its merging of tone with color to produce effect and the Tschaikowsky for its pulsating and driving rhythmic grace.

There will be another performance of the Boston Symphony tonight at the Mosque under Dr. Koussevitzky. A different but probably just as interesting a program will be heard. Attendance is urged by this reporter.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

DEC 3 - 1946

Boston Orchestra On Annual Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, has started its western tour, which this year has been extended to include 10 concerts.

At the Syria Mosque in Pittsburgh, Pa., the orchestra played last night and will play this evening; in the Music Hall, Cleveland, Ohio, tomorrow evening; at the Museum of Art, Toledo, Ohio, Thursday evening; Orchestra Hall, Chicago, Friday evening; and the Auditorium, Milwaukee, Wis., Sunday afternoon. In the following week they will play in the Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, Mich.; the Masonic Temple, Detroit, Tuesday evening; and the Eastman Theatre, Rochester, N.Y., Wednesday evening. They will return to Boston in time for the regular Friday and Saturday concerts at Symphony Hall, Dec. 13 and 14.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

DEC 4 1946

The Berkshire Festival concerts last summer netted $26,215, but the Berkshire Music Center, a school, went in the red, leaving a combined net deficit of $9,184 for the two enterprises.

POST

DEC 3 - 1946

Boston Symphony Offer Program from Pittsburg

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will take the podium at 9:30 toni WFMJ to conduct the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra thro colorful music program which will be presented from the Syria M in Pittsburgh.

Koussevitzky, who has responded to many requests, will present two very familiar numbers for the broadcast. The orchestra will be heard in the opening selection of Ravel's "Pavanne pour une Infante defunte." The four movements of the colorful suite, "Scheherazade," the well known story of "1.000 and One Nights," will complete the program.

Dr. Koussevitzky

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 3 1946

Famed Conductor Lauds Pittsburgh Audiences for Being So Attentive

Serge Made Them Fidget 22 Years Ago

By BETTY-JO DANIELS

Twenty-two years ago Pittsburgh audiences twisted in their chairs and shuffled their feet and manicured their nails when Serge Koussevitsky conducted "new music"—modern compositions.

Today the City's audience is one of the most attentive—they listen with interest—to Mr. Koussevitsky's crusade into the realm of the future.

The famed conductor of the Boston Symphony since 1924 arrived here yesterday to conduct concerts at Syria Mosque last night and tonight.

Praises Copland's Symphony

And he brought with him what he calls one of the "most important musical compositions ever done in America"—Aaron Copland's Third Symphony.

"It will come a day when the Copland Symphony will be as popular as Tschaikowsky's Fifth," the 72-year-old conductor enthused.

And that's really saying something. For years and years Mr. Koussevitsky has championed Russian music as well as American.

Founded Publishing Firm

In 1909 he founded a publishing company for Russian composers, simply because he felt sorry for them.

"Why do you know what Rachmaninoff received for his Prelude in C Sharp Minor—you know the one that goes like this"—and Mr. Koussevitsky gestured with his smooth-skinned hands and sang 'dum-dum-dum,' rippling imaginary piano chords as he went.

"Fifteen dollars he got. And his publishers got rich!" he remonstrated.

Composer at Seven

The ruddy-faced, blue-eyed musician—who smiles frequently and talks eagerly about everything except himself—was born in Russia. His father was a violin player, but he wanted his son, Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, to have no part of music.

But he couldn't stop him—nobody could. When he was five he "already crazy," he smiled. And by seven, though he didn't know how, he was composing.

At 14 he left high school, after telling his principal that he simply had to study music, that Latin and Greek were nothing to him, so he journeyed alone to Moscow.

Won Scholarship

He had no money, knew nobody. Knew only that music demanded of him.

He wangled a scholarship from the Conservatory there—but only on the condition that he would take up one of the more difficult—and unpopular—instruments. Bassoon, trombone, or double bass.

He chose double bass. And in five months became what other bass players take five years to accomplish. And, finally, the only bass virtuoso in the world.

Two Before Him

"There were two before me—one during Beethoven's time. His name was Dragonetti. Then 50 years later there was another, Bottesini, and 50 years another. It was I."

He became a virtuoso when his music teacher said that unless he started doing better in his music he would have to leave school. So he did. He watched string players, and decided, "If a violin can sing like a soprano, a cello like a baritone, why can't a bass sound like a basso."

That's what he worked on. He employed violin, cello and viola techniques in his playing. The was no concerto for his instrumen so he wrote one, and played it wit. principal orchestra all over th. world.

Denies He'll Retire

It's been 12 years since he's touched his bass, though, "And every year it grows farther away. I am sorry, but I do not have the time," he reflected.

The rumors—and they seem to make the rounds every once in a while—to the effect that Mr. Koussevitsky plans to retire as conductor of the Boston Symphony are entirely untrue, he says.

He has no children—but his musicians are his children. They and all the American composers he can think of, He loves them all and will not leave them.

To Record Symphony

When he does stop conducting, however, he plans to write an autobiography. "So far I don't know when that will be." And he knocked on wood.

Mr. Koussevitsky is playing the Copland Symphony tonight. He plans to record it in March. "Then we shall wait and see how long it is before it becomes like the Tschaikowsky," he smiled.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
He likes Pittsburgh audiences.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

DEC 4 1946

TANGLEWOOD MUSIC DEFICIT IS $9,184

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts by the Boston Sym~~phony Orchestra at Tanglewood,~~ Stockbridge, last summer, produced a net profit of $26,215.99 but the Berkshire Music Center, operated at Tanglewood by the orchestra, went in the hole $35,400.08, leaving a net deficit of $9,184.09 for the Tanglewood season.

The Festival concerts had income of $179,167.43 of which $150-521.58 was from ticket sales and $28,645.85 cae from broadcasting Expenses totaled $152,951.44. The Music Center had income of $41-834.75, mostly from tuition, and its expenses were $90,520.76. Gifts totaling $13,285.93 from friends reduced the operating deficit of the center to $35,400.08.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 3 1946

Koussevitzky's Concert Here Is Unforgettable

Orchestra's Amazing Powers Revealed In Last Night's Performance

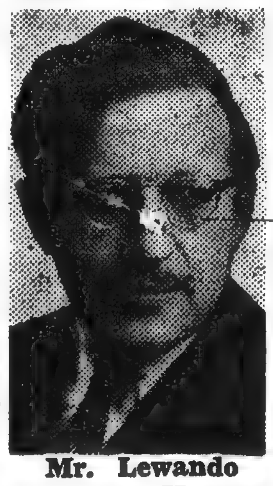
By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

We are grateful for the annual concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. For in the revealment of the orchestra's amazing powers and its conductor's communicative interpretative gifts listeners are always stirred and provided with an unforgettable artistic experience.

This was repeated last night. A huge audience came to absorb an impelling musical message and to pay homage to the performers.

The program comprised Mendelssohn's 4th (Italian) symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," and Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony.

From every angle the performance was perfect, but more than perfect was the extraordinary expressional force evinced by the players under the inspiring and galvanic leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky.



Mr. Lewando

Perfect Performance

Each of the program items many have been heard time and again, but as performed on the occasion new vistas of loveliness and tonal beauty were opened in a manner that kept the audience enrapt.

For instance, Mendelssohn's works are supposed to be losing their hold. Not as Dr. Koussevitzky interprets it, though, through the medium of his excellent musicians. The "Italian" symphony took on added warmth and brilliancy, poesy and charm under his ministrations. The entire work glowed like a bright summer day.

Artistry at Peak

To listen to them perform is overwhelming. One need not be of the cognoscenti to realize that here is a great orchestra that is unsurpassed in every department, thanks to the guidance of Dr. Koussevitzky who has brought it to its present high estate and maintains its artistry at the peak.

Debussy's "The Sea" was extraordinary in exotic unfoldment.

Its poetic vitality and splashing tonal colors, its marvelous depiction of the ocean and wind was set forth with inspiring articulation. Like the playing of the Mendelssohn work it was received with tremendous approbation that recalled the conductor to share the success with the orchestra.

A brilliant presentation of the Tschaikowsky work brought the memorable concert to an end amid a demonstration of applause.

Tonight the Orchestra will play Aaron Copland's new 3rd symphony, Ravel's Pavane and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although it came two days late, yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was in the nature of a very nice Christmas present. The all-French program, to be repeated this evening and tomorrow afternoon, was conducted by a man well qualified for the job, Charles Muench of Paris, now on his first visit to the United States. That well-known adjective, dynamic, suits Mr. Muench admirably, but there is something very solid about him, too, and there is reason to regret that his present visit is so short.

Unlike his countryman, Paul Paray, who visited us a year ago, Mr. Muench elected to introduce himself to Boston through unfamiliar music. The only number on his program already known here was the concluding item, Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor with organ, which we last heard in February, 1938, and not too often in the years immediately preceding.

The new pieces, none of them hard to get or difficult to take, were a "Sonata a due" by Maurice Jaubert, who was killed in action in 1940; the Second Suite from Roussel's Ballet, "Ariane et Bacchus," and Honegger's Symphony for strings, with optional trumpet in the coda of the finale. It was used yesterday and with electrifying effect. To fall back on an always-useful metaphor, Jaubert's piece, for strings with solo violin and cello, is a case of new wine in an old bottle. However, the wine is not new enough to endanger the container. Mr. Jaubert writes discreetly and skilfully in frank simulation of the ancient manner. Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti as the soloists, and the small group of string players acquitted themselves admirably. This high level of performance was sustained throughout the afternoon.

You could sum up the other novelties briefly by saying that Honegger's Symphony has something in it and Roussel's Suite everything, including Wagner and Strauss as well as Ravel and Roussel himself. However, it made such excellent and satisfying listening that you wondered why a piece that good, on the market for 14 years, had been withheld from us so long. Composed in Paris during the German occupation, Honeggar's Symphony expresses not a little of the sorrow and bitterness that filled the minds and hearts of the French people at that time. The finale is exciting and the whole work bespeaks its composer's mastery.

In a performance less discerning, less intense than the one accorded it yesterday, Saint-Saens' 60-year-old Symphony can seem no more than a well constructed bit of musical mechanics, with a sentimental slow movement and a sententious conclusion. As presented by Mr. Muench, it was good to hear again.

[46]

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC - 4 1946

Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Give Rousing Concert at Mosque

Conductor Still Vibrant Leader at 70; Presentation of Copeland Work Praised

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

To observe Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to know the meaning of intense, vivid and vibrant leadership and to realize its communicative power.

To listen to this orchestra is to know what ensemble artistry is and should be.

The marvelous blending of this amazing conductor's personality with that of his musicians produces a result that is rousing to the soul and a contribution to those experiences that make real living worth while.

Mr. Lewando

Last night at Syria Mosque this eminent leader and magnificent orchestra played another program to a full house. The audience not only enjoyed the performance— it was thrilled, and it evidenced its appreciation with sustained applause.

The program consisted of Aaron Conland's new Third Symphony, Ravel's Pavane pour une Infante, defunte, and Rimsly-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." The last two numbers were broadcast over a network via WCAE.

Mr. Copland is in the forefront of American composers. He has created many interesting works in various forms. He is a master craftsman, full of imagination and inventiveness.

Pretentious Work

His 3rd symphony is a pretentious composition. In four movements—the third and fourth are played without pause—the work as a whole is of commanding interest.

This symphony is modern in every sense of the term. That means that Mr. Copland indulges in the engaging art of applied dissonance, which may not be so pleasing to those who like their music simple and conservative.

Yet this is music of our times. Good music, too. It breathes vigor, reveals skilled handling and is full of rhythmic complexities of definite exciting appeal. Even jitterbugs would reveal in listening to the clever time schemes. But do not think this is jitterbug music. It isn't by any flight of imagination.

Conductor Still Energetic

When one listens to the remarkable fanfares that open and close this glowing work one is aware of the wholesomeness of Mr. Copland's broad endowments. It is a symphony that bears repetition.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his endless capacity for energetic effort performed a herculean feat in interpreting this brilliant work, and the orchestra responded in kind.

Dr. Koussevitzky has done yeoman service in the cause of the American composer. They are indebted no end to his perserving interest and desire to bring American works to the attention of the musical public. At 72 this grand man of the baton is as full of exuberance in his art as he was years ago.

Praises Reiner

We had an intimate chat with him during intermission. He dwelt for some time upon Dr. Fritz Reiner. He said that Pittsburgh should be proud of its conductor. He said Dr. Reiner "is a great man of music who has done wonders for the Pittsburgh Symphony and for this city."

He was much interested in what music our orchestra is performing and showed excited interest in a piece he'd like to perform in Boston which the Pittsburgh Orchestra is playing this week-end. It is Bartok's music from the pantomine "The Miraculous Mandarin," parts of which Dr. Reiner has extracted and arranged in the form of a suite.

Back to the program. The Pavane was revealed in all of its exquisite color, and the Korsakoff piece, always an audience favorite was played with poetic charm.

The violin solos of Concertmaster Richard Burgin were played with superlative tonal quality and fullness of expressional warmth.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1946

The Berkshire Festival concerts last summer netted $26,213 but the Berkshire Music Center, a school, ~~went in the red, leaving~~ a combined net deficit of $9,184 for the two enterprises.

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1946

Sheer Beauty of Tone Marks Boston Symphony Concert

BY HERBERT ELWELL

Always an event of the first magnitude in Cleveland music circles, the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Public Music Hall produced its customary effect on an audience of major proportions. It was an effect of tremendous enthusiasm expressed in persistent recalls to the stage of that veteran dynamo of leadership whose name has become synonymous with this admirable orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Now in his 72d year, this extraordinary musical personality continues to impress his own indomitable spirit upon this group and permeate it to an uncanny degree. From this body of expert musicians, who seem to anticipate every movement of his lips, to say nothing of what he communicates with his hands, Koussevitzky draws beauty of sound with all the energy and tenacity of a bee extracting pollen from a flower. And if ever there was a magic powder capable of fertilizing the imagination of the listener, it is certainly to be found in the particular brand of star dust employed by this eminent virtuoso of the baton.

One was carried away, not only by the zestful conviction and subtle nuance that went into every phrase of the music, but by the sheer beauty of tone which comes from every section of the orchestra.

Slightly Intoxicating

There is something so luxuriant about it as to become slightly intoxicating, and there was one particular phrase from the brasses, in the middle of Debussy's "La Mer," that was like nothing that ever came out of a cylindrical tube. Instruments actually lose their identity in a crucible of glowing emotion and become one as they transmit the feeling of their director, who in turn distills pure feeling from the printed page.

But why, please, do the visitors from Boston feel obliged to give us a program consisting of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and Tschaikovsky's Four Symphony? Obviously they do not realize what an indelible impression they make, and that people remember their having performed these same works here many times before. Perhaps, also they may not realize that, remote as we may be from the centers of civilization, we frequently hear other orchestras play these thrice familiar works. We do not necessarily expect them to give us entirely new music, but some of us at least would like to hear them play something different.

The orchestra appeared as one of the events in the course sponsored by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

BY ELMORE BACON

Maestro Koussevitzky tip-toed through a gorgeous garden of melody last night at Music Hall and picked a stunning bouquet of Mendelssohn roses, Debussy mums and Tschaikowsky violets, gladioli and sunflowers.

Playing to a hall crowded to capacity his Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed all of its virtuosity. The distinguished director offered a vigorous, virile performance of the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony. He matched it with such a clairvoyant presentation of the Debussy "La Mer" as to give its impressionism reality. And fairly leaped into a demonstration of the fireworks and romance of the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

As in the past the Koussevitzky batoning was dynamic. And the response from his symphonists was electric in its certainty and its expressive attunement—a radar demonstration in music. A flip of his fingers and that grand string section sang its heart out. A curl of his knuckles and the woodwinds gave till it hurt. A pursing of his lips and the brasses went into ecstasy. A toss of his head and the harps glissed their glissandos.

• • •

It was all very exciting. And after each number the famous maestro and his musicians had many recalls—a fine demonstration richly deserved. There can be no question but that Cleveland likes these Boston symphonists. And they play as though they like to come here.

In the Debussy trio of symphonic sketches portraying moods of the sea, the Koussevitzky direction reached its zenith of perfection. Under his baton these unique musical pictures of the ocean took on a new depth and meaning. There was something individual and human about the "Dialog of the Wind and Sea." The Koussevitzky touch pointed the surge and flow of these sketches with an emotionalism out of which were materialized in vision, the dancing of water sprites, the exultant procession of Neptune and his court, with the blowing of conch shells, and the tormenting cries of the water demons. There as the glint of the sunlight on the ppling surface, the noontide peace the sheltered bays. The climactic ose revealed a sea unconquered, a ystic au revoir that leaves a curl g oceancomber hanging in midair. There was a fine Koussevitzky pol on the Mendelssohn work. As s often been pointed out, there's t much purely Italian about this sic, apart from the Saltarello fi le. It was a vigorous perform ce which revealed the beautiful ging tone of the violin section d the expressive skill of the ma ro.

he Tschaikowsky Fourth has n played here before by the stons. And as in the past it was given a highly emotional performance. The tempi sometimes was too fast for our liking, especially in the pizzicato movement. We thought the pace sometimes obscured the melodic design. However, Koussevitzky reveled in this brilliant display and stirred the big crowd to a fine demonstration at the close of the fiery finale.

The concert was a feature of the Cleveland Civic Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno. The next feature—an extra—is the [illegible]cital by Maggie Teyte, distinguished English singer, tomorrow night at he ballroom of Public Hall.

DEC 5 - 1946

Boston Symphony Again Proves Tops in Artistry

By ARTHUR LOESSER
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, a combination generally accepted as being the paragon of symphonic excellence, appeared here again last night at Music Hall. The event was one of the series presented by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association managed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

The performance again demonstrated the reason for the Boston's exalted reputation; on all ordinary counts: tone quality, balance of choirs, precision, individual artistry, it amply confirmed the orchestra's right to stand on the snowiest pinnacles of achievement.

On the whole the most convincing offering of the evening was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, which occupied the entire second half of the program. It was in the nervous melancholy, the hysterical pathos, the suave courtesy of this work that Koussevitzky seemed to feel most at home, and where his interpretation achieved the highest measure of authenticity. A thrilling performance was given; the audience applauded loud and long.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony opened the program. It, too, was brilliantly realized; however, it could be argued that, except for the final "saltarello," the chaste, if lively, sentiments of this most gentlemanly of composers could have been even more successfully projected if they had not been so resolutely streamlined.

On the other hand one might conceivably reply to this that the tempos actually envisaged by composers who knew neither railroads nor telegraphs might well be insufferably dull to modern nerves.

Debussy's three orchestral sketches, La Mer, formed the remainder of the program. This congeries of suggestive melodic fragments and splashes of tone-colors gave fine opportunity for the display of individual skills on the part of many Boston players.

The house was completely sold out. Enthusiasm ran high.

Pittsburgh Dec 4

Koussevitzky Pleases ith Varied Repertoire

Boston Symphony Gives New Work By Aaron Copland Its Premiere Here

By Donald Steinfirst

The second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Syria Mosque under Serge Koussevitzky's leadership listed a novelty, a symphonic war-horse and a transition piece. The new work, completed less than three months ago and heard for the first time in Pittsburgh, was the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland. The familiar work was the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the shorter work was Ravel's delicious "Pavanne pour une Infante Defunte."

It is a tribute to Pittsburgh concert-goers that Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to let us hear a new work. He has long been an acting supporter of young American composers and has insisted that auditors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both at home and on the road, listen to new music. And rightly so, for unless music continues to draw from fresh well-springs to renew itself it will stagnate and die. Then too, the concerts of the visiting orchestras have too long been drawn from the classics of the repertoire. It is fresh and more or less daring to offer Pittsburgh Mr. Copland's new work, and the deafening and obviously spontaneous applause and "bravos" that were heard at the conclusion of the Symphony must have confirmed Dr. Koussevitzky's good judgment.

Large Ovation Given

The very last pages of the Copland work were the kind that lead to large ovations. They brought the music to a terrific climactic crescendo conclusion and as such they were truly evocative. Previously however, much of the last movement had been confused and complicated. And it may as well be said here also that this last movement was far too long for the content.

The opening brass fanfare was rather typical of Mr. Copland's continual engrossment in the percussive which also appeared in the second movement where there was far too much sound and fury. With a profound and wise knowledge of the extensive qualities of the modern symphonic orchestra, it is possible for as honest and sincere a composer as Mr. Copland to build tremendous walls of brass and tympani and other percussion to terrifying sounds and this was the net result of the 2nd and 4th movements.

The opening section was rather stark. Here one heard the familiar devices which the composer had used to such good advantage in the far superior "Appalachian Spring." In the 3rd slow section, the conductor was on his firmest ground. He handled the string writing beautifully and if there were an unconscious reference here and there to Shostakovich, why not? He is a good composer, too.

Pavanne Pleased

After the Copland Symphony, and like so much cool fresh air after a sultry day, the Ravel Pavanne with its delicate stately theme and its quasi-modern harmonic structure that always looks back to the ancients, seemed a delightful few minutes. The Bostonians played it with so much grace, so much elegance and so much restraint that it at once became a high spot of the concert.

The concluding "Scheherazade" was an ideal work for the highly colored pallete of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra. If "Scheherazade" has a place at all in the modern serious repertoire of symphonic orchestras, performances of the kind heard last night will certainly help to keep it there. The many violin solos were eloquently played by Richard Burgin and a long list of other soloists were heard particularly among the winds and the solo cellist played beautifully and warmly.

The concert was heard by a large and highly enthusiastic and appreciative audience.

[47]

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC - 4 1946

Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Give Rousing Concert at Mosque

Conductor Still Vibrant Leader at 70; Presentation of Copeland Work Praised

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

To observe Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to know the meaning of intense, vivid and vibrant leadership and to realize its communicative power.

To listen to this orchestra is to know what ensemble artistry is and should be.

The marvelous blending of this amazing conductor's personality with that of his musicians produces a result that is rousing to the soul and a contribution to those experiences that make real living worth while.

Mr. Lewando

Last night at Syria Mosque this eminent leader and magnificent orchestra played another program to a full house. The audience not only enjoyed the performance— it was thrilled, and it evidenced its appreciation with sustained applause.

The program consisted of Aaron Conland's new Third Symphony, Ravel's Pavane pour une Infante, defunte, and Rimsly-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade." The last two numbers were broadcast over a network via WCAE.

Mr. Copland is in the forefront of American composers. He has created many interesting works in various forms. He is a master craftsman, full of imagination and inventiveness.

Pretentious Work

His 3rd symphony is a pretentious composition. In four movements—the third and fourth are played without pause—the work as a whole is of commanding interest.

This symphony is modern in every sense of the term. That means that Mr. Copland indulges in the engaging art of applied dissonance, which may not be so pleasing to those who like their music simple and conservative.

Yet this is music of our times. Good music, too. It breathes vigor, reveals skilled handling and is full of rhythmic complexities of definite exciting appeal. Even jitterbugs would reveal in listening to the clever time schemes. But do not think this is jitterbug music. It isn't by any flight of imagination.

Conductor Still Energetic

When one listens to the remarkable fanfares that open and close this glowing work one is aware of the wholesomeness of Mr. Copland's broad endowments. It is a symphony that bears repetition.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his endless capacity for energetic effort performed a herculean feat in interpreting this brilliant work, and the orchestra responded in kind.

Dr. Koussevitzky has done yeoman service in the cause of the American composer. They are indebted no end to his perserving interest and desire to bring American works to the attention of the musical public. At 72 this grand man of the baton is as full of exuberance in his art as he was years ago.

Praises Reiner

We had an intimate chat with him during intermission. He dwelt for some time upon Dr. Fritz Reiner. He said that Pittsburgh should be proud of its conductor. He said Dr. Reiner "is a great man of music who has done wonders for the Pittsburgh Symphony and for this city."

He was much interested in what music our orchestra is performing and showed excited interest in a piece he'd like to perform in Boston which the Pittsburgh Orchestra is playing this week-end. It is Bartok's music from the pantomine "The Miraculous Mandarin," parts of which Dr. Reiner has extracted and arranged in the form of a suite.

Back to the program. The Pavane was revealed in all of its exquisite color, and the Korsakoff piece, always an audience favorite, was played with poetic charm.

The violin solos of Concertmaster Richard Burgin were played with superlative tonal quality and fullness of expressional warmth.

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1946

Sheer Beauty of Tone Marks Boston Symphony Concert

BY HERBERT ELWELL

Always an event of the first magnitude in Cleveland music circles, the annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Public Music Hall produced its customary effect on an audience of major proportions. It was an effect of tremendous enthusiasm expressed in persistent recalls to the stage of that veteran dynamo of leadership whose name has become synonymous with this admirable orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Now in his 72d year, this extraordinary musical personality continues to impress his own indomitable spirit upon this group and permeate it to an uncanny degree. From this body of expert musicians, who seem to anticipate every movement of his lips, to say nothing of what he communicates with his hands, Koussevitzky draws beauty of sound with all the energy and tenacity of a bee extracting pollen from a flower. And if ever there was a magic powder capable of fertilizing the imagination of the listener, it is certainly to be found in the particular brand of star dust employed by this eminent virtuoso of the baton.

One was carried away, not only by the zestful conviction and subtle nuance that went into every phrase of the music, but by the sheer beauty of tone which comes from every section of the orchestra.

Slightly Intoxicating

There is something so luxuriant about it as to become slightly intoxicating, and there was one particular phrase from the brasses, in the middle of Debussy's "La Mer," that was like nothing that ever came out of a cylindrical tube. Instruments actually lose their identity in a crucible of glowing emotion and become one as they transmit the feeling of their director, who in turn distills pure feeling from the printed page.

But why, please, do the visitors from Boston feel obliged to give us a program consisting of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and Tschaikovsky's Four Symphony? Obviously they do not realize what an indelible impression they make, and that people remember their having performed these same works here many times before. Perhaps, also they may not realize that, remote as we may be from the centers of civilization, we frequently hear other orchestras play these thrice familiar works. We do not necessarily expect them to give us entirely new music, but some of us at least would like to hear them play something different.

The orchestra appeared as one of the events in the course sponsored by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1946

The Berkshire Festival concerts last summer netted $26,215 but the Berkshire Music Center, a school, ~~went in the red, leaving~~ a combined net deficit of $9,184 for the two enterprises.

BY ELMORE BACON

Maestro Koussevitzky tip-toed through a gorgeous garden of melody last night at Music Hall and picked a stunning bouquet of Mendelssohn roses, Debussy mums and Tschaikowsky violets, gladioli and sunflowers.

Playing to a hall crowded to capacity his Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed all of its virtuosity. The distinguished director offered a vigorous, virile performance of the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony. He matched it with such a clairvoyant presentation of the Debussy "La Mer" as to give its impressionism reality. And fairly leaped into a demonstration of the fireworks and romance of the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

As in the past the Koussevitzky batoning was dynamic. And the response from his symphonists was electric in its certainty and its expressive attunement—a radar demonstration in music. A flip of his fingers and that grand string section sang its heart out. A curl of his knuckles and the woodwinds gave till it hurt. A pursing of his lips and the brasses went into ecstasy. A toss of his head and the harps glissed their glissandos.

• • •

It was all very exciting. And after each number the famous maestro and his musicians had many recalls—a fine demonstration richly deserved. There can be no question but that Cleveland likes these Boston symphonists. And they play as though they like to come here.

In the Debussy trio of symphonic sketches portraying moods of the sea, the Koussevitzky direction reached its zenith of perfection. Under his baton these unique musical pictures of the ocean took on a new depth and meaning. There was something individual and human about the "Dialog of the Wind and Sea." The Koussevitzky touch pointed the surge and flow of these sketches with an emotionalism out of which were materialized in vision, the dancing of water sprites, the exultant procession of Neptune and his court, with the blowing of conch shells, and the tormenting cries of the water demons. There was the glint of the sunlight on the rippling surface, the noontide peace of the sheltered bays. The climactic close revealed a sea unconquered, a mystic au revoir that leaves a curling oceancomber hanging in midair.

There was a fine Koussevitzy polish on the Mendelssohn work. As has often been pointed out, there's not much purely Italian about this music, apart from the Saltarello finale. It was a vigorous performance which revealed the beautiful singing tone of the violin section and the expressive skill of the maestro.

The Tschaikowsky Fourth has been played here before by the Bostons. And as in the past it was given a highly emotional performance. The tempi sometimes was too fast for our liking, especially in the pizzicato movement. We thought the pace sometimes obscured the melodic design. However, Koussevitzky reveled in this brilliant display and stirred the big crowd to a fine demonstration at the close of the fiery finale.

The concert was a feature of the Cleveland Civic Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno. The next feature—an extra—is the recital by Maggie Teyte, distinguished English singer, tomorrow night at the ballroom of Public Hall.

DEC 5 - 1946

Boston Symphony Again Proves Tops in Artistry

By ARTHUR LOESSER
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, a combination generally accepted as being the paragon of symphonic excellence, appeared here again last night at Music Hall. The event was one of the series presented by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association managed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

The performance again demonstrated the reason for the Boston's exalted reputation; on all ordinary counts: tone quality, balance of choirs, precision, individual artistry, it amply confirmed the orchestra's right to stand on the snowiest pinnacles of achievement.

On the whole the most convincing offering of the evening was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, which occupied the entire second half of the program. It was in the nervous melancholy, the hysterical pathos, the suave courtesy of this work that Koussevitzky seemed to feel most at home, and where his interpretation achieved the highest measure of authenticity. A thrilling performance was given; the audience applauded loud and long.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony opened the program. It, too, was brilliantly realized; however, it could be argued that, except for the final "saltarello," the chaste, if lively, sentiments of this most gentlemanly of composers could have been even more successfully projected if they had not been so resolutely streamlined.

On the other hand one might conceivably reply to this that the tempos actually envisaged by composers who knew neither railroa nor telegraphs might well be sufferably dull to modern nerv

Debussy's three orchestr sketches, La Mer, formed the mainder of the program. T congeries of suggestive melo fragments and splashes of to colors gave fine opportunity for display of individual skills on part of many Boston players.

The house was completely out. Enthusiasm ran high.

Pittsburgh Dec 4

Koussevitzky Pleases ith Varied Repertoire

Boston Symphony Gives New Work By Aaron Copland Its Premiere Here

By Donald Steinfirst

The second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Syria Mosque under Serge Koussevitzky's leadership listed a novelty, a symphonic war-horse and a transition piece. The new work, completed less than three months ago and heard for the first time in Pittsburgh, was the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland. The familiar work was the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the shorter work was Ravel's delicious "Pavanne pour une Infante Defunte."

It is a tribute to Pittsburgh concert-goers that Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to let us hear a new work. He has long been an acting supporter of young American composers and has insisted that auditors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both at home and on the road, listen to new music. And rightly so, for unless music continues to draw from fresh wellsprings to renew itself it will stagnate and die. Then too, the concerts of the visiting orchestras have too long been drawn from the classics of the repertoire. It is fresh and more or less daring to offer Pittsburgh Mr. Copland's new work, and the deafening and obviously spontaneous applause and "bravos" that were heard at the conclusion of the Symphony must have confirmed Dr. Koussevitzky's good judgment.

Large Ovation Given

The very last pages of the Copland work were the kind that lead to large ovations. They brought the music to a terrific climactic crescendo conclusion and as such they were truly evocative. Previously however, much of the last movement had been confused and complicated. And it may as well be said here also that this last movement was far too long for the content.

The opening brass fanfare was rather typical of Mr. Copland's continual engrossment in the percussive which also appeared in the second movement where there was far too much sound and fury. With a profound and wise knowledge of the extensive qualities of the modern symphonic orchestra, it is possible for as honest and sincere a composer as Mr. Copland to build tremendous walls of brass and tympani and other percussion to terrifying sounds and this was the net result of the 2nd and 4th movements.

The opening section was rather stark. Here one heard the familiar devices which the composer had used to such good advantage in the far superior "Appalachian Spring." In the 3rd slow section, the conductor was on his firmest ground. He handled the string writing beautifully and if there were an unconscious reference here and there to Shostakovich, why not? He is a good composer, too.

Pavanne Pleased

After the Copland Symphony, and like so much cool fresh air after a sultry day, the Ravel Pavanne with its delicate stately theme and its quasi-modern harmonic structure that always looks back to the ancients, seemed a delightful few minutes. The Bostonians played it with so much grace, so much elegance and so much restraint that it at once became a high spot of the concert.

The concluding "Scheherazade" was an ideal work for the highly colored pallete of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra. If "Scheherazade" has a place at all in the modern serious repertoire of symphonic orchestras, performances of the kind heard last night will certainly help to keep it there. The many violin solos were eloquently played by Richard Burgin and a long list of other soloists were heard particularly among the winds and the solo cellist played beautifully and warmly.

The concert was heard by a large and highly enthusiastic and appreciative audience.

[47]

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

DEC 6 - 1946

Boston Symphony Receives Warm Greeting At Peristyle

Audience Hails Richard Burgin's Players Who Present Annual Concert In Museum

By ALINE JEAN TREANOR
Blade Staff Writer

Christmas comes but once a year; likewise the Boston Symphony.

With all the festive dressing up, the filled Peristyle, and the warm reception given Richard Burgin and his men by Museum of Art members, it might have been a Christmas party, the guests coming laden with the tree; a bright, shining one, with tinsel, star dust, gifts of joy and excitement, memories evoked and premonitions stirred.

No Haydn "Toy" however, but, for opening the mature, urbane, No. 95 in C minor, written in London just after the "Surprise," and last night unusually reminiscent of it. Strings were in fine fettle despite fog outside. With a complement of winds that scaled the band to 18th Century instrumentation, they made a bold, crisp entrance and projected the highly reasoned work with appropriate logic, never restraining Haydn's exuberant personality from running circles around its orderly advance.

Prokokieff's Ballet

Shrills of flutes opened the cuttings from Prokofieff's ballet, "Chout," and strong winds prevailed. To hear this lusty buffoonery is to realize the giant Russian genius, the grotesquerie of the Russian sense of humor; to understand Mr. Molotov a little, even. Here the 100-piece band laid on tone color after tone color, plastered choir on choir, sustained almost unbearable intensity of tone from bassoon to high trumpet, in various and vigorous rhythms beaten out on drums, cymbals, xylophones, tambourines, and probably vodka bottles.

Intermission was scarcely long enough to compose an audience for the marble forms and aristocratic ornaments of Ravel's tribute to the early 18th Century, "The Tomb of Couperin." Here the winds blew cold, the harps rustled mournfully. Mr. Burgin shared bows with his oboe soloist.

Auxiliary Suggested

If, as seems imminent, Toledo is to have a Society for Silencing Music Transcribed and Arranged, this reviewer suggests an auxiliary for suppression of clumsy translations and prosy descriptions that pass for program notes.

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" has to do with the passions of a man's heart and the exaltation of his soul. Possibly that is why still it is heard after 57 years. It is tone poetry and has a right to be heard by every individual for what it has to say to him. Last night a "paraphrase" of the second-rate poem that inspired it started it off at a disadvantage. Let no one less than a Browning explain Strauss on the great adventure.

Is a lament in order that Mr. Koussevitzky was absent? This is three times he has by-passed Toledo. No, this reviewer had her symphonic baptism at his hands, and yet was glad to hear the gospel according to Burgin. New times, new conductors. Shortly ago —20 years—the cry was "Koussevitzky will never be another Muck." So what? Music has myriad forms and faces. For revitalizing it needs many interpretations. Mr. Burgin's was worth its hearing.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 7 - 1946

ON THE AISLE

Koussevitzky Introduces Copland's Brilliant Third Symphony in Memorable Concert

By Claudia Cassidy

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Friday evening, Dec. 6, 1946. The program:

Prelude to "Khovantschina" .... Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 3.................Copland
Symphony No. 1, C. minor.......Brahms

Good music is like good bread, and you don't know how much better it is than cake until you try to live without it. But great music is rather like eating your bread and having your cake, too, as the Boston orchestra proves on what has happily come to be its annual visit to Orchestra hall. Its director, Serge Koussevitzky, stands quietly yet imperiously at the pinnacle of his fame a magnificent maker of music. And it must disconcert those pessimists who are convinced that anything as supreme as the Boston orchestra is courting decadence and collapse to hear with what fiery young splendor it rises to the challenge of a complex and vigorous new score.

This was true last season when Mr. Koussevitzky gave us a superb performance of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, and it was true last night when Copland's Third Symphony stirred a capacity audience to shouts of approval. For Mr. Koussevitzky has something more than enthusiasm and a great orchestra to offer contemporary music. He knows a good score when he sees it, and he takes the most exquisite pains to communicate that knowledge to his audience. And it must be, too, that he has the gift of inspiring music, for Copland's work, like "Peter Grimes," was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, which is twice blessed.

◆

If this Third Symphony is not Aaron Copland's finest work, and it seemed to me to be so last night, it is at least his largest in scale and most complex in design. Into it have gone the individuality, the craftsmanship, and the "something to say" that make "Rodeo" and "Appalachian Spring" live happily in memory, and the bold clarity, the probing into music that make the piano sonata a challenge.

To attempt to do such a symphony justice in a brief review after one hearing, however revealing, is rather like pole vaulting with too short a pole. But it is at once remarkable for its design, its intricate use of material, and what seemed to me rather like his own musical finger prints from "Rodeo," in the sense of haunting memories from that lovely score which open vistas in the deep distance and are uniquely American. This is not a copy, but it is the same man thinking aloud, and worth hearing.

◆

The three themes of the opening movement are the intimations of a powerful and sinewy structure. The scherzo, so brilliant the audience burst into unaccustomed applause, is rather like the wild horses of that "Rodeo" curtain, gallant and untamed, yet never out of its own control. The third movement opens almost imperceptibly as the high violins remember the trombones of that earlier third theme, and interest, already fully captured, grows more and more intense as the brass and percussion play a brilliant interlude, the higher woodwinds bewitch the ears, and slowly the whole structure rises to a massive but never topheavy climax.

◆

As I seem to have neither time nor space left for the rest of the concert, perhaps it is enough to say that the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" was perfection in its handling of Russian timbres and moods, fading away so quietly you felt nostalgic about it before it had vanished, and that Brahms' First Symphony was a glorious example of what such an orchestra can do with such music. I rather thought the climactic phrase a jubilant shout, but my companion insisted it was a 21 gun salute. Either way, it was a fine way to sign off such a concert.

The orchestra reappears in Orchestra hall tomorrow afternoon.

* * *

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

DEC 7 1946

Boston Symphony in Detroit on Tuesday

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard from Detroit's Masonic temple over Radio Station KWNO Tuesday at 8:30 p. m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. His program is an all-Russian list, comprising the colorful prelude to Moussourgsky's opera, "Khovanstchina," and the familiar "Symphony No. 5" of Tchaikovsky.

The following week, December 17, the Boston Symphony orchestra will return to Cambridge, Mass., for another broadcast with Richard Burgin on the podium.

DEC 8 - 1946

THE MUSIC RACK

Detroit, Boston Symphonies Offer Major Concerts

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

TWO SYMPHONIC CONCERTS of major importance will be offered in Detroit this week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the series of orchestral concerts at Masonic Temple Auditorium Tuesday night, and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra will give its weekly pair of concerts at Music Hall.

The program arranged by Karl Krueger for Thursday and Friday nights will present two distinguished guests.

Zoltan Kodaly, the most celebrated living Hungarian composer, will conduct his famous "Peacock Variations," and George Haddad, young Canadian pianist, will play the solo lines in Manuel de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain."

Kodaly is noted for his research work in Hungarian folk music which resulted in an enormous collection of authentic tunes. The Variations were written for the Golden Jubilee of the Concertgebouw Orchestra and were first performed in Amsterdam in 1939.

Callaghan

Haddad was a highly successful guest artist with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra at the Pops Concerts last summer. He is widely known for his concert work in Canada and in the East.

The concert otherwise will consist of the Shostakovich Symphony No. 9, never before performed in Detroit, and the Prelude and Finale from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

* * *

THE CHICAGO SUN, Saturday, December 7, 1946

Boston Symphony Excelled by None

By Felix Borowski.

AT Orchestra Hall last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave the first of the two concerts which it is offering here this season. It proved again that as an organization there can be but few orchestras in the world to approach, and none to excel it.

The glow and richness of the string playing, the individual excellence of members of the wind choir — particularly the first flute, oboe and clarinet — the dynamic purity of the brass, even in the most fortissimo passages, are qualities that almost stand alone.

There was more interest in the concert than that of the playing, however. Dr. Koussevitzky did not bring his matchless orchestra only to demonstrate how great and good are things in Boston. He also imported Mr. Aaron Copland, to whom, it seems, is given the leadership of the little coterie of composers which the conductor apparently believes is the ultimate in American music-making.

Reception Vigorous

There also may have been in the conductor's mind the regrettable circumstance that Chicago, and, indeed, the Middle West, has been insufficiently exposed to the kind of progressive music which in general, Dr. Koussevitzky believes to be the best; and in particular to the music of Mr. Copland. To remedy this shortcoming he gave the first performance here of that composer's new Third Symphony.

It should be said at once that no musician could hope to have one of his creations more magnificently set forth than was this symphony by the Boston Orchestra. Nor was its reception by the listeners lacking in cordiality. The applause brought forth Dr. Koussevitzky several times to acknowledge it, and several times more to bring out Mr. Copland.

Now that the handclapping has ceased, and the gala ovation is echoing only in history, it remains to ask whether the new score is likely to cause all other American symphonies to be forgotten. We believe that it will not.

The score is uncommonly clever. It is highly individual; for whether you care or do not care for Mr. Copland's brand of music, it is not to be gainsaid that the music is his own.

But there are qualities other than mere originality. Mr. Copland lacks the one that clothes all immortal music. He lacks a sense of true beauty, and—judging by this symphony — the occasional interplay of tranquillity to bring into relief the prevailing spirit of excitement.

Outlook for Composers

The composer has met successfully many of the difficult problems of symphonic creation, but he made no rendezvous with charm. He provided passages of great power in every movement, imposing climaxes — too many, perhaps — and in the second movement ingenuities of rhythmical complexity. But loveliness stood without.

Most composers find an outlet for emotional fervidity in their slow movements, but there is no trace of such a thing in the section which Mr. Copland labeled Andantino. What he seems to need in order to produce such a quality is not the medium of absolute music, but the ballet, where scenery, action, and actors or dancers performing it give him the required stimulus.

It is possible that "Rodeo" and "Appalachian Spring" still will be giving joy to multitudes when the Third Symphony is left solitary in the tomb of forgotten things.

Only two other works were on the program. Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with Moussorgsky's prelude to the first act of "Khovanstchina," as orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff. This was beautifully set forth, and the delicacy with which the piece faded into silence made a dramatic effect wonderful to hear.

Brahms' C Minor Symphony at the end was a phenomenal example of sheer orchestral virtuosity. While it might be possible to take exception to the conductor's rapid tempi for the two last movements — which neutralized some of the nobility of the score — nothing but admiration could have been evoked by the tone, balance and indeed the inspiration of the whole.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES
DEC 8 - 1946

Cheers and bravos for Copland opus

By REMI GASSMANN

THANKS to Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, Chicago heard Aaron Copland's Third Symphony just two months after the ink was dry on the manuscript—which is a shorter time than it usually takes to fly the latest Shostakovitch from Moscow and have it performed by the Chicago Symphony!

But it was not only in this respect that Copland's new work set a local precedent for American music: it was also received with what sounded to me like unrestrained enthusiasm on the part of a Chicago audience, and it was fortunate that the composer was present, to bow from the stage and to receive such an ovation in person.

Certainly cheers and bravos are unfamiliar sounds at Orchestra hall when any new music is played. Even hearty applause is a rare exception and, to my knowledge, has never been made for the first performance of a new symphony by an American composer.

Now, if I follow such public approval by saying that I consider the Copland Third Symphony to be a good American symphony, I would feel that I was understating the case.

COPLAND has not only written a good American symphony; he has written a good symphony. And that, indeed, is a more important accomplishment, though in the same breath I am happy to add the fact that it happens to be by an American.

In it, he has succeeded in bringing his creative development to the mature strength of a full-fledged symphonic style, capable of a truly sustained expressive power. Without this quality, no work of real symphonic dimensions can possibly be considered successful, regardless of the interest that may be maintanied through thematic invention, flashes of brilliant instrumentation, or even the entire craftsmanship of individual movements.

At the same time, Copland has retained the essence of his decidedly individual musical thought, as expressed in many earlier works —from the jazzy Piano Concerto of the 20's to "Appalachian Spring," last year's Pulitzer Prize winner. There has been no change of style; merely extension of it. This essence has now been put to the great final test of extended symphonic development and has demonstrated its basic vitality.

The work is at once Copland's most significant achievement to date and an important milestone in the history of American symphonic literature. Whether it will endure as a work of the standard repertory, time alone can tell. But this much is certain: it deserved the loving care and attention devoted to it by Koussevitzky and the Bostonians, the place of honor it occupied on their program and in our season, and the applause it immediately won for its composer.

Anron Copland

. . . an American triumph

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 8 - 1946

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. Haggin

MILLIONS of radio listeners have been getting their ideas of Verdi and his operas from performances in what Milton Cross has assured them was the greatest opera house in the world—performances in which even a competent conductor has devoted his competence mostly to creating an approximation of continuity around the traditional distortions of phrases by singers competing with each other for applause. And so it is a good thing for these listeners to hear at least once, at Toscanini's N. B. C. broadcast last Sunday and today, what "La Traviata" sounds like when it is performed with correctness and refinement of style and with discipline which makes every note that is sung part of the plastically continuous progression.

The Boston Symphony was already playing Prokofieff's suite from "Chout" when I turned on the radio (ABC, Nov. 26)—which movement I did not know. Nor—interestingly enough, was I able to tell, as I continued to listen, whether I was hearing "The Clown Dresses as a Young Girl" or "Arrival of the Merchant" or "The Young Girl Is Transformed Into a Goat." But most of what I heard I enjoyed, for it was music of the same period as the superb "Scythian" Suite. And the playing of the Boston Symphony, even under another conductor than Koussevitsky (Burgin), was something to marvel at.

As for Lopatnikoff's Second Piano Concerto, performed by the composer with the C. B. S. Symphony under Berezowsky (CBS's "Invitation to Music," Nov. 26), its "modern" style was for me like an impenetrable code that concealed the meaning that was being communicated.

Having managed at last to hear WNYC's "Behind the Scenes in Music" (Wednesdays at 6), I strongly recommend it to every one. It is supposedly forty-five minutes of a real rehearsal of the National Orchestral Association's training orchestra by Leon Barzin; and if—as I suspect from the way it sounded—it is a rehearsal that has been rehearsed in advance, this merely enables Mr. Barzin to choose which few details to work out with the orchestra for the radio audience's benefit, and so to assure that audience the best combination of occasional instruction in a context of pleasurable listening.

The instruction has this important merit—that it provides the actual sound, which alone can give meaning to the word (think of the endless talk about music—including even description of themes and details of construction—that is not correlated with the sound of what it refers to by the speaker, and is therefore not correlated with that sound in the mind of the listener). And it has the initial merit of presenting genuine and valuable ideas (think of the rubbish one has to take with the music on the air).

Thus, Mr. Barzin stopped the orchestra and soloist after a passage in the development section of the first movement of Grieg's Piano Concerto in order first to take the passage apart—to teach the strings (if I remember correctly) to keep their accompanying triplets absolutely even while the flute played the melody with elasticity, and to point out to the soloist that in this passage she had "very little to say" with her passage work—and then to put the corrected parts together again into a subtly inflected flute melody over even accompanying triplets and delicate piano passage work. Later he stopped in the recapitulation to ask the soloist first to listen to the distortion of the shape of the obbligato horn melody caused by her excessive acceleration of the piano part, then to listen to the horn melody played with its shape undistorted, and then to gear her piano part with this playing of the horn melody. Some of the radio listeners who were made aware of the plastic continuity that Mr. Barzin created in the flow of sound in time at this point may have been able to appreciate the similar continuity throughout the movement when he played it through after rehearsing it. And they may have been able to enjoy the manifestations of his plastic sense in the fine performances of the two other pieces with which he opened and closed the program.

That plastic sense is part of the outstanding musical equipment which, with Mr. Barzin's equal technical equipment as a conductor, I have admired during the many years that he has conducted only a training orchestra or the absurd little groups provided by WQXR, while our important orchestras have been kicked around from one to another of his inferiors. WNYC's "Behind the Scenes in Music" offers one of the sadly inadequate opportunities for hearing the performances that have given me the pleasure I have not had from the performances of men like Rodzinski, Ormandy, Mitropoulos and Szell, or from brilliant virtuosos and tasteless musicians like Stokowski, or even Koussevitsky.

Another thing this broadcast did was to demonstrate how much better WNYC was able to transmit the sound of the piano from Carnegie Hall than from the Frick Collection.

Here is my selection of some things you may want to hear:

Today—P. M.: Berlioz's "Corsair" overture; Francaix's Concertino, WQXR, 1:05, Haydn's Trio in F sharp minor, WQXR, 2:05; Landowska recital at the Frick Collection, WNYC, 3; Toscanini's performance of the second half of Verdi's "La Traviata," N. B. C., 5; a Purcell suite, WQXR, 9:05; a Marcello sonata, a Handel suite for harpsichord, WQXR, 10:05; Mozart's Horn Concertino (K. 495); WQXR, 11.07.

Monday—P. M.: Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, Haydn's Cello Concerto (Feuermann, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande," WNYC, 7; songs sung by Gerhard Huesch, WQXR, 9:45; Mozart's Piano Concerto in F (K. 459), WQXR, 11:15.

Tuesday—P. M.: Mozart's Symphony in A (K.201), WQXR, 8:05; Mozart's Symphony in B flat (K. 319), WQXR, 11:07.

Wednesday—P. M.: Rehearsal of National Orchestral Association, WNYC, 6; Berlioz program, WNYC, 7; music by Scarlatti and Beethoven, performed by string orchestra under Barzin, WQXR, 7:30; Bruckner's Mass in E minor, WNYC, 9; Bach's Concerto in F minor, Mozart's Rondo in D, performed by Hilde Somer and C. B. S. Symphony under Herrmann, C. B. S., 11:30.

Thursday—P. M.: Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the Chabrier music of Balanchine's "Cotillon," WNYC, 7; Mozart's Overture to "The Seraglio," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 (Schnabel), Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz's "The Trojans," WQXR, 8:05.

Friday—P. M.: K. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D, Delius's Violin Concerto, Griffes's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn," WQXR, 8:05; Weber's "Der Freischuetz" at the Juilliard School, WNYC, 8:30.

Saturday—A. M.: Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 2 in G major, WQXR, 8:05; Young People's Concert by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Ganz, WQXR, 11:05. P. M.: Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on the theme of Tallis, Mozart's D major Violin Concerto (K. 218), WQXR, 1:05; "Der Rosenkavalier" at the Metropolitan, A. B. C., 2; Haydn's Symphony No. 100, Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor (K.491), WQXR, 8:05; Schubert's Violin Sonata in A, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, WQXR, 11:07. Also Russian program by Cincinnati Symphony under Goossens, with Kapell as soloist, in Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 3, WINS, 8:30, and Bloch's "Sacred Service," from the Central Synagogue, WQXR, 9:05.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
DEC 8 - 1946

Formation of a new publishing house—Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc.—devoted exclusively to the issuance of books "for the music lover," has been announced in New York.

In a formal announcement, David Ewen said:

"The missionary agencies of the radio, the phonograph, and the cinema have, in the past two decades, reached out to the man in the street. Often, much to his own surprise, he has discovered that he is actually a music lover. The fabulous sale of serious-music records, the increasing tendency on the part of our leading industrialists to subsidize programs of great music over the radio to promote good will for their products, the vogue of presenting great musicians and music on the screen, the sharp increase in the sale of music books—all this testifies that music is no longer the exclusive property of the ultra-sophisticated or the trained musician. Music is playing an increasingly vital role in the life of the average citizen.

It is only natural, and in keeping with the emergence of America as one of the foremost musical countries in the world, that a publishing house should now be established devoted entirely to books on music for the layman.

"While we plan to cultivate one field alone, that of music, we believe that the soil is rich enough to yield many different crops. Our lists will embrace a wide range of books on popular music as well as serious: biographies, histories, and reference books; anthologies of all kinds; juvenile literature; even fiction, when good musical fiction is available.

"The one guiding principle in our editorial policy wil be to provide sound, authoritative, nontechnical books in all branches of music—books which will not only be informative, but entertaining as well. For we are convinced that authority and scolarship are not incompatible with readability and cultured entertainment."

As its first publication, Allen Towne and Heath is offering "Kuowssevitzky," a biography of the celebrated conductor written by Moses Smith, music critic of the Boston American and the Boston Transcript. It will be published January 20.

The company will follow "Koussevitzky" with the republication of Mr. Ewen's "Music Comes to America." The book was published originally several years ago but now is out of print. The coming edition has been "so completly revised, extended and brought up-to-date with new material that it is virtually a new publication."

Keeping its pledge that it will not be exclusively "high-brow," the company will issue in mid-March "Horn of Plenty: The Story of Louis Armstrong." The biography of the great jazz trumpet player, written by Robert Goffin, jazz-writer for Esquire, is called "virtually the story of jazz itself.

Not to be outdone, Henry Holt and Company is continuing its series of musical biographies with the publication of "Mozart." Written by Dr. Ann Lingg, a musicologist in her own right, the book is called by the publisher's advance agent "a warm and detailed presentation of this greatest of eighteenth century master."

"Counter points" has cast a reflective eye on the business of naming books and comes up with the pronouncement that "we heartily concur with a writer who recently bemoaned the tendency of people who select titles for books, to choose abstract phrases or excerpts from irrelevant quotations.

"Take a title, for instance, like 'Forever Tomorrow' which might have no connection with the book itself, and there are dozens of titles so similar there's bound to be confusion."

On the other hand, "Counter points" takes off its hat to the detective story writers who name their works in the manner of "The Case of the Stuttering Bishop" or "The Case of the Caretaker's Cat." When you see those titles, there's little doubt as to whether you've read the book.

Ambiguity, however, is not a modern trait, entirely. The publication has come up with some dandies from the seventeenth century. Among them are "Hooks and Eyes for Believers' Breeches" —a work on charity; another book on uplifting thoughts, "High-Heeled Shoes for Dwarfs in Holiness," and a spicy religious work entitled "Spiritual Mustard Pot to Make the Soul Sneeze With Devotion."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL
DEC 8 - 1946

Modern City

(From Page 1)

tood at an all time peak of $50,- operation of the public debt ecame debt free, the only large d make such a boast.
ccomplishment the 1948 Corp.

Aim to Impr
For Stat

The 1948 Corporation, whic yesterday threw its weight be hind a municipal modernizatio program financed by city bon issues, was organized in October.

made upon 6,400 last night in the far from celestial regions of the Milwaukee Auditorium.

The composers represented in Mr. Koussevitzky's program were Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss, none of them in the first row with such demigods at Bach, Beethoven and Mozart.

The music he played was neither heroic nor godlike. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony is the slightest phrase a gleaming ornament.

The Fourth Symphony, somewhat violent in other hands, was a shining angel of light. The andantino was nothing short of miraculous with its gentle song, its comforting voices, its delicate bubbles of tone welling up from the clarinets.

Far from being a rogue, Till

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES
DEC 8 - 1946

Cheers and bravos for Copland opus

By REMI GASSMANN

THANKS to Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, Chicago heard Aaron Copland's Third Symphony just two months after the ink was dry on the manuscript—which is a shorter time than it usually takes to fly the latest Shostakovitch from Moscow and have it performed by the Chicago Symphony!

But it was not only in this respect that Copland's new work set a local precedent for American music: it was also received with what sounded to me like unrestrained enthusiasm on the part of a Chicago audience, and it was fortunate that the composer was present, to bow from the stage and to receive such an ovation in person.

Certainly cheers and bravos are unfamiliar sounds at Orchestra hall when any new music is played. Even hearty applause is a rare exception and, to my knowledge, has never been made for the first performance of a new symphony by an American composer.

Now, if I follow such public approval by saying that I consider the Copland Third Symphony to be a good American symphony, I would feel that I was understating the case.

COPLAND has not only written a good American symphony; he has written a good symphony. And that, indeed, is a more important accomplishment, though in the same breath I am happy to add the fact that it happens to be by an American.

In it, he has succeeded in bringing his creative development to the mature strength of a full-fledged symphonic style, capable of a truly sustained expressive power. Without this quality, no work of real symphonic dimensions can possibly be considered successful, regardless of the interest that may be maintanied through thematic invention, flashes of brilliant instrumentation, or even the entire craftsmanship of individual movements.

At the same time, Copland has retained the essence of his decidedly individual musical thought, as expressed in many earlier works—from the jazzy Piano Concerto of the 20's to "Appalachian Spring," last year's Pulitzer Prize winner. There has been no change of style; merely extension of it. This essence has now been put to the great final test of extended symphonic development and has demonstrated its basic vitality.

Anron Copland
. . . an American triumph

The work is at once Copland's most significant achievement to date and an important milestone in the history of American symphonic literature. Whether it will endure as a work of the standard repertory, time alone can tell. But this much is certain: it deserved the loving care and attention devoted to it by Koussevitzky and the Bostonians, the place of honor it occupied on their program and in our season, and the applause it immediately won for its composer.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 8 - 1946

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. Haggin

MILLIONS of radio listeners have been getting their ideas of Verdi and his operas from performances in what Milton Cross has assured them was the greatest opera house in the world—performances in which even a competent conductor has devoted his competence mostly to creating an approximation of continuity around the traditional distortions of phrases by singers competing with each other for applause. And so it is a good thing for these listeners to hear at least once, at Toscanini's N. B. C. broadcast last Sunday and today, what "La Traviata" sounds like when it is performed with correctness and refinement of style and with discipline which makes every note that is sung part of the plastically continuous progression.

◆

The Boston Symphony was already playing Prokofieff's suite from "Chout" when I turned on the radio (ABC, Nov. 26)—which movement I did not know. Nor—interestingly enough, was I able to tell, as I continued to listen, whether I was hearing "The Clown Dresses as a Young Girl" or "Arrival of the Merchant" or "The Young Girl Is Transformed Into a Goat." But most of what I heard I enjoyed, for it was music of the same period as the superb "Scythian" Suite. And the playing of the Boston Symphony, even under another conductor than Koussevitsky (Burgin), was something to marvel at.

As for Lopatnikoff's Second Piano Concerto, performed by the composer with the C. B. S. Symphony under Berezowsky (CBS's "Invitation to Music," Nov. 26), its "modern" style was for me like an impenetrable code that concealed the meaning that was being communicated.

Having managed at last to hear WNYC's "Behind the Scenes in Music" (Wednesdays at 6), I strongly recommend it to every one. It is supposedly forty-five minutes of a real rehearsal of the National Orchestral Association's training orchestra by Leon Barzin; and if—as I suspect from the way it sounded—it is a rehearsal that has been rehearsed in advance, this merely enables Mr. Barzin to choose which few details to work out with the orchestra for the radio audience's benefit, and so to assure that audience the best combination of occasional instruction in a context of pleasurable listening.

The instruction has this important merit—that it provides the actual sound, which alone can give meaning to the word (think of the endless talk about music—including even description of themes and details of construction—that is not correlated with the sound of what it refers to by the speaker, and is therefore not correlated with that sound in the mind of the listener). And it has the initial merit of presenting genuine and valuable ideas (think of the rubbish one has to take with the music on the air).

Thus, Mr. Barzin stopped the orchestra and soloist after a passage in the development section of the first movement of Grieg's Piano Concerto in order first to take the passage apart—to teach the strings (if I remember correctly) to keep their accompanying triplets absolutely even while the flute played the melody with elasticity, and to point out to the soloist that in this passage she had "very little to say" with her passage work—and then to put the corrected parts together again into a subtly inflected flute melody over even accompanying triplets and delicate piano passage work. Later he stopped in the recapitulation to ask the soloist first to listen to the distortion of the shape of the obbligato horn melody caused by her excessive acceleration of the piano part, then to listen to the horn melody played with its shape undistorted, and then to gear her piano part with this playing of the horn melody. Some of the radio listeners who were made aware of the plastic continuity that Mr. Barzin created in the flow of sound in time at this point may have been able to appreciate the similar continuity throughout the movement when he played it through after rehearsing it. And they may have been able to enjoy the manifestations of his plastic sense in the fine performances of the two other pieces with which he opened and closed the program.

That plastic sense is part of the outstanding musical equipment which, with Mr. Barzin's equal technical equipment as a conductor, I have admired during the many years that he has conducted only a training orchestra or the absurd little groups provided by WQXR, while our important orchestras have been kicked around from one to another of his inferiors. WNYC's "Behind the Scenes in Music" offers one of the sadly inadequate opportunities for hearing the performances that have given me the pleasure I have not had from the performances of men like Rodzinski, Ormandy, Mitropoulos and Szell, or from brilliant virtuosos and tasteless musicians like Stokowski, or even Koussevitsky.

Another thing this broadcast did was to demonstrate how much better WNYC was able to transmit the sound of the piano from Carnegie Hall than from the Frick Collection.

Here is my selection of some things you may want to hear:

Today—P. M.: Berlioz's "Corsair" overture; Francaix's Concertino, WQXR, 1:05, Haydn's Trio in F sharp minor, WQXR, 2:05; Landowska recital at the Frick Collection, WNYC, 3; Toscanini's performance of the second half of Verdi's "La Traviata," N. B. C., 5; a Purcell suite, WQXR, 9:05; a Marcello sonata, a Handel suite for harpsichord, WQXR, 10:05; Mozart's Horn Concertino (K. 495); WQXR, 11.07.

Monday—P. M.: Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, Haydn's Cello Concerto (Feuermann, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande," WNYC, 7; songs sung by Gerhard Huesch, WQXR, 9:45; Mozart's Piano Concerto in F (K. 459), WQXR, 11:15.

Tuesday—P. M.: Mozart's Symphony in A (K.201), WQXR, 8:05; Mozart's Symphony in B flat (K. 319), WQXR, 11:07.

Wednesday—P. M.: Rehearsal of National Orchestral Association, WNYC, 6; Berlioz program, WNYC, 7; music by Scarlatti and Beethoven, performed by string orchestra under Barzin, WQXR, 7:30; Bruckner's Mass in E minor, WNYC, 9; Bach's Concerto in F minor, Mozart's Rondo in D, performed by Hilde Somer and C. B. S. Symphony under Herrmann, C. B. S., 11:30.

Thursday—P. M.: Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the Chabrier music of Balanchine's "Cotillon," WNYC, 7; Mozart's Overture to "The Seraglio," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 (Schnabel), Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz's "The Trojans," WQXR, 8:05.

Friday—P. M.: K. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D, Delius's Violin Concerto, Griffes's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn," WQXR, 8:05; Weber's "Der Freischuetz" at the Juilliard School, WNYC, 8:30.

Saturday—A. M.: Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 2 in G major, WQXR, 8:05; Young People's Concert by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Ganz, WQXR, 11:05. P. M.: Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on the theme of Tallis, Mozart's D major Violin Concerto (K. 218), WQXR, 1:05; "Der Rosenkavalier" at the Metropolitan, A. B. C., 2; Haydn's Symphony No. 100, Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor (K.491), WQXR, 8:05; Schubert's Violin Sonata in A, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, WQXR, 11:07. Also Russian program by Cincinnati Symphony under Goossens, with Kapell as soloist, in Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 3, WINS, 8:30, and Bloch's "Sacred Service," from the Central Synagogue, WQXR, 9:05.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
DEC 8 - 1946

Formation of a new publishing house—Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc.—devoted exclusively to the issuance of books "for the music lover," has been announced in New York.

In a formal announcement, David Ewen said:

"The missionary agencies of the radio, the phonograph, and the cinema have, in the past two decades, reached out to the man in the street. Often, much to his own surprise, he has discovered that he is actually a music lover. The fabulous sale of serious-music records, the increasing tendency on the part of our leading industrialists to subsidize programs of great music over the radio to promote good will for their products, the vogue of presenting great musicians and music on the screen, the sharp increase in the sale of music books—all this testifies that music is no longer the exclusive property of the ultra-sophisticated or the trained musician. Music is playing an increasingly vital role in the life of the average citizen.

It is only natural, and in keeping with the emergence of America as one of the foremost musical countries in the world, that a publishing house should now be established devoted entirely to books on music for the layman.

"While we plan to cultivate one field alone, that of music, we believe that the soil is rich enough to yield many different crops. Our lists will embrace a wide range of books on popular music as well as serious: biographies, histories, and reference books; anthologies of all kinds; juvenile literature; even fiction, when good musical fiction is available.

"The one guiding principle in our editorial policy will be to provide sound, authoritative, nontechnical books in all branches of music—books which will not only be informative, but entertaining as well. For we are convinced that authority and scolarship are not incompatible with readability and cultured entertainment."

As its first publication, Allen Towne and Heath is offering "Kuowssevitzky," a biography of the celebrated conductor written by Moses Smith, music critic of the Boston American and the Boston Transcript. It will be published January 20.

The company will follow "Koussevitzky" with the republication of Mr. Ewen's "Music Comes to America." The book was published originally several years ago but now is out of print. The coming edition has been "so completly revised, extended and brought up-to-date with new material that it is virtually a new publication."

Keeping its pledge that it will not be exclusively "high-brow," the company will issue in mid-March "Horn of Plenty: The Story of Louis Armstrong." The biography of the great jazz trumpet player, written by Robert Goffin, jazz-writer for Esquire, is called "virtually the story of jazz itself.

Not to be outdone, Henry Holt and Company is continuing its series of musical biographies with the publication of "Mozart." Written by Dr. Ann Lingg, a musicologist in her own right, the book is called by the publisher's advance agent "a warm and detailed presentation of this greatest of eighteenth century master."

"Counter points" has cast a reflective eye on the business of naming books and comes up with the pronouncement that "we heartily concur with a writer who recently bemoaned the tendency of people who select titles for books, to choose abstract phrases or excerpts from irrelevant quotations.

"Take a title, for instance, like 'Forever Tomorrow' which might have no connection with the book itself, and there are dozens of titles so similar there's bound to be confusion."

On the other hand, "Counter points" takes off its hat to the detective story writers who name their works in the manner of "The Case of the Stuttering Bishop" or "The Case of the Caretaker's Cat." When you see those titles, there's little doubt as to whether you've read the book.

Ambiguity, however, is not a modern trait, entirely. The publication has come up with some dandies from the seventeenth century. Among them are "Hooks and Eyes for Believers' Breeches"—a work on charity; another book on uplifting thoughts, "High-Heeled Shoes for Dwarfs in Holiness," and a spicy religious work entitled "Spiritual Mustard Pot to Make the Soul Sneeze With Devotion."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL
DEC 8 - 1946

Boston Orchestra Impresses 6,400 at Auditorium

By EDWARD P. HALLINE

A bemused listener reverently said:

"It sounded as if it had been rehearsed by God."

That inspired hyperbole should convey something of the impression which Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra made upon 6,400 last night in the far from celestial regions of the Milwaukee Auditorium.

The composers represented in Mr. Koussevitzky's program were Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss, none of them in the first row with such demigods at Bach, Beethoven and Mozart.

The music he played was neither heroic nor godlike. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony is melodious and charming. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" is a raucously witty tale of a mythical medieval scoundrel. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony tells of a high powered dream world and the escape therefrom.

Mr. Koussevitzky bathed them all in splendor, mellowed whatever travails they had and made the slightest phrase a gleaming ornament.

The Fourth Symphony, somewhat violent in other hands, was a shining angel of light. The andantino was nothing short of miraculous with its gentle song, its comforting voices, its delicate bubbles of tone welling up from the clarinets.

Far from being a rogue, Till Eulenspiegel was just a mischievous child in Mr. Koussevitzky's version. This tenderized Till was not very dramatic, but the Bostonians certainly made it persuasive.

The most eloquent performance of all was the "Italian" Symphony. It was graceful, flowing music. Mr. Koussevitzky made it as no tour of Italy, but a glimpse of spacious skies, rosy dawns and cool forests alive with the supernatural little folk of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The salterello was not for Italians, but for elves.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
DEC 8-1946

Boston Symphony Excelled by None

Reprinted from Yesterday's Late Editions.

By Felix Borowski.

AT Orchestra Hall last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave the first of the two concerts which it is offering here this season. It proved again that as an organization there can be but few orchestras in the world to approach, and none to excel.

The gloss and richness of the string playing, the individual excellence of members of the wind choir — particularly the first flute, oboe and clarinet — the dynamic force of the brass, even in the most fortissimo passages, are qualities that almost stand alone.

There was more interest in the concert than that of the playing, however. Dr. Koussevitzky did not bring his matchless orchestra only to demonstrate how great and good are things in Boston. He also imported Mr. Aaron Copland.

Reception Vigorous

There may have been in the conductor's mind the regrettable circumstance that Chicago, and, indeed, the Middle West, has been insufficiently exposed to the kind of progressive music which in general, Dr. Koussevitzky believes to be the best; and in particular to the music of Mr. Copland. To remedy this shortcoming he gave the first performance here of that composer's new Third Symphony.

It should be said at once that no musician could hope to have one of his creations more magnificently set forth than was this symphony by the Boston Orchestra. Nor was its reception by the listeners lacking in cordiality. The applause brought forth Dr. Koussevitzky several times to acknowledge it, and several times more to bring out Mr. Copland.

Now that the handclapping has ceased, and the gala ovation is echoing only in history, it remains to ask whether the new score is likely to cause all other American symphonies to be forgotten. We believe that it will not.

The score is uncommonly clever. It is highly individual; for whether you care or do not care for Mr. Copland's brand of music, it is not to be gainsaid that the music is his own.

But there are qualities other than mere originality. Mr. Copland lacks the one that clothes all immortal music. He lacks a sense of true beauty, and— judging by this symphony — the occasional interplay of tranquillity to bring into relief the prevailing spirit of excitement.

Outlet for Composers

The composer has met successfully many of the difficult problems of symphonic creation, but he made no rendezvous with charm. He provided passages of great power in every movement imposing climaxes — too many, perhaps — and in the second movement ingenuities of rhythmical complexity. But loveliness stood without.

Most composers find an outlet for emotional fervidity in their slow movements, but there is no trace of such a thing in the section which Mr. Copland labeled Andantino. What he seems to need in order to produce such a quality is not the medium of absolute music, but the ballet, where scenery, action, and actors or dancers performing it give him the required stimulus.

Only two other works were on the program. Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with Moussorgsky's prelude to the first act of "Khovanstchina," as orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff. This was beautifully set forth, and the delicacy with which the piece faded into silence made a dramatic effect wonderful to hear.

Brahms' C Minor Symphony at the end was a phenomenal example of sheer orchestral virtuosity. While it might be possible to take exception to the conductor's rapid tempi for the two last movements — which neutralized some of the nobility of the score — nothing but admiration could have been evoked by the tone, balance and indeed the inspiration of the whole.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 9-1946

The Bassoonist Is a Lady

ONE woman—and a hundred and some escorts! That's the way it is with Anne de Guichard.

She's a bassoonist, and the only woman member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sharp observers may have difficulty locating her in the midst of the sea of male countenances at Masonic Temple, where the symphony is playing Tuesday night. But she'll be there, and has been with the company since their 1944 season of Pop Concerts.

★ ★ ★

WHY A BASSOON? Miss de Guichard explains her choice of that instrument in this way: "I began with the violin. One night while I was playing with eighteen other violinists I thought it would be much nicer to have a part to play that I could hear myself. So I elected the bassoon . . .

And that answers the question which must have popped into the thoughts of many a concert-goer: How can one musician possibly hear himself play with drums to the left of him, bass fiddles to the right and all around, noise, noise, noise?

★ ★ ★

MISS DE GUICHARD can play the saxaphone, too—and in case of another player's absence, she is able to play brilliantly on the clarinet.

The fact is that when she played a very tricky part for saxaphone with Mitropoulos as guest conductor he stopped the rehearsal to comment on the beauty of tone she drew from the often not-so-symphonic-sounding invention of Mr. Sax.

Starting as a substitute bassoonist, Miss de Guichard distinguished herself as of definitely more than substitute value. The next year she became a full-fledged member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its winter season under Serge Koussevitzky.

Anne de Guichard

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
DEC 9-1946

RIVAL SYMPHONIES

Koussevitsky as Svengali

BY C. J. BULLIET.

While Serge Koussevitsky was conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Orchestra Hall yesterday afternoon, a pupil of his, tall, slender Thor Johnson was on the podium at the Opera House for the Cincinnati Symphony.

Eugene Goossens, Cincinnati conductor, is ill with pneumonia.

Mr Johnson made a good initial impression, without being either another Goossens or another Koussevitsky

He was at a disadvantage in having been called upon so suddenly to take charge

He had to omit Copland's "Appalachian Spring" suite, for example, because of insufficient time to rehearse it with the Cincinnatians

* * *

KOUSSEVITSKY yesterday afternoon and Friday night was again the great actor as well as conductor

I heard his Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony at the matinee before rushing over to the Opera House to see what Mr. Johnson was up to.

Koussevitsky is a Svengali

He makes you feel that his Boston Symphony lives and breathes under his baton and that without him it would be lost in an aimless confusion.

David Belasco was that way as a stage director.

Koussevitsky is a challenging perfectionist like Belasco and like Bouguereau, the painter of smooth nudes who dominated the old Paris salon.

It took an Eugene O'Neill to break the spell of Belasco, a Cezanne to outmode Bouguereau.

* * *

AARON COPLAND'S new Symphony No. 3, played Friday night by Koussevitsky, was the overwhelming feature of the symphonic weekend.

Mr. Copland was present and took bow after bow as the audience wildly applauded.

His symphony, in all its movements, scarcely relieved even by the andantino, proceeds along a strenuous way, crash after crash. You can always arouse an audience by piling up crashes.

Copland's new opus struck me as monotony at high tension, covering up with noise a poverty of significant invention.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 9-1946

ON THE AISLE

By Claudia Cassidy

Koussevitzky's Farewell Makes Boston Orchestra Sing and Its Excited Audience Shout

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8, 1946. The program:

Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian" ....Mendelssohn
"La Mer"......................Debussy
Symphony No. 4, in F minor.............. ....Tschaikowsky

Thank you, I've had my Christmas present—the two concerts by the Boston orchestra, presented by Allied Arts in Orchestra hall. And it isn't any easier to review the second than the first, because if you heard it you need no words, and if you missed it you wouldn't believe me. For it may be that this amazing orchestra plays consistently at the peak of its form, as it must have played yesterday, and it may be that Serge Koussevitzky constantly conducts like a man inspired. But it is not often, to my sorrow, that I am around when such things happen, so that I sit on the edge of my chair and suddenly realize I haven't been breathing.

When this happens, magicians have been at work, and this time Debussy's magnificently realized "La Mer" cast the spell. Not even mediocrity can utterly dim the splendor of this giant seascape, but it can blur and confuse the music, and frustrate the perceptive senses. A good performance is a delight, but a great performance—ah there you have another story.

◆

It may be that at some other fortunate time I heard this wonder work so played, but I doubt it. I would not have forgotten. For Koussevitzky saw it whole, which is to say in every exquisite detail, and the orchestra played it in a kind of tidal glory reflected from the ever-changing and changeless sea itself. To listen was to be bemused and bewitched—and held in magnetic attraction. In such a performance, to choose one choir above another is rather like saying you prefer the sea at dawn to the sea at dusk, or when it smiles rather than when it is lashed by storm, but even in an orchestra which seems to be composed solely of virtuosi, so that the harps, too, speak a more liquid language, the sudden ferocity of the cellos, which usually sing like baritone angels, was electrifying.

This orchestra is, above all, supremely alive, and so is its music. To precede and follow "La Mer," Mr. Koussevitzky had chosen the fourth symphonies of Mendelssohn and Tschiakowsky, but any one who anticipated standard performances of standard works had a surprise coming. The "Italian" burst upon us with a lyrical outpouring as fresh as spring, and the lambent tone of the andante was as near perfection as the scherzo with its almost unbelievable woodwinds.

◆

If you expected the Tschiakowsky to be a letdown, you reckoned without another imposing Russian. For Mr. Koussevitzky lavished upon it his most assiduous attention and loving care. He reminded you of beauties almost forgotten in the "Pop" concert melée, and when that andantino began to sing, you heard the Boston orchestra in all its glory. The pizzicato scherzo was a work of art, not a stunt, and the finale let off steam for orchestra and audience, bringing the one to a great climax, singing, the other to its feet, shouting.

Perhaps, as the conservatives tell us, we couldn't stand too much of this magnilcent music, but it would be wonderful to try.

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

DEC 10 1946

Boston Symphony Orchestra Inspired, Cincinnati's Is Otherwise

By William Leonard

(Reprinted from yesterday's final edition.)

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra had all the better of it yesterday afternoon, in its conflict of schedule here with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra The Bostonians played an electrifying program before a capacity audience at Orchestra Hall. The Ohioans had few customers and not even their own conductor, at the Opera House.

Serge Koussevitzky, who on Friday evening had highlighted the ~~Boston orches~~tra's program with the first Chicago performance of a brand new symphony by Aaron Copland, adhered to well worn staples at yesterday's matinee.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, most worn item of all, was traversed with such verve and warmth, such precision and balance, that it deeply stirred an audience which probably never expected to thrill to the old warhorse again. Debussy's "La Mer" had a tonal fabric that completely realized the scope and quality of the colorful seascape. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony was played while I was on the other side of the Loop, and I'm sorry I missed it.

I left the Cincinnatians with no regrets, for the Opera House is not acoustically kind to an orchestra on stage, and the program, first event in the Opera House Concert series, was uninspired. Eugene Goossens, who is leaving at the end of this season to become conductor of the Sydney Symphony Orchestra, was absent with pneumonia and Thor Johnson, who was a guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony in March, 1945, took over the baton.

He substituted Tschaikowsky's 'Romeo and Juliet" overture for Copland's "Appalachian Spring" and conducted Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, Elgar's "Enigma" variations and Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 with animation but poor results.

EUGENE LIST will play Orchestra Hall Friday in the Allied Arts Piano Series.

The fault may have been largely that of the setting, but there was little about the Cincinnati orchestra's performance to compare with that being turned out across town by the men from Boston.

* * *

"A FLAG IS BORN," Ben Hecht's pageant to aid the American League for a Free Palestine, will open Christmas night at the Studebaker.

"The Student Prince," in its eleventh (or is it twelfth?) Chicago engagement, will follow "State of the Union" at the Blackstone, opening Jan. 13.

Horsemen and Horseplay

The Original Don Cossack Chorus has lost none of its magnetism, it demonstrated Saturday evening at Orchestra Hall, where the Russian singers met with such genuine audience enthusiasm they still were begging off 15 minutes and several encores after their concert had ended.

The reason for their appeal isn't too hard to uncover. The chorus knows what the customers expect and does nothing to disappoint them. The same fine soloists, the same sturdy bass section, the same puckish falsettos, and, of course, the same precision diminutive Serge Jaroff always has demanded still are there in abundance.

But where some performers might let it go at that, the cossacks take no such chances. Also present are the rousing shouts, the thundering fortissimi, the shrill whistles, the hearty guffaws and the clip-clopping of horses' hoofs that punctuate their more picturesque offerings.

In fact, horseplay definitely got the nod in their latest program, thereby furnishing food for thought. Certainly time is begining to encroach on the chorus (whose average age now must be over 45), and some of the edge has gone out of its voices. But zest and humor go on forever, and the cossacks, if Saturday's concert is any criterion, seem likely to do the same.

—C. P.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 10 1946

DominionFund Discloses Site Of New College

School Headed by Dr. Barr To Be on Old Dan Hanna Estate at Stockbridge

Special to the Herald Tribune

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Dec. 9.—The new liberal arts college to be headed by Dr. Stringfellow Barr, now president of St. John's College, Annapolis, Md., and endowed with $4,500,000 by the Old Dominion Foundation, is to be established on the old 700-acre Dan R. Hanna estate at Stockbridge.

The details of the project were made public here today by Scott Buchanan, dean of St. John's College, who is to be dean of the new institution.

The Hanna farm is a mile and a half from Tanglewood, the site of the annual Berkshire music festivals. The property ~~is on the~~ west shore of the Stockbridge Bowl, the modern name of Mahkeemac Lake, along which it has a frontage of three-fourths of a mile. There are eighteen buildings on the estate, including a thirty-room house that was built in 1892.

Mr. Buchanan, who has been who has been making his home in near-by Richmond, said that it is planned at first to use the present buildings, but that when conditions are favorable an extensive new building program will be begun.

The college, he added, will be conducted closely along the lines of the St. John's "100 great books" program, with its four-year classical curriculum and related laboratory work, mathematics and foreign languages. It will be nondenominational, solely for men, and will have a seminar and summer school for adult education.

A considerable number of the faculty has already been chosen, it was said, and the college expects to have its charter in time to open in September, 1947. The school will be prepared to accommodate a maximum enrollment of 300, said Mr. Buchanan.

The Old Dominion Foundation is a charitable corporation founded in 1941 by Paul Mellon, son of the late Andrew W. Mellon, former Secretary of the Treasury.

The college was organized under the name of Liberal Arts, Inc., although its name has not yet been made public. The incorporators are listed as Stringfellow Barr, Scott Buchanan, Mark Van Doran, author and professor of English at Columbia University; Mortimer J. Adler, professor of philosophy at the University of Chicago, and three local persons necessary for legal purposes.

Michigan Daily

MUSIC

Tue Dec 10, 1946

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting; Program: Haydn: Symphony in C minor, No. 95; Prokofieff: Suite from the Ballet, "Chout," ("Buffoon"), Op. 21; Sibelius: Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY returned to Hill Auditorium last night and the combination of this great orchestra with a first rate program made for an overwhelming musical experience.

The orchestra was without its regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, but years of working together have so fused the talents of this fine group that it doesn't seem to make much difference whether Dr. Koussevitzky directs personally or not. If possible, the orchestra was better than ever last night under Mr. Burgin.

What made for a particularly happy evening was the choice of an exceptionally well integrated program. Dr. Koussevitzky has always showed taste in his selection of new or relatively new music and when he uses a standard concert piece it has guts to it.

Of immediate interest was the performance of the Prokofieff "Choud" ballet suite. There may be a tendency to compare this music to Stravinsky—and certainly the opening passages are reminiscent of Petrouchka—but to say any more than that is unfair to the music. It is well able to stand on its own feet and once into the music proper it shows unmistakable traces of the crystallization that we associate with the composer's later music. The last half of it, beginning with "The Arrival of the Merchant" and "The Dance of Servility," develops into an arresting and exciting work. I, for one, didn't bother to associate the program with the music, but program or no, I'd like to hear it again.

The Sibelius symphony was played, making full utilization of the rich orchestration and with an earnestness and sincerity that gave it renewed stature. Mr. Burgin and the Orchestra performed in a way that I have come to associate with the Boston orchestra—they played as if they liked it.

—Harry Levine

TUESDAY, DEC. 10, 1946

Boston Symphony Plays Brilliantly Under Burgin

By Edmund Haines

The climax of the Boston Symphony concert last night in Hill auditorium was the performance of the Sibelius First Symphony. Despite the fact the permanent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, was unable to appear, the orchestra was in its usual brilliant form. Under Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor, nothing of the perfection of phrasing, quality of ensemble, was lost.

The first half of the program was composed of the early Prokofieff ballet, "Chout," and a Haydn Symphony. It was interesting to hear a revival of the Prokofieff—to compare the devices in this work by a master of 21 years of age (the piece was composed in 1916) with his later pieces, such as Nevsky and the Fifth Symphony.

Potentially, all of Prokofieff's genius is in "Chout." The handling of the instrumentation is effective, and the thematic materials are personal. The orchestra and the conductor of the evening understood the brilliance of the music, and gave the audience an unforgettable performance.

The Boston has been for several decades now the envy of all other groups of its type in its excellence in 18th century music. To do Haydn and Mozart, to walk the fine line of technique balanced against musicianship, is the test of any musical organization.

The Haydn was carried off in precisely the perfect fashion one expects. The Symphony was the 95th work in the Haydn catalog, and is one of the most economical of his works. The piece is spare and lean, and the orchestra entered into the mood of the music. The balance between fat and bare phrases was exceptionally well calculated.

Naturally one wished for the permanent conductor. Dr. Kousevitsky has spent a half generation building the orchestra to its present nonpareil status, and the orchestra without him seems nearly like a body without its arms.

Burgin Praised

But Koussevitsky has trained so well that the orchestra responds to any conductor. And Mr. Burgin is a fine conductor to whom the orchestra for the most part did respond sensitively.

The absence of Dr. Koussevitsky served to remind one that the Boston is a cultural problem in America—a major problem, in much the same way the Chicago Symphony was several years ago. Upon Mr. Stock's retirement and demise, the Chicago was faced with the same impasse which may confront the Boston at any time.

Not to see Koussevitsky on the podium only served as a similar reminder, then. One wonders whether the orchestra will eventually have a future without him. It is no time to bid farewell to the maestro, for he stands at the apothetical point of his career right now; but one wishes him to see the Boston through what it is hoped will be better days to come.

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 10 1946

New Liberal Arts College Buys 700 Acres at Pittsfield, Mass.

Institution, Not Yet Named, Gets Site West of Stockbridge Bowl—Project Was Endowed by Paul W. Mellon

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PITTSFIELD Mass., Dec. 9—With the aid of an endowment of $4,500,000, the gift of Paul W. Mellon, son of the late Andrew W. Mellon, former Secretary of the Treasury, and Mrs. Paul Mellon, a new Liberal Arts College will be established on the old Dan R. Hanna estate on the west shore of Stockbridge Bowl, it was disclosed here today.

The new institution will see the flowering of the idea of liberal education through the reading and discussion, in seminars, of 100 "best books of ancient and modern thought" from Homer to the present day, introduced in 1937 by Dr. Stringfellow Barr at St. John's College at Annapolis. Dr. Barr is to quit the presidency of St. John's at the end of the year to head the new institution.

With him will go Scott Buchanan, his dean and former associate at the University of Virginia. Mr. Buchanan is on leave from St. John's until June 30, 1947. It is understood that John S. Kieffer of Hagerstown, professor at St. John's since 1929, will be named acting president. Although there will be some connection between the two schools because of the identities of the individuals and the "common purpose" involved, the exact status has not yet been determined.

Chosen for the site of the new school by the Mellons through their Old Dominion Foundation are 700 acres of historic background fronting for nearly a mile on Stockbridge Lake, called by the Indians Lake Mahkeenac The grounds are about a mile and a half from Tanglewood, home of the Berkshire Music Festival. On the site, in fact, was given the first festival in 1934. About eighteen buildings already are on the property. These include an inn and dormitories where the late John E. Parsons, New York lawyer, maintained for a number of years, his Home for Fresh Air Children.

The principal building on the Hanna estate is a thirty-room house, the main part of which was designed by Leonard Forbes Beckwith, a Boston architect. The property, representing an investment of $500,000, was, in 1916, the wedding gift of Dan Hanna, son of Senator Mark A. Hanna of Ohio, to his fourth wife, Molly Covington (Worden) Hanna of Deal, N. J. The property was bought, in 1904, by Samuel Hill of Seattle, son-in-law of James J. Hill, "the empire builder" who organized the Great Northern Railroad.

Last October the property was sold for $50,000 to a real estate firm. And now an agreement for purchase of the property has been signed with the incorporators of the new college.

In addition to Dr. Barr and Mr. Buchanan the incorporators are Mark Van Doren of Columbia University, Mortimer J. Adler, Professor of the Philosophy of Law at the University of Chicago; Charles R. Alberti, State District Attorney in the western district of Massachusetts, and Francis J. Quirico, a lawyer, of Pittsfield.

Under the law of Massachusetts, the college may not get a charter until it has been in operation for some months. It can then apply to the Board of Collegiate Authority which, after a satisfactory inspection, makes the grant.

Mr. Buchanan said he expected the new institution would be open by September, 1947. He felt that the present buildings are sufficient to answer its purpose for the opening and the number of students attending in the first year or two. As soon as conditions permit, an extensive new building program will be inaugurated.

A nondenominational institution for men, the new school will have a maximum enrollment of about 300 students and a faculty of thirty. A name has not yet been selected but the corporation is called "Liberal Arts, Inc."

Historic St. John's (it was established as an extension of King William's School in 1696 and chartered in 1784) will continue as now, with the same curriculum started by Dr. Barr in 1937 when he made his "book course" the entire college curriculum and eliminated elective courses and departments. The small college remains intact after a skirmish last year with its neighbor, the United States Naval Academy, which sought to annex its adjoining campus in an expansion program to take care of its 6,000 post-war cadets where only 2,500 had attended in pre-war days. Both Senate and House Naval Affairs Committee decided against the Academy's project.

Dr. Barr is leaving St. John's with the "hearty good wishes" of the board of trustees. He is a former professor of history at the University of Virginia where he edited the Virginia Quarterly Review. With Dean Buchanan, a graduate of Amherst, he served on the Committee of Liberal Arts of the University of Chicago.

[51]

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

DEC 10 1946

Editorials

The Berkshires Contemplate The Birth of a New College

Nothing could fit more logically or happily into the pattern for the future of the Berkshires than the founding of a new liberal arts college within our borders.

We have begun to recognize a tendency toward smugness as we contemplate our development as a cultural center. The growing stature of the Berkshire Music Center and the Berkshire Festival; the stability of the Berkshire Playhouse and Ted Shawn's school of the dance; the arrival of such new groups as the Rollins Theatre School; the expanding list of private schools occupying former estates; all these combine to nurture a conviction that we are a haven for the finer things of life.

This is a natural and quite human reaction, provincial at best, but fairly harmless. It can become dangerous only if we begin to take ourselves more seriously than is healthy.

With this in mind, we welcome the news that we are to have a new liberal arts college. We welcome it not because we consider it a compliment to the Berkshires, but because its founders are dedicating their lives to an idea which is unquestionably important to American education as a whole and may be the start of the educational revolution so many reputable educators feel is long overdue.

The program, based on approximately 100 of the world's great books, was started by Stringfellow Barr and Scott Buchanan at historic St. John's College nine years ago. Probably no educational theory advanced in recent years has been the target for so much abuse, nor has been so warmly defended. That it has survived such radical insults to the conventional approach to "higher" education as the abandonment of intercollegiate athletics and social fraternities is of considerable significance. It has a tough core.

The program is to find a second home in the Berkshires. The founders have a profound faith in what they are doing; they also have $4,500,000. The world being what it is, solvency can be cruelly important to the survival of an idea. The fact that Paul Mellon gave the new college a large sum of money, however, while of great interest no doubt to possible creditors and to those who view a large bank account as a guarantee of stability, is of particular interest because of its meaning. It means, in this case, that Mr. Mellon, a former student at St. John's, was won over by an idea to the extent that he wanted to see it survive. To some people, his endorsement would carry more weight than the obviously less expensive support of a philosopher's magazine article. This fact may have melancholy overtones, but it is a factor in survival.

We think the new college will like it here. We are, by nature, a conservative community, but we're learning. Adult education is a major objective of the St. John's program; thus the effect of the new college will be felt throughout the area. This, too, we welcome.

It is exciting to think that we are privileged to observe as important and rare an event as the founding of a college. That its birth and growth are henceforth inextricably woven into our own lives is a solemn thought. For the college, and for ourselves, we wish a joint success.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 11 1946

Boston Symphony

An audience which filled Masonic Auditorium from pit to gallery, stood up and cheered Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening. It was one of the most responsive audiences known to a city not overly demonstrative.

Shouts of "Bravo" and "speech" rose above the din as Koussevitzky returned to take bow after bow. The audience greeted Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, which opened the program, with marked enthusiasm but the great burst of applause followed the final movement of Tchaikovsky's famed "Fifth Symphony."

* * *

THE AUDIENCE was as varied as it was huge. The usual symphony patrons in gowns of silk and lace under wraps of mink and sable, with escorts in evening attire, mingled with those dressed in the extreme of informality.

Some went especially to hear Mendelssohn or Moussorgsky or Strauss but all were there because of the desire to hear great music played under the baton of a great conductor.

Just a few of those noted in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Warren S. Booth, Mrs. Julius Haass, who came with her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Trent McMath, Mrs. Russell A. Alger, Mrs. Jerome H. Remick, Mrs. A. Ingersoll Lewis, also were noted.

* * *

WILMINGTON, N. C.
NEWS

DEC 11 1946

Boston Symphony Will Have New Sponsor In '47

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

NEW YORK, Dec. 11. — (AP) — The Boston symphony orchestra, which, since the conclusion of its first sponsored series of ABC last season, has been going on as a network feature, is to have a new sponsor (John Hancock Insurance) in 1947.

Broadcasts under the contract start January 21 and continues through the winter and spring. The only schedule change will be a shift to 3:30 p. m. an hour earlier than at present.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 11 1946

Boston Symphony's Magic Draws 5,000 to Concert

By HARVEY TAYLOR

More than 5,000 Detroiters crowded into Masonic Auditorium last night to hear Serge Koussevitzky conduct the great Boston Symphony Orchestra in their first concert here in a decade.

After it was over most of the audience stood up at their seats to give their applause—in an eloquent testimony to what one brilliant mind can do with a symphony if he has it under his control for a quarter of a century or more.

They played the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony, Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" prelude, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

ONE MAN RESPONSIBLE

But what they played is comparatively irrelevant because any report of a Koussevitzky concert must develop a description of the fabulous technique by which the 72-year-old veteran shapes the music his men play.

As Toscanini, Dr. Koussevitzky is completely iminhibited on the stage. He doesn't care how he gets the music he wants as long as he gets it. This philosophy, as he applies it, results in an unbelievable expenditure of nervous energy.

Although he must have played the Tchaikovsky several hundred times, he conducted it last night as if he were exposing its music to his orchestra for the first time.

In his slavish determination to extract everything from the music, he works his face into rude approximations of what he thinks the mood of the music should be. Or he assumes a stance of exaggerated dignity to usher in a noble theme.

But whereas Toscanini sings the entries in a frenzied, cracked voice, Koussevitzky soundlessly shapes them with his lips, only rarely allowing himself to sing.

BUT IT PAYS OFF

Thus, last night's audience was given a brilliant, practical exposition of the cause and effect law. Every gesture had its immediate and readily heard effect in the orchestra's choirs.

Even a musical novice could have followed the puckish "Till Eulenspiegel" as he coursed through Strauss' complex orchestration.

The orchestra's smooth strings and pure brass responded with uncanny sensitivity in the neo-classic Mendelssohn, but it was not until the finale of the Tchaikovsky that the precise music-making machine was heard in its full power.

And when they'd heard it, many of the audience understood why, under Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony has come to be considered by a great many people the greatest orchestra in the world.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 11 1946

5,000 Detroiters Acclaim Koussevitsky at Concert

By FRANCES D'HONDT

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today can be assured that all talk about Detroiters being unresponsive as an audience is just so much bosh.

Last night more than 5,000 music lovers voiced their appreciation of his superb performance at conducting the world-renowned orchestra with repeated and hearty applause.

Upholding the tradition of lending brilliance and beauty to the arts were the David B. Moreings. Mr. Moreing, in formal garb, made a distinguished picture as he helped his wife, whose long black dress with jet top contrasted with rich ermine, from their limousine.

After dining at the Detroit Club, the Edwin T. Barbours arrived with the William T. Barbours and Mrs. Benjamin Warren.

At the intermission Mrs. John B. Ford was seen chatting with Miss Christine Symington and Mrs. Henry T. Bodman.

One couldn't miss the ready smile of Mrs. Daniel Goodenough who, with her husband, sat with the John Hutchinsons.

Seated in their season box were Mr. and Mrs. Frederick S. Ford with the Charles B. Johnsons, and Mrs. Frank W. Goldie. Mrs. Goldie was handsome in a beige sequined dress. Mrs. Johnson wore a black crepe dress with appliqued French blue, and Mrs. Ford wore a black dress with a vari-colored sequined top and black broadtail coat.

Dr. and Mrs. Alfred H. Whittaker were in their front box. Mrs. Whittaker, a musician of merit, broke into an appreciative smile when Mr. Koussevitzky, during a particularly sportive melody played by the violins in the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel," graciously welcomed in the woodwinds.

Another pair of music lovers, Mr. and Mrs. James Merriam Barnes, went backstage to greet their Boston friends. Mrs. Barnes, as Florence Maiullo, when a little girl knew the redoubtable conductor, and her husband studied under the direction of the Boston first cellist while attending Harvard.

Seated with Mr. and Mrs. Richard Forsyth were Jack Newberry, Mrs. Henry B. Joy and Mrs. Allan Shelden.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 11 1946

Bostonians Bring Crowd to Salute

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

Thousands of Detroiters, filling the Masonic Auditorium to its uttermost cranny, heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra perform the most magnificent music which this town has heard in many a long day.

The public, according to a durable axiom, is never wrong. So its mass-wisdom prompted a throng of 5,000 to cram itself inside the big hall, Tuesday evening, to listen to this comparable organization and watch Serge Koussevitzky conduct. Everybody stood at salute, when the program was over, and went home with, probably, a new set of standards.

Actually, the program, in its bare composition, was pretty old-hat; Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegel," Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" Prelude and Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony; nothing much in that to tell the grandchildren about, with every piece long ago elected to the chestnut category.

* * *

BUT THE VERY fact of the familiarity made the deeds of Koussevitzky and the orchestra more remarkable. Nobody listened for surprises in this music, but he heard hundreds. Koussevitzky took phrases, tattered and torn with long custom, and made them new adventures, full of excitement. Take, for example, his dynamics. Where the score indicates a pianissimo, this man makes it a vanishing wraith of sound. Where full voice is required, he piles tones a-top one another until the ear-drums crack—but, whatever the volume it is suave and smooth as oil and unfalteringly eloquent.

It is, in short, a fulfillment of the ancient dream; that a symphony orchestra seems to be an instrument—the largest and most complex of instruments, but still a single mechanism on which a great virtuoso proposes to perform. And that is, of course, because the Boston Symphony has for decades had no financial worries, has maintained a stable personnel and has had Koussevitzky for the past 22 years.

* * *

IN MUSIC, as in everything else, nothing is important but the result and it is foolish to covet the set of singular advantages which the Boston Symphony e joys. One may, to be sure, en Boston for hearing them all t time. But it is sensible to thankful for an occasional ev ning like Tuesday's.

Probably the chief virtuosit which Koussevitzky displayed i this program was the "Khovanstchina" Prelude, in which one heard colorations that really seemed foreign to the orchestral ensemble and, finally, a diminu endo which, if it weren't th veritable Lost Chord, certain trembled away into silence, as it were loath to cease.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

DEC 11 1946

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been on the air this season without a sponsor, will have one starting Jan. 21, to continue through the winter and spring.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

DEC 1 1 1946

MUSIC

Audience Acclaims Symphony

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

Detroiters who were fortunate enough to get tickets in a standing-room-only house, turned out at Masonic Temple Auditorium to give a thundering welcome to the greatest symphony orchestra in the world.

For there is no arguing that among the great musical organizations the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands head and shoulders above all others.

* * *

FROM SUCH magnificence of reputation, one should expect magnificent things. Anything less than perfection would be bitterly disappointing.

Even with these advance expectations, it is to be doubted if the audience was entirely prepared for the sheer, breath-taking beauty and excitement of performance that pervaded the evening.

The indescribable distinction that the orchestra brings to every composition was evident from the moment that Serge Koussevitzky raised his baton to begin the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony until the last, full-throated statement of the Tschaikowsky Fifth was uttered.

* * *

THE GREAT masses of strings were tremendously impressive in the body of tone they produced, as well as in the unfailing discipline they dispayed.

Koussevitzky, with economy of gesture and utter surety as to the efects he desired, molded the mighty orchestra to his will, so that the music emerged as the production of one genius, expressing the thoughts of the composer.

An instance of the amazing art of the conductor was revealed in the performance of the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina." It is a work that has been a tested standby of radio and concert programs, used extensively as a time filler.

* * *

YET, AS PERFORMED by the Boston orchestra, it became the loveliest of tone paintings, charming and expressive to the veriest breath of sound.

Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegal," revealed another facet of Koussevitzky's musicianship. The engaging impudence of the topical themes was never better expressed. The whole composition became a story told in the best tradition.

The Tschaikowsky symphony ended the evening. The audience almost shattered the roof with its applause. The concert was the first in a series of four appearances by major orchestras.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 1 2 1946

BACKSTAGE NOTE: Serge Koussevitzky ruined three white shirts during his concert here . . . soaked 'em with perspiration during his amazing antics on the podium . . . the ripped 'em out at the arms . . . ONLY ONE thing missing in that Lafayette production of "Burlesque" . . . Bert Lahr ought to gladden the audience with an after-piece . . . his terrific rendition of the cowardly lion bit from "The Wizard of Oz."

Happy Marriage

The announcement that the John Hancock Life Insurance Company will sponsor the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the air brings together two old New England institutions. It has the additional merit of wiping out the orchestra's deficit for the current year. Congratulations are in order.

Dec 11

DEC 1 2 1946
Portland Me

Current Comment

Butter's Vulnerability
St. Louis Star Times

The war years have contributed to popular support of the margarine industry in its battle with butter. Many housewives turned to margarine for the first time during the butter shortage; and that they found it a desirable substitute is conceded even by the Milwaukee Journal, published in a state where any mention of the stuff is considered little short of heresy.

Now the margarine manufacturers have decided to attack the federal law which taxes colored margarine 10 cents a pound, and to get whatever concessions they can in the 25 states which have discouraged sale of their product with special taxes, licenses and prohibitions against its use in state institutions.

Statutory handicaps imposed on margarine are wrong in prinicple, barring those which fix standards of purity and food value. They stand up only because law-makers have not been able to resist the powerful farm and creamery lobbies. But if ever there was a time when public sentiment could be mobilized against such special legislation, it is now when butter costs around 90 cents a pound in St. Louis—and more in some places. The dairy industry had better be looking to its defenses—to a lowering of prices, that is.

Still Happier Marriage
Boston Herald

Owing to misinformation received on Tuesday regarding the arrangements uniting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance on the air waves, this paper stated that the contract wiped out the orchestra's deficit for the current season. We are now informed that there remains a deficit of about $46,000. In explanation of the failure of the radio contract to end the deficit, it is stated that part of the proceeds from the insurance company will be used to increase the remuneration of Conductor Koussevitzky and his players. We say, then, that this marriage of two old New England institutions is an even happier one in adding to the reward of these outstanding musisians. It ought to be easy to make up the remaining deficit. Let's go, Boston!

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 1 2 1946

Crashes 'Man's World' as First Hub Symphony Woman Pianist

WATERTOWN, Dec. 12 (UP)—A petite brunette, who next Tuesday will become the first woman ever to play as a pianist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 66-year history, said today she was "thrilled to be given the chance in a man's world."

"You know how people always say that the musical world belongs to men," Miss Luise Vosgerchian, 22, of Watertown said in an interview. "Well, I'm proud to have this chance—as a woman—to play with the greatest orchestra in the world."

Invited by Associate Conductor Richard Burgin to play with the orchestra at three concerts next week, Miss Vosgerchian will fill the coveted but more conventional role of guest soloist Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Boston Symphony Hall.

On Tuesday evening at Harvard's Sanders Theater in Cambridge, however, Miss Vosgerchian will establish a precedent by substituting for Lukas Foss, the orchestra's official pianist, in their rendition of Igor Stravinsky's Symphony in three movements written in 1945.

Miss Vosgerchian, who started studying piano when she was seven years old, said she has been practicing all day every day since Burgin's invitation last Thursday. She said an opportunity to appear with the Boston Symphony was "the dream of every young pianist and absolutely the mostt hrilling thing that's ever happened to me."

In 1941, Miss Vosgerchian won a prize awarded by the New York Philharmonic Symphony for an original composition, "Window Shopping," an orchestral sketch with piano which she performed with that group. She will give a recital at Town Hall in New York Feb. 16.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

DEC 1 2 1946

John Hancock Mutual Life Makes Its Bow in Radio

The John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. is sponsoring a series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over a coast-to-coast network of the American Broadcasting Co. The first concert in the series will be broadcast from Symphony Hall in Boston on Jan. 21. This program will continue every Tuesday evening at 8:30 (EST) through the winter and spring.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC 1 2 1946

Watertown Pianist First Woman Symphony Player

WATERTOWN, Dec. 12 (UP)—A petite 22-year-old brunette, who next Tuesday will become the first woman ever to play as a pianist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 66-year history, said today she was "thrilled to be given the chance in a man's world."

"You know how people always say that the musical world belongs to men," Miss Luise Vosgerchian of Watertown said in an interview. "Well, I'm proud to have this chance—as a woman—to play with the greatest orchestra in the world."

Invited by Associate Conductor Richard Burgin to play with the orchestra at three concerts next week, Miss Vosgerchian will fill the coveted but more conventional role of guest soloist Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Boston Symphony Hall.

On Tuesday evening at Harvard's Sanders Theater in Cambridge, however, Miss Vosgerchian will establish a precedent by substituting for Lukas Foss, the orchestra's official pianist, in their rendition of Igor Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements written in 1945.

Miss Vosgerchian, who started studying piano when she was seven years old, said she has been practicing all day every day since Burgin's invitation last Thursday. She said an opportunity to appear with the Boston Symphony was "the dream of every young pianist and absolutely the most thrilling thing that's ever happened to me."

In 1941, Miss Vosgerchian won a prize awarded by the New York Philharmonic Symphony for an original composition, "Window Shopping," an orchestral sketch with piano which she performed with that group. She will give a recital at Town Hall in New York, Feb. 16.

Miss Vosgerchian lives at 74 West Boylston street, Watertown.

OIL CITY, PA.
BLIZZARD

DEC 1 2 1946

STATUES ORGANIZED BUT WORK ALL HOURS

Boston—(AP)—Even the statues can "hear perfectly" in Boston's 46-year-old Symphony Hall, first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity to acoustical laws. The Boston Symphony Orchestra dedicating a plaque to the designer, the late acoustical architect, Wallace C. Sabine, was told by his widow, that the 16 classical plaster statues surrounding the second balcony had a practical purpose.

"They break up the sound waves and prevent undue reverberation," she said.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

DEC 1 2 1946

Chance To Play With Hub Symphony Thrills Petite Watertown Girl

WATERTOWN, Dec. 12 (UP)—A petite 22-year-old brunette, who next Tuesday will become the first woman ever to play as a pianist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 66-year history, said today she was "thrilled to be given the chance in a man's world."

"You know how people always say that the musical world belongs to men," Miss Luise Vosgerchian of Watertown said in an interview. "Well, I'm proud to have this chance—as a woman—to play with the greatest orchestra in the world."

Invited by Associate Conductor Richard Burgin to play with the orchestra at three concerts next week, Miss Vosgerchian will fill the coveted but more conventional role of guest soloist Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Boston Symphony hall.

DEC 1 2 1946

Petite Brunette Thrilled At Chance With Orchestra

Watertown, Mass., Dec. 12—(UP)—A petite 22-year-old brunette, who next Tuesday will become the first woman ever to play as a pianist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 66-year history, said today she was "thrilled to be given the chance in a man's world."

"You know how people always say that the musical world belongs to men," Miss Luise Vosgerchian of Watertown said in an interview. "Well, I'm proud to have this chance—as a woman—to play with the greatest orchestra in the world."

Invited by Associate Conductor Richard Burgin to play with the orchestra at three concerts next week, Miss Vosgerchian will fill the coveted but more conventional role of guest soloist Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Boston Symphony Hall.

On Tuesday evening at Harvard's Sanders Theater in Cambridge, however, Miss Vosgerchian will establish a precedent by substituting for Lukas Foss, the orchestra's official pianist, in their rendition of Igor Stravinsky's Symphony in three movements written in 1945.

Miss Vosgerchian, who started studying piano when she was 7 years old, said she has been practicing all day every day since Burgin's invitation last Thursday. She said an opportunity to appear with the Boston Symphony was "the dream of every young pianist and absolutely the most thrilling thing that's ever happened to me."

In 1941, Miss Vosgerchian won a prize awarded by the New York Philharmonic Symphony for an original composition, "Window Shopping," an orchestral sketch with piano which she performed with that group. She will give a recital at Town Hall in New York Feb. 16.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 12 1946

ON THE AISLE

A Mixup in Maestros Pays Conversational Dividends as Old Friends Meet

By Claudia Cassidy

The voice on the telephone last Friday was familiar and welcome. "How are you, Maestro?" I asked, settling back to enjoy a chat with my cherished friend, Giorgio Polacco. And we exchanged greetings and made an engagement for luncheon. Then the Maestro asked, "How is your musical season getting along?" and I thought it odd that he should, as we had discussed it only a few nights before, but I admitted that it could be improved. Then he said, "Do you anticipate an improvement?" and I said, "I certainly do, when the Boston orchestra plays tonight." A warm chuckle at the other end of the line pulled me up short. It was distinctly a Russian chuckle, without a tinge of Italian. "Wait a minute," I said, "Which Maestro is this?" "Which one did you think?" said the voice, enjoying my discomfiture. "Maestro Koussevitzky," I confessed, "I may as well admit it. I thought you were Maestro Polacco."

But it turned out to be a happy accident, for after the Sunday concert the two friends renewed old acquaintance, the one saying "Unsurpassable!" and "Sublime!" about Koussevitzky's glorious concert, the other recalling that no "Pelléas and Mélisande" had pleased him quite as much as Polacco's in the days when the Chicago Opera took its treasures to Boston. And the good talk glowed warm and friendly as your own fire on a winter night.

Koussevitzky told us about his life in Russia, and about the Russian habit of honoring its generals beyond their artistic capacities by placing them in responsible musical posts, recalling the one general indignant that the czar's orchestra should tolerate second violins when it could afford to hire a full contingent of firsts, and the other who watched the percussion players thru their long waits and demanded to know why those idle fellows didn't earn their pay.

Koussevitzky himself was a director—I refrain from saying director general—of music under the Kerensky regime, but survived the bolsheviks, perhaps because of the family reputation as radicals, perhaps because of his years of taking his concerts to the Russian people. Only his property was forfeit to the state, and while he may speak with mild regret of a beloved painting, the irreparable loss was his music library, ranging from Palestrina to 1914.

When he came to Boston to take over the orchestra, Koussevitzky fired 53 players in three years, then started to build. It took him seven years, but once that orchestra was created it was a little like the Chicago Symphony under Thomas and Stock. You had to quit or pass your prime as a player in order to leave it.

But even creating and sustaining the world renowed Boston orchestra was not enough for this man. Always ready to help young musicians, he has given their work heartening encouragement, sometimes because, as he says, "If there are 20 bars worth encouraging, you must help." And his Tanglewood school and festival are dear to his heart because he hopes that in some who will come there to be helped lies a share in the future of music. He spoke of one boy, whose application was the first to arrive when the post-war reopening was announced. The boy wants to be a conductor, and the man who is working with him says he doesn't learn by the month or the week or the day, but "every five minutes."

He and Polacco both hoped that boy would use a baton, agreeing that no manipulation of hands, however eloquent, captures the baton's technique. But just to show you what kind of man Koussevitzky is, and why he is idolized by so many young musicians, do you suppose he broke his baton in disgust because some of his favorites declined to use it? No, he just spent hours working with his hands to discover how best in manual terms to impart the baton's dexterity to these gifted youngsters who spurn it.

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 13 1946

Reviews On New Books

By W. G. ROGERS

SERGE KOUSSELVITZKI: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC, BY HUGO LEICHTENTRITT (HARVARD) THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, BY JOHN BURKE (Mowern Library)

It's Boston's turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music column; the Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume, and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitzky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Though these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitzy's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their juniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scent. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Ives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on "Artis Koussevitzky," as conductor, is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a little more . . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to.

Burk's book, first published in 1943, is divided about evenly between biography and a catalogued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

This Clipping From
UNION CITY, N. J.
HUDSON DISPATCH

DEC 13 1946

Books

By W. G. ROGERS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: THE BOSTON SYM[illegible] THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard; $3); THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, by John N. Burk (Modern Library; $1.10.)

It's Boston's turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music column; the Bay State's iluustrious conductor is the subject of one volume, and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitzky assumed his present post, to 1944, acording to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Though these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitzky's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, 9 by Ernest Bloch, 9 by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their juniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein, and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservation, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Ives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on "Artist Koussevitzky," as conductor, is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a litle more . . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to.

Burk's book, first published in 1943, is divided about evenly between biography and a catalogued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

DEC 13 1946

Literary Guidepost

By W. G. ROGERS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard; $3); THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, by John N. Burk (Modern Library; $1.10).

It's Boston 's turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music column; the Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume, and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitzky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Though these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitzky's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their juniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Ives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on "Artist Koussevitzky," as conductor, is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a little more . . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to. Burk's book, first published in [illegible] is divided about evenly between biography and a catalogued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

DEC 13 1946

Literary Guidepost

By W. G. ROGERS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard; $3); THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, by John N. Burk (Modern Library; $1.10).

It's Boston's turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in the music column; the Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume, and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitzky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Though these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitzky's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their juniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Ives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on "Artist Kouasevitzky," as conductor, is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a little more . . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to.

Burk's book, first published in 1943, is divided about evenly between biography and a catalogued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

DEC 13 1946

AROUND THE DIAL

'Home Edition' Changes Format

Boston Symphony Gains Insurance Sponsorship

By BEE OFFINEER, Radio Editor

"HOME EDITION," heard Monday through Friday at 11:30 a. m. over WAKR, is due for a change of format. A complete daily drama called "Hollywood Story" will air over the eastern half of the ABC network. Galen Drake will broadcast in the west only. "Hollywood Story" is based on the people who live and work in the film capital. New series debuts on Dec. 30.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has found itself a sponsor. Beginning on Jan. 21, 1947, it will air under the bankroll of an insurance company. The concerts, now broadcast at 9:30 p. m. on Tuesdays, will be switched to 8:30 effective with the January date.

A series of yuletide programs has been scheduled for 3:15 p. m. over WHKK and the Mutual network, beginning Monday. First of these is titled "America Goes Shopping," featuring interviews with shoppers in New York City, Omaha and Salt Lake City. Second broadcast, for Tuesday, is titled "Christmas With the U. S. Navy." Fleet Adm. Chester W. Nimitz is to be guest speaker.

* * *

Saturday Daytime

VARIETY, drama and music, both serious and popular, are on tap for the stay-at-home listeners tomorrow. Here's a brief review of some of the programs to be heard.

Station WAKR lists "Kent State Radio Workshop" at 11:30 a. m. with "Petit Jockie" as the drama. Written by Kenneth Goldstein, student, the play's cast includes Edith Tedford, Phil Hartman, Duane Budner, Joe McNaughton and Frank Fedorka ....Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," second of six operas selected by the radio listeners for this season's weekly broadcast from the Metropolitan, starts at 2 p. m. The cast follows:

"DER ROSENKAVALIER"

"Octavian"	Rise Stevens
"Princess"	Irene Jessner
"Sophie"	Eleanor Steber
"Majordomo"	Emery Darcy
"Valzacchi"	Alessio de Paolis
"Annina"	Herta Glaz
"Faninal"	Frederick Lechner
"Marianne"	Thelma Votipka
"Baron Ochs"	Emanuel List

Other principal roles sung by Maxine Stellman, Irene Jordan, Thelma Altman, Lillian Raymondi, Lodovico Oliviero, Anthony Marlowe, Gerhard Pechner, Leslie Chabay, Kurt Baum, Edward Caton, Lorenzo Alvary, Ludwig Burgstaller and Peggy Smithers.

MISS STEBER

ATTRACTIVE ELEANOR STEBER will sing the role of "Sophie" when "Der Rosenkavalier" is broadcast by the Metropolitan Opera on Saturday. Dial WAKR at 2 p. m.

DECEMBER 14, 1946

phony on Second Hearing

Piatigorsky as Soloist in Haydn Concerto

By Winthrop P. Tryon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concluded its western tour yesterday afternoon with a visit home, where it stays a while before a swing down in the New York direction. It returned to Symphony Hall for its ninth pair of concerts in the regular Boston series, bringing the Aaron Copland Symphony No. 3, which it has been exhibiting on the road. To vary matters in pleasant fashion, it called in Gregor Piatigorsky to illustrate his gifts in the Haydn Concerto in D major for Violoncello. As a reminder of days gone, it offered a couple of informal readings in Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin" and Prelude to "Meistersinger."

Possibly it would be proper to refer to the leading work on the program as the Koussevitzky-Copland Symphony, for the reason that the Koussevitzky Music Foundation commissioned it, and all Mr. Copland did was to write it. At any rate, here is how the case stands—Dr. Koussevitzky has made the Symphony No. 3 like something his very own. There can be no doubt whatever that he regards it as representing the highest hopes of the Foundation, and as therefore inviting the most serious attention of his audiences.

To judge how the Friday afternoon subscribers took the Symphony, hearing it now for the second time since its completion three months ago, the applause hardly amounted to an indication; for everybody was glad to welcome Dr. Koussevitzky back to the platform and happy to commend his brilliant handling of the players in this repeated Boston performance. But the public rarely receives an unaccustomed type of music with outward expression of enthusiasm. It feels surprise at the time, and it comes out with approval, if at all, a long while afterwards.

Whatever the event may be, there can no great harm result if someone right now gives No. 3 all possible praise, describing it as an effort right out in the international artistic front, and as an accomplishment that leaves men like Strauss and Ravel, to say nothing of Stravinsky and Prokofiev, trailing.

Up to now, composers have treated the modern orchestra as nothing but an enlarged and amplified classic ensemble. We had only to listen to Wagner yesterday to be convinced of that. Copland discovers in it an altogether new compound of sonorities, capable not only of proclaiming old verities with larger voice, but also of searching out thoughts hitherto hidden. His manner of making a melody struggle up through an overlay of discord is in for being much imitated, we may be sure. But he is there first and ahead of them all.

The No. 3, whatever the comment may amount to, could with reason be denominated the Symphony of the Fanfare. For the episode for brasses in the fourth movement, the finale, sounds like music composed to stay. The whole construction, though, has outline and proportion. It has progress. It has unity. It puts the United States, venturesome to say so or not, out of a following into a leading position in music.

Speaking of the soloist, Mr. Piatigorsky showed unwillingness to be acclaimed for his playing in the quaint Haydn Concerto. He knew that he and the reduced group of executants supporting him were there just for relief and contrast. But what a pleasure to hear his warm-voiced 'cello again, and what an old-fashioned joy the cadenza of the opening Allegro!

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 15 1946

OUR MUSIC

The National Music Council has completed a comprehensive job of combing all the programs played last season by the twenty-four orchestras in this country who operate on a budget of $100,000 or more. Its seventh annual survey finds that these orchestras played 175 works by American-born composers, as against 142 the season before. The figure represented 9.2 per cent of all the 1,913 works performed.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony played the largest number of the works by American-born—twenty. The Boston Orchestra was second with fourteen. Third was Cincinnati with thirteen. The Rochester Philharmonic played eight, but it topped the percentage list, for this represented 17.8 per cent of all the works it performed, where the New York Philharmonic's twenty formed only 15.4 per cent of its programs.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 15 1946

Mrs. Carlos de Heredia, Music Festival Founder

Trustee of Berkshire Concerts From Start in 1934

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Dec. 14.—Mrs. Georgie Bruce Cook de Heredia, eighty-one, one of the founders of the Berkshire Music Festival, died here yesterday at her summer home, Wheatleigh. Her home in New York is at 110 East Seventieth Street.

Mrs. de Heredia helped to found the Reconstruction Hospital, 395 Central Park West, New York, during the first world war. She was a charter member of the Colony Club of New York and had been a trustee of the Berkshire Festival since it was begun in 1934. She was an associate manager of the Lenox Library here and a member of the Lenox Club.

She was born in Bath, N. Y., the daughter of the late Henry H. Cook, a New York banker. She was married to Carlos M. de Heredia in 1891 and lived in Paris during most of her married life. Her husband died in 1918. Surviving are two nieces, Mrs. Robert G. McGregor, of New York, and Mrs. Herbert L. Gutterson, of Washington.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
COMMERCIAL NEWS

COMPANY SPONSORING SYMPHONY

The John Hancock Mutual Life is the latest large life insurance company to "take to the air" with a program of fine music. Starting January 21 the company sponsors a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra over a coast to coast network of the American Broadcasting Company through 58 stations. This is the first venture of the company in this type of advertising although it is understood that the communications will be of high character and limited with more of an institutional tone than blatantly commercial. The program will be heard here at 5:30 p. m.

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 15 1946

By ROSS PARMENTER

FEELING the composer is the "orphan in America's musical panorama," a group in Illinois has banded together to do something about what it calls "the professional destitution of the average creatively minded musician, particularly those who write in the smaller forms—the non-orchestral, vocal and choral idioms." Known as the Illinois Composers Guild, the group is planning monthly forums to which composers from all States may submit their works for performance and evaluation. The group hopes to present the best works submitted at a spring concert and to interest publishers in works it appraises. John Alden Carpenter and Leo Sowerby are among the five incorporators.

NEW WORK: The 82-year-old Richard Strauss has written a new work, called "Metamorphoses." Besides calling for ten violins, five violas, five 'celli and three bassos, it requires eighteen solo strings. The composer has offered the American première to Serge Koussevitzky, who has accepted it and will perform the work with the Boston Symphony Jan. 3.

FOR 'CELLO: Aram Khatchaturian, Armenian composer, has completed a 'cello concerto which has already received its première at the Moscow Conservatory. "The oriental flavor," writes the critic of the Moscow News, "is emphasized in the instrumentation, which is lavish and luxurious to the point of extravagance."

SOVIET OPERA: A new Soviet opera will be performed next month for the first time at the State Theatre of Opera and Ballet in Ashkhabad, Turkmenia. Known as "Kemine and Kazi," it is laid in the eighteenth century and tells the story of Kemine, Turkmenia's national poet. The composer is Veli Mukhadov, the son of a folk bard who sang songs and ballads accompanying himself on an instrument known as a dutar. Young Mukhadov showed unusual ability while at the Ashkhabad Music School. Rheinhold Gliere heard of him and saw that he was sent to the Moscow Conservatory in 1936. During the war the composer visited the front lines and composed patriotic songs. In addition to the opera he has also composed a ballet since the war. "Ak-Pamyk," which depicts the life and work of Turkmenian collective cotton farmers.

NEW REVIEW: As an adjunct to its activities in fostering the interchange of music and musicians between this country and Soviet Russia, the American-Soviet Music Society is now publishing a magazine devoted to news and feature articles dealing with contemporary musical activities in both the USA and the U.S.S.R. The periodical is known as the American-Soviet Music Review.

This Clipping From

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 19 1946

CINCINNATI GETS JOHNSON

He Replaces Goossens as Leader of Orchestra for 1947-48

CINCINNATI, Dec. 18 (AP)—Thor Johnson, 34-year-old Wisconsin-born musician, today was appointed conductor of the Cincinnati symphony orchestra for the 1947-48 season.

Mr. Johnson, who was conductor of the first symphony orchestra in the Army during the recent war, succeeds Eugene Goossens, who recently announced his resignation to accept a position as conductor of the Sydney (Australia) symphony, effective in April.

The board described Mr. Johnson as a protégé of Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra. Recently he was orchestra conductor at the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

DEC 19 1946

Fund Will Be Raised To Rebuild Queen's Hall

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc. joined hands for British War Relief at Tanglewood in 1940, residents of the Berkshires had quite a share in raising the total of more than $23,000. Of this amount, $5000 was sent to Myra Hess, the well-known British pianist, to help her continue her daily concerts in Queen's Hall, London.

The check arrived in London just before Miss Hess was to announce, that for lack of funds, she was being forced to discontinue the concerts. In grateful tribute, Miss Hess sent Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Orchestra a telegram of thanks.

Then in 1941, Queen's Hall was bombed out. Now through the interest of a number of Americans, notably Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland, Me., president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, funds will be raised to rebuild the hall. It i salso the federation and Mrs. Gannett who are sponsoring the building of the replica of Hawthorne's little red house at Tanglewood. Excavations for this project are well under way.

According to an announcement by Mrs. Gannett the campaign for the rebuilding of the famous concert auditorium will be conducted in this country under the auspices of the Federation's International music relations committee under the cochairmanship of Olga Samaroff-Stokowski and Charles Cooke, both of New York. Myra Hess will head the campaign in Great Britain.

Mrs. Gannett said that while the federation will not assume the responsibility for raising the full quota in the United States, its international music relations state chairmen will head the drive in their various states, and seek contributions from influential and internationally minded persons of broad musical interest. Contributions may be sent to the International Music Relations Committee at 28 Beekman Place, New York 22.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 20 1946

Thor Johnson to Conduct Cincinnati Orchestra

CINCINNATI, Dec. 18 (AP).—Thor Johnson, thirty-four-year-old American-born musician, Wednesday was appointed conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for the 1947-'48 season.

Mr. Johnson, who was conductor of the First Symphony Orchestra in the United States Army during World War II, succeeds Eugene Goossens, who recently announced his resignation to accept a position as conductor of the Sydney, Australia, symphony, effective next April.

The board described Mr. Johnson as a native of Wisconsin and a protege of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was educated in Winston-Salem, N. C.

Prior to his military service Mr. Johnson was conductor of the Ann Arbor (Michigan) May Festival and the Grand Rapids Symphony Orchestra.

He served as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and recently was orchestra conductor at the Juilliard School of Music, New York.

PRINTERS INK WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 20 1946

. . . The John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. sponsors a series of concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra over ABC starting Jan. 21 . . .

KNOXVILLE, TENN
NEWS-SENTINEL
12/22/46

New Beethoven Book

MODERN LIBRARY has added to its excellent series The Life & Works of Beethoven, by John N. Burk, historian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ($1.10); and Henry James' The Wings of the Dove (95c). . . .

One of the most fascinating of quiz books is Sylvan Hoffman's How Much Do You Know? (Farrar, Straus, $2.50). The wide range of subjects is drawn from popular magazines and radio programs . . .

TIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y
12/20/46

John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance has appointed BBD&O to place its big, new radio program, sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will start next month over American Broadcasting. Its other advertising will remain with McCann-Erickson.

* * * * *

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 21 1946

Just Plain Johnson

"I see that a man with the incredible name of Johnson has been appointed conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra."

"What you mean, incredible?"

"Why, Johnson's just a plain ordinary Amurrican name. How can a fellow with a name like that conduct a big symphony orchestra?"

"You mean he don't know music?"

"On the contrary he knows a lot of music. Must. He's a protege of Koussevitsky. He has been orchestra conductor at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. He conducted the first symphony orchestra in the army during the war, when he must have got a first-class workout. Oh, he knows his music all right. And he must have something on the ball or the Cincinnati orchestra wouldn't hire him; for they know music too, but . . ."

"But what?"

"Well, he wasn't born abroad. He hasn't gone abroad and come back with a foreign twist to his name—Jonsky, say, or Yohannev. For all I know he didn't even marry a foreign singer; and if he did, why, she's just Missus Johnson now. So what are the Amurrican people going to think of big symphony music with just a plain Johnson on the box?"

"The Washington Senators did all right with one."

"Yes, but that was baseball; that's our game. But music's foreign stuff or it isn't any good and especially conductors."

"Say, I guess you're right. I guess I never took a practical view of it. I guess I just like to listen."

"Well I certainly hope this fellow Johnson—Thor Johnson his first name is. Thor might help—I certainly hope he makes good. One or two more Johnsons and Blacks and Hansons and Kruegers and a couple of Smiths, and maybe we Amurricans will wake up and realize we got something just as good, as the druggist says."

"Maybe."

ST. MARY'S, PA.
PRESS

DEC 21 1946

An insurance company may underwrite the Boston Symphony, now on ABC on a sustaining basis. It's a one-million-dollar time and talent deal for a year.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

DEC 21 1946

The Coq Rouge, 65 East 56th street, New York, comes forth with an announcement beginning Monday, January 6, the famed and excellent restaurant will be open daily (except Sunday) for luncheon from noon on. Since the Coq Rouge discontinued their original, and very popular, policy of opening for luncheon some years back, customers have been clamoring for a return to same, and Host Frank Bonacchini has at long last listened to their pleas . . .

* * *

Charles Muench, conductor of the famed Paris Conservatory Orchestra, arrived by TWA plane on Tuesday for his first visit to this country. Mr. Muench will be guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony the last week in January and first in February. Prior to his engagement with the Philharmonic-Symphony, Muench will conduct the Boston Symphony. Later he will conduct the Montreal Concerts Symphoniques, the Chicago Symphony and the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

Muench's Philharmonic programs will feature French music. He will present the Honnegger Symphony No. 3 (Liturgique) for the first time in this country; Debussy's "Images", "Iberia" and "La Mer"; Ravel's "La Valse", "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and "Daphnis et Chloe"; and the Roussel Symphony No. 3 will also be played under his direction.

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 22 1946

Paris Director Here; To Lead U.S. Orchestras

Charles Munch Tells How French, in War, Refused to 'Digest' Nazi Kultur

The liberation of France brought more than physical freedom to the musicians who had chafed for years under the Nazi yoke, Charles Munch, director of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire in Paris, said in an interview at the St. Moritz yesterday. To them it meant the re-establishment of international contacts in the world of music.

In November, 1945, soon after the liberation, Mr. Munch enjoyed the first fruits of this renewal of contacts when he was flown to England to conduct the London Philharmonic and the British Broadcasting Company orchestras.

He Will Tour U. S.

Now he is in the United States for a series of appearances as guest conductor. His first concert will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday night. Then he will go to Chicago, Los Angeles and Montreal. The last week in January and the first week in February he will appear as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York.

"You cannot imagine what it means," Mr. Munch said, "to be isolated for years without news or contacts from abroad. All we had was German Kultur rammed at us, and that we refused to digest."

When the Nazis took over Paris, Mr. Munch said he at first refused to conduct under their auspices, but finally consented to do so to avoid disbanding of the orchestra or his replacement by a German conductor. He turned his fees over to the resistance movement and steadfastly refused to play German music, except the classics which he would have played anyway.

Defended His Players

"They made an attempt to send some of my musicians into Germany," he recalled, "but they never got one away from me."

He said he also repulsed attempts by the Nazis to inquire into the racial background of his orchestra members, telling the inquisitors that "musicians are musicians, not races."

Throughout the war the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire presented two concerts a week, on Saturday and Sunday afternoons, since blackouts and regulations made it impossible to give them at night.

"The youth of France were our most enthusiastic listeners," he said. "We had concerts devised especially for them, with an admittance fee of less than 10 cents in American money. Their interest has not waned. They keep coming and are now good critics. They will be the great music lovers of tomorrow."

DAVENPORT, IA
DEMOCRAT
2/22/46

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard: $3); THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, by John N. Burk (Modern Library; $1.10).

IT'S BOSTON'S turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music column; the Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume, and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitsky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Tho these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitsky's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their puniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Ives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on "Artist Koussevitsky," as conductor, is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a little more . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to.

Burk's book, first published in 1943, is divided about evenly between biography and a catalogued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

This Clipping From

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 19 1946

CINCINNATI GETS JOHNSON

He Replaces Goossens as Leader of Orchestra for 1947-48

CINCINNATI, Dec. 18 (AP)—Thor Johnson, 34-year-old Wisconsin-born musician, today was appointed conductor of the Cincinnati symphony orchestra for the 1947-48 season.

Mr. Johnson, who was conductor of the first symphony orchestra in the Army during the recent war, succeeds Eugene Goossens, who recently announced his resignation to accept a position as conductor of the Sydney (Australia) Symphony, effective in April.

The board described Mr. Johnson as a protégé of Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra. Recently he was orchestra conductor at the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

DEC 19 1946

Fund Will Be Raised To Rebuild Queen's Hall

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc. joined hands for British War Relief at Tanglewood in 1940, residents of the Berkshires had quite a share in raising the total of more than $23,000. Of this amount, $5000 was sent to Myra Hess, the well-known British pianist, to help her continue her daily concerts in Queen's Hall, London.

The check arrived in London just before Miss Hess was to announce, that for lack of funds, she was being forced to discontinue the concerts. In grateful tribute, Miss Hess sent Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Orchestra a telegram of thanks.

Then in 1941, Queen's Hall was bombed out. Now through the interest of a number of Americans, notably Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland, Me., president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, funds will be raised to rebuild the hall. It i salso the federation and Mrs. Gannett who are sponsoring the building of the replica of Hawthorne's little red house at Tanglewood. Excavations for this proj ect are well under way.

According to an announcement by Mrs. Gannett the campaign for the rebuilding of the famous concert auditorium will be conducted in this country under the auspices of the Federation's International music relations committee under the cochairmanship of Olga Samaroff-Stokowski and Charles Cooke, both of New York. Myra Hess will head the campaign in Great Britain.

Mrs. Gannett said that while the federation will not assume the responsibility for raising the full quota in the United States, its international music relations state chairmen will head the drive in their various states, and seek contributions from influential and internationally minded persons of broad musical interest. Contributions may be sent to the International Music Relations Committee at 28 Beekman Place, New York 22.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 20 1946

Thor Johnson to Conduct Cincinnati Orchestra

CINCINNATI, Dec. 18 (AP).—Thor Johnson, thirty-four-year-old American-born musician, Wednesday was appointed conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for the 1947-'48 season.

Mr. Johnson, who was conductor of the First Symphony Orchestra in the United States Army during World War II, succeeds Eugene Goossens, who recently announced his resignation to accept a position as conductor of the Sydney, Australia, symphony, effective next April.

The board described Mr. Johnson as a native of Wisconsin and a protege of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was educated in Winston-Salem, N. C.

Prior to his military service Mr. Johnson was conductor of the Ann Arbor (Michigan) May Festival and the Grand Rapids Symphony Orchestra.

He served as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and recently was orchestra conductor at the Juilliard School of Music, New York.

PRINTERS INK WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 20 1946

. . . The John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. sponsors a series of concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra over ABC starting Jan. 21 . . .

KNOXVILLE, TENN
NEWS-SENTINEL
12/22/46

New Beethoven Book

MODERN LIBRARY has added to its excellent series The Life & Works of Beethoven, by John N. Burk, historian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ($1.10); and Henry James' The Wings of the Dove (95c). . . . One of the most fascinating of quiz books is Sylvan Hoffman's How Much Do You Know? (Farrar, Straus, $2.50). The wide range of subjects is drawn from popular magazines and radio programs . . .

NEW YORK, N.Y
12/20/46

John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance has appointed BBD&O to place its big, new radio program, sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will start next month over American Broadcasting. Its other advertising will remain with McCann-Erickson.

* * * * *

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 21 1946

Just Plain Johnson

"I see that a man with the incredible name of Johnson has been appointed conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra."

"What you mean, incredible?"

"Why, Johnson's just a plain ordinary Amurrican name. How can a fellow with a name like that conduct a big symphony orchestra?"

"You mean he don't know music?"

"On the contrary he knows a lot of music. Must. He's a protege of Kousevitsky. He has been orchestra conductor at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. He conducted the first symphony orchestra in the army during the war, when he must have got a first-class workout. Oh, he knows his music all right. And he must have something on the ball or the Cincinnati orchestra wouldn't hire him; for they know music too, but . . ."

"But what?"

"Well, he wasn't born abroad. He hasn't gone abroad and come back with a foreign twist to his name—Jonsky, say, or Yohannev. For all I know he didn't even marry a foreign singer; and if he did, why, she's just Missus Johnson now. So what are the Amurrican people going to think of big symphony music with just a plain Johnson on the box?"

"The Washington Senators did all right with one."

"Yes, but that was baseball; that's our game. But music's foreign stuff or it isn't any good and especially conductors."

"Say, I guess you're right. I guess I never took a practical view of it. I guess I just like to listen."

"Well I certainly hope this fellow Johnson—Thor Johnson his first name is. Thor might help—I certainly hope he makes good. One or two more Johnsons and Blacks and Hansons and Kruegers and a couple of Smiths, and maybe we Amurricans will wake up and realize we got something just as good, as the druggist says."

"Maybe."

ST. MARY'S, PA.
PRESS

DEC 21 1946

An insurance company may underwrite the Boston Symphony, now on ABC on a sustaining basis. It's a one-million-dollar time and talent deal for a year.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

DEC 21 1946

The Coq Rouge, 65 East 56th street, New York, comes forth with an announcement beginning Monday, January 6, the famed and excellent restaurant will be open daily (except Sunday) for luncheon from noon on. Since the Coq Rouge discontinued their original, and very popular, policy of opening for luncheon some years back, customers have been clamoring for a return to same, and Host Frank Bonacchini has at long last listened to their pleas . . .

* * *

Charles Muench, conductor of the famed Paris Conservatory Orchestra, arrived by TWA plane on Tuesday for his first visit to this country. Mr. Muench will be guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony the last week in January and first in February. Prior to his engagement with the Philharmonic-Symphony, Muench will conduct the Boston Symphony. Later he will conduct the Montreal Concerts Symphoniques, the Chicago Symphony and the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

Muench's Philharmonic programs will feature French music. He will present the Honnegger Symphony No. 3 (Liturgique) for the first time in this country; Debussy's "Images", "Iberia" and "La Mer"; Ravel's "La Valse", "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and "Daphnis et Chloe"; and the Roussel Symphony No. 3 will also be played under his direction.

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 22 1946

Paris Director Here; To Lead U.S. Orchestras

Charles Munch Tells How French, in War, Refused to 'Digest' Nazi Kultur

The liberation of France brought more than physical freedom to the musicians who had chafed for years under the Nazi yoke, Charles Munch, director of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire in Paris, said in an interview at the St. Moritz yesterday. To them it meant the re-establishment of international contacts in the world of music.

In November, 1945, soon after the liberation, Mr. Munch enjoyed the first fruits of this renewal of contacts when he was flown to England to conduct the London Philharmonic and the British Broadcasting Company orchestras.

He Will Tour U. S.

Now he is in the United States for a series of appearances as guest conductor. His first concert will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday night. Then he will go to Chicago, Los Angeles and Montreal. The last week in January and the first week in February he will appear as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York.

"You cannot imagine what it means," Mr. Munch said, "to be isolated for years without news or contacts from abroad. All we had was German Kultur rammed at us, and that we refused to digest."

When the Nazis took over Paris, Mr. Munch said he at first refused to conduct under their auspices, but finally consented to do so to avoid disbanding of the orchestra or his replacement by a German conductor. He turned his fees over to the resistance movement and steadfastly refused to play German music, except the classics which he would have played anyway.

Defended His Players

"They made an attempt to send some of my musicians into Germany," he recalled, "but they never got one away from me."

He said he also repulsed attempts by the Nazis to inquire into the racial background of his orchestra members, telling the inquisitors that "musicians are musicians, not races."

Throughout the war the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire presented two concerts a week, on Saturday and Sunday afternoons, since blackouts and regulations made it impossible to give them at night.

"The youth of France were our most enthusiastic listeners," he said. "We had concerts devised especially for them, with an admittance fee of less than 10 cents in American money. Their interest has not waned. They keep coming and are now good critics. They will be the great music lovers of tomorrow."

AVENPORT, IA
EMOCRAT
2/22/46

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard; $3); THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, by John N. Burk (Modern Library; $1.10).

IT'S BOSTON'S turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music column; the Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume, and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitsky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Tho these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitsky's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their puniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Ives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on "Artist Koussevitsky," as conductor, is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a little more . . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to.

Burk's book, first published in 1943, is divided about evenly between biography and a catalogued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 2 2 1946

On the Dial

BY MAURICE DOLBIER

I HAVE been carolled into a mood of good will, and (the program originally scheduled for this time having already been heard) this week's column will resound only with the jingling of merry Christmas bells.

1. I like Bernard Herrman because of his music, and because of the way he conducts other men's music, and because of the things he said when he got back from England, where nearly 6000 persons turned out to hear one of his concerts in Manchester in a rainy night in the midst of a bus strike. Among the things he told a "Variety" reporter: that it was amazing that such a modern medium as radio had developed so many prejudices and traditions in such a short time, and that our practice of discarding fine scripts after one performance only is economic and cultural waste.

2. I like the broadcasts of the Boston Symphony, and I'm glad they're being sponsored, starting Jan. 21, and I'm glad that the broadcasts will move then to an earlier time on Tuesday night, specifically, from 8:30 to 9:30. I hope that the persons who prepare the program notes will lose a little of their zeal in searching out rare and unusual facts or critical quotes about composers and compositions, and stick to the style of the N. Y. Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Orchestra notes. (Hold on! This week you like everybody, remember?)

3. Well, almost everybody. There are some commentators. . .

Let's start again.

3. I like Storm Whaley, the general manager of Station KUOA, the only station in Siloam Springs, Arkansas, who took a wire recorder to New York in October, recorded news and interviews at the United Nations Assembly and airmailed his spools back to Arkansas for daily broadcasts at peak listening times. Now he's lecturing in Arkansas, saying "I'm attempting to make the U. N. live in the minds of the people of this area."

(Note from the almanac: From Arkansas to New York is about 1500 miles; from Providence to New York is 174 miles.)

4. I like William L. Shirer, and I'm sorry to read that his sponsor is going to drop him, and is in the market for a musical show instead. Now if someone would only drop. . . . (Watch it! 'Tis the season to be jolly)

5. I have not lost my fondness for Harold Huber, the actor who impersonates Hercule Poirot, nor for the agency that sends me publicity about him, even though both Huber and the agency have been absent from the column for months. "Harold Huber," says a recent release, "reads a page a day of the telephone directory." Merry Christmas, Mr. Huber! Merry Christmas, you agency you!

And the season's greetings to all!

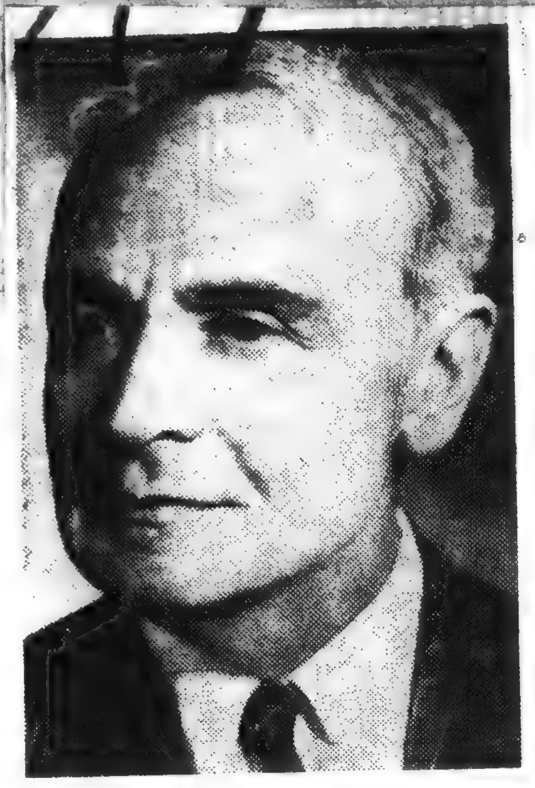
NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 2 2 1946

FRENCH WORKS: Charles Muench, the conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, who is visiting this country for the first time, is following the example of Manuel Rosenthal, the French conductor who preceded him to this country. He is featuring the work of contemporary French composers on his orchestral programs. He will make his debut conducting the Boston Symphony in its home city two days after Christmas. His first program will include Honegger's Symphony for Strings and "Sonate a due" by Maurice Jaubert, 40-year-old composer who was killed in action during the invasion of France in 1940. Jaubert's work is known only in this country for his scores for the films "Carnet du Bal," "Port of Shadows" and "Daybreak." When he conducts the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra later in the season Mr. Muench will introduce Honegger's Symphony No. 3 and will lead other French works.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

DEC 22 1946



Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Conductor's Evaluations of Our Composers

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY. By Hugo Leichtentritt. Harvard U. Press. 199 pp. $3.

By FELIX BOROWSKI

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY of the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly is the conductor in America who has inspired the largest amount of literature. This book by Hugo Leichtentritt is less a biography than a critical record of Dr. Koussevitzky's endeavors to put American composers on the artistic map. The author appears to see eye to eye with the famous conductor in his estimation of the native composer. The former turns a cold shoulder to musical conservatism. So does Dr. Leichtentritt.

Dr. Leichtentritt, however, is more mercifully disposed to what he calls the "intermediate generation," to which he assigns Edward B. Hill, Frederick S. Converse, John Alden Carpenter, Charles T. Griffes, Emerson Whithorne, Deems Taylor and Louis Gruenberg. As works of these music-makers have been included in Boston programs they are given more or less discussion and dissection in this volume. But the author reserves the most space, as well as the most laudatory adjectives, for the men in whom Dr. Koussevitzky places the largest confidence and greatest admiration.

These are—and not unnaturally—in a chapter headed "The Russian-American School," which treats of Dukelsky, Berezovsky, Lopatnikoff, Dubensky and Koutzen. Also included is the Czech, Bohuslav Martinu. What is admitted to the sacred Boston circle is discussed in a chapter titled "The New Americanism," in which space is devoted to Aaron Copland and Roy Harris, their styles and an analysis of their more important works. There are also pages on William Schuman, Samuel Barber, Paul Creston, David Diamond and other modern musicians who have been included in Dr. Koussevitzky's favor.

The last two chapters are devoted to "Artist Koussevitzky" and "Koussevitzky as an Educator" respectively. The author, after careful consideration of his subject's great excellencies, finds that no frailties are to be weighed against them.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

DEC 27 1946

Bruno Jaenicke, Noted Musician

The world of music today mourned Bruno Jaenicke, 59, internationally known French horn player, who died on Christmas Day in his home, 99-56 63rd ave., Forest Hills, Queens.

Mr. Jaenicke served as a soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra from 1921 until his retirement in 1943.

He was a native of Potsdam, Germany. He studied at the musical conservatory in Sondershaven, Germany, where he changed from the violin to the horn upon the advice of one of his teachers.

CAME HERE IN '13.

In 1913 he came to this country and joined the Boston Symphony, remaining with that orchestra for six years before becoming a member of the Detroit Symphony.

He also had played with the New York Chamber Music Society and the Beethoven Association.

The French horn is one of the most difficult of musical instruments to play, and Mr. Jaenicke was regarded as a master of it. He was particularly noted for his playing of solo horn passages from Tschiakowsky's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's opera, "Siegfried."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 27 1946

Bruno Jaenicke, Retired French Horn Soloist

With N.Y. Philharmonic From 1921 Until 1943

Bruno Jaenicke, fifty-nine, solo French horn player for the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra until he retired in 1943, died Wednesday at his home, 99-56 Sixty-third Avenue, Elmhurst, Queens. Mr. Jaenicke was first engaged by the New York Philharmonic in 1921 and retained his position when that orchestra merged with the New York Symphony in 1928.

He was born in Potsdam, Germany, the son of Gustav and Louise Sroka Jaenicke. He received part of his musical education at the musical conservatory in Sondershaven, Germany, where he first studied the violin, changing to the horn at the advice of one of his teachers.

He was already an accomplished artist when he came to the United States in 1913 and joined the Boston Symphony. He remained with this orchestra for six years, and then became a member of the Detroit Symphony, where he remained until he came to New York.

He was regarded as one of the great horn players of the world and was particularly known for his playing of Siegfried's horn call and the horn solo in Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

Surviving are his wife, Mrs. Marie Helen Jaenicke; two daughters, Mrs. Louise Licht and Mrs. Elsa Thede, and a son, Wa[illegible] Jaenicke.

DEC 28 1946

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY . . . in action on the podium

Local Boys Make Good

Koussevitzky: He Gave U.S. Composers a Big Break

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music, by Hugo Leichtentritt. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Mass. 199 pp. $3.

Reviewed by
GEORGE H. L. SMITH

THE year 1924 was a notable one in the history of music in America. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had been faced with the problem of finding a leader for their world-famous organization. Their choice fells upon Serge Koussevitzky who had won fame first as a virtuoso of the double bass, and later as a conductor.

Koussevitzky had already stirred the musical publics of Russia and Paris. Most of the musical capitals of Europe had felt his wizardry and warmed to his fiery passion for all that was great in musical art. A conductor of such eminence and promise was a logical choice for an institution that had built its reputation not only on the superb re-creations of the music of the past, but on its leadership in the world of music.

• • •

UPON HIS ARRIVAL in Boston, Koussevitzky set out to accomplish three principal aims. First, he wanted to rebuild and train his orchestra so that it would be capable of the most communicative and revealing performances of the great masterpieces of musical history. Then he wanted to perform the important new music of composers of every nationality that had something real to contribute to the progress of his art. His third aim was simply a new application of an early principle. In Russia he had sought out the new music of Rachmaninoff, Prokofieff and other rising composers; so in France he had furthered the causes of such men as Debussy, Ravel, Honegger, and Roussel. In America he would find the true roots of American culture, he would aid young composers of promise with performances of their works, and he would encourage them with promises of performances and commissions to create new works.

THE TALE that Dr. Leichtentritt tells in his new book on Koussevitzky is mainly concerned with the realization of the conductor's aims through his twenty-two seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Leichtentritt has chosen to follow a chronological order, which is a practical and effective method of following Koussevitzky's development and the growth of the composers he has aided. He pauses in his narrative to outline briefly the history of symphonic composition in America, making critical comments on the various groups of composers, as well as the individuals and their music.

• • •

THOSE READERS who are looking for a biography of the conductor will be disappointed. Dr. Leichtentritt has stayed close to his subject. But what a rewarding subject it is! How many composers owe their first hearings, and the steady performances of new work after new work to the faith and the vision of Koussevitzky. The list is too long to give in full, but a few may be named. Such composers as Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Edward Burlingham Hill, Walter Piston, William Schuman and a dozen others owe their fame and in some measure, their growth t Koussevitzky's ever receptiv friendship. But if his choice ha been wide, it has not been careless He has never performed a work unless he was convinced of its importance. Time has been kind t his choices.

• • •

THIS SIGNAL service to Amer can music has not, of course, bee accomplished at the expense of his torical perspective. Koussevitzk has been astute in building his pr grams.

His whole program has been educational in the best sense, but h has not stopped there. He has gon on to the realization of anothe ambition, formed in his early yea in Russia, and created the Ber shire Music Center where, "in summer of living and working music," a large group of studen may profit from the long exper ence of the conductor and the di tinguished musicians of his orche tra.

NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 29 194

COMPOSERS' LEAGUE

Long-Range Plan to Widen Scope of Its Activities

By OLIN DOWNES

THIS evening the League of Composers gives the second of its three special programs of the season, when Darius Milhaud will speak and direct performances of several of his vocal and instrumental works not previously heard in the United States. The first concert of this series presented Zoltán Kodály and a program of his compositions. The third, on Jan. 12, will pay tribute to Serge Koussevitzky by marking the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, with a concert of works commissioned by that institution, which has so materially aided the cause of the modern composer and his art.

These events represent details of a long-range plan of activities for the new year by which "the pioneering League of Composers," as Lawrence Gilman once described the organization, will extend further the scope of its work on a national scale

The League's most important innovation of its twenty-fourth year will be a new periodical, The Composer's News Record, of which the editor is Everett Helm.

News of Composers

The new publication is designed to cover those branches of music of particular interest to the composer. In one aspect it will be strictly informal, supplying factual knowledge concerning prizes and competitions open to composers, lists of new scores of serious composers, chronicles of first and second performances of new compositions, lists of new manuscript works available in blueprint process, notices regarding festivals and outstanding programs of modern music, and news of film and radio scores.

But The Composer's News Record will be concerned in another way with the expression of composers' problems and the discussion of various situations facing the modern musician. By means of editorials, question box and letters to the editor, opportunity will be offered for the discussion of controversial issues. But The Record will contain no musical criticism and no expression of critical opinion, since these functions fall within the province of the League's magazine Modern Music.

This publication will also contain notices concerning modern music in all parts of the world. Correspondents will be appointed in Europe, South America and various regions of the United States and Canada, with special emphasis upon the universities. Much of the new material, it is anticipated, will come from voluntary contributions of composer-readers. It is hoped especially that there will be a large response from United States composers outside the New York area. The active cooperation of music schools, colleges and universities in the supplying of news information will be solicited.

All Composers Welcome

Although an organ of the League of Composers, the horizon of The Composer's News Record will be by no means bounded by the interests of the parent organization. On the contrary, the active cooperation of all composers will be welcomed and encouraged.

The better to organize its work the League has put Randall Thompson of Princeton University in charge of a national project which originated with its board of directors, of whom Aaron Copland is chairman. Mr. Thompson's suggestions to the directors include the following:

That the League send to college and university music departments and to schools of music an annual descriptive check-list of newly published—vocal or instrumental—music suitable for performance by college or music school students (individuals or organizations). The list should describe what performers were required, the degree of difficulty and the general nature of each work listed. Recent recordings of interest should be similarly noted.

That the League arrange to send to these institutions a traveling exhibit of recent publications of American and foreign music of significant interest to college students and music schools.

ress from

That the League solicit reports from individual colleges and schools of music listing performances of contemporary music, American and foreign, by students, faculty or visitors; that performances of compositions by students, faculty and other local composers be included in the report, and that a synthesis of these performances be published.

Work of Students

That the League send to colleges and conservatories an annual letter soliciting student compositions, to be chosen selectively by a local committee, to be judged by a League jury and given some sort of award by the League; the award might be on the basis of either first, second and third place and/or the performance of the winning work (or works) at a concert sponsored by the League, in New York, presumably in the spring of each year.

The League has decided to continue the experiment suggested a season ago by Norman dello Joio of bringing contemporary composers and performers of music together in one room and making them aware of their common interests and problems. Mr. dello Joio now departs to Europe with the mission to promote closer relations of foreign musicians and those of the United States as performers or composers.

It is by activities such as these that the League expects to broaden the base and increase the practical influence of its work for contemporary music. Through fair weather and foul the League has pursued similarly constructive courses.

The public owes a great deal to the League of Composers for its concerts, publications and commissions extended to various musicians. The League's service to ideas has been as energetic as its production of new works in practical performance. Those who recognize the value, indeed the indispensability, of its services will commend its energy and wish the organization a Happy New Year.

SCORE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Alex North has written the score for a musical play for young people. It is called "The Hither and Thither of Danny Dither." Jerome Gury wrote the libretto. Both composer and author planned it so it could be made adaptable to almost any group. It could be done with a cast of twenty or 120.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD ADVERTISER

DEC 29 1946

►THE JOHN HANCOCK Life Insurance Co. will sponsor the Boston Symphony Orchestra's broadcasts beginning January 21, when the hour to go on the air will be advanced from 9:30 P. M. to 8:30 P. M. on Tuesdays over ABC-WSAZ.

E. Power Biggs will devote his broadcast of organ music this morning at 9:15, CBS, to music of Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, the oldest son of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Today at 3, CBS, New York Philharmonic, Stokowsky conducting: Bach's choral prelude, "We All Believe in One God"; Brahms' "First Symphony"; "Harvest Evening," part 2 of Elie Siegmaster's "Prairie Legend," and the finale of the third act of "Parsifal."

Tuesday, 5 P. M., CBS, "Gateway to Music," Kamiel Lefevre playing the Riverside Church carillon in New York.

Wednesday, 11:30 P. M., CBS, "Invitation to Music": Darius Milhaud will conduct the CBS Symphony Orchestra in his First Symphony.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

DEC 29

League of Composers to Present Special Program

BY OLIN DOWNES
New York Times Music Editor.

NEW YORK, Dec. 28.—Monday evening the League of Composers will give the second of its three special programs of the season, when Darius Milhaud will speak and direct performances of several of his vocal and instrumental works not previously heard in the United States. The first concert of this series presented Zoltan Kodaly and a program of his compositions. The third, on Jan. 12, will pay tribute to Serge Koussevitzky by marking the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, with a concert of works commissioned by that institution, which has so materially aided the cause of the modern composer and his art.

These events represent details of a long-range plan of activities for the new year by which "the pioneering League of Composers," as Lawrence Gilman once described the organization, will extend further the scope of its work on a national scale.

The league's most important innovation of its 24th year will be a new periodical, the Composer's New Record, of which the editor is Everett Helm.

The new publication is designed to cover those branches of music of particular interest to the composer. In one aspect it will be strictly informal, supplying factual knowledge concerning prizes and competitions open to composers, lists of new scores of serious composers, chronicles of first and second performances of new compositions, lists of new manuscript works available in blueprint process, notices regarding festivals and outstanding programs of modern music, and news of film and radio scores.

But the Composer's New Record will be concerned in another way with the expression of composers' problems and the discussion of various situations facing the modern musician. By means of editorials, question box and letters to the editor, opportunity will be offered for the discussion of controversial issues. But the Record will contain no musical criticism and no expression of critical opinion, since these functions fall within the province of the league's magazine, Modern Music.

This publication will also contain notices concerning modern music in all parts of the world. Correspondents will be appointed in Europe, South America and various regions of the United States and Canada, with special emphasis upon the universities. Much of the new material, it is anticipated, will come from voluntary contributions of composer-readers. It is hoped especially that there will be a large response from United States composers outside the New York area. The active co-operation of music schools, colleges and universities in the supplying of news information will be solicited.

Although an organ of the League of Composers, the horizon of the Composer's New Record will be by no means bounded by the interests of the parent organization. On the contrary, the active co-operation of all composers will be welcomed and encouraged.

The better to organize its work the league has put Randall Thompson of Princeton University in charge of a national project which originated with its board of directors, of whom Aaron Copland is chairman. Thompson's suggestions to the directors include the following:

That the league send to college and university music departments and to schools of music an annual descriptive check-list of newly published—vocal or instrumental—music suitable for performance by college or music school students (individuals or organizations). The list should describe what performers were required, the degree of difficulty and the general nature of each work listed. Recent recordings of interest should be similarly noted.

That the league arrange to send to these institutions a traveling exhibit of recent publications of American and foreign music of significant interest to college students and music schools.

That the league solicit reports from individual colleges and schools of music listing performances of contemporary music, American and foreign, by students, faculty or visitors; that performances of compositions by students, faculty and other local composers be included in the report, and that a synthesis of these performances be published.

That the league send to colleges and conservatories an annual letter soliciting student compositions, to be chosen selectively by a local committee, to be judged by a league jury and given some sort of award by the league; the award might be on the basis of either first, sceond and third place and/or the performance of the winning work (or works) at a concert sponsored by the league, in New York, presumably in the spring of each year.

The league has decided to continue the experiment suggested a season ago by Norman Dello Joio of bringing contemporary composers and performers of music together in one room and making them aware of their common interests and problems. Dello Joio now departs to Europe with the mission to promote closer relations of foreign musicians and those of the United States as performers or composers.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current symphony list runs in twos: two names on the program and two conductors at the helm. In the first instance composer and conductor are one and the same, since Darius Milhaud directed yesterday afternoon the first performance of his Second Symphony, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. After intermission Richard Burgin took over and paid his respects to the late Manuel de Falla by playing the suite from "Love the Sorcerer;" "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for orchestra and piano; and the Three Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat." The incidental piano parts in the first and third of these numbers and the important one of the second were played by the resident pianist, Luise Vosgerchian.

It is not to be expected that every work commissioned by the Koussevitzky foundation will prove to be important, but the general level has been high and three compositions brought into the world under these auspices have been outstanding: Stravinsky's ode, Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes" and this Symphony of Milhaud.

Now in his 55th year and busily teaching at Mills College in California, Mr. Milhaud has tried his hand at many things, including Brazilian dance rhythms, American jazz and polytonality. For some time he has been the most significant composer of contemporary France. The five-movement symphony of yesterday makes an immediate appeal. The pastoral first movement is charming, both melodically and as sheer sound. Less successful is the ensuing near-scherzo, but after that everything is all right. The third movement is an impressive lament that rises to a powerful climax. The fourth division, with its long and beautiful saxophone solo, amplifies the mood of the first, and the final "Allelouia" takes the form of a tense and gripping fugue. There is another great climax, and yesterday the answering applause returned the composer many times to the stage.

Because of lameness, Mr. Milhaud conducted, not standing, as is customary, but sitting in a chair, rising only when the excitement of his music brought him to his feet.

Originally the program had announced his delightful "Suite Provencale," which he introduced to us six years ago. Some would rather have had it and less of the music of Falla, three of whose pieces resulted in a great deal of sameness. Broadly speaking, these Spanish composers harp always on one string. As conductor and pianist, respectively, Mr. Burgin and Miss Vosgerchian acquitted themselves ably, and the audience as a whole plainly enjoyed the pop-concert flavor of Falla's music.

Dec 31 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Darius Milhaud conducts the first performances of his Second Symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall this week. The remainder of the program is given over to music by the late Manuel de Falla, which is conducted by Richard Burgin. The pieces are the Suite from "Love the Sorcerer," "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" and Three Dances from the Ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." The assisting pianist in Falla's music is the young Bostonian, Luise Vosgerchian, who is making her first appearance with the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Milhaud, who for more than five years has been teaching at Mills College in Berkeley, Calif., wrote his Second Symphony out there, and dedicated it to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. This work in five short movements (requiring a half-hour's total playing time) is admirably well-made and yet, as musical expression, unusual. The first two movements, on the quiet side yet technically involved, are inclined to be dry, or at least very restrained in what they have to say.

These movements are a matter of line and even subtle detail, quite in contrast to the evident melancholy of the third, the somewhat ebullient character of the fourth, and the outgiving animation of the fifth, which is a bang-up fugue. This fugue, so far as I could tell on brief acquaintance, is strict and scholarly and vigorous, bringing the Symphony to a close in a mood of buoyancy which, up to this point, it has lacked. You can get an idea of the composer's purpose in the designations of the five movements: Paisible (peaceful), Mysterieux, Douloureux, Avec Serenitie (with serenity) and Allelouia.

Mr. Milhaud, who conducted sitting in a chair, probably shares with other eminent composers the shortcomings of composers as conductors. Paradoxically, they are not the best conductors of their own music. Though they may know their scores better than anyone, many composers lack either the objective point of view or the technical mastery of the professional conductor. Mr. Milhaud made his Symphony interesting but, candidly, I should like to hear it again from some other conductor. He was applauded with noticeable cordiality for a work that boasts excellent facture, Gallic brevity and directness, and a degree of emotional persuasion.

We all must thank Mr. Burgin for bringing out music of Manuel de Falla, even though three such pieces in a row make a strong and unvarying flavor. It is ironic, indeed, that apart from the dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" nothing of Falla has been heard at these concerts for 16 years!

Though he may prove to have been a minor creative force, Falla nevertheless was one of the powerful and authentic voices in Spanish music, an artist with fastidious taste and yet with a passionate delight in the irresistible rhythms and melodies of his unhappy Iberian country. It was pure delight to hear his music again.

[58]

NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 29 1946

COMPOSERS' LEAGUE

Long-Range Plan to Widen Scope of Its Activities

By OLIN DOWNES

THIS evening the League of Composers gives the second of its three special programs of the season, when Darius Milhaud will speak and direct performances of several of his vocal and instrumental works not previously heard in the United States. The first concert of this series presented Zoltán Kodály and a program of his compositions. The third, on Jan. 12, will pay tribute to Serge Koussevitzky by marking the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, with a concert of works commissioned by that institution, which has so materially aided the cause of the modern composer and his art.

These events represent details of a long-range plan of activities for the new year by which "the pioneering League of Composers," as Lawrence Gilman once described the organization, will extend further the scope of its work on a national scale

The League's most important innovation of its twenty-fourth year will be a new periodical, The Composer's News Record, of which the editor is Everett Helm.

News of Composers

The new publication is designed to cover those branches of music of particular interest to the composer. In one aspect it will be strictly informal, supplying factual knowledge concerning prizes and competitions open to composers, lists of new scores of serious composers, chronicles of first and second performances of new compositions, lists of new manuscript works available in blueprint process, notices regarding festivals and outstanding programs of modern music, and news of film and radio scores.

But The Composer's News Record will be concerned in another way with the expression of composers' problems and the discussion of various situations facing the modern musician. By means of editorials, question box and letters to the editor, opportunity will be offered for the discussion of controversial issues. But The Record will contain no musical criticism and no expression of critical opinion, since these functions fall within the province of the League's magazine Modern Music.

This publication will also contain notices concerning modern music in all parts of the world. Correspondents will be appointed in Europe, South America and various regions of the United States and Canada, with special emphasis upon the universities. Much of the new material, it is anticipated, will come from voluntary contributions of composer-readers. It is hoped especially that there will be a large response from United States composers outside the New York area. The active cooperation of music schools, colleges and universities in the supplying of news information will be solicited.

All Composers Welcome

Although an organ of the League of Composers, the horizon of The Composer's News Record will be by no means bounded by the interests of the parent organization. On the contrary, the active cooperation of all composers will be welcomed and encouraged.

The better to organize its work the League has put Randall Thompson of Princeton University in charge of a national project which originated with its board of directors, of whom Aaron Copland is chairman. Mr. Thompson's suggestions to the directors include the following:

That the League send to college and university music departments and to schools of music an annual descriptive check-list of newly published—vocal or instrumental—music suitable for performance by college or music school students (individuals or organizations). The list should describe what performers were required, the degree of difficulty and the general nature of each work listed. Recent recordings of interest should be similarly noted.

That the League arrange to send to these institutions a traveling exhibit of recent publications of American and foreign music of significant interest to college students and music schools.

progress from

That the League solicit reports from individual colleges and schools of music listing performances of contemporary music, American and foreign, by students, faculty or visitors; that performances of compositions by students, faculty and other local composers be included in the report, and that a synthesis of these performances be published.

Work of Students

That the League send to colleges and conservatories an annual letter soliciting student compositions, to be chosen selectively by a local committee, to be judged by a League jury and given some sort of award by the League; the award might be on the basis of either first, second and third place and/or the performance of the winning work (or works) at a concert sponsored by the League, in New York, presumably in the spring of each year.

The League has decided to continue the experiment suggested a season ago by Norman dello Joio of bringing contemporary composers and performers of music together in one room and making them aware of their common interests and problems. Mr. dello Joio now departs to Europe with the mission to promote closer relations of foreign musicians and those of the United States as performers or composers.

It is by activities such as these that the League expects to broaden the base and increase the practical influence of its work for contemporary music. Through fair weather and foul the League has pursued similarly constructive courses.

The public owes a great deal to the League of Composers for its concerts, publications and commissions extended to various musicians. The League's service to ideas has been as energetic as its production of new works in practical performance. Those who recognize the value, indeed the indispensability, of its services will commend its energy and wish the organization a Happy New Year.

SCORE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Alex North has written the score for a musical play for young people. It is called "The Hither and Thither of Danny Dither." Jerome Gury wrote the libretto. Both composer and author planned it so it could be made adaptable to almost any group. It could be done with a cast of twenty or 120.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD ADVERTISER
DEC 29 1946

►THE JOHN HANCOCK Life Insurance Co. will sponsor the Boston Symphony Orchestra's broadcasts beginning January 21, when the hour to go on the air will be advanced from 9:30 P. M. to 8:30 P. M. on Tuesdays over ABC-WSAZ.

E. Power Biggs will devote his broadcast of organ music this morning at 9:15, CBS, to music of Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, the oldest son of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Today at 3, CBS, New York Philharmonic, Stokowsky conducting: Bach's choral prelude, "We All Believe in One God"; Brahms' "First Symphony"; "Harvest Evening," part 2 of Elie Siegmaster's "Prairie Legend," and the finale of the third act of "Parsifal."

Tuesday, 5 P. M., CBS, "Gateway to Music," Kamiel Lefevre playing the Riverside Church carillon in New York.

Wednesday, 11:30 P. M., CBS, "Invitation to Music": Darius Milhaud will conduct the CBS Symphony Orchestra in his First Symphony.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
DEC 29 1946

League of Composers to Present Special Program

BY OLIN DOWNES
New York Times Music Editor.

NEW YORK, Dec. 28.—Monday evening the League of Composers will give the second of its three special programs of the season, when Darius Milhaud will speak and direct performances of several of his vocal and instrumental works not previously heard in the United States. The first concert of this series presented Zoltan Kodaly and a program of his compositions. The third, on Jan. 12, will pay tribute to Serge Koussevitzky by marking the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, with a concert of works commissioned by that institution, which has so materially aided the cause of the modern composer and his art.

These events represent details of a long-range plan of activities for the new year by which "the pioneering League of Composers," as Lawrence Gilman once described the organization, will extend further the scope of its work on a national scale.

The league's most important innovation of its 24th year will be a new periodical, the Composer's New Record, of which the editor is Everett Helm.

The new publication is designed to cover those branches of music of particular interest to the composer. In one aspect it will be strictly informal, supplying factual knowledge concerning prizes and competitions open to composers, lists of new scores of serious composers, chronicles of first and second performances of new compositions, lists of new manuscript works available in blueprint process, notices regarding festivals and outstanding programs of modern music, and news of film and radio scores.

But the Composer's New Record will be concerned in another way with the expression of composers' problems and the discussion of various situations facing the modern musician. By means of editorials, question box and letters to the editor, opportunity will be offered for the discussion of controversial issues. But the Record will contain no musical criticism and no expression of critical opinion, since these functions fall within the province of the league's magazine, Modern Music.

This publication will also contain notices concerning modern music in all parts of the world. Correspondents will be appointed in Europe, South America and various regions of the United States and Canada, with special emphasis upon the universities. Much of the new material, it is anticipated, will come from voluntary contributions of composer-readers. It is hoped especially that there will be a large response from United States composers outside the New York area. The active co-operation of music schools, colleges and universities in the supplying of news information will be solicited.

Although an organ of the League of Composers, the horizon of the Composer's New Record will be by no means bounded by the interests of the parent organization. On the contrary, the active co-operation of all composers will be welcomed and encouraged.

The better to organize its work the league has put Randall Thompson of Princeton University in charge of a national project which originated with its board of directors, of whom Aaron Copland is chairman. Thompson's suggestions to the directors include the following:

That the league send to college and university music departments and to schools of music an annual descriptive check-list of newly published—vocal or instrumental—music suitable for performance by college or music school students (individuals or organizations). The list should describe what performers were required, the degree of difficulty and the general nature of each work listed. Recent recordings of interest should be similarly noted.

That the league arrange to send to these institutions a traveling exhibit of recent publications of American and foreign music of significant interest to college students and music schools.

That the league solicit reports from individual colleges and schools of music listing performances of contemporary music, American and foreign, by students, faculty or visitors; that performances of compositions by students, faculty and other local composers be included in the report, and that a synthesis of these performances be published.

That the league send to colleges and conservatories an annual letter soliciting student compositions, to be chosen selectively by a local committee, to be judged by a league jury and given some sort of award by the league; the award might be on the basis of either first, sceond and third place and/or the performance of the winning work (or works) a a concert sponsored by the league in New York, presumably in th spring of each year.

The league has decided to con tinue the experiment suggested season ago by Norman Dello Joi of bringing contemporary compo ers and performers of music t gether in one room and makin them aware of their common i terests and problems. Dello Jo now departs to Europe with t mission to promote closer re tions of foreign musicians a those of the United States as pe formers or composers.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current symphony list runs in twos: two names on the program and two conductors at the helm. In the first instance composer and conductor are one and the same, since Darius Milhaud directed yesterday afternoon the first performance of his Second Symphony, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. After intermission Richard Burgin took over and paid his respects to the late Manuel de Falla by playing the suite from "Love the Sorcerer;" "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for orchestra and piano; and the Three Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat." The incidental piano parts in the first and third of these numbers and the important one of the second were played by the resident pianist, Luise Vosgerchian.

It is not to be expected that every work commissioned by the Koussevitzky foundation will prove to be important, but the general level has been high and three compositions brought into the world under these auspices have been outstanding: Stravinsky's ode, Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes" and this Symphony of Milhaud.

Now in his 55th year and busily teaching at Mills College in California, Mr. Milhaud has tried his hand at many things, including Brazilian dance rhythms, American jazz and polytonality. For some time he has been the most significant composer of contemporary France. The five-movement symphony of yesterday makes an immediate appeal. The pastoral first movement is charming, both melodically and as sheer sound. Less successful is the ensuing near-scherzo, but after that everything is all right. The third movement is an impressive lament that rises to a powerful climax. The fourth division, with its long and beautiful saxophone solo, amplifies the mood of the first, and the final "Allelouia" takes the form of a tense and gripping fugue. There is another great climax, and yesterday the answering applause returned the composer many times to the stage.

Because of lameness, Mr. Milhaud conducted, not standing, as is customary, but sitting in a chair, rising only when the excitement of his music brought him to his feet.

Originally the program had announced his delightful "Suite Provencale," which he introduced to us six years ago. Some would rather have had it and less of the music of Falla, three of whose pieces resulted in a great deal of sameness. Broadly speaking, these Spanish composers harp always on one string. As conductor and pianist, respectively, Mr. Burgin and Miss Vosgerchian acquitted themselves ably, and the audience as a whole plainly enjoyed the pop-concert flavor of Falla's music.

Dec 31 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Darius Milhaud conducts the first performances of his Second Symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall this week. The remainder of the program is given over to music by the late Manuel de Falla, which is conducted by Richard Burgin. The pieces are the Suite from "Love the Sorcerer," "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" and Three Dances from the Ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." The assisting pianist in Falla's music is the young Bostonian, Luise Vosgerchian, who is making her first appearance with the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Milhaud, who for more than five years has been teaching at Mills College in Berkeley, Calif., wrote his Second Symphony out there, and dedicated it to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. This work in five short movements (requiring a half-hour's total playing time) is admirably well-made and yet, as musical expression, unusual. The first two movements, on the quiet side yet technically involved, are inclined to be dry, or at least very restrained in what they have to say.

These movements are a matter of fine and even subtle detail, quite in contrast to the evident melancholy of the third, the somewhat ebullient character of the fourth, and the outgiving animation of the fifth, which is a bang-up fugue. This fugue, so far as I could tell on brief acquaintance, is strict and scholarly and vigorous, bringing the Symphony to a close in a mood of buoyancy which, up to this point, it has lacked. You can get an idea of the composer's purpose in the designations of the five movements: Paisible (peaceful), Mysterieux, Douloureux, Avec Serenitie (with serenity) and Allelouia.

Mr. Milhaud, who conducted sitting in a chair, probably shares with other eminent composers the shortcomings of composers as conductors. Paradoxically, they are not the best conductors of their own music. Though they may know their scores better than anyone, many composers lack either the objective point of view or the technical mastery of the professional conductor. Mr. Milhaud made his Symphony interesting but, candidly, I should like to hear it again from some other conductor. He was applauded with noticeable cordiality for a work that boasts excellent facture, Gallic brevity and directness, and a degree of emotional persuasion.

We all must thank Mr. Burgin for bringing out music of Manuel de Falla, even though three such pieces in a row make a strong and unvarying flavor. It is ironic, indeed, that apart from the dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" nothing of Falla has been heard at these concerts for 16 years!

Though he may prove to have been a minor creative force, Falla nevertheless was one of the powerful and authentic voices in Spanish music, an artist with fastidious taste and yet with a passionate delight in the irresistible rhythms and melodies of his unhappy Iberian country. It was pure delight to hear his music again.

[58]

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 10th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Darius Milhaud and Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Luise Vosgerchian was the piano soloist in Manuel de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2..........Milhaud
Suite from "El Amor Brujo"..........Falla
"Nights in the Gardens of Spain,"
Symphonic Impressions..........Falla
Three Dances from the Ballet,
"El Sombrero de Tre Picos"..........Falla

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert was a singularly interesting occasion. All of the music was contemporary, that is to say within the last thirty-five years, and all of it was artistically distinguished. None of the music, with the exception of Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" Suite, was familiar to the concert-going public; and indeed the Milhaud Second Symphony was given its "world premiere," as the theatrical people like to describe such things.

Milhaud is a highly individual and somewhat difficult composer. This new symphony, which he conducted himself for the most part seated at the stand they use at rehearsals, is not at all an easy work to take in at a first hearing. You have to become accustomed to the composer's idiom. In my own case I did not really begin to like the Symphony until the third movement, "Douloureux." After that I felt that I was getting the composer's message and thus thoroughly enjoyed the serene and gracious fourth movement and the splendid fugal finale.

The entire Symphony has a curious antique ring to it. It seems to me to reach back into 16th century art and even earlier. In a sense it has an affinity with Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," which, you will recall, was inspired by a painting by Matthias Grunewald. Although there are plenty of dissonances and other things we associate with modern music, the Symphony clearly conjures up the remote past.

Milhaud has devised some strange effects in the Symphony. Take, for example, that passage of ghoulish laughter for the bass clarinet in the second movement, "Mysterieux." And there are many others, mainly effects of orchestral sonorities. The symphony had a mixed reception, but there were enough admirers of it to bring M. Milhaud back to the stage three times. He is evidently not in the best of health, but I should say that he nonetheless secured from the orchestra a fine performance of his music.

Manuel de Falla died last month. He was not by any means a prolific composer, but, like Debussy, and Ravel in this same category, he seldom wrote stale or undistinguished music. I don't believe that there would be much dispute in acclaiming him as the greatest Spanish composer.

It came as a great surprise to me that his "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" has apparently not been played at these concerts since 1930. I suppose it is that all of Falla's music has so strikingly individual a style that we are inclined to think, from having heard some other of his works, that we are familiar with them all. I suppose this is the place to say that Falla's music is fascinating and exotic. It is all of that, but it has more merit than mere exoticism.

Mr. Burgin got some admirable performances out of the orchestra, save that some of "Three Cornered Hat" Suite was not impeccably finished. But in the main the music was most persuasively set forth. Miss Vosgerchian did a brilliant job with the piano solo in "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for which she won great applause.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Charles Munch will be guest conductor of the following program: Maurice Jaubert's Sonata a due; Roussel's Suite from "Ariane et Bacchus" (not the Messiaen work announced in the program); Honegger's Symphony for strings; Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3.

NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 29 194

THE WORLD OF MUSIC: TWO NEW OPERAS ON WAY

By ROSS PARMENTER

SAMUEL BARBER and Marc Blitzstein are writing operas on commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. ~~Since he wrote~~ "The Cradle Will Rock" and "No For an Answer," the form is not new to Mr. Blitzstein, who received the commission this year. But Mr. Barber's will be his first. He accepted his commission back in 1942, but the necessity of serving a term as a soldier delayed matters. An indication of the importance of the commissions can perhaps be gained from the first opera so produced—Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes."

The foundation will soon be five years old. These are the works commissioned that have already been performed: Nicolai Berezowsky's Symphony No. 4 and Bohuslav Martinu's Symphony No. 3, which were commissioned in 1942; Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, Igor Stravinsky's Ode for Orchestra, William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, William Bergsma's Second String Quartet and Robert Palmer's String Quartet, dating from 1943; Darius Milhaud's Second Symphony, Aaron Copland's Third Symphony and Nikolai Lopatnikoff's Concertino for Orchestra, commissioned in 1944, and Lukas Foss' Capriccio for 'cello and piano, commissioned last year.

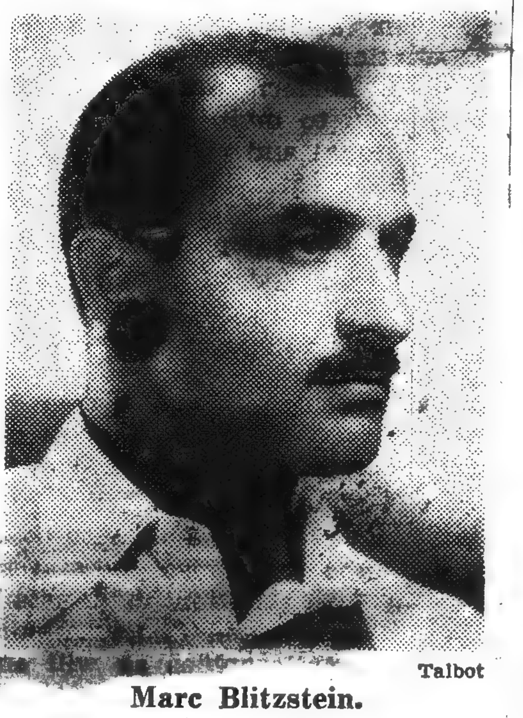
The three completed works awaiting performance are Burrill Phillips' Overture for Orchestra, "Tom Paine"; Villa-Lobos' "Madona Poema Sinfonica" and Alexei Haieff's Eclogue for 'cello and piano. In addition, Olivier Messaien, Howard Hanson, David Diamond, Harold Shapero and Walter Piston are all preparing symphonic works the foundation has commissioned, and a new commission has recently been offered to Paul Hindemith. Small wonder the League of Composers is celebrating the foundation's fifth anniversary with a reception in honor of Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 12.

CONDUCTOR: Thor Johnson, the 34-year-old American conductor who has been named to succeed Eugene Goossens next season as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is another young musician who was helped to wider fame by the U. S. Army. His pre-war career was as follows: While an undergraduate studying for a B. A. degree in music at the University of North Carolina he conducted the Carolina Ensemble and the choir of the University Methodist Church. Then he went to the University of Michigan for post-graduate work. He received his M. A. in 1936, taught at the university a year, went to Salzburg, Leipzig and Prague for a year of study and returned to Michigan and taught there for five more years. While assistant music professor, he directed the University Musical Society May Festivals and founded and organized both the Little Symphony of Ann Arbor and the Mozart Festival of Asheville, N. C. For two summers he studied under Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center.

Then came the Army. He went to the Army Music School at Fort Myer, Va., and was graduated as a warrant officer bandleader in January, 1943. At Fort Monmouth, N. J., he organized a soldier symphony orchestra. Then, when the sponsors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium were looking for a service man to lead the orchestra for its Army and Navy Night on July 29, 1944, they picked Mr. Johnson.

That was the beginning. After that the Army lent him to a number of other orchestras for guest appearances, including the Boston "Pops," the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras. When he was sent overseas he was made conductor of the American University Symphony at Shrivenham, England. He was discharged last June. His first civilian engagement, three weeks later, was a repeat with the Philharmonic at the Lewisohn Stadium. Then he accepted his present position as director of the Juilliard Orchestra.

Samuel Barber.



Talbot

Marc Blitzstein.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch made his first appearance in the United States yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The distinguished French musician, conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, impressed me immediately as an interpreter and technician of high rank.

His all-French program brought one piece new to this country, Maurice Jaubert's "Sonata a due"; two new to Boston: the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Ariane et Bacchus" and Honegger's Symphony for Strings. The final number was Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, with the organ part taken by E. Power Biggs.

Mr. Munch conducted from memory; there were no scores before him. Such can be a stunt, but here you felt that, the music thoroughly detailed in his mind, Mr. Munch did not need the printed notes to guide him.

He is an interpreter of passionate temperament and a remarkable sense of elasticity and rhythm. The afternoon through, you felt rhythmic vitality in every measure. He makes music "sing", and he also is fastidious about having everything clear and well-proportioned. Even when the orchestra was surging along at terrific volume almost the tiniest inner voices were perceptible.

As might be expected from a Gallic musician, Mr. Munch seems to favor a tone somewhat brighter and thinner than we are accustomed to hear, yet of good body, unforced color and consistent polish. He is exacting as to tempo, energetic but not flamboyant in his gestures. It would be rewarding to hear him in other styles of the symphonic repertory. Certainly he ought to be invited to return, and the sooner the better.

The late Jaubert's "Sonata a due" is really too small for a large hall. It is a chamber sonata with violin and 'cello solos, calling for about 30 musicians. The style, far from radical, is perhaps on the neo-classical side. Honegger's Symphony, conversely, is a big piece, and it is at once intellectual and full of emotional tensions. Both the Jaubert and Honegger are beautifully written for their expressive medium, yet both are a little dry and preeminently musicians' music.

Roussel has been unjustly neglected here in the last eight or 10 years. The "Ariane et Bacchus" Suite, a sinewy and muscular score, is also colorful and large, winding up with a thumping, pulse-quickening bacchanale. If in its color, descriptive power and full-bodied orchestral texture it may suggest late 19th Century German music like that of the younger Strauss or even Mahler, it nevertheless is highly original and it is not inflated or pompous. We should hear this work again.

As Mr. Munch read it, the Saint-Saens Third Symphony took on momentarily the significance, weight and deep seriousness of a great masterpiece. Actually it is much less than that, but it contains luscious sounds and is a grand show.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC: TWO NEW OPE

Times Dec 29 '46

By ROSS PARMENTER

SAMUEL BARBER and Marc Blitzstein are writing operas on commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Since he wrote "The Cradle Will Rock" and "No For an Answer," the form is not new to Mr. Blitzstein, who received the commission this year. But Mr. Barber's will be his first. He accepted his commission back in 1942, but the necessity of serving a term as a soldier delayed matters. An indication of the importance of the commissions can perhaps be gained from the first opera so produced—Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes."

The foundation will soon be five years old. These are the works commissioned that have already been performed: Nicolai Berezowsky's Symphony No. 4 and Bohuslav Martinu's Symphony No. 3, which were commissioned in 1942; Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, Igor Stravinsky's Ode for Orchestra, William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, William Bergsma's Second String Quartet and Robert Palmer's String Quartet, dating from 1943; Darius Milhaud's Second Symphony, Aaron Copland's Third Symphony and Nikolai Lopatnikoff's Concertino for Orchestra, commissioned in 1944, and Lukas Foss' Capriccio for 'cello and piano, commissioned last year.

The three completed works awaiting performance are Burrill Phillips' Overture for Orchestra, "Tom Paine"; Villa-Lobos' "Madona Poema Sinfonica" and Alexei Haieff's Eclogue for 'cello and piano. In addition, Olivier Messaien, Howard Hanson, David Diamond, Harold Shapero and Walter Piston are all preparing symphonic works the foundation has commissioned, and a new commission has recently been offered to Paul Hindemith. Small wonder the League of Composers is celebrating the foundation's fifth anniversary with a reception in honor of Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 12.

CONDUCTOR: Thor Johnson, the 34-year-old American conductor who has been named to succeed Eugene Goossens next season as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is another young musician who was helped to wider fame by the U. S. Army. His pre-war career was as follows: While an undergraduate studying for a B. A. degree in music at the University of North Carolina he conducted the Carolina Ensemble and the choir of the University Methodist Church. Then he went to the University of Michigan for post-graduate work. He received his M. A. in 1936, taught at the university a year, went to Salzburg, Leipzig and Prague for a year of study and returned to Michigan and taught there for five more years. While assistant music professor, he directed the University Musical Society May Festivals and founded and organized both the Little Symphony of Ann Arbor and the Mozart Festival of Asheville, N. C. For two summers he studied under Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center.

Then came the Army. He went to the Army Music School at Fort Myer, Va., and was graduated as a warrant officer bandleader in January, 1943. At Fort Monmouth, N. J., he organized a soldier symphony orchestra. Then, when the sponsors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium were looking for a service man to lead the orchestra for its Army and Navy Night on July 29, 1944, they picked Mr. Johnson.

That was the beginning. After that the Army lent him to a number of other orchestras for guest appearances, including the Boston "Pops," the Chicago and Philadelphia orchestras. When he was sent overseas he was made conductor of the American University Symphony at Shrivenham, England. He was discharged last June. His first civilian engagement, three weeks later, was a repeat with the Philharmonic at the Lewisohn Stadium. Then he accepted his present position as director of the Juilliard Orchestra.

Samuel Barber.

[59]

Herald Dec. 29

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 11th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Muench conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Sonata a due....................Jaubert
2nd Suite from the Ballet,
"Ariane et Bacchus"..........Roussel
Symphony for Strings..........Honegger
Symphony No. 3 in C minor
(with organ) Op. 78......Saint-Saens

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Our distinguished French visitor, Charles Muench, who made his American debut yesterday as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, won and deserved an ovation for his interpretations of three modern and unfamiliar works and the sonorous and well-known Symphony of Saint-Saens. Not since the memorable first appearance here a good many years ago of Dmitri Mitropoulos have I witnessed a more remarkable or rewarding occasion in which a guest conductor so impressed his artistic personality on the public.

As I wrote last Sunday, I was prepared for M. Muench's great talents as a musician and conductor by having heard him in Europe two years ago, when he was guest conductor of the Brussels Philharmonic. He is a musician of great intelligence and integrity and an inspired conductor. There was nothing histrionic about his interpretations yesterday. They were dramatically sound recreations of the music and at every point M. Muench graciously acknowledged the superb co-operation which he had from the orchestra. Indeed, he got the best out of them and would be the first to admit it.

Over and above the fire and excellence of the interpretations there was a wealth of most interesting music to be heard. Most surprising of the unfamiliar scores was the Roussel Suite from "Ariane et Bacchus." Roussel is an intellectual composer who certainly in his 3rd and 4th Symphonies achieved inspiration as well. But here is a brilliant ballet suite from which the intellectual element has been largely erased. It is an exciting and exotic score, and I venture to say that you have to go back to Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" for anything comparable in its effect. Why on earth so fascinating a work has been untouched by the Boston Symphony heretofore I cannot imagine.

Maurice Jaubert's "Sonata a Due" for violin, 'cello and strings and Honegger's Symphony for Strings were played for the first time in the United States. Honegger is a composer who has been far too much neglected in Boston, if not in the country at large. This composition is a masterly piece of writing for strings and a work of high artistic merit. Particularly moving are the adagio and the arresting finale. Here is neo-classicism at its strongest and best. If we are going to hear Copland's Symphony repeated during a season, neither the Honegger nor the Roussel of this concert should be allowed to languish on the shelf.

By contrast the Jaubert work suffered, though it is far from a negligible composition. It is in fact a concerto grosso in a modern idiom but stemming from Handel. Especially charming are the divertimento and the toccata, but the entire work is well-written and interesting. The fact that the composer was killed in the French army in 1940 adds to the regret one feels that so talented an artist should have been cut off by war.

The Saint-Saens Symphony was given a gorgeous performance, that at the same time was never forced. If to a certain extent the sentiments to which Saint-Saens gives utterance date, the masterly way in which re says them does not. It made a tremendous effect yesterday and had the audience remaining afterwards to applaud M. Muench and the orchestra for a memorable concert.

This concert will be repeated tonight and Sunday afternoon. Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct the first performance in America of Strauss' "Metamorphosen," Martinu's Concerto Grosso and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Boston Post Dec 29

Although it came two days late, yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert was in the nature of a very nice Christmas present. The all-French program, to be repeated this evening and tomorrow afternoon, was conducted by a man well qualified for the job, Charles Muench of Paris, now on his first visit to the United States. That well-known adjective, dynamic, suits Mr. Muench admirably, but there is something very solid about him, too, and there is reason to regret that his present visit is so short.

Unlike his countryman, Paul Paray, who visited us a year ago, Mr. Muench elected to introduce himself to Boston through unfamiliar music. The only number on his program already known here was the concluding item, Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor with organ, which we last heard in February, 1938, and not too often in the years immediately preceding.

The new pieces, none of them hard to get or difficult to take, were a "Sonata a due" by Maurice Jaubert, who was killed in action in 1940; the Second Suite from Roussel's Ballet, "Ariane et Bacchus," and Honegger's Symphony for strings, with optional trumpet in the coda of the finale. It was used yesterday and with electrifying effect. To fall back on an always-useful metaphor, Jaubert's piece, for strings with solo violin and cello, is a case of new wine in an old bottle. However, the wine is not new enough to endanger the container. Mr. Jaubert writes discreetly and skilfully in frank simulation of the ancient manner. Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti as the soloists, and the small group of string players acquitted themselves admirably. This high level of performance was sustained throughout the afternoon.

You could sum up the other novelties briefly by saying that Honegger's Symphony has something in it and Roussel's Suite everything, including Wagner and Strauss as well as Ravel and Roussel himself. However, it made such excellent and satisfying listening that you wonder d why a piece that good, on the market for 14 years, had been withheld from us so long. Composed in Paris during the German occupation, Honeggar's Symphony expresses not a little of the sorrow and bitterness that filled the minds and hearts of the French people at that time. The finale is exciting and the whole work bespeaks its composer's mastery.

In a performance less discerning, less intense than the one accorded it yesterday, Saint-Saens' 60-year-old Symphony can seem no more than a well constructed bit of musical mechanics, with a sentimental slow movement and a sententious conclusion. As presented by Mr. Muench, it was good to hear again.

BRAZIL, IND.
TIMES

DEC 31 1946

Reading 100 Books To Be Basic Rule Of New College

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Dec. 31.—(UP)—A daring educational innovation based on "the 100 best books of ancient and modern thought" will spread from Maryland to Pittsfield by September, 1947, when 300 students will attend a new college operated by "Liberal Arts, Inc."

The new institution, to be established on a 700-acre estate fronting for nearly a mile on Stockbridge Lake, will be headed by Dr. Stringfellow Barr, who largely is credited with this new approach to liberal education.

It was Dr. Barr who introduced the organized reading of 100 volumes of the best from Homer to the present day at St. John's College in Annapolis, Md., in 1937. He has resigned as president of that institution to found the offshoot here.

Endowed with $4,500,000 by Paul W. Mellon, son of the late secretary of the treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, the new Liberal Arts College will be situated on the old Dan R. Hanna estate, about a mile and a half from Tanglewood, the home of Serge Koussevitzky's Berkshire Festival.

The property already includes about 30 buildings, including an inn and dormitories, where the late John E. Parsons, a New York lawyer, maintained a home for fresh air children.

A non-denominational college for men, the new school will have a maximum enrollment of 300, with a faculty of about 30. The entire college course will be devoted to the study of prescribed books, with no conventional college departments.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the ninth concert in its regular series yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3..................Copland
Violoncello Concerto in D major...Haydn
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..........Wagner
Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" ....Wagner

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The repetition so soon of Aaron Copland's Third Symphony proved to be worth while for various reasons. Although the score is by no means as complex as to form and content as many other modern compositions, it is still not easy to assimilate at a first hearing. Then, if the expressive quality of the Symphony is fairly open and direct, the work is exceedingly difficult to play. There are countless little details to be brought out and probably only a superb body of instrumentalists can do so effectively. Thus on both counts it was a good idea to repeat it while most of us retained some memory of it and while the orchestra had it freshly rehearsed.

I should say that if the Symphony does not improve at a second hearing it keeps its position as Mr. Copland's most important score and one of the more impressive modern works to be heard in this or last season. The first movement gains by repetition; its well-knit construction becomes clearer with a corresponding increase in the impact of what it has to say. The finale, on the other hand, does not stand up so well and emerges as more bombastic than eloquent. The scherzo remains a brilliant work of its kind and the andantino continues to hold the attention.

It is curious how so great an artist and cellist as Mr. Piatigorsky can contrive to get so ludicrously, monstrously out of the picture as he did yesterday in the Haydn Concerto. The only time the music sounded right, as to its period and what it is, was when the small orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky was playing the tuttis. And even then whenever Mr. Piatigorsky played in the tuttis, particularly at the very end, the performance turned into little more than a flashy vulgar show.

The Concerto was further burdened with three cadenzas, just as if Mr. Piatigorsky did not play his part of the entire first movement as though it were written to be a cadenza. It was, in short, a monumentally egotistical interpretation. We have all heard Mr. Piatigorsky so many times when his splendid artistry and technique on the cello were a joy to hear, that it is all the more tiresome to listen to and watch him play fast and loose with a simple and gracious work. At any rate he does not have to worry about what is said here, since he received a huge measure of applause for his high-jinks.

The orchestra was apparently so pressed for time on its tour that Dr. Koussevitzky merely filled up the rest of the program with the two Wagner Preludes which he conducted last March.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week we shall get a more original program, with Darius Milhaud conducting his own Suite Provencale and Symphony No. 2 and Mr. Burgin leading three pieces by the late Manuel de Falla.

Audience Acclaims Symphony

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

Detroiters who were fortunate enough to get tickets in a standing-room-only house, turned out at Masonic Temple Auditorium to give a thundering welcome to the greatest symphony orchestra in the world.

For there is no arguing that among the great musical organizations the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands head and shoulders above all others.

* * *

FROM SUCH magnificence of reputation, one should expect magnificent things. Anything less than perfection would be bitterly disappointing.

Even with these advance expectations, it is to be doubted if the audience was entirely prepared for the sheer, breath-taking beauty and excitement of performance that pervaded the evening.

The indescribable distinction that the orchestra brings to every composition was evident from the moment that Serge Koussevitzky raised his baton to begin the Mendelssohn Italian Symphony until the last, full-throated statement of the Tschaikowsky Fifth was uttered.

* * *

THE GREAT masses of strings were tremendously impressive in the body of tone they produced, as well as in the unfailing discipline they displayed.

Koussevitzky, with economy of gesture and utter surety as to the effects he desired, molded the mighty orchestra to his will, so that the music emerged as the production of one genius, expressing the thoughts of the composer.

An instance of the amazing art of the conductor was revealed in the performance of the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina." It is a work that has been a tested standby of radio and concert programs, used extensively as a time filler.

* * *

YET, AS PERFORMED by the Boston orchestra, it became the loveliest of tone paintings, charming and expressive to the veriest breath of sound.

Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegal," revealed another facet of Koussevitzky's musicianship. The engaging impudence of the topical themes was never better expressed. The whole composition became a story told in the best tradition.

The Tschaikowsky symphony ended the evening. The audience almost shattered the roof with applause. The concert was the [illegible] in a series of four appearances by major orchestras.

CHARLES MUENCH

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post [illegible] 30 1946

By Thomas B[illegible] burst into print a while ago [illegible] a statement to the effect that Americans were inclined to overrate [illegible] orchestras. On the other hand Charles Muench of Paris, who [illegible] appears as guest [illegible] Boston Symphony, [illegible] rehearsal yesterday that he found that organization to be the "culminating point" and raised his hand high in the air to give added force to that observation. "And the men are so interested in their work," he went on to say, "so alive, so responsive."

Mr. Muench, who spells his name in the German fashion—Munch, with an umlaut over the "u"—was born in Alsace and obviously is not 100 per cent Latin. A thick-set man in his early 50s, with a shock of unruly gray hair, he resembles the dramatist, Maeterlinck, and there is a suggestion in his appearance of the Beethoven of the later years. In 1938 he took over the conductorship of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory and during the war remained at the head of that body. The Nazis endeavored to be "correct" in their attitude toward occupied France, but Mr. Muench explained that they tried to win him in subtle ways to their cause. They also wished him to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic when it visited Paris, and that he refused to do. Between the Nazis and the French people, however, his programs were rather restricted. The former forbade the performance of Jewish music and Russian music and the latter would allow no Germans but the established classics.

"I like all music that is good," said Mr. Muench, "no matter from what country or what composer, but I do like to have something going on." The French people, he added, don't care for music that is long and draggy and for that reason have never taken to Bruckner. Asked whether he preferred operatic to symphonic music, he replied that his tastes ran to pure music.

It is mostly that variety which stands on his impending program here: Jaubert, Sonata a due; Roussel, Suite from "Ariadne and Bacchus; Honegger, Symphony for strings (all these will be new to us); and Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor with organ. Maurice Jaubert we do not know at all. In 1942 Mr. Muench had rehearsed this particular piece, which is for strings with solo violin and viola, and the composer came back from the front to conduct the first performance. Returning immediately afterwards to the field of battle, he was killed in action.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Returned from an extraordinarily successful mid-Western tour, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the Friday subscribers a concert mostly of familiar music at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. True, the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland, which began the program, is not exactly familiar, but its first performances had been given here only last October. Copland was followed by Haydn of the Cello Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. Two Preludes by Wagner, those to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," brought up the rear.

There's no doubt about it. The Copland Third Symphony is one of the most impressive works in all American music. Hearing it again only strengthens one's first impressions of its structural solidity and logic, its salience of ideas, and the skill with which it is put together. Virgil Thomson, as quoted in the program book, may pick his own flaws in the orchestration, but the writing for the many instruments used is certainly striking. I wonder how many orchestras, incidentally, could cope successfully with those tricky entrances and accents of the second movement?

Copland does go at it for quite a length, but even so, the significance of his music is not weakened. In what he has to say there is a pleasant sense of forthrightness, perhaps eben of simplicity. The Symphony still receives my vote as one of the two best American symphonies yet composed.

Mr. Piatigorsky may have been a little careless yesterday about entering or stopping just on the split second, but he gave a superlatively gracious and easeful performance in Haydn's charming Concerto. The tone he produced was, as always, a mixture of brilliance and tenderness, clean and impeccably pitched, and never the least bit dry.

There was sheer fun in the tune of the finale, which will never sound the same again to those who have read Sir Donald Tovey, and the doggerel that fits the rhythm so well: "The town that voted the earth was flat, flat as my hat, yet flatter than that!" Mr. Koussevitzky used a reduced orchestra, which was appropriate for this Concerto. At the end, all hands were tumultuously applauded.

In the "Lohengrin" Prelude the string tone was celestial, but there was piercing and out-of-place vibrato from the trumpet. Mr. Koussevitzky took it slowly, building up to a great climax. For some reason he made the "Meistersinger" Prelude too loud and also mannered. The ending was broadened out until the drum strokes became pompous and the theme of the Mastersingers sounded like the thump of doom.

Symphony Marks U.S. Milestone

By J. FRED LISSFELT

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque last night gave Director Koussevitsky the great opportunity to pay his respects to the American composer.

With the same devotion as to the mightiest classic, he brought all the elan of his orchestra to play Aaron Copland's recent Third Symphony, and through his sincerest interpretation of this music made a somewhat reluctant audience listen to what may become an important milestone in American composition.

SYMPHONIC THEMES

The symphony has the formal four parts. The earliest measures suggest the groping of Sibelius for articulation; then come themes, fortunately symphonic themes whose character permit development, short motifs somewhat in the style of Shostakovitch.

Throughout the cherzo and slow movement, one looked in vain for the usual Copland fingerprints, but he seemed to avoid his older cliches and to be working almost objectively. Finally, the last movement quoted themes and rythms with which we are all familiar, and we were on American territory for certain, what with hoe-down tunes, country dances and a hit at Yankee Doodle.

NATURAL MUSIC

These materials lent themselves to excellent treatment and made music more natural than the more stilted first movements. Its orchestration was happily worked out althought Copland is somewhat partial to full orchestra.

Ravel's "Pavanne" was balm in Koussevitsky's hands and a pleasant intermission before Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" Suite. No matter how dated this music, it still bears the marks of inspired genius, of talent for orchestral color upon which the Russians have a large claim. The orchestra revelled in its oriental sensualism and the audience found it good.

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY
SMITH

ONE generally reckons musical events by "seasons," but now that concerts and operas have become a year-round affair—if we extend the local scene to include the Symphony's activities in the Berkshires—the September-May classification is hardly adequate. Anyway, this column is about to depart from precedent and list some musical high-spots and outstanding personalities of 1946.

If this summary were to be postponed until next Sunday it would be possible to comment more fully on the only new guest-conductor of the year, Charles Muench, of Paris, who winds up his visit at Symphony Hall this afternoon with a repetition of the program offered there last evening and the day before: Jaubert, Sonata a due; Roussel, Suite from "Arjadne and Bacchus"; Honnegar, Symphony for strings; and Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor for orchestra and organ. As observed in rehearsal, Mr. Muench is eloquent and knows his business.

To continue with the conductors, in January stolid Sir Adrian Boult returned to us after a lapse of 11 years and offered three programs largely of British music. Insufficiently representative of what is going on in the United Kingdom today, this brief English festival may be set down as an important contribution, if for no other reason that it afforded a welcome change from our regular symphonic fare.

Versatile "Lenny" Bernstein, who succeeded Sir Adrian, is now an annual visitor to his former home town. Brazil's Camargo Guarnieri, who recently conducted a mildly interesting Symphony of his own, had previously appeared here in the role of composer-conductor. The same is true of Igor Stravinsky, who last February introduced to us his rather intellectual Symphony in Three Movements and diverting "Scenes de Ballet," and also of Darius Milhaud, whose Second Symphony, given its first performances at the concerts of Dec. 20 and 21, was the outstanding new piece of the year. My colleagues, apparently, would award that distinction to the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland, likewise commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and twice heard in the present season under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

* * *

The conductor himself is greatly excited over this work and predicts for it enormous popularity, but sc was he over the jaunty Ninth Symphony of Shostakovitch that hc placed on the opening program o the season, having already performed it for the first time on thi side of the water at Tanglewoo last August. The other new pieces offered by him or Richard Burgi seem hardly important enough t be included in so cursory a surve as this.

Two orchestras visited us for th first time: Fabien Sevitzky's Indianapolis Symphony on Jan. 12 and Leonard Bernstein's New York City Center Orchestra on Nov. 13. Both proved to be predominantly youthful in their makeup, with a goodly proportion of women musicians, and the playing of each was marked by exuberance and enthusiasm. Returning to a city that knew him long as a conductor of various orchestras, Mr. Sevitzky was cordially welcomed. The nearest approach to a novelty on his program, the dullish "Manfred" Symphony of Tchaikowsky, was made temporarily engrossing by a dynamic performance.

Koussevitzky And String Section Lauded

Boston Symphony Heard in Exceptional Concert at Mosque

By Donald Steinfirst

I tried to analyze the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance last night at Syria Mosque to determine if possible why, in so many respects it is the greatest symphonic organization in the world. It was a more or less hopeless task and it interfered considerably with my enjoyment of the music.

It was difficult, too, because every time I had determined in my own mind just what was so good, something happened on the stage to make me change my mind. But it was nonetheless a rewarding task.

Certainly the orchestra itself seemed to be the same as it always has been. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky was conducting, as he has for so many years. Some men of the orchestra have been in their seats so long they must seem like old friends to consistent listeners of the orchestra's annual Pittsburgh concerts.

Familiar Program

The program was a familiar one, consisting of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and "La Mer" of Debussy. This is a list that any symphony-goer listens to with pleasant remembrances and one that the Boston Symphony members can probably play with their eyes closed.

I think that the answer to my query lies in the tone quality of the string section around which Dr. Koussevitzky has built his magnificent structure. The woodwinds, good as they are, occasionally play out of tune and the brass with the individual warm muffled tone of this particular orchestra, plays brilliantly but unobtrusively. The French horns occasionally muff a note, after the habit of French horns the world over, but the strings are incredible. They play with an effulgence and sonority that carries all before it. There is a mellowness that has the aura that age imparts to everything intrinsically fine. It is an ineffable joy to hear them.

Shows His Musicianship

Added, too, are the additional, perhaps, primary virtues that are Dr. Koussevitzky's. Given an orchestral instrument that is split-second in its response and attentions to the conductor, it is in the use of these powers and prerogatives that his musicianship shines. He could use them unwisely. He does not. When he calls for a crescendo he gets a magnificent surge of music or by a flick of the finger he gets a diminuendo so soft one can almost hear the bows slowing on the strings.

But his direction is never mannered nor for that matter peculiarly stylistic. It was as embracing in the happy joie-de-vivre of the bouncy slow section of the Mendelssohn as it was in the fiery Saltarello of the last movement. It was as evident in the diaphanous Debussy as it was in revealing all the details of the thrice-familiar Tschaikowsky.

All three major works were sensitively led even to the very last measure. Each was exciting in a different way, the Mendelssohn "Italian" for its very simple and likable tunefulness, the Debussy for its merging of tone with color to produce effect and the Tschaikowsky for its pulsating and driving rhythmic grace.

There will be another performance of the Boston Symphony tonight at the Mosque under Dr. Koussevitzky. A different but probably just as interesting a program will be heard. Attendance is urged by this reporter.

Young Watertown Pianist

David W. Nilsson

Luise Vosgerchian is only 22 years of age, but she faces with complete calmness and aplomb the prospect of playing as soloist tomorrow with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Hub Symphony Woman Soloist Links Rise to Earnest Work

By Laura Haddock

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Delighted but quite calm at the prospect of playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday is young Luise Vosgerchian, 22-year-old Watertown, Mass., pianist and composer.

"If you get nervous about a concert," she said in an interview today, "you are only hindering your chances for a good performance. And after all, I'm playing the piano because I love it, so it should be the most natural thing in the world for me to enjoy playing in public."

This slender, brown-eyed daughter of an Armenian meat dealer in Watertown has been playing the piano since, at the age of seven, she went to a piano teacher down the street and persuaded her to give her her first lesson. She promised to pay for it the following week, and then she told her mother about it.

"We didn't even have a piano," Luise said, laughing at the recollection, "but when my mother saw I was so interested in piano playing, she bought me a very old upright, and I've been at it ever since."

Parents to Be There

Mr. and Mrs. Guelbeng Vosgerchian and Luise's older brother Goren, will be at the Saturday night concert to hear her; and Mrs. Vosgerchian probably also will be at the Friday afternoon performance.

Luise thinks that she will probably wear a red velvet dress which her mother made for her, a dress with lace at the neck and sleeves, and that is "not really red, not exactly wine-colored, it's sort of American beauty, I guess."

Mrs. Vosgerchian makes all her daughter's dresses, which Luise thinks is a very good idea.

"You know when you're playing in concerts you have to have a different dress for almost every time, and that would run into money, the way dresses are now, and anyway you can never find just the kind of dress you want. So all I have to do is tell my mother what I'd like and she makes it. I don't even have to have a fitting, she knows my measurements so well."

Her entire ease at the prospect of her performances Friday and Saturday as soloist with the orchestra in Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," Symphonic Impressions for Piano and Orchestra, Luise attributed to the training given her since she was 13 years old by her teacher, Mme. Gladys Ondricek.

Mme. Ondricek, said Luise, has always made her pupils play at musicales and other public gatherings until it is second nature for them to do their best before an audience.

Mode of Practicing

Luise added that methods of practicing have a great deal to do with a pianist's success.

"Practicing is an art in itself," she said, "and is three fourths of the battle. The first thing that I do—and this is just my own system of working—is to familiarize myself with the work as a whole and make it almost a part of myself. Then I start working with separate hands, and at slow tempos. Gradually, by degrees I work the piece up to its proper tempo and by that time I have analyzed it and made it so completely my own that nothing can rattle me."

Four years ago Luise served as pianist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra when that group presented her composition, "Window Shopping," in Carnegie Hall. She has no particular goal toward which she is striving, except that sometimes she thinks it would be fun to tour in concert work.

"Things have always just happened to me," she explained. "I think if you work hard then you always get your chance. I just love piano playing and I work hard because I love it and I don't even call it work. It's a pleasure. So I don't worry much about the future."

ON THE AISLE

Tribune 12/7/46

Koussevitzky Introduces Copland's Brilliant Third Symphony in Memorable Concert

By Claudia Cassidy

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Friday evening, Dec. 6, 1946. The program:

Prelude to "Khovantschina"	Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 3	Copland
Symphony No. 1, C. minor	Brahms

Good music is like good bread, and you don't know how much better it is than cake until you try to live without it. But great music is rather like eating your bread and having your cake, too, as the Boston orchestra proves on what has happily come to be its annual visit to Orchestra hall. Its director, Serge Koussevitzky, stands quietly yet imperiously at the pinnacle of his career as a magnificent maker of music. And it must disconcert those pessimists who are convinced that anything as superb as the Boston orchestra is [illegible] decadence and collapse to hear with what fiery young strength it rises to the challenge of a complex and vigorous [illegible]

[illegible] was true last season when Mr. Koussevitzky gave us a superb performance of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, and it was true last [illegible] Copland's Third Symphony sent a capacity audience [illegible] of approval. For Mr. [illegible] something more than enthusiasm and a great orchestra to offer contemporary music. He knows a good score when he sees it, and he takes the most exquisite pains to communicate that knowledge to his audience. And it must be, too, that he has the gift of inspiring music, for Copland's work, like "Peter Grimes," was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, which is twice blessed.

If this Third Symphony is not Aaron Copland's finest work, and it seemed to me to be so last night, it is at least his largest in scale and most complex in design. Into it have gone the individuality, the craftsmanship, and the "something to say" that make "Rodeo" and "Appalachian Spring" live happily in memory, and the bold clarity, the probing into music that make the piano sonata a challenge.

To attempt to do such a symphony justice in a brief review after one hearing, however revealing, is rather like pole vaulting with too short a pole. But it is at once remarkable for its design, its intricate use of material, and what seemed to me rather like his own musical finger prints from "Rodeo," in the sense of haunting memories from that lovely score which open vistas in the deep distance and are uniquely American. This is not a copy, but it is the same man thinking aloud and worth hearing.

The three themes of the opening movement are the intimations of a powerful and sinewy structure. The scherzo, so brilliant the audience burst into unaccustomed applause is rather like the wild horses of tha

"Rodeo" curtain, gallant and untamed, yet never out of its own control. The third movement opens almost imperceptibly as the high violins remember the trombones of that earlier third theme, and interest, already fully captured, grows more and more intense as the brass and percussion play a brilliant interlude, the higher woodwinds bewitch the ears, and slowly the whole structure rises to a massive but never topheavy climax.

As I seem to have neither time nor space left for the rest of the concert, perhaps it is enough to say that the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" was perfection in its handling of Russian timbres and moods, fading away so quietly you felt nostalgic about it before it had vanished, and that Brahms' First Symphony was a glorious example of what such an orchestra can do with such music. I rather thought the climactic phrase a jubilant shout, but my companion insisted it was a 21 gun salute. Either way, it was a fine way to sign off such a concert.

The orchestra reappears in Orchestra hall tomorrow afternoon.

* *

MENASHA, WIS.
CRESSET
DEC 1946

One Billion Discs

When the ten-millionth Ford car came from the assembly lines, Frederick Shepherd Converse, one of our country's prominent composers, wrote an orchestral composition, called Flivver Ten Million, in honor of the event. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave the first public performance of the work. This took place in the year 1927.

The completion of the ten-millionth flivver was an important milestone in the progress of American business and American history. Our own nation and many other countries took note of Henry Ford's significant achievement and paused to reflect on what the motor car has contributed to modern life.

In October, 1946, another epoch-making event took place—an event which, in the opinion of many, was in no way less important than the completion of the ten-millionth Ford car. It was the pressing of RCA Victor's one-billionth disc.

Even though the tremendous expenditures of money made necessary by the recent war eventually caused most of us to look upon the word "billion" as somewhat commonplace, that vast number still fills one with awe when it is mentioned in connection with phonograph records. One billion discs! It staggers the imagination. Performances of masterpieces, quasi-masterpieces, and short-lived drivel have been brought into millions of homes throughout the world. One billion discs from RCA Victor and many millions from other manufacturers have done more to serve the cause of music than anyone can tell. They have shown that fine music will live and that tosh will soon lose whatever savor it has and perish by the wayside; they have dispensed entertainment, edification, and understanding. Many a student of music has derived untold benefit from recordings, and many an artist has been able to deepen and enrich his own art by paying close and repeated attention to the skill of others. Will anyone ever be able adequately to measure what one billion discs and millions more have done for culture and civilization?

If the making of Henry Ford's ten-millionth flivver was worthy of commemoration in music, the production of the one-billionth phonograph disc should be worthy of a truly great masterpiece in tone. In honor of the event the manufacturers have issued as their one-billionth recording one of the new, unbreakable discs containing performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of two stirring marches from the pen of John Philip Sousa: Semper Fidelis and Stars and Stripes Forever. Those two works are masterpieces in their field, just as the man who wrote them was a master in his domain. The disc commemorates an event of permanent and wide-reaching significance; the compositions remind us that our country, too, can be, and actually has been, fertile soil for the production of music of lasting value. We should be particularly happy that the milestone represented by the one-billionth disc is to be found in the United States. Maybe a composer of note will write a work entitled Disc One Billion; but it would be difficult indeed for anyone to in-

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

Boston Symphony Scores with Debussy

There are those who insist, and not without some reason, that one sure measurement of an orchestra's greatness is its success with the music of Claude Debussy. If this be true, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard yesterday afternoon in the second of two Orchestra Hall concerts, is well entrenched in the lofty position at which flags are unfurled.

The men from Boston, under their respected leader, Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday painted the atmospheric perspective into "La Mer" without which the French composer's impressions of the sea would have had only the two-dimensional virtues of a picture postcard. It is thus that a work which "defies minute analysis" can nonetheless give a vivid representation of the "immemorial fascination" of the ocean and the wind.

No Less Familiar

The balance of Mr. Koussevitzky's program was no less familiar than the impressionistic masterpiece. Heard also were the "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikowsky.

The planning of the program was apparently based on the not unreasonable belief that audiences in the "provinces" are really curious to hear how visiting orchestras play the well-known classics.

There is no doubt of the high estimation with which the Sunday audience regarded the visiting organization. Amidst great applause the smiling conductor, whose face is seldom without visible emotion during the course of a concert, bowed again and again, often beckoning his mighty musicians to do likewise.

Reason to Be Proud

While there are many who would run miles to escape a performance of Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, there is an even greater number of listeners who are quite addicted to the work. The loyalists had every reason to be proud yesterday, for the Bostonians gave unmistakable emphasis to the fact that the melancholy Russian composer was a man of talent and ideas.

The "Italian Symphony," except for occasional moments of haste, was played with nothing short of elegance. Here, as in the other works, the unanimity of impulse among the hundred men was, to say the least, amazing.

S. S. R.

Koussevitzky Pleases With Varied Repertoire

Boston Symphony Gives New Work By Aaron Copland Its Premiere Here

By Donald Steinfirst

The second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Syria Mosque under Serge Koussevitsky's leadership listed a novelty, a symphonic war-horse and a transition piece. The new work, completed less than three months ago and heard for the first time in Pittsburgh, was the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland. The familiar work was the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the shorter work was Ravel's delicious "Pavanne pour une Infante Defunte."

It is a tribute to Pittsburgh concert-goers that Dr. Koussevitsky has chosen to let us hear a new work. He has long been an acting supporter of young American composers and has insisted that auditors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both at home and on the road, listen to new music. And rightly so, for unless music continues to draw from fresh wellsprings to renew itself it will stagnate and die. Then too, the concerts of the visiting orchestras have too long been drawn from the classics of the repertoire. It is fresh and more or less daring to offer Pittsburgh Mr. Copland's new work, and the deafening and obviously spontaneous applause and "bravos" that were heard at the conclusion of the Symphony must have confirmed Dr. Koussevitsky's good judgment.

Large Ovation Given

The very last pages of the Copland work were the kind that lead to large ovations. They brought the music to a terrific climactic crescendo conclusion and as such they were truly evocative. Previously however, much of the last movement had been confused and complicated. And it may as well be said here also that this last movement was far too long for the content.

The opening brass fanfare was rather typical of Mr. Copland's continual engrossment in the percussive which also appeared in the second movement where there was far too much sound and fury. With a profound and wise knowledge of the extensive qualities of the modern symphonic orchestra, it is possible for as honest and sincere a composer as Mr. Copland to build tremendous walls of brass and tympani and other percussion to terrifying sounds and this was the net result of the 2nd and 4th movements.

The opening section was rather stark. Here one heard the familiar devices which the composer had used to such good advantage in the far superior "Appalachian Spring." In the 3rd slow section, the conductor was on his firmest ground. He handled the string writing beautifully and if there were an unconscious reference here and there to Shostakovich, why not? He is a good composer, too.

Pavanne Pleased

After the Copland Symphony, and like so much cool fresh air after a sultry day, the Ravel Pavanne with its delicate stately theme and its quasi-modern harmonic structure that always looks back to the ancients, seemed a delightful few minutes. The Bostonians played it with so much grace, so much elegance and so much restraint that it at once became a high spot of the concert.

The concluding "Scheherazade" was an ideal work for the highly colored pallete of Dr. Koussevitsky and the Orchestra. If "Scheherazade" has a place at all in the modern serious repertoire of symphonic orchestras, performances of the kind heard last night will certainly help to keep it there. The many violin solos were eloquently played by Richard Burgin and a long list of other soloists were heard particularly among the winds and the solo cellist played beautifully and warmly.

The concert was heard by a large and highly enthusiastic and appreciative audience.

[62]

ON THE AISLE

Chicago Tribune 12/7/46

Koussevitzky Introduces Copland's Brilliant Third Symphony in Memorable Concert

By Claudia Cassidy

"Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Friday evening, Dec. 6, 1946. The program:

Prelude to "Khovantschina" .... Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 3 .... Copland
Symphony No. 1, C. minor .... Brahms

Good music is like good bread, and you don't know how much better it is than cake until you try to live without it. But great music is rather like eating your bread and having your cake, too, as the Boston orchestra proves on what has happily come to be its annual visit to Orchestra hall. Its director, Serge Koussevitzky, stands quietly yet imperiously at the pinnacle of his fame a magnificent maker of music. And it must disconcert those pessimists who are convinced that anything as supreme as the Boston orchestra is courting decadence and collapse to hear with what fiery young splendor it rises to the challenge of a complex and vigorous new score.

This was true last season when Mr. Koussevitzky gave us a superb performance of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, and it was true last night when Copland's Third Symphony stirred a capacity audience to shouts of approval. For Mr. Koussevitzky has something more than enthusiasm and a great orchestra to offer contemporary music. He knows a good score when he sees it, and he takes the most exquisite pains to communicate that knowledge to his audience. And it must be, too, that he has the gift of inspiring music, for Copland's work, like "Peter Grimes," was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, which is twice blessed.

If this Third Symphony is not Aaron Copland's finest work, and it seemed to me to be so last night, it is at least his largest in scale and most complex in design. Into it have gone the individuality, the craftsmanship, and the "something to say" that make "Rodeo" and "Appalachian Spring" live happily in memory, and the bold clarity, the probing into music that make the piano sonata a challenge.

To attempt to do such a symphony justice in a brief review after one hearing, however revealing, is rather like pole vaulting with too short a pole. But it is at once remarkable for its design, its intricate use of material, and what seemed to me rather like his own musical finger prints from "Rodeo," in the sense of haunting memories from that lovely score which open vistas in the deep distance and are uniquely American. This is not a copy, but it is the same man thinking aloud, and worth hearing.

The three themes of the opening movement are the intimations of a powerful and sinewy structure. The scherzo, so brilliant the audience burst into unaccustomed applause, is rather like the wild horses of tha "Rodeo" curtain, gallant and untamed, yet never out of its own control. The third movement opens almost imperceptibly as the high violins remember the trombones of that earlier third theme, and interest, already fully captured, grows more and more intense as the brass and percussion play a brilliant interlude, the higher woodwinds bewitch the ears, and slowly the whole structure rises to a massive but never topheavy climax.

As I seem to have neither time nor space left for the rest of the concert, perhaps it is enough to say that the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" was perfection in its handling of Russian timbres and moods, fading away so quietly you felt nostalgic about it before it had vanished, and that Brahms' First Symphony was a glorious example of what such an orchestra can do with such music. I rather thought the climactic phrase a jubilant shout, but my companion insisted it was a 21 gun salute. Either way, it was a fine way to sign off such a concert.

The orchestra reappears in Orchestra hall tomorrow afternoon.

MENASHA, WIS.
CRESSET
DEC 1946

One Billion Discs

When the ten-millionth Ford car came from the assembly lines, Frederick Shepherd Converse, one of our country's prominent composers, wrote an orchestral composition, called Flivver Ten Million, in honor of the event. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave the first public performance of the work. This took place in the year 1927.

The completion of the ten-millionth flivver was an important milestone in the progress of American business and American history. Our own nation and many other countries took note of Henry Ford's significant achievement and paused to reflect on what the motor car has contributed to modern life.

In October, 1946, another epoch-making event took place—an event which, in the opinion of many, was in no way less important than the completion of the ten-millionth Ford car. It was the pressing of RCA Victor's one-billionth disc.

Even though the tremendous expenditures of money made necessary by the recent war eventually caused most of us to look upon the word "billion" as somewhat commonplace, that vast number still fills one with awe when it is mentioned in connection with phonograph records. One billion discs! It staggers the imagination. Performances of masterpieces, quasi-masterpieces, and short-lived drivel have been brought into millions of homes throughout the world. One billion discs from RCA Victor and many millions from other manufacturers have done more to serve the cause of music than anyone can tell. They have shown that fine music will live and that tosh will soon lose whatever savor it has and perish by the wayside; they have dispensed entertainment, edification, and understanding. Many a student of music has derived untold benefit from recordings, and many an artist has been able to deepen and enrich his own art by paying close and repeated attention to the skill of others. Will anyone ever be able adequately to measure what one billion discs and millions more have done for culture and civilization?

If the making of Henry Ford's ten-millionth flivver was worthy of commemoration in music, the production of the one-billionth phonograph disc should be worthy of a truly great masterpiece in tone. In honor of the event the manufacturers have issued as their one-billionth recording one of the new, unbreakable discs containing performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of two stirring marches from the pen of John Philip Sousa: Semper Fidelis and Stars and Stripes Forever. Those two works are masterpieces in their field, just as the man who wrote them was a master in his domain. The disc commemorates an event of permanent and wide-reaching significance; the compositions remind us that our country, too, can be, and actually has been, fertile soil for the production of music of lasting value. We should be particularly happy that the milestone represented by the one-billionth disc is to be found in the United States. Maybe a composer of note will write a work entitled Disc One Billion; but it would be difficult indeed for anyone to in-

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

Boston Symphony Scores with Debussy

THERE are those who insist, and not without some reason, that one sure measurement of an orchestra's greatness is its success with the music of Claude Debussy. If this be true, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard yesterday afternoon in the second of two Orchestra Hall concerts, is well entrenched in the lofty position at which flags are unfurled.

The men from Boston, under their respected leader, Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday painted the atmospheric perspective into "La Mer" without which the French composer's impressions of the sea would have had only the two-dimensional virtues of a picture postcard. It is thus that a work which "defies minute analysis" can nonetheless give a vivid representation of the "immemorial fascination" of the ocean and the wind.

No Less Familiar

The balance of Mr. Koussevitzky's program was no less familiar than the impressionistic masterpiece. Heard also were the "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikowsky.

The planning of the program was apparently based on the not unreasonable belief that audiences in the "provinces" are really curious to hear how visiting orchestras play the well-known classics.

There is no doubt of the high estimation with which the Sunday audience regarded the visiting organization. Amidst great applause the smiling conductor, whose face is seldom without visible emotion during the course of a concert, bowed again and again, often beckoning his mighty musicians to do likewise.

Reason to Be Proud

While there are many who would run miles to escape a performance of Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, there is an even greater number of listeners who are quite addicted to the work. The loyalists had every reason to be proud yesterday, for the Bostonians gave unmistakable emphasis to the fact that the melancholy Russian composer was a man of talent and ideas.

The "Italian Symphony," except for occasional moments of haste, was played with nothing short of elegance. Here, as in the other works, the unanimity of impulse among the hundred men was, to say the least, amazing.

S. S. R.

Koussevitzky Pleases With Varied Repertoire

Boston Symphony Gives New Work By Aaron Copland Its Premiere Here

By Donald Steinfirst

The second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Syria Mosque under Serge Koussevitzky's leadership listed a novelty, a symphonic war-horse and a transition piece. The new work, completed less than three months ago and heard for the first time in Pittsburgh, was the Third Symphony of Aaron Copland. The familiar work was the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the shorter work was Ravel's delicious "Pavanne pour une Infante Defunte."

It is a tribute to Pittsburgh concert-goers that Dr. Koussevitsky has chosen to let us hear a new work. He has long been an acting supporter of young American composers and has insisted that auditors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both at home and on the road, listen to new music. And rightly so, for unless music continues to draw from fresh wellsprings to renew itself it will stagnate and die. Then too, the concerts of the visiting orchestras have too long been drawn from the classics of the repertoire. It is fresh and more or less daring to offer Pittsburgh Mr. Copland's new work, and the deafening and obviously spontaneous applause and "bravos" that were heard at the conclusion of the Symphony must have confirmed Dr. Koussevitsky's good judgment.

Large Ovation Given

The very last pages of the Copland work were the kind that lead to large ovations. They brought the music to a terrific climactic crescendo conclusion and as such they were truly evocative. Previously however, much of the last movement had been confused and complicated. And it may as well be said here also that this last movement was far too long for the content.

The opening brass fanfare was rather typical of Mr. Copland's continual engrossment in the percussive which also appeared in the second movement where there was far too much sound and fury. With a profound and wise knowledge of the extensive qualities of the modern symphonic orchestra, it is possible for as honest and sincere a composer as Mr. Copland to build tremendous walls of brass and tympani and other percussion to terrifying sounds and this was the net result of the 2nd and 4th movements.

The opening section was rather stark. Here one heard the familiar devices which the composer had used to such good advantage in the far superior "Appalachian Spring." In the 3rd slow section, the conductor was on his firmest ground. He handled the string writing beautifully and if there were an unconscious reference here and there to Shostakovich, why not? He is a good composer, too.

Pavanne Pleased

After the Copland Symphony and like so much cool fresh air after a sultry day, the Ravel Pavanne with its delicate stately theme and its quasi-modern harmonic structure that always looks back to the ancients, seemed a delightful few minutes. The Bostonians played it with so much grace, so much elegance and so much restraint that it at once became a high spot of the concert.

The concluding "Scheherazade" was an ideal work for the highly colored pallete of Dr. Koussevitsky and the Orchestra. If "Scheherazade" has a place at all in the modern serious repertoire of symphonic orchestras, performances of the kind heard last night will certainly help to keep it there. The many violin solos were eloquently played by Richard Burgin and a long list of other soloists were heard, particularly among the winds, and the solo cellist played beautifully and warmly.

The concert was heard by a large and highly enthusiastic and appreciative audience.

[62]

CASALS AT 70

Great Spanish 'Cellist Waits For Country's Liberation

By MAURICE EISENBERG

TODAY is the seventieth birthday of Pablo Casals. In a letter which I have just received from him he writes:

"My seventy years are about to ring. As a birthday present the French Government has honored me with the Grand Officier de la Legion d'Honneur and other European Governments are planning similar decorations for me. This all touches me deeply, but you know that I am far from happy. My dears, be thankful that you are all together. Do you realize the joy that this means? These ten years of exile from my dear family have made me realize that nothing can equal this good fortune."

If Pablo Casals could have but one birthday wish today, it would be to see Spain liberated from the Fascist rule of Franco. As everyone knows, at the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War, he did not hesitate to take sides with the Loyalists. During the terrible aerial bombardments of Barcelona, he conducted his symphony orchestra to keep up the morale of his people, but he was finally obliged to leave Spain because of repeated attempts upon his life. All his property was confiscated.

Lives in Exile

He has since lived as a voluntary exile in the little village of Prades in the Pyrénées-Orientales near the French-Spanish frontier so that he might be of assistance to the thousands of Spanish refugees living in the many internment camps of the region. He organized and played numerous concerts in France and Switzerland to raise funds for these sufferers. With the proceeds of his concerts and with money contributed by his friends and admirers all over the world, he has been able to distribute milk and other necessities to his exiled countrymen.

This great Spaniard has been accused of "mixing in politics, which as a great artist did not concern him." But how untrue this is! He has never had political ambitions and if his name has been falsely misrepresented by certain political factions, it has always been without his authorization.

All forces and factors by which his people have been made to suffer concern Pablo Casals. When civil war broke out in Spain in 1936 he was at the zenith of his career. Since he is the foremost instrumental interpreter of our time, the musical public all over the world, especially the Americas, clamored for his appearances. Managers made the most tempting offers, yet even when World War II cast its shadow over the entire European Continent and Casals' life was again in danger, he refused all personal advantages. He sacrificed health, comfort and further triumphs to remain near his people in the greatest hour of need.

True Patriot

In this age of materialism, it is difficult to understand such devotion and sacrifice for a cause. But Pablo Casals is a patriot in the true sense of the word, and a great humanitarian. The love of his country is so much a part of him that nothing else matters. A number of times during the Nazi occupation of France he was visited by the Gestapo. They tried in every way to force him to go to Germany to play, but no threat was strong enough to induce him to play in the country of the enemy.

Last March I spent several days in Switzerland with Casals and heard him play two concerts devoted entirely to Bach. I must admit that I had expected to find a broken-down man of nearly 70, which would have been natural after all the hardships, both physical and moral, which he had undergone during the war. However, he looked younger than when I had last seen him in the late fall of 1939. In fact, he looked like a man in his fifties.

His playing has taken on qualities that only the untold suffering of a great soul could produce. The telltale sign of age in all string players is intonation, but here was the perfection of the great Casals as I had last heard him. The quality of the message of his playing bordered on the divine, and the effect it produced upon his public was uncanny.

Making 'Progress'

When the Germans were driven off French territory in 1944, Casals wrote me in one of his first letters after the long enforced silence of the occupation:

"Now that the enemy has been forced to leave, I have resumed my practicing and you will be pleased to know that I feel that I am making daily progress."

This striving for "daily progress" reflects his modest approach to his art and is the key to the secret of why "Casals is ageless."

Pablo Casals has decided not to give any public concerts anywhere until after his return to his liberated country.

"However," he writes, "this does not mean that I have abandoned my career. My entire day is taken up with practice and my vast correspondence."

This is the only means of protest of a great artist and a citizen of the world against the forces of evil and injustice. Let us hope that his seventy-first birthday will find Pablo Casals reunited with his loved ones in a liberated Spain.

Famed Conductor Lauds Pittsburgh Audiences for Being So Attentive

Serge Made Them Fidget 22 Years Ago

By BETTY-JO DANIELS

Twenty-two years ago Pittsburgh audiences fidgeted in their chairs and shuffled their feet and manicured their nails when Serge Koussevitsky conducted "new music"—modern compositions.

Today the City's audience is one of the most attentive—they listen with interest—to Mr. Koussevitsky's crusades into the realm of the future.

The famed conductor of the Boston Symphony since 1924 arrived here yesterday to conduct concerts at Syria Mosque last night and tonight.

Praises Copland's Symphony

And he brought with him what he calls one of the "most important musical compositions ever done in America"—Aaron Copland's Third Symphony.

"It will come a day when the Copland Symphony will be as popular as Tschaikowsky's Fifth," the 72-year-old conductor enthused.

And that's really saying something. For years and years Mr. Koussevitsky has championed Russian music as well as American.

Founded Publishing Firm

In 1909 he founded a publishing company for Russian composers, simply because he felt sorry for them.

"Why do you know what Rachmaninoff received for his Prelude in C Sharp Minor—you know the one that goes like this"—and Mr. Koussevitsky gestured with his smooth-skinned hands and sang 'dum-dum-dum,' rippling imaginary piano chords as he went.

"Fifteen dollars he got. And his publishers got rich!" he remonstrated.

Composer at Seven

The ruddy-faced, blue-eyed musician—who smiles frequently and talks eagerly about everything except himself—was born in Russia. His father was a violin player, but he wanted his son, Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitsky, to have no part of music.

But he couldn't stop him—nobody could. When he was five he "already crazy," he smiled. And by seven, though he didn't know how, he was composing.

At 14 he left high school, after telling his principal that he simply had to study music, that Latin and Greek were nothing to him, so he journeyed alone to Moscow.

Won Scholarship

He had no money, knew nobody. Knew only that music demanded of him.

He wangled a scholarship from the Conservatory there—but only on the condition that he would take up one of the more difficult—and unpopular—instruments. Bassoon, trombone, or double bass.

He chose double bass. And in five months became what other bass players take five years to accomplish. And, finally, the only bass virtuoso in the world.

Two Before Him

"There were two before me—one during Beethoven's time. His name was Dragonetti. Then 50 years later there was another, Bottesini, and 50 years another. It was I."

He became a virtuoso when his music teacher said that unless he started doing better in his music he would have to leave school. So he did. He watched string players, and decided, "If a violin can sing like a soprano, a cello like a baritone, why can't a bass sound like a basso."

That's what he worked on. He employed violin, cello and viola techniques in his playing. There was no concerto for his instrument, so he wrote one, and played it with principal orchestra all over the world.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
He likes Pittsburgh audiences.

Denies He'll Retire

It's been 12 years since he's touched his bass, though, "And every year it grows farther away. I am sorry, but I do not have the time," he reflected.

The rumors—and they seem to make the rounds every once in a while—to the effect that Mr. Koussevitsky plans to retire as conductor of the Boston Symphony are entirely untrue, he says.

He has no children—but his musicians are his children. They and all the American composers he can think of. He loves them all and will not leave them.

To Record Symphony

When he does stop conducting, however, he plans to write an autobiography. "So far I don't know when that will be." And he knocked on wood.

Mr. Koussevitsky is playing the Copland Symphony tonight. He plans to record it in March. "Then we shall wait and see how long it is before it becomes like the Tschaikowsky," he smiled.

Münch at Symphon

Guest Conductor Presents Program of French Music

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Everything was French at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, Charles Münch, from the Paris Conservatory, conducting. The music covered the decades from the '80's down to the present, the composer of earliest date being Saint-Saëns, with his Symphony No. 3 in C minor, carrying a part for organ, played by E. Power Biggs; the composer of the period just past being Roussel, with his "Ariane and Bacchus" Ballet Suite No. 2, op. 43; and composers of the War II period being Jaubert, with Sonata a Due, for Violin (Mr. Burgin), Violoncello (Mr. Bedetti), and Strings, and Honegger, with his Symphony for Strings.

Mr. Münch arranged matters on his program in a way to shake up chronology, making the small-sounding Jaubert piece, which wants only an elemental string group built on a pair of double basses, serve for opening; and going back in time to the Roussel Suite, which requires a full modern orchestra but gets along on moderate sonority, for his second item. From there he moved into the '40's again, leading the complete outfit of Boston Symphony Strings, through the rough and raucous scoring of Honegger. Then, intermission, and the pompous, jubilant Saint-Saëns work for the finish.

Such a scheme is rather more subtle than Boston Symphony audiences are accustomed to, and it produced what might be called a decorative effect. At any rate, the arrangement of moods and the disposition of tone colorings lent an especial artistic aspect to the occasion.

The concert itself, accordingly, was a construction; and it was something agreeable to regard on its own general account, whatever anybody might think of it in detail. To take the mechanism down, however, and to examine one or two things, the piece most remarkable for ingenuity, or perhaps say, originality, was the Honegger Symphony for Strings. For here the composer carries exploration beyond any point hitherto attained. We have only to recall Schoenberg's "Verklärte Nacht" to realize what an advance, if that is the word, Honegger has made. Neither of the old terms, classic and romantic, here apply. There needs new description and classification. Formal style and sweet sound are absent. Every group—first violins, seconds, violas, 'cellos and basses—speaks, and each is individually heard. It seems like complete social break-up; and yet they all get along together and exhibit a kind of unity.

A practical question is, whether many orchestras in the United States, or anywhere else, can put the work through to convincing performance. Mr. Münch did well, indeed, to get the Boston Symphony men into the swing of it in the short time he has had them under his baton. ceremonial eloquence inheres in passages of moderate speed and deliberate song that we should hardly wish to do without.

Mr. Münch, free to swing his stick, having no desk and book before him, made an interesting platform figure. We could see the music in his motions as well as hear it on the instruments. There resulted, too, a broad phrasing and a larger rhythm that lent the day high distinction.

Boston Symphony Scores with Debussy

THERE are those who insist, and not without some reason, that one sure measurement of an orchestra's greatness is its success with the music of Claude Debussy. If this be true, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard yesterday afternoon in the second of two Orchestra Hall concerts, is well entrenched in the lofty position at which flags are unfurled.

The men from Boston, under their respected leader, Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday painted the atmospheric perspective into "La Mer" without which the French composer's impressions of the sea would have had only the two-dimensional virtues of a picture postcard. It is thus that a work which "defies minute analysis" can nonetheless give a vivid representation of the "immemorial fascination" of the ocean and the wind.

No Less Familiar

The balance of Mr. Koussevitzky's program was no less familiar than the impressionistic masterpiece. Heard also were the "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikowsky.

The planning of the program was apparently based on the not unreasonable belief that audiences in the "provinces" are really curious to hear how visiting orchestras play the well-known classics.

There is no doubt of the high estimation with which the Sunday audience regarded the visiting organization. Amidst great applause the smiling conductor, whose face is seldom without visible emotion during the course of a concert, bowed again and again, often beckoning his mighty musicians to do likewise.

Reason to Be Proud

While there are many who would run miles to escape a performance of Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, there is an even greater number of listeners who are quite addicted to the work. The loyalists had every reason to be proud yesterday, for the Bostonians gave unmistakable emphasis to the fact that the melancholy Russian composer was a man of talent and ideas.

The "Italian Symphony," except for occasional moments of haste, was played with nothing short of elegance. Here, as in the other works, the unanimity of impulse among the hundred men was, to say the least, amazing.

S. S. R.

Thor Johnson Takes Place Of Goossens

By Felix Borowski.

UNDER unfortunate circumstances a concert was given at the Opera House yesterday by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Eugene Goossens, the regular conductor of the organization who was to have directed, was laid low with pneumonia, and at the last moment Thor Johnson was called in to take his place.

Mr. Johnson, a young American musician, was not making his debut here, for he led a concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra—at the suggestion, we believe, of Dr. Koussevitzky—the season before last. At that time he gave evidence of talent as well as of inexperience.

The circumstances of yesterday's concert were hardly likely to give much inspiration to the visiting orchestra; for not only was it deprived of its own conductor but the audience was small, and such lack of public interest was likely to have a chilling effect upon all concerned.

Good Material Shown

Under such conditions, it would not be fair to arrive at a final judgment as to the accomplishments of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, or those of Mr. Johnson as the conductor of it. It may be said, however, that yesterday's concert showed that there is good material in the organization.

The woodwind section gave the impression of being without much body, and was badly balanced against the strings and brass, even when those departments were least vociferant.

The program, which contained Aaron Copland's "Appalacian Spring," was changed, presumably as Mr. Johnson was unacquainted with the score, and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" was substituted. The concert began, however, with Brahms' Academic Festival Overture. Upon this, and upon the other works, the conductor, expended great physical effort.

'Enigma' Featured

With larger experience he, no doubt, will learn that a more tranquil direction will bring about more effective results.

The principal feature of the concert was Elgar's "Enigma" Variations. Considering that there had been no rehearsal, the playing of so difficult a work was creditable both to the conductor and the men and women under him.

It would manifestly be unjust to insist that there should have been greater plasticity in the reading, and the same may be said concerning Tschaikowsky's work, and the G Major Symphony by Dvorak, which closed the program.

Munch to Lead Symphony; Bach and Mozart on Records

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Next Friday and Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have as its guest conductor Charles Munch, the conductor of the Paris Conservatory. Charles Munch is an Alsatian by birth (1895) and the "u" of his name should have an "umlaut" over it (these presses cannot reproduce accents) and should be pronounced as the French "tu" or the German "umlauted u." He will conduct an all-French program, consisting of Maurice Jaubert's "Sonata a due," the Second Suite from Albert Roussel's "Ariane et Bacchus," Arthur Honegger's Symphony for String Orchestra and Saint Saens' Third Symphony in C minor with organ. The last named is familiar enough to the Boston Symphony's public, but the other items should provide both novelty and interest. Roussel's music is almost always rewarding to listen to, and it has been far too long since anything of Honegger's has been played.

As for M. Munch, I think the Boston public will certainly take to him as a conductor, even though to most of them he is an unknown quantity. I heard him once when he came to Brussels as guest conductor of the Philharmonic in the spring of 1945. The Brussels Philharmonic is a good orchestra under whose regular conductors the performances varied from the excellent to the indifferent. But under M. Munch's ministrations it became positively inspired and played far better than I ever heard it before or since. The main item on the program was our old friend, the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto in B flat minor, with Nicole Henriot as soloist. The crowd was beside itself after this, partly, of course, because it had heard little Tchaikovsky for so long a time but also because the performance really merited such enthusiasm. From my own selfish point of view, however, I am just as glad that M. Munch has not selected this work for his Boston appearance.

ON THE AISLE

By Claudia Cassidy

Koussevitzky's Farewell Makes Boston Orchestra Sing and Its Excited Audience Shout

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Sunday afternoon, Dec. 8, 1946. The program:

Symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian" .... Mendelssohn
"La Mer" .... Debussy
Symphony No. 4, in F minor .... Tschaikowsky

Thank you, I've had my Christmas present—the two concerts by the Boston orchestra, presented by Allied Arts in Orchestra hall. And it isn't any easier to review the second than the first, because if you heard it you need no words, and if you missed it you wouldn't believe me. For it may be that this amazing orchestra plays consistently at the peak of its form, as it must have played yesterday, and it may be that Serge Koussevitzky constantly conducts like a man inspired. But it is not often, to my sorrow, that I am around when such things happen, so that I sit on the edge of my chair and suddenly realize I haven't been breathing.

When this happens, magicians have been at work, and this time Debussy's magnificently realized "La Mer" cast the spell. Not even mediocrity can utterly dim the splendor of this giant seascape, but it can blur and confuse the music, and frustrate the perceptive senses. A good performance is a delight, but a great performance—ah there you have another story.

It may be that at some other fortunate time I heard this wonder work so played, but I doubt it. I would not have forgotten. For Koussevitzky saw it whole, which is to say in every exquisite detail, and the orchestra played it in a kind of tidal glory reflected from the ever-changing and changeless sea itself. To listen was to be bemused and bewitched—and held in magnetic attraction. In such a performance, to choose one choir above another is rather like saying you prefer the sea at dawn to the sea at dusk, or when it smiles rather than when it is lashed by storm, but even in an orchestra which seems to be composed solely of virtuosi, so that the harps, too, speak a more liquid language, the sudden ferocity of the cellos, which usually sing like baritone angels, was electrifying.

This orchestra is, above all, supremely alive, and so is its music. To precede and follow "La Mer," Mr. Koussevitzky had chosen the fourth symphonies of Mendelssohn and Tschiakowsky, but any one who anticipated standard performances of standard works had a surprise coming. The "Italian" burst upon us with a lyrical outpouring as fresh as spring, and the lambent tone of the andante was as near perfection as the scherzo with its almost unbelievable woodwinds.

If you expected the Tschiakowsky to be a letdown, you reckoned without another imposing Russian. For Mr. Koussevitzky lavished upon it his most assiduous attention and loving care. He reminded you of beauties almost forgotten in the "Pop" concert melée, and when that andantino began to sing, you heard the Boston orchestra in all its glory. The pizzicato scherzo was a work of art, not a stunt, and the finale let off steam for orchestra and audience, bringing the one to a great climax, singing, the other to its feet, shouting.

Perhaps, as the conservatives tell us, we couldn't stand too much of this magnificent music, but it would be wonderful to try.

[64]

FURTWAENGLER'S STANDARDS ON TRIA

Though Acquitted, Conductor's Moral Position Leaves Doubts About His Record

By DELBERT CLARK

BERLIN.

ON Tuesday, Dec. 17, 1946, Wilhelm Furtwaengler was acquitted of Nazi activities by the Berlin denazification tribunal. It was a great day for Dr. Furtwaengler if one is not too precise in appraising moral values. The tribunal acquitted him on the ground of insufficient evidence but, perhaps unwillingly, convicted him of another offense which is not punishable under any modern law.

That offense was in the same general category as those committed by Beniamino Gigli in Italy and Richard Strauss in Austria: the offense of so overlooking moral values and fixed principles that he was able and willing to make maximum use of a regime which he alleged was obnoxious to him, to maintain himself in a position of comfort and security and to kick down any potential competitors for that position. Positive Nazi activity is punishable under the rules of these tribunals; lack of moral sense is not yet a crime.

In his trial, which lasted two full days, the proved charges were that Dr. Furtwaengler, who used to be acclaimed as Germany's greatest orchestra conductor, had been honorary Prussian State Councilor appointed by Hermann Goering, and that he had continued as president of the Berlin Music Chamber and director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra during part of the Hitler regime. Charges not proved were that he had been intimate with the Ministry of Propaganda, if not with Goebbels himself, and had used that intimacy to procure punishment for a Berlin critic who dared praise Herbert Von Karajan, young guest conductor, at his expense.

As for proved charges, Dr. Furtwaengler said it was obviously impossible to resign as Prussian Councilor since Goering had appointed him and Goering alone could remove him. And he had eventually resigned both musical directorates.

Outside Dates

He contended he had quit these positions as a result of arguments with Goebbels over the retention of Jewish musicians. But the former business manager of the Philharmonic who appeared as a defense witness and who had not heard Furtwaengler's testimony, did him a disservice by saying the conductor was unable to continue administrative jobs because of pressure of guest engagements outside Germany. There appears to be little question that he had indeed protected some Jewish musicians, whether for reasons of per sonal friendship or because of opposition to the Nazi regime is unclear. However, when it is said of a German, "Some of his best friends were Jews," it is often taken as proof positive that he was no Nazi.

L IN BERLIN

As for the unproved charge, the substance was that Von der Nuell, music critic of the Berliner Zeitung, had in 1938 praised Karajan to the skies and suggested that 50-year-old conductors should learn from him. The reference to Furtwaengler was inescapable. Because it was so extravagant and spoke of "the wonder Karajan," this review became known to Berlin music circles as "Die Wunderkritik" and became a cause célèbre.

Wants Critic Punished

It was definitely established that Furtwaengler appealed to the management of orchestra and state opera to do something to punish Von der Nuell and both refused. Whereupon, as Furtwaengler himself eventually admitted after a day of denials, he personally and in writing appealed to the Propaganda Ministry to restrain Von der Nuell.

Furtwaengler contended he so acted because Von der Nuell's criticism was part of a persecution campaign engineered by Hermann Goering, who wanted to get rid of him. It was well established that Von der Nuell, no lily himself, was a personal friend of Goering. The trial resolved itself into a debate of two questions: First, did Furtwaengler succeed in his efforts to have the critic punished? Second, was his act that of a sensitive temperamental artist who felt insulted or that of a very powerful man who desired to suppress all opposition, however legitimate?

It soon appeared that the only witness who might answer these questions was Von der Nuell, himself, but he was listed as a prisoner of war in Belgium, allegedly as a result of Furtwaengler having him drafted.

However, one of the last witnesses was a pathetic, plump Hausfrau, wife of Von der Nuell, who had not heard from her husband since the end of war and did not know whether he was alive or dead. In timid, weary, scarcely audible tones, she said that she had heard of "Die Wunderkritik," but since it had been written before her marriage, she did not know details of the case.

Attitude Questioned

No, she couldn't see any connection between Furtwaengler's Olympian anger and her husband's being drafted because there was a two-year interval between the two incidents, and meanwhile the Berliner Zeitung had ceased publication, depriving Von der Nuell of exemption.

Thus the main part of the case against Furtwaengler collapsed because a man, either dead or missing, who himself might have been a denazification defendant, could not be found, and no one else knew facts or would tell.

Toward the end it seemed as though the denazification tribunal accepted the thesis that if Furtwaengler was unsuccessful in his efforts to have the critic punished, then he was innocent, and that if Karajan actually was not as great a conductor as the critic said, then the efforts were not unjustified. It soon became apparent that this tall, bald-headed old man with a fringe white hair would be acquitted.

On strict rules of evidence of a United States court it is more than probable he would have been acquitted. Yet throughout the case his attitude was scarcely that of an opponent of nazism, despite his statements for the record. He consistently referred to Hitler as "Der Fuehrer" and used the official Nazi epithet in references to the Weimar Republic. The very term, Weimar Republic, was banned by Hitler with the word "Systemzeit," substituted, and this was the word Furtwaengler used until one member of the court sharply interjected: "Would you mind stop using this Nazi expression? It is something we all want to forget."

Furtwaengler replied, "Oh, was that a Nazi phrase? I was unaware of it."

The next time, in heavily accented, almost sarcastic, tones, he used the words "Weimar Republic," whereupon the audience that packed the court room seemed vastly amused.

Another member of the court angrily inquired the reason fo

Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

mirth, saying: "What is the reason for this silly laughter? The audience appears to be still somewhat spoiled."

Still Takes Bows

Character witnesses produced much testimony of Furtwaengler's refusal to act in a propaganda film. One critic, Werner Fiedler, wrote an unfavorable review of the film in question in which Richard Strauss substituted for Furtwaengler, and immediately, he testified, he was called in by the conductor for a discussion of the necessity of criticism in general. However, he said, Furtwaengler finally agreed that criticism is necessary if art is to survive.

At the trial's close Furtwaengler rose, tall, slender, self-confident and with the air of a Gothic Jesus, and addressed his admirers in the court room:

"I don't regret having done this for Germans and for Germany. I knew it was worth while to take it."

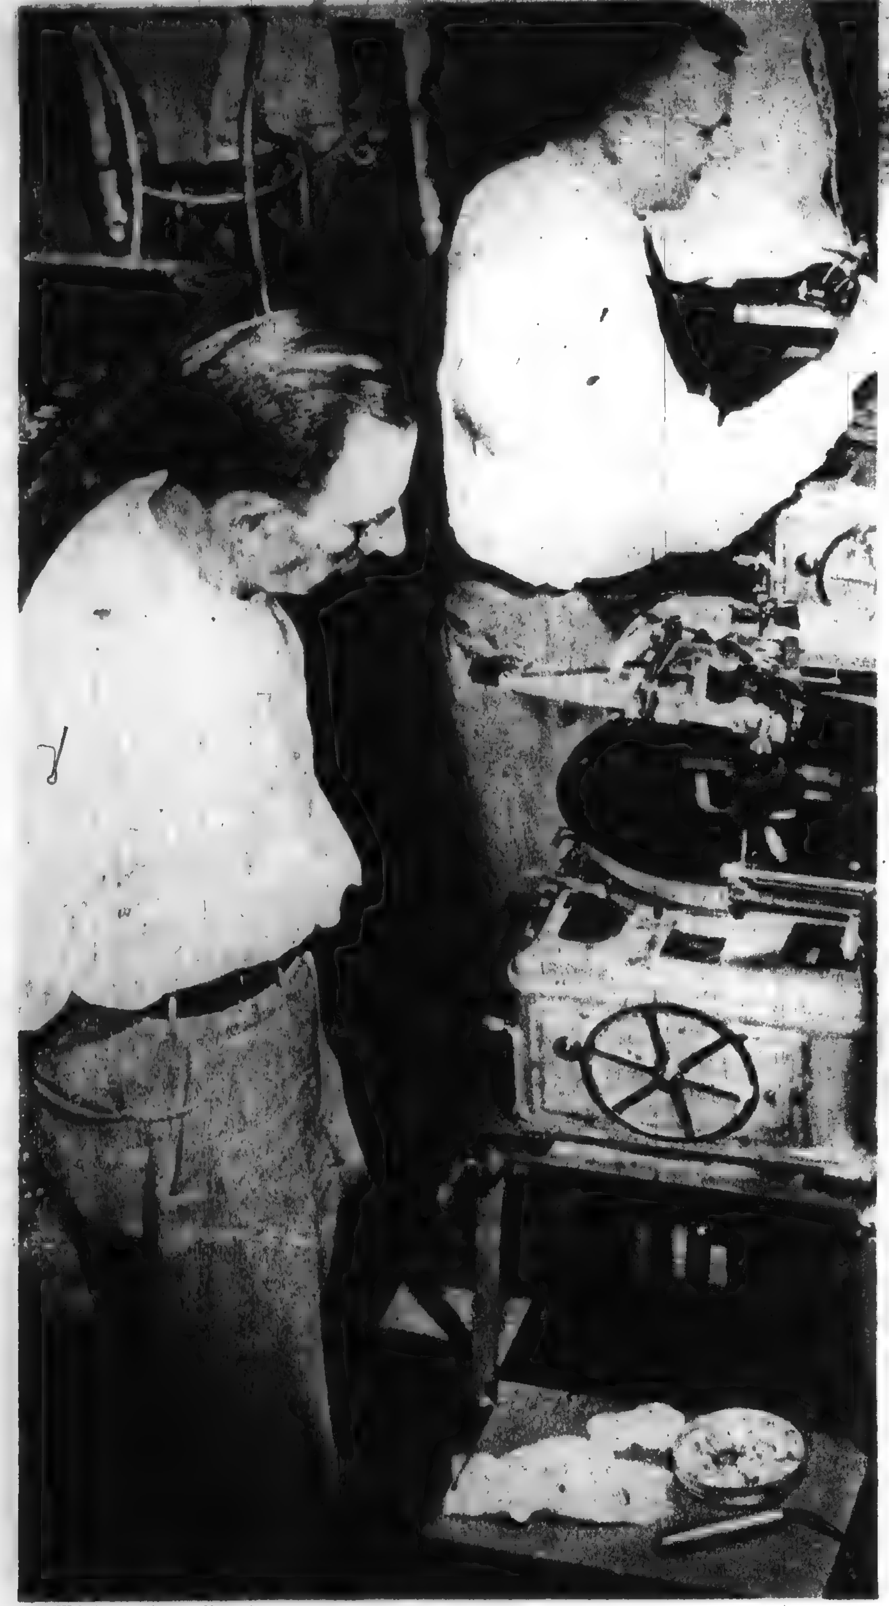
This curtain speech brought enthusiastic applause which he acknowledged with several bows as in the old days.

He has gone to Switzerland to await review by the Allied Kommandatura of the decision in his case. Earlier, he said his one desire was to clear his name, not conduct, but now associates say he meant he did not want to be permanent conductor of the Philharmonic, just to have ten or so guest appearances a year.

CREATING A RECORD

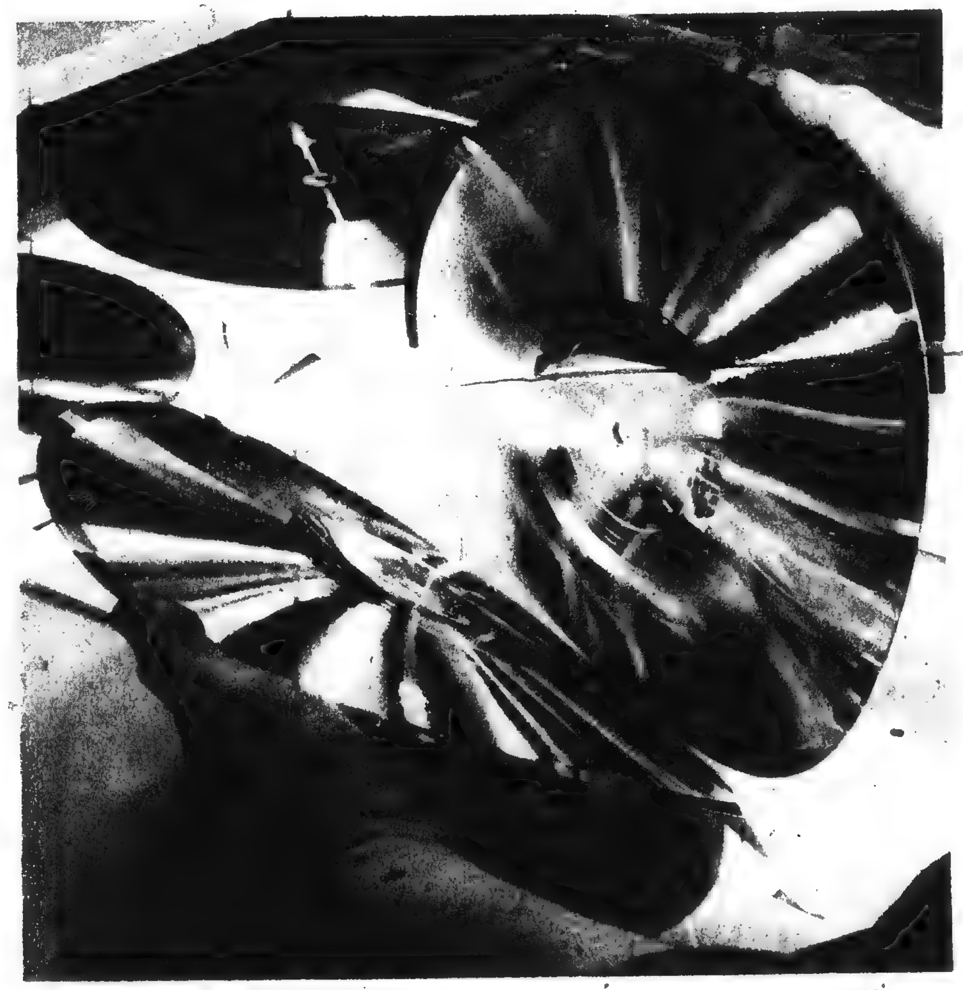
Youngstown Vindicator

RECORDED music, which has been "on its way out" about three times in 70 years, is having its biggest season, with more than 260,000,000 records scheduled for manufacture by more than 150 American companies in 1946. The modern phonograph disc has come a long way since 1877, when Thomas A. Edison invented his crude tinfoil-wrapped cylinder which recorded and reproduced sound. Today's record contains ingredients from all parts of the world—shellac from India, gums from the Philippines and Africa, fine limestone from Indiana, red slate from Pennsylvania—and a series of manufacturing processes which are constantly being changed and improved. Last year the non-breakable plastic record was produced. Pictured here are the various steps taken in the making of a record—a recording of a symphony played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the manufacture of the finished disc at the RCA Victor record plant in Camden, N. J.



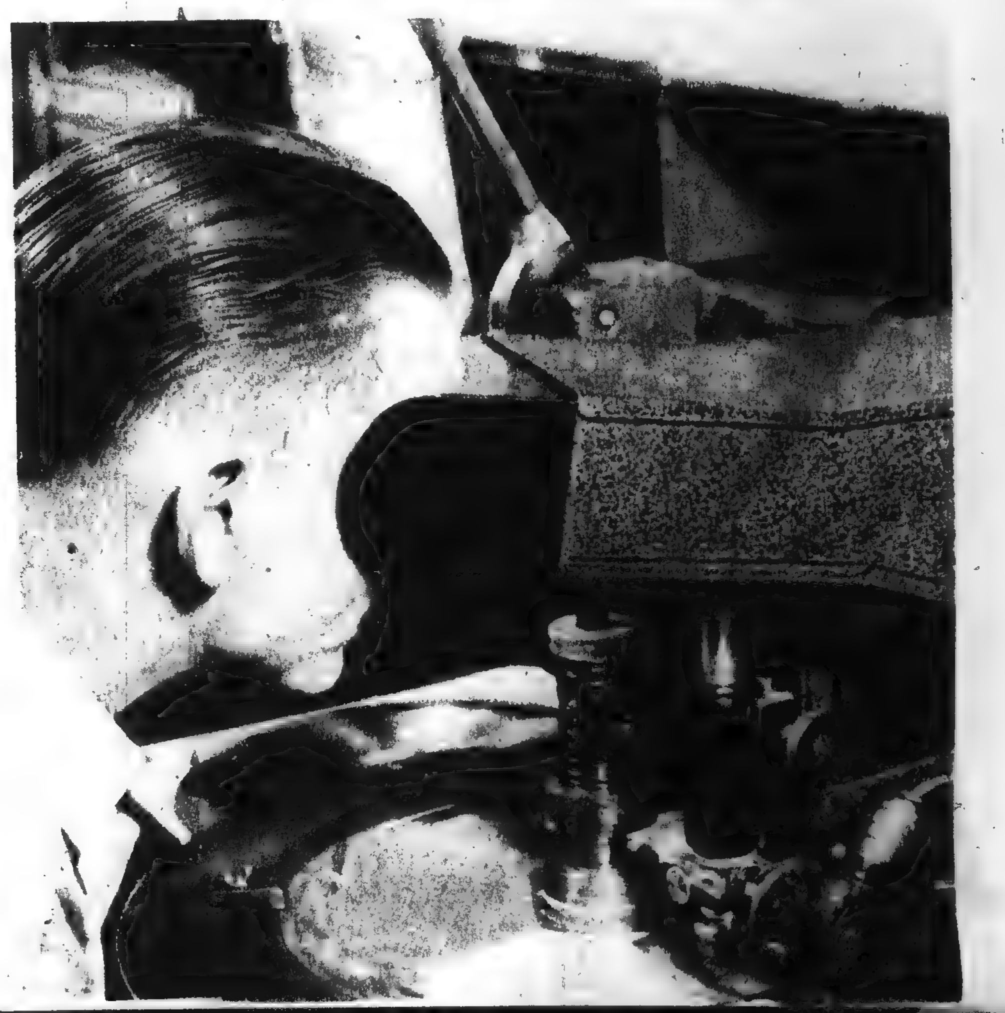
1. In wings of concert theater recording engineers supervise turntables which record the music on lacqeur discs. These are then re-recorded.

2. Surface of "master" is treated electrically by placing disc in vacuum chamber, covering it with extremely thin film of gold, then removed, ready for copper plating.



3. One becomes many. To produce many records, duplicate molds and stampers are made. A stamper, which will press out the record, is separated from mold.

4. Made in quantity from the mold, stampers are negatives from which actual records are pressed. Placed carefully on racks, as shown, they await centering.

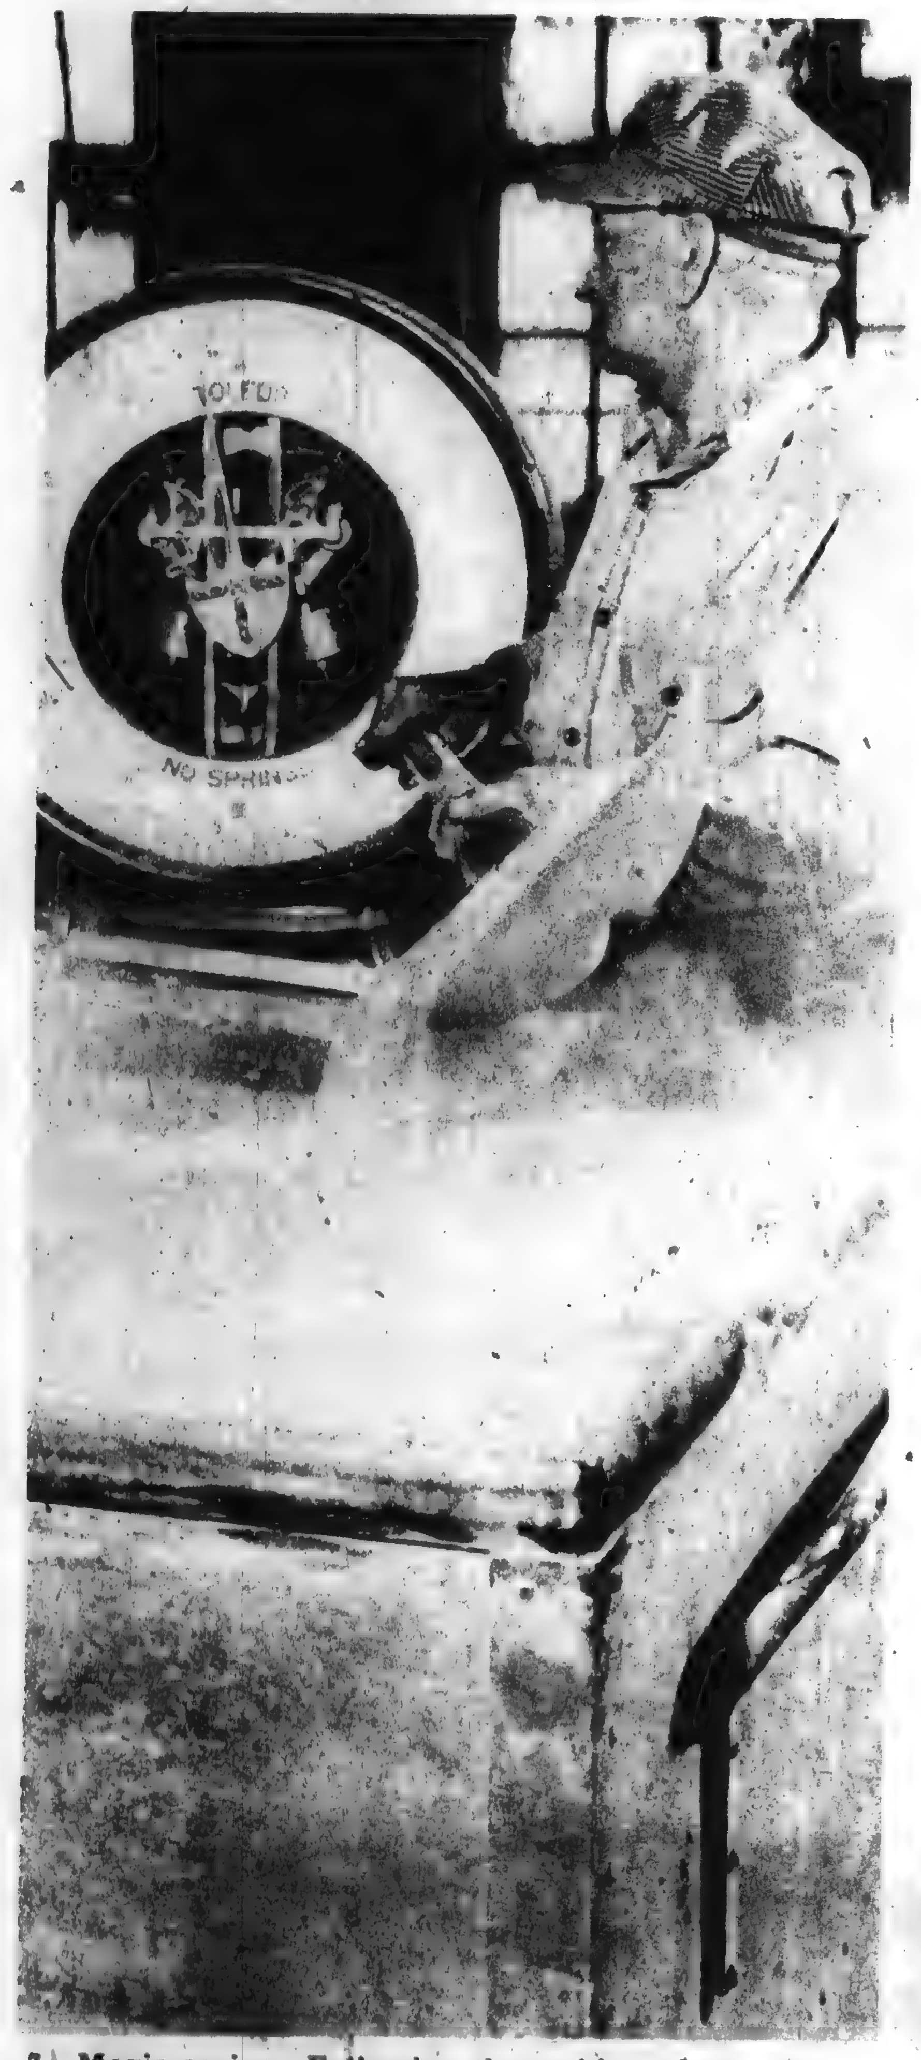


5. Inspection. J. W. Murray, vice president in charge of RCA Victor record activities, inspects stamper. The "master record" is consigned to vault.

A PERFORMANCE by conductor Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony is recorded in a studio.

Associated Press Newsfeatures.

6. "Centering." Operator studies the lines on the stamper through shadowgraph and taps rim until dead center is reached. He then bores hole in stamper.



7. Magic recipe. Following the making of the "master record" and stampers, workmen mix and blend the dozen ingredients found in the record.

8. Records in the raw. Circular knives are poised to mark off long ribbons of hot black plastic compound into sections, called "biscuits," then sent along conveyor.

9. Working over steam table, operator folds a "biscuit" for waiting press nearby. The base of shellac, limestone and lamp black is about to become a record.

10. The newly born record, fresh off the press, is played for first time in test booth. Operator checks quality, freedom from noice and surface imperfections.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

COLUMBIA, S.C.
RECORD
1/2/47

Sketch Of S. A. Koussevitzky

Career In Music

[illegible] Koussevitz- [illegible] Symphony Or- [illegible] one of the [illegible] phonic bodies,

[illegible] in 1924, he [illegible] musical dol- [illegible] criticisms and [illegible] and lived [illegible] "most high- [illegible] sym- [illegible] world."

[illegible] For Art

[illegible] his art and [illegible] by operating [illegible] for symphonic [illegible] them by [illegible] Though it [illegible] wrath of critics, [illegible] works of [illegible] merit.

[illegible] score with 20 [illegible] in it," he said. [illegible] If he [illegible] and rea- [illegible] to give it a [illegible] the second sym- [illegible] the critics [illegible] if I had not [illegible] would have [illegible] and that [illegible] pretty well."

Youthful Prodigy

[illegible] Russia, June 30, 1874, [illegible] left home despite his [illegible] and went to [illegible] when a boy. He won a mu- [illegible] scholarship and after cram- [illegible] a five-year course into five months, became leading double-bass player at the Imperial Opera.

In less than a decade he was Europe's greatest bull-fiddle virtuoso but suddenly his interest switched to conducting. He organized fantastic trips with full orchestra, sailing down the 2,300-mile stretch of the Volga river to bring symphonic music to those who had never known it before.

These trips were made possible by the financial help of his wife, Natalya Konstantinova, whom he married in 1905. She accompanied him when he conducted in Berlin, London, Paris and Vienna and was his constant companion until her death in 1942.

Lack of sympathy with the Bolshevik regime forced Koussevitzky to come to America and he was invited to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had slipped considerably since its inception in 1881.

Rounded Up Talent

He pensioned old players, discharged incompetent ones and scouted the country for talent. Then by driving the 110 men, rehearsing endlessly he brought the orchestra world renown.

At rehearsals he was a tyrant, hunching over in an old sweater, shouting, singing nad waving frantically with his baton. One false note and he would howl with disgust. The passage would be repeated until perfect, and then repeated some more.

Koussevitzky had an abiding passion for music. He established the Berkshire Center music school at Stockbridge, where the orchestra plays summer concerts. He pleaded for a state department for music to help young composers who could "refresh and vitalize the spirit of man."

"Art is indispensible and inseparable from the life of man," he contended.

BELOIT, WIS
NEWS
1/2/47

Modern Library has added to its excellent series The Life & Works of Beethoven, by John N. Burk, historian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Henry James' The Wings of the Dove.

JAN 3 - 1947

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY opened the 1946-47 New York season of the Boston Symphony with three of the orchestra's most popular and notable performances — Debussy's symphonic suite, "La Mer;" the "Italian Symphony," of Mendelssohn, and the "Symphony No. 4 in F Minor," by Tchaikowsky—all of which have been recorded for RCA Victor by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. In reviewing the concert, which incidentally was attended by a most distinguished audience, Olin Downes declared: "To have played anything as these works were played would have represented a triumph, and an irresistible joy to the listener. The music was reborn in the performances. In an imperfect world, where there are no values immune to argument and no truths which are not relative, the concert came as near as anything could to perfect orchestral playing."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In two weeks Bruno Walter will give us the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, composed in 1888, when Strauss was but 24. Yesterday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky presented for the first time in the United States his "Metamorphosen," a Study for 23 solo string instruments, completed two years ago next April, just two months before the composer's 81st birthday. It is this reviewer's guess that "Don Juan" has a better chance of living another 57 years than the "Metamorphosen" has of reaching the age that "Don Juan" is now.

The new piece is by no means without interest, and it surely would have been twice as effective in an auditorium half the size. In the vast spaces of Symphony Hall these 23 string players, each one with his own part to play, labored somewhat in vain. The men worked hard enough and so did Dr. Koussevitzky. He would not have given any more of himself conducting the "Domestica" or the "Heldenleben," and this Study lasts nearly as long as the aforementioned tone poems, without having a tithe of their musical and tonal variety. The inscription at the end of the printed score, "In Memoriam! Garmisch, 12, April, 1945," is plainly suggestive of the purport of the music, as is the deliberate quotation from the Funeral March in Beethoven's "Eroica." The prevailing mood of the music, however, is lyrical rather than elegiac. There are melodic and textural suggestions of "Rosenkavalier" and the operas that followed it, in particular, the delectable "Ariadne," and our enjoyment of the music is lessened rather than increased by the fact that we seem to have heard it all before. Strauss has not lost his skill but we are not surprised to find that the flame of his inspiration burns less fiercely than of yore.

The rest of the concert offered plenty of contrast. The second number was Martinu's bumptious Concerto Grosso, its two solo piano parts played by Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera, and the current program concludes with the fourth performance in less than five years of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." This time the solo viola is Jascha Veissi and he does an extremely capable job, producing a beautiful tone from what is said to be a viola of considerable antiquity. The performances of both the Martinu and the Berlioz were brilliant. As before, there was an excessive amount of din in the Frenchman's rather paltry finale, but when Berlioz calls something an "Orgy of Brigands," he didn't intend that it should resemble a pink tea. After Strauss' "linked sweetness, long drawn out," Martinu's rhythmic vitality and brash modernity were just what the doctor ordered, and the audience received work and performance with an unexpected warmth.

BISBEE, ARIZ
REVIEW

JAN 4 1947

By W. G. ROGERS

Sergeant Krusseirtzky, the Boston Symphony And The New American Music, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard; $3) The Life And Works Of Beethoven, by John N. Burk (Modern Library; $1.10).

It's Boston's turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music column; the Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume, and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitzky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Though these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break oll records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitzky's credit.

Of these compititions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their juniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Pis- the primacy accorded Copland's the primacy accoded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Iives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on 'Artist Koussevitzky,' as conductor is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a little more. . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to.

Burk's book, first published in 1943, is divided about evenly between biography and a catalougued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

MUSIC

1/4/48

Symphony Concert

The 12th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Jascha Veissi, violist. The program was as follows:

"Metamorphosen," Study for 23 solo string instruments ....Strauss
Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra and two pianos ....Martinu
"Harold in Italy," Symphony with viola solo, Op. 16..................Berlioz

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Doubtless it was the acme of tolerance and artistic internationalism to bespeak the first performance in this country of Richard Strauss' latest score, though we can be fairly certain, had the shoe been on the other foot, that Mr. Furtwaengler would not have sought out Mr. Copeland's latest work for performance in Berlin. Still, regardless of his political complacency, Strauss is an important figure in the history of music, and thus a new orchestral composition by him is an event to be noted.

Beyond the technical interest and the novelty of the ensemble, however, the "Metamorphoses" did not seem to me worth the immense difficulty of preparing it. Earlier in his career Strauss wrote a couple of anthems for 16 part chorus, which I well remember having heard at one time in Salzburg. In these unusual works he treated the voices of the chorus as if they were solo instruments in the orchestra, and he obtained an extraordinary effect. In the "Metamorphoses" he has done something similar with his 23 solo strings. Neither the members of the chorus in the one instance nor the musicians of the orchestra in the other could rely on their neighbors to "carry" them if they lost count or made a mistake. Therein, of course, lie both the technical interest of the music and the difficulty of performance. That the Boston Symphony men yesterday acquitted themselves with distinction goes without saying, and Mr. Koussevitzky was at pains to indicate that as he acknowledged the applause.

Emotionally the "Metamorphoses" is a dull and sentimental work. It is, in fact, just the sort of piece you would expect to come out of Germany at this time, a rather solemn attempt to be ingratiating. Countless Germans today are busy saying: "See, we're not such a bad lot after all"; and that is just what this music of Strauss seems to me to say.

At any rate along came Martinu's Concerto Grosso and briskly and cleanly swept the Straussian cobwebs out of the hall. Acclaimed back in 1941 as a piece of exceptional merit and consisting of two bouncing, athletic allegros and a slow movement of great eloquence, the Concerto Grosso is still fine music of the neo-classical school. It is a piece very much like in concept the Jaubert "Sonata a due," which we heard last week, but it is also a good deal better and stronger. Mr. Koussevitzky is very much to be thanked for restoring it to the repertoire.

By reason of an abrupt change of profession I never had a chance until yesterday to hear Mr. Koussevitzky's resplendent interpretation of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." So much has been written about it and since it was apparently given as recently as November 1944 I shall not add any more words here except to say that it is a rewarding experience in the concert hall to listen to such a performance as we heard yesterday. Not a little of this excellence was due to the admirable viola playing of M. Veissi.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra is on tour.

MUSIC

Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, bringing with him a new composition by Richard Strauss. That was "Metamorphosen" (or simply Metamorphoses), a study for 23 solo string instruments. The remainder of the program consisted of Bohuslav Martinu's Concerto Grosso, with Lukas Foss and Bernard Zighera at the paired pianos, and "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz. For the last, Jascha Veissi was viola soloist.

Someone is bound to ask: "Why play new music by a living composer of a still theoretically enemy country?" so we may as well get in on the ground floor and ask it now. If you go on the principle that patriotic scruples should influence artistic activity, the answer is "no," a new piece by Richard Strauss should not be played in this country so soon. But then you run up against the fact that we played Strauss' old music all through the war, that makes an embarrassing contradiction. And if you believe that art exists independently of politics, the answer is play Strauss, old or new, anyway. See? It's all as clear as yesterday's air over Boston!

I would like to know what Strauss meant when, at the end of his score, e penned, "In Memoriam! Garmisch, 12 April, 1945." Did he intend his music, which contains a reminiscence of the funeral march of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, to be some sort of an elegiac work? Did he have a specifically German reference in mind? Or did he intend it to be just a sorrowful musing upon the state of the world in general? There is no point discussing the matter further until Strauss, who is now 82, has told us what he meant.

The Metamorphoses make in their five linked sections a closely woven and extended fabric of counterpoint. They may be variations but since all 23 parts are written separately, it is hard to tell without a look at the printed notes. The music sounds well, for Strauss has not lost his great skill as a craftsman, even though his inspiration long since was on the down grade. The Metamorphoses reminded me of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" in mood and general contours, though the idiom seems more conservative and diatonic rather than chromatic. Put this score down, then, as enjoyable to the ear and probably of no lasting importance.

Martinu's lively but much too heavily orchestrated Concerto Grosso again proved a tonal stimulant. Messrs. Foss and Zighera were justly applauded for their spectacular work. The high point of the afternoon, however, was that grand, old example of unrestrained romanticism, "Harold in Italy," which, under Mr. Koussevitzky's ardent leading, alternately glowed and sparkled and, in the finale, set fire to the whole orchestra. On a day of such grim weather, the piece was just the thing. Mr. Veissi dealt capably if not brilliantly with the solo part.

SYMPHONY HALL

St. Cecilia's Schola Cantorum

Boston's newest choral group, St. Cecilia's Schola Cantorum, presented Verdi's Requiem in Symphony Hall last evening as its first public effort. The proceeds were designated for the Archbishop Cushing Charity Fund.

Arthur D. Howes conducted the performance of some 200 singers, an orchestra of 54 players from the Boston Symphony and soloists. The latter were Selma Kaye, soprano, who replaced Agnes Davis at such a late date that the substitution was not noted in the program; Anna Kaskas, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and John Herrick, baritone.

It is good to welcome a new choral group to Boston's musical activities. We have plenty of vocal stars today, but nowhere near enough ensemble singing. And choral music, whether done publicly for profit, or privately for recreation, should occupy a larger place in the musical scene.

The performance of the St. Cecilia's Schola Cantorum, while not ideal, showed that much earnest work went into the preparation. Mr. Howes led the chorus vigorously, although he rather neglected the orchestra. And there were many moments when the male sections of the chorus were wanting.

As a group, the soloists were excellent. Miss Kaskas' work was notable for style and clear vocalism. Messrs. Lloyd and Herrick made a nice destinction between the theatricality of the music and the religious spirit of the text.

At intermission Archbishop Cushing gave a brief talk in which he lent his encouragement to St. Cecilia's Schola Cantorum. We should hear more from this organization.—J. W. R.

Jan 4

RESERVED FOR RADIO

By Rudolph Elie, Jr.

'Sunday Afternoon at 4:30' a Big Time Radio Show; Arthur Fiedler Shows Rare Talent as Producer

In view of the fact I have something of a job on it myself, I suppose it is impossible to be completely unbiased about it, but it does seem that Arthur Fiedler's radio show "Sunday Afternoon at 4:30" is easily the best and most professional radio show produced hereabouts. It is, in any case, the only "big time" production originating in a city that produces remarkably few first class radio shows and virtually none of national importance.

The thing that gives "Sunday Afternoon at 4:30" its more or less unique aspect is the fact that it is a "production" in the best sense of the word. The First National Bank, which has been putting it on for three seasons now, appears to spare nothing in the way of expense to achieve a certain artistic integrity along with its flair, and what it actually gets out of it but prestige in view of the fact that its commercials are the least commercial of any I ever heard, is hard to see. It is what you might call an institutional affair, a sharing of profits with the public by bringing to that public, at no expense, a musical program that is by its very nature one of the better of life.

Symphony Also on Air

In this connection it is more than gratifying to see that the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company is doing the same thing later in the month when it sponsors the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, not so much to sell insurance as to help further a great but not possibly self-supporting organization. The First National Bank and the John Hancock Company have, in short, accepted the roles formerly held by such great public benefactors as Henry Lee Higginson and Eben Jordan, a breed of men long since succumbed to the changing social patterns.

As a production, "Sunday Afternoon at 4:30" takes place in the Opera House, the stage of which is most suitably and attractively set to enhance the visual impressiveness of Arthur Fiedler's orchestra of 60 Boston Symphony musicians. The public is invited free of charge and tickets may be obtained, so far as I know, merely by writing to the bank and asking for them. In any case, the auditorium is usually filled to capacity 15 minutes before the show begins, and almost a half hour before the show is on the air.

At 4:10, the unrehearsed musical quiz begins on the stage. This is a sort of "warm-up" for the radio broadcast, and it consists of a board of three musical experts and a quiz master (who happens to be me). We have two regular experts, Arthur Fiedler himself, and Warren Storey Smith of the Post, and a guest expert of musical note. The questions are sent in by the audience, members of which are awarded record albums if their questions are used. This informal business lasts until about 4:25 and then, at 4:30 the show goes on the air with Streeter Stuart of WBZ as announcer and Jack Wright of the advertising agency as producer.

From then on it is Arthur Fiedler's show. Needless to say the famed Pops conductor, with his genius for building a program of lively musical interest and performing it with style, vigor and musicianship, requires no compliments from me at this late date. With his acute sense of timing, his enthusiasm for introducing young soloists, and his overall command and authority on the conductor's stand, he puts on a concert that compares favorably with any he ever gives during the Pops Esplanade season.

Forms Second Orchestra

An example of Mr. Fiedler's talent for this sort of thing, is the fact that he has trained a "second" orchestra of local musicians to take the place of the Symphony musicians when the orchestra is on tour, and it is nearly impossible to tell one from the other. Of course there have already been first rate resident musicians in Boston outside of the Symphony, but it has remained for Mr. Fiedler and Rakov, musical director of WBZ, to bring them together and show us what they could do.

The show is on the air for a half hour, but the concert continues for the audience another half hour. Thus, as production, "Sunday Afternoon at 4:30" runs nearly an hour and a half. Taking it by and large I know of nothing else outside the production centers of New York nd Hollywood that comes anywhere near it either as a musical event or as a "show." So some day, if you want to see a real big time radio production—and New York is a little too far to go—drop in to see "Sunday Afternoon at 4:30." I guarantee you'll like it, at least from 4:30 on. But then, maybe I'm just biased.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

JAN 5 - 1947

Symphony Conductor

Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitzky is~~ celebrating his 22nd year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 66-year-old ensemble is heard over ABC Tuesdays in an hour-long program of classical music.

JAN 5 - 1947

Bernstein To Hold Auditions Monday

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, who is guest conductor this week of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will hold auditions Monday for students of orchestral instruments for the Berkshire Music Center, where he is a member of the faculty. The school, which is operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and is under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., June 30 to Aug. 10.

The auditions will be held at the Baldwin Piano Co. Concert hall, 142 W. Fourth st., Cincinnati, Monday, as follows: Strings at 1 p. m., woodwinds at 2 p. m., brass and other instruments at 3 p. m.

Information about the Music Center will be available at the audition.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

JAN 5 - 1947

Berkshire Auditions In Cincinnati Monday

Leonard Bernstein, who is guest conductor this week of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will hold auditions Monday, Jan. 6, for students of orchestral instruments for the Berkshire Music Center, where he is a member of the faculty. The school, which is operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., and is under the director of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., June 30 to Aug. 10.

The auditions will be held at the Baldwin Piano Co. concert hall, 142 W. Fourth-st, Cincinnati, on Monday, Jan. 6, at follows: Strings at 1 p. m., woodwinds at 2 p. m., brass and other instruments at 3 p. m. Information about the music center will be available at the audition.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH

JAN 7 - 1947

CENTER OPENING SLATED BY FEB. 13

But Gerlach Is Not Positive Repairs Can Be Completed By Concert Date

County Executive Herbert C. Gerlach announced today that every possible effort will be made to re-open the main auditorium of the County Center, now closed for almost 13 months, by Feb. 13, in time for the scheduled appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At ~~the same time, he declined~~ to give a definite commitment that repairs to the roof and other building replacements will permit opening on that date without question.

The County Executive made the statement after he had been importuned yesterday by Mrs. Julian Olney, who conducts a concert series at the Center, a series which was necessarily abandoned in the 1945-1946 season when the auditorium was closed, and which has been pushed back several times this season as increasing delay caused repeated postponements of the re-opening of the center. One postponed appearance was that of Lauritz Melchior, now set for ~~March 13.~~

"Now ~~that County Executive~~ Gerlach has taken the re-opening of the County Center personally in hand, I feel confident that remaining repairs will be completed within the specified time," said Mrs. Olney today.

But Mr. Gerlach and James C. Harding, County Commissioner of Public Works, were not so optimistic. Both pointed out that even with completion of the new roof, a job 90 per cent finished, much other work remains to be done, including re-painting the interior, testing of the new electrical work and a new springler protection system, and possible replacement of the hardwood floor.

The auditorium floor has warped badly, due to exposure to the elements when the general contractor, Lewis and McDowell, New York City, removed the old roof last Summer, to avoid delay, under assurance that the steel trusses would be immediately available. The trusses, however, did not arrive until Oct. 21, and during those months rain and exposure buckled the floor.

Altogether, the complete job, it was learned today, will now cost the county in excess of $175,000, far more than originally estimated.

There is some doubt, said Mr. Harding, whether it is better to paint the auditorium now or wait until Summer. The question will be left, said Mr. Gerlach, to the Recreation Commission which operates the Center. If the painting is started now, the Center cannot be opened in February.

JAN 8 - 1947

Parisian Makes Plans To Conduct Symphony Concerts

Immediately upon his arrival in Cincinnati, Charles Munch, director of the Societe des Concerts of the Paris Conservatory, looked to the proper arrangement of scores for concerts with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra this week.

BY JOHN P. RHODES.

Fatigued by the railway journey from New York, Charles Munch, Director of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire of Paris, arrived in Cincinnati yesterday evening. However, accustomed to traveling (he visited and conducted most of the major symphony orchestras in Europe during 1946), he delayed a nap he had in prospect at the Netherland Plaza and began at once on arrangements for his concerts with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra this week.

As he shaved, disposed his luggage around the bedroom and opened his orchestral scores, a bedside lamp winked off and on with disconcerting irregularity. Riveters drilled incessantly at the rising structure of the new Terrace Plaza Hotel outside his windows.

Nothing daunted, Munch went on making arrangements for extra musicians with J. M. O'Kane, manager of the orchestra. An extra tuba, another bassoon, an E-flat clarinet are needed for performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony this week. Munch wanted to be sure of two harps. Berlioz wrote elaborate orchestration to make his symphony effective.

"It must be the true Berlioz," the conductor said calmly.

* * *

THERE WAS difficulty about the bassoons, of which the orchestra ordinarily only needs three. Cincinnati has a limited number of bassoonists. One, a member of the University of Cincinnati faculty, has his own schedule of classes each day. The only other local bassoonist is not a union member, since he plays only upon occasion. His engagement would require special arrangements with the union.

There was difficulty about the extra tuba. One of the double-bass members of the orchestra, Roland Fancher, on occasion, doubles on the tuba. Fancher had planned to attend his father's funeral tomorrow, during the hours of the orchestra's first rehearsal.

"Three rehearsals for the Berlioz;" Munch was adamant. "If the orchestra is in prime condition, perhaps one less rehearsal. I cannot know that until I've heard them."

Munch calmly surveyed the riveters, amused by the way the workers tossed red-hot bolts to each other.

"I hope they don't carry on all night." We assured him they didn't.

* * *

SPEAKING ENGLISH with difficulty, the conductor talked with Albert Thompson, public relations official of the orchestra, and with us about his resent experiences in Europe. He said he was delighted to include Cincinnati on his world-wide itinerary.

He has just made his American debut with the New York Philharmonic Symphony. Upon leaving Cincinnati, he will conduct concerts of the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra. Later he will go to Canada as guest leader of the Concerts Symphoniques de Montreal. He has been engaged by the Chicago Symphony for five concerts.

After the liberation of France, Charles Munch was the first French conductor to cross the Channel. Recent Continental engagements have included appearances with seven Swiss orchestras those at Basel, Berne, Zurich, Winterthur, Geneva, Lausanne and Neuchatel; six concerts with the Brussels Philharmonic in the Belgian capital, others at Liege and Antwerp; six concerts with the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam; appearances with the Palestine Symphony in Palestine and Egypt; two concerts with the Vienna Philharmonic; four more under auspices of the Society of Musical Culture in Lisbon, Portugal.

* * *

THE WINKING bedside lamp punctuated the long itinerary. No wonder the Parisian conductor looked tired. He told of concerts of the International Festival of Music last year to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, and concerts at the summer International Festival of Music in Zurich. He also directed in France at Bordeaux, Lyons, Strasbourg and Mulhouse. The 1946 "season" ends with summer concerts in Brazil.

Charles Munch is conductor of the Societe des Concerts at the Paris Conservatory, I believe we said in the beginning. Despite his other activities, he managed 30 concerts with the Paris orchestra during the past year.

* * *

THE MAN'S EYES seemed to reflect the many cities, miles of railways and ocean, he had traversed. His far-off gaze came to rest on the hills girding Cincinnati like a half-moon beyond his window.

Nervously he glanced once more at the blinking lamp.

"My little lamp is ill," he said.

We called the hotel's housekeeper; the light would be repaired immediately.

"The doctor will fix the lamp?" he asked.

"Yes, tout de suite," we said.

[71]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 9 - 1947

Music

2 Symphonies Are Bracketed At Carnegie

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Two great "Symphonies No. 3" were bracketed in epic style on the program of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night—Beethoven's and Aaron Copland's. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

More than just numerical equality must have prompted Mr. Koussevitzky to group the Beethoven classic with a work that may come to be regarded as one of the greatest—if not the greatest to date—of American symphonies.

Mr. Koussevitzky probably was thinking of both "Thirds" in relation to each composer's earlier scores. For Beethoven and Copland No. 3 marks a lengthy stride forward in power and novelty.

Both Mark New Eras.

Just as Beethoven's "Eroica" marked the birth of a new era in music almost a century and a half ago, so Mr. Copland's Third may well signalize a fresh turn in American music.

Only a few weeks ago Mr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians introduced the score to New York at a Saturday matinee. The response of public and critics, my own included, was warm.

Last night I felt even more convinced that this sturdy new score is a turning-point, for Copland as much as for his brother American composers.

With this vital score, the American symphony may now be said to have truly come of age, ready to make the rounds of the wrold's concert halls.

To be sure, Mr. Copland's predecessors in the field have done yeoman work; several symphonies have shown true concert stature, and a few will linger long in the American repertory.

Crystallized Maturity.

But the Third seems to crystallize the maturity, the firm control of idiom, the seasoned style slowly evolving in American composition. There need be no groping along the old levels any longer.

Last night's reading only strengthened my hunch of some weeks ago, that this work would serve as a kind of release, a liberating force in American symphonic writing.

There is next to no waste motion throughout the four movements, each gathering momentum in a natural, steadily gripping way. Everything is headed somewhere.

Themes thread naturally into the scheme, and nothing seems foisted on the fabric to pretty it up or call attention to itself. A kind of law of organic life seems at work all the time.

Woven Into Web.

Just how much Mr. Copland owes to others working the same field it is futile to speculate. Reminders of Prokofieff, Shostakovich, and the Americans buzz through the web.

The orchestra sounded even better last night than it had earlier this season, and Mr. Koussevitzky seemed an even more confirmed believer in Aaron Copland's genius.

As for Beethoven's "Eroica," I don't think it heresy to say he made the grand old symphony sound as fresh and of our time and place as Mr. Copland's.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 9 - 1947

Boston Symphony Award to Copland

By the United Press.

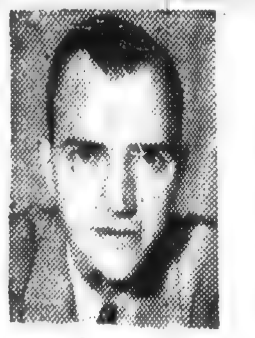
BOSTON, Jan. 9.—The newly established Boston Symphony Orchestra merit award has been presented to Aaron Copland, New York composer, for his third symphony.

Mark M. Horblit, Boston lawyer, provided the fund for the award, which amounted to $859 for 1947. It will be presented annually for some outstanding American symphonic composition.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JAN 9 - 1947

Words and Music



Boston Symphony Offers New Copland, Old Beethoven

By John Briggs

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony made their appearance in Carnegie Hall last evening with an intriguing novelty, the Symphony No. 3 of Aaron Copland.

Mr. Copland was commissioned to write his new work by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and completed it last September after two years' work. The symphony had its first performance last October, by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

As a general rule the nebulous impressions that drift through your mind on hearing unfamiliar music do not add up to a coherent pattern. Sorting out the dissimilar fragments of recollected experience is apt to be something of a chore.

But Mr. Copland's musical personality emerges from a new score as sharp-edged as a freshly minted nickel. He is long past the experimental stage. His style is fixed. In his work there is no fumbling, no musical erasures. It is sketched with hard, unerring lines and ready to go to the printers. The new piece is unmistakably Copland, and unmistakably linked with "El Salon Mexico," "Billy the Kid," "Appalachian Spring" and the rest. Mr. Copland has reached that plateau of experience and technique at which, if he no longer has any great surprises in store for us, he also is not very likely to disappoint us.

No Waste Motion

The salient impression left by a hearing of Copland is craftsmanship. In every department of his trade — in blocking out the pattern of his work, in stating his musical ideas, in working out details of harmony and part-leading and in scoring the whole for orchestra — Mr. Copland knows what he is about. He knows what he wants and knows the quickest way of getting it. In his music progress from [illegible]

But Mr. Copland's music suggests it is possible to have too much of even so excellent a thing as musical craftsmanship. Mr. Copland's score last night was overpowering in its utter lack of spontaneity. It was cerebral music. Every phrase and every cadence sounded contrived. Mr. Copland scorned appealing melody. You had the feeling that he would have felt such a thing overobvious and in rather bad taste. A harshness and grotesqueness of musical utterance redeemed even his most lyric moments from this failing.

It may be over-optimistic to believe one should take from the concert hall more than admiration for a composer's technical skill. As Joseph Conrad put it, "The artist's job is not to make us think, but to make us feel." But last night the Copland symphony had no emotional wallop of any sort. Like a scrupulous fighter, Mr. Copland refrained from hitting below the belt.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, after their exertions in the Copland, returned to play an exciting performance of the Beethoven Third Symphony. Like the work itself, the Bostonians' "Eroica" wears well with the passing of time.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 9 - 1947

Bostonians At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Two thirds made a whole concert for the Bostonians on their second visit to Carnegie Hall last night. Serge Koussevitzky programmed Aaron Copland's Third Symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica," also a third symphony.

Whether the juxtaposition was a compliment to Copland, only posterity will tell.

Having introduced the Copland last November to the Saturday patrons, Koussevitzky considered it significant enough to bring back with him this time.

He did the same thing a year ago with Prokofieff's Fifth. That work has caught the public: there is no reason why the same thing may not happen to Copland.

This third symphony has crystallized Copland's creative work to date. It is an important milestone, just as Harris' third, Hanson's third and Schumann's third symphonies marked a turning point in their careers. Only Copland has made a more notable contribution.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 9 - 1947

COPLAND'S THIRD REPEATED HERE

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Among those who profited from the second performance this season of Aaron Copland's third symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night was the composer himself. This was true beyond the merely sordid additional royalty, since this repetition directed by Serge Koussevitzky was a considerably more clear and unified exposition of the score than its predecessor in the Saturday afternoon series a few weeks ago.

Taking two things together—the more searching performance and the reference points established by memory—the score attained a kind of cohesiveness which did not ring in the first playing. This was notably true of the balance between the first two and the last two movements. I doubt that any number of hearings will justify the excessive clamor of the final section with its heavy brass choir and noisy percussion—this appears to be a five drum power work—but the score is otherwise saturated with musical instinct in a solution of sincere purpose and canny craftsmanship.

As before, one was especially impressed with the compact, swift-moving second movement, but the plan and intent of the following slow movement were more evident this time. Throughout, the leadership and playing were on the uplands of orchestral virtuosity; though there was an occasional dizziness induced by the notorious high pitch preferred by this organization.

Beethoven's 'Eroica.'

Since there is no known evidence that Koussevitzky is addicted to numerology, it must have been some other adage than safety in numbers which led him to pair the Copland third symphony with another third symphony, the "Eroica" of Beethoven. There are many debatable aspects of such a weighting of the scales, with an intermission as balance, not the least of which is Beethoven's expressed desire that his work stand at the beginning of any program on which it appears. The point was ignored on this occasion.

As performance, the Koussevitzky exposition varied between finicky attention to detail and peculiar indifference to basic verities. Thus, the first movement—which is the key to successful performance of the work—had impressive energy, but also an oddly indulgent phrasing of the second, lyric subject. There are few orchestras, however, and even fewer horn sections, which could manage the scherzo at the dazzling tempo taken [illegible] Koussevitzky. Due to certain time factors, Beethoven was honored in absentia, Copland in the flesh, both with rousing applause.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1947

Boston Symphony

Copland 3d Symphony, 'Eroica' Played at Carnegie Hall

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its second 1946-'47 visit to New York last night at Carnegie Hall, where Serge Koussevitzky conducted this admirable ensemble in two third symphonies—Aaron Copland's latest work in this form and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The Bostonians had introduced the Copland symphony to us last November, when it was played both in the Brooklyn Academy of Music and at Carnegie Hall. A noteworthy feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making is that when he presents a new work which he considers of particular consequence he gives it an introduction that is as widespread as possible. Mr. Copland's third symphony, for instance, not only has had three performances here but four in Boston and several others in this orchestra's westward tour. This is a good record for a work completed only a little more than three months ago. The symphony fully justifies Dr. Koussevitzky's desire to make it widely known. In inventiveness, emotional content, construction and orchestration it is a work of unusual consequence, and its vital and eloquent interpretation was followed by much applause for the composer, the conductor and his instrumentalists.

The "Eroica" symphony also found the conductor and orchestra in excellent form. The first movement gave, here and there, an impression of swiftness, but the interpretation as a whole was vital and expressive, with a persuasive realization of the various moods of this mighty work. The funeral march was marked by dignified eloquence, but also by a momentum which did not conflict with the essential spirit of the movement, and the close of the symphony was memorably climactic. The concert left no doubt as to the high position of this conductor and orchestra among the symphonic organizations of our day.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 10 1947

Aaron Copland Gets First Boston Symphony Award

Boston, Jan. 10 (U.P.)—The newly established Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award has been presented for the first time, with Aaron Copland, New York composer, being honored for his Third Symphony.

Mark M. Horblit, Boston lawyer, provided the fund for the award, which amounted to $859 for 1947. It will be presented annually for some outstanding American Symphonic composition.

Achieved World Fame

Aaron Copland is the Brooklyn-born composer who has achieved world-wide fame with his varied compositions. His Third Symphony which won the Boston award, received its metropolitan premiere here in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestro and received universal acclaim from the metropolitan critics.

Before his departure from the borough in 1921 as a scholarship student at the American School of Music at Fontainebleau, Mr. Copland lived with his parents at 628 Washington Ave. He is now 46.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 10 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Applauded by Truman At Capital Concert

Washington, Jan. 9.—(AP)—President Truman stood and applauded tonight in tribute to director Serge Koussesitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The President's wife and daughter Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic about the performance, too.

The presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.

[72]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN - 9 1947

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS COPLAND 3D

Koussevitzky Presents Strong Reading of Composition on Carnegie Hall Program

By OLIN DOWNES

Aaron Copland's Third Symphony was played for the second time in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, last night in Carnegie Hall, and it was given a superlative performance. Heard for the first time by this writer, it impressed first of all by the complete sincerity and the genuinely symphonic conception of the music. Many are the works given the title which are not symphonic in their real nature—in the sense of the grand line, germinal growth of the ideas and the proportional relations of the parts that make the whole.

The symphony is very classic in concept; admirably concentrated in workmanship, and lofty in mood in the opening movement, with a vigorously written scherzo and a final two movements, linked together, which do not impress us as completely successive in the sequence and the cohesion of the idea. Prevailingly the symphony is vigorously and clearly written and, if one may say so, without superciliousness, it shows an enormous development on Mr. Copland's part in resourceful development and extension of main ideas, and an over-all unity of design. It is entirely honest writing; there is no mere verbiage in any page of it.

And the style is Copland. One might point to a faint spook of the cloven hoof of Stravinsky, or a derivation from Mahler in a certain vein, or an allusion to Prokofieff. It is nevertheless the fact that whatever the thematic elements present, they are assimilations, not imitations; they have been absorbed into style immediately identifiable as the composer's own.

This is the biggest work of Mr. Copland's that we have heard. He has written earlier formative pieces and given them the symphonic title. In our opinion this is the first time that he has emerged as an authentic symphonist, for reasons previously given. On further hearings this symphony may reveal a greater degree of concision than one finds on preliminary acquaintance in what we now believe to be its weaker spots. As the matter stands we prefer to call this score not Mr. Copland's third but his first symphony, and look forward expectantly to his future works in this as in other forms.

One may well ask how this symphony would have sounded in a less masterly performance. So far as hasty perusal of the score and impressions of the occasion go, it could not have been more eloquently presented. And there is another reason to ask this question, a question which applies farther than the fortunes of any single work, since it has to do with the immense indebtedness of the composer to the worthy interpreter, the composer's dilemma, if he had not an adequate interpreter, and, finally, what commensurate interpretation means, to even the greatest masterpieces.

Beethoven's "Eroica" made the second half of Dr. Koussevitzky's program. Its performance, especially in the first and last movements, was a towering accomplishment. The presence of the "Eroica" on a concert program is taken as a perfectly ordinary affair by superficial or inexperienced listeners. It is nothing of the kind. When we find an actor who can worthily interpret Oedipus or King Lear we remember it as a historic event. When a conductor, through a lifetime of experience and the wisdom that only long thought and searching experience can confer, gives an interpretation such as Dr. Koussevitzky gave last night of Beethoven, he has accomplished a task of equal greatness. The performance was one more of the proud laurels of the orchestra and its leader, and one more reminder of Beethoven's immeasurable greatness.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

JAN 10 1947

TRUMAN JOINS IN OVATION FOR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded last night in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The President's wife and daughter, Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic too about the performance.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 10 1947

Postlude

Koussevitsky Redefines Perfection

Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4 in A Major; Debussy: La Mer; Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 4 in F Minor; played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Thursday evening in Constitution Hall.

By Paul Hume

If there are degrees of perfection in the performance of music, then last night's playing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky was perfection in the highest.

No shade of nuance indicated by even so meticulous a composer as Claude Debussy was overlooked, nor were any added by a conductor whose phenomenal control and matchless taste laid before Washington's most farsighted and enthusiastic audience a program of three popular favorites.

By far the most splendid of the evening's offerings was Debussy's La Mer. Its intricacies fascinated the listener as never before, at the same time that its unity was outlined with new beauty. Dr. Koussevitsky and his men entered into the performance of the work until the entire orchestra seemed illuminated by the incandescence of the music and its tremendous physical appeal. In such a work, the unerring line of a Koussevitsky maintains throughout that growing sense of the final climax to which all else must direct itself.

It is in no sense newsworthy that Mendelssohn's Italian and Tschaikowsky's F Minor symphonies received readings of the most informed sensitivity. In both works, tempi are of the highest importance, and in critical moments, it was refreshing and reassuring to hear such happy paces begun and continued. In the Tschaikowsky, especially, it was a joy to realize that the music could speak for itself.

What then remains to be said, for the evening was not of unalloyed pleasure? Simply this: In New York on Wednesday night Dr. Koussevitsky led his orchestra through what we are told was an impelling account of the third symphony of Aaron Copland. Later on this week, he will direct new works of Bohuslav Martinu and Richard Strauss. In the face of such a repertoire as that which Dr. Koussevitsky has built up during his marvelous stay in Boston, particularly in regard to new works by American composers, it is disappointing to have his orchestra, capable of anything in the realm of instrumental music, presented to Washington in its only appearance this season, in a concert of such ~~over-played~~ music. Far preferable to Mendelssohn or Tschaikowsky would have been the name of Aaron Copland, Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss, Paul Hindemith, Leo Sowerby, or any of a number of others, whose music has found warm approval and fostering in past seasons in Boston.

At the end of the concert, President Truman stood and applauded in tribute to Dr. Koussevitsky. The President's wife and daughter, Margaret, whom he escorted to th concert, also were enthusias about the performance.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

JAN 10 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS TRUMANS' APPLAUSE

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9-(AP)-President Truman stood and applauded tonight in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The President's wife and daughter Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic too about the performance.

The Presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES

JAN 10 1947

PERSONALITIES

HONORED: Director Serge Koussevitzky of Boston's Symphony orchestra, by a huge audience (led by Harry Truman, wife, daughter Margaret) which stood, roared applause after his concert last night in Constitution hall, Washington.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 10 1947

WITH THE applause of an enthusiastic audience still ringing in his ears, Serge Koussevitzky went on from Constitution Hall last evening to the French Embassy for the reception in his honor given by the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet.

Most of the guests at the reception had heard the Boston Symphony Concert, had watched Mr. Koussevitsky's magic fingers lead his men through the familiar Fourth Symphony by Tschaikowsky, the difficult "La Mer" by Debussy, and Mendelssohn's beloved "Italian Symphony."

The Ambasasdor and Mme. Bonnet occupied a box, having among their guests the former Attorney General and Mrs. Francis Biddle.

Mrs. Robert Low Bacon had in her box former Senator and Mrs. Warren Austin, who are her guests for the week, the Austins having come down for the White House reception Tuesday evening from New York where Mr. Austin is now chief United States delegate to the United Nations Security Council.

With Judge and Mrs. George D. Neilson in their box were the Nicaraguan Ambassador, Dr. Guillermo Sevilla Sacasa; the Philippine Ambassador, Joaquin Elizalde, and Mrs. Tom Clark, wife of the Attorney General.

The Cuban Ambassador and Senora de Belt came in after their dinner party had broken up, and with them were the Brazilian Ambassador, Carlos Martins, and the Egyptian Ambassador and Mme. Hassan, who had been in the dinner company.

The Italian Ambassador and Signora Tarchiani were there and the Peruvian Ambassador and Senora de Prado, the Swiss Minister and Mme. Bruggmann, the New Zealand Minister and Lady Berendsen, the Honduran Ambassador and Senora de Caceres and the Swedish Minister and Mme. Eriksson.

O. Max Gardner, United States Ambassador to Great Britain, and Mrs. Gardner were in the gathering, and others were Justice and Mrs. Felix Frankfurter, Senator and Mrs. J. William Fulbright, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown; Senator and Mrs. Edward V. Robertson, the Undersecretary of War and Mrs. Kenneth Royall, Representative Edith Nourse Rogers, Representative and Mrs. Richard Wigglesworth and the Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. Willard Thorp.

Representative and Mrs. Estes Kefauver were among those offering congratulations to Mr. Koussevitzky, and then there were Representative Sol Bloom and his daughter, Miss Vera Bloom; former Ambassador Joseph Grew and Mrs. Grew, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Glover, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mrs. Warren Delano Robbins.

Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, musically minded Mrs. Truxtun Beale and Mrs. Leland Harrison were in the group and—Jonkheer and Mme. Rene van Swinderen, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lippmann, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Elliston, Mr. and Mrs. Harry White, Mr. and Mrs. Andre Visson and Mr. and Mrs. Edgar A. Mowrer.

FINDLAY, OHIO
REPUBLICAN COURIER

JAN 10 1947

TRUMANS APPLAUD AT ORCHESTRA CONCERT

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9—(AP)—President Truman stood and applauded Thursday night in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The president's wife and daughter Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic too about the performance.

~~The presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.~~

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

JAN 10 1947

First Family Hears Boston Symphony

WASHINGTON— (AP) —President Truman stood and applauded Thursday night in tribute to director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra in Constitution hall.

The President's wife and daughter Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic too.

W

JAN 10 1947

White House Parties Crowd the Calendar

THE next large reception at the White House will be one for department officials Tuesday, January 21. The last such reception wa held in 1941.

Attendance figures for White House receptions show a higher pe centage of those invited attending the one for diplomats than any other There were 1146 diplomats at the reception Tuesday. About 1500 wer invited. The reception for press and radio was attended by 1300, a though 2000 were asked.

That the number of diplomats and chiefs of foreign missions in Was ington has increased is shown by the fact that the last diplomat ception in 1939 was attended by a few more than 500.

Mrs. Truman entertained at two teas yesterday afternoon at 4 and 5 p. m. In the evening she attended the Boston Symphony concert at Constitution Hall.

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

JAN 10 1947

PRESIDENT APPLAUDS

WASHINGTON— (AP) —President Truman stood and applauded last night in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Constitution hall.

Washington D.C. 1/10/47

President Among Notables At Koussevitzky Concert Here

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Sergei Koussevitsky

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the President, the First Lady and many notables in the capacity audience assembled in Constitution Hall last night. The eminent Russian conductor performed the usual ritual with the National Anthem in honor of the head of the nation, and then set forth with consummate art a program, which in the opinion of many, might have been improved as to choice.

Sales and Income

It must be understood, however, that great orchestras do not fare forth into the sticks—and Washington, by reason of its lack of an opera house or a great concert hall, long has been in that category—solely for the love of art. A house sold out weeks in advance by no means exhausted the business opportunities represented by this concert. There remained to be exploited the recordings which the Boston Symphony has made.

Such sales provide an important part of the annual income for many of the major orchestras. So it is their practice to select programs from the record catalogue when further away from home than New York. This was done last night when Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "Le Mer," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony comprised the list of works scheduled for performance.

It was interesting to note that it was the music of this century stimulated a reaction that far exceeded the rather restrained tributes to Mendelssohn (1833) and was heard with far greater attention than was accorded the opening movement of the Tschaikowsky work. The Mendelssohn symphonies had nearly vanished from the repertoire when Hitler's barbarisms toward the composer caused them to be revived with great vigor. The Tschaikowsky symphony has become popular. Even the bands play it many times each season.

Debussy Piece a Classic

Debussy composed his great sea poem 40 years ago. It is not a modern page. Indeed in the sense that it is music that has endured it has become a classic. It is, however, a work of great difficulty. Elusive, intangible, dependent for the realization of its beauties upon far more than mere orchestral virtuosity, it had had relatively few performances. It needs an interpreter of great great imagination and an orchestra disciplined to the most subtle nuances.

These requisites were present last night. Koussevitzky is a sensitive artist who persues beauty with unabated ardor despite his more than three score and 10 years. His orchestra has become a veritable part of his own personality. Such complete sympathy and understanding are rare in the art. When they exist one hears the kind of tonal magic that was evoked last night.

The sea with its vastness, its mystery, its power, appeared upon the tonal screen in ever changing line, color, and movement. This is, happily, no collection of imitative sound effects, but a series of moods and impressions such as it has been the peculiar prerogative of the French to suggest without labored and exact definition.

For the rest the Mendelssohn was neat, sparkling tuneful and superficial, and the Tschaikowsky appropriately gloomy and powerful with flashes of brilliance.

BEND, ORE.
BULLETIN

JAN 10 1947

TRUMANS ATTEND CONCERT

Washington, Jan. 10 (UP)—It was a night out last night for the Harry S. Trumans. The president, Mrs. Truman and their daughter Margaret, went to Constitution hall to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 10 1947

Truman Hears Boston Symphony

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded tonight in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The President's wife and daughter Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic too about the performance.

The presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.

OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

JAN 10 1947

Truman Applauds Maestro

Washington (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded Thursday night in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

JAN 10 1947

Truman Applauds Koussevitzky Concert

Washington, Jan. 9 (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded tonight in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The President's wife and daughter, whom he escorted to the concert, also were enthusiastic about the performance.

The presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JAN 10 1947

RKSHIRE MUSICIAN S GIVEN AWARD

BOSTON (AP) — The first presentation of the newly-established Boston Symphony Orchestra merit award has been made to Aaron Copeland, New York composer and member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, for his third symphony. Carrying $859 in cash this year from a fund established by Mark A. Horblit, Boston lawyer, the award is intended to recognize annually an outstanding symphonic composition by a resident of the United States.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

JAN 10 1947

Trumans Have Night Out

Washington, Jan. 10 (U.P.)—It was a night out last night for the Harry S. Trumans. The President, Mrs. Truman and their daughter, Margaret, went to Constitution Hall to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

JA

Trumans Join in Ovation to Boston Symphony

The audiance was excited even before the concert began. As if to underscore the fact that the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony at Constitution Hall last night was something of an occasion, Mr. and Mrs. Truman and daughter Margaret slipped into their seats in the presidential box just as the orchestra rose to play the "Star-Spangled Banner."

Whatever the expectations, the 3700 listeners were not disappointed. The orchestra's string sections have never sounded smoother, the woodwinds more alluring, or the brass purer. There was applause for the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony, cries of approval for Debussy's "La Mer" and an uproarious demonstration for the climactic Tschaikowsky Fourth.

It was the sort of program that required a minimum of intellectual effort so you could sit back and enjoy the sheer sensuousness of the orchestral tone. But even tho the works were familiar, Koussevitzky's approach is always fresh. He demanded and got readings as spontaneous as if the three works were having their premiere. When you can accomplish that with Tschaikowsky you are fully entitled to the shouts of acclaim that echoed thru Constitution Hall last night. M. R. B.

[73]

Trumans Join in Ovation to Boston Symphony

The audiance was excited even before the concert began. As if to underscore the fact that the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony at Constitution Hall last night was something of an occasion, Mr. and Mrs. Truman and daughter Margaret slipped into their seats in the presidential box just as the orchestra rose to play the "Star-Spangled Banner."

Whatever the expectations, the 3700 listeners were not disappointed. The orchestra's string sections have never sounded smoother, the woodwinds more alluring, or the brass purer. There was applause for the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony, cries of approval for Debussy's "La Mer" and an uproarious demonstration for the climactic Tschaikowsky Fourth.

It was the sort of program that required a minimum of intellectual effort so you could sit back and enjoy the sheer sensuousness of the orchestral tone. But even tho the works were familiar, Koussevitzky's approach is always fresh. He demanded and got readings as spontaneous as if the three works were having their premiere. When you can accomplish that with Tschaikowsky you are fully entitled to the shouts of acclaim that echoed thru Constitution Hall last night. M. R. B.

HOLDREGE, NEB.
DAILY CITIZEN

[illegible] 1947

Presidential Family At[illegible] Symphony Concert

WASHINGTON (U.P.) It was a [illegible] night for the Harry S. Tr[illegible]. The President, Mrs. Truman [illegible] daughter Margaret [illegible] Constitution Hall to [illegible] by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WICHITA, KAN.
EAGLE

JAN 10 1947

PRESIDENT AT CONCERT

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9.—(AP)—President Truman stood and applauded tonight in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra in Constitution hall. The President's wife and daughter Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic too about the performance.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 10 1947

Symphony Award to Coplan[illegible]

BOSTON, Jan. 9 (AP).—The firs[illegible] presentation of the newly estab[illegible]lished Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award was made today to Aaron Copland. New York composer and member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, for his Third Symphony. Carrying $859 in cash this year from a fund established by Mark A. Horblit, Boston lawyer, the award is intended to recognize annually an outstanding symphonic composition by a resident of the United States.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1947

Copland Wins Symphony Award

BOSTON, Jan. 9 (AP)—The first presentation of the newly established Boston Symphony Orchestra merit award was made today to Aaron Copland, New York composer and member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, for his Third Symphony.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

JAN 11 1947

DIRECTOR OF SYMPHONY IS CHEERED BY TRUMAN

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded last night in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The President's wife and daughter, Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic too about the performance.

The presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.

EVENING STAR, Washington, D. C.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1947.

Boston Symphony's Concert Is Supreme Event of Season

By Alice Eversman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Constitution Hall last night and played a program that was matchless in beauty of execution and in interpretive artistry. The concert proved to be the supreme event of the season so far, not only because of the rarity of the orchestra's visits but for the emotional excitement prevailing throughout the evening. The anticipation of the distinguished audience, headed by members of the presidential family and their guests, was to be felt on entering the hall. But the underlying current of feeling burst forth in a warmth of welcome when the conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, entered, the applause flowing over his bowing acknowledgment for several minutes.

There was not a stir among those present during the playing of the three numbers on the program but when each ended, again the tumult, filled with admiration and affection, spoke the appreciation of the thousands that filled the hall to capacity. Only on his entrance did Dr. Koussevitsky accept the reception for himself. Afterwards, the splendid body of men that responds so completely to his leadership, were beckoned to their feet to share equally in the triumph.

Dr. Koussevitsky selected three symphonic works for this program. They were arranged in a crescendo of interest from Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony" through Debussy's "La Mer" to Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 4." Only once in recent years has the Debussy work been heard here. It was on the program which the Mexican conductor, Carlos Chavez, directed as guest conductor of the National Symphony in 1940.

It is a remarkable revelation of the composer's genius and of the tone painting power of the orchestra. Never once in the three movements does the restless motion of the sea abate but continues in changing rhythm from placid charm to angry defiance of the storm winds. Upon this foundation is erected a superstructure of arabesques fashioned from the fantasies the seas have aroused in the composer. This combination shows his power at bending the great orchestral tone to his delicate imagery and at the same time, a firmness and breadth of constructive line not suspected from a composer who touched lightly and fleetingly to create his musical pictures.

In the presenting of such a work, Dr. Koussevitsky is a master. His is the most poised directing, never hurrying an effect and appreciating the value of quiet and restrain. The orchestra does not fashion a pianissimo of almost inaudible quality but it has a subdued tone of even mellowness that is richly vibrant in its reduced state. Its different ingredients, however, are the conductor's concern and they flash back and forth with magical intent at his bidding. In the kaleidoscope of colorful sound in Debussy's work, Dr. Kousevitsky keeps the pattern clear, allowing each orchestral section its opportunities and infusing the unceasing movement with a certain calmness.

These masterly characteristics were employed also in the Mendelssohn symphony. The fitnesse with which the conductor sustained the spirit of each movement, the velvetiness of tone evoked in the song-like Andante and the climatic vigor of the finale brought out the fresh and vernal quality of the music to its full appeal.

Yet as artistically conceived and reproduced as were the first numbers of the program, the summit was reached in Tschaikowsky's symphony. Here was an understanding of profound sympathy and national kindship. It was an interpretation fired with feeling, intimately aware of moods and temperamentally responsive. To thoroughly know and appreciate Tschaikowsky one needs only to hear Dr. Koussevitsky direct any of his symphonic works. Then, the vast emotion, the tremendous rebellious surges and the profound depression have a glorious meaning in a soul speaking. He made a gift to the Washington public and amply repaid its enthusiasm by his superb performance of this work.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 10 1947

Boston Symphony

Copland 3d Symphony, 'Eroica' Played at Carnegie Hall

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its second 1946-'47 visit to New York Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall, where Serge Koussevitzky conducted this admirable ensemble in two third symphonies—Aaron Copland's latest work in this form and Beethoven's "Eroica."

The Bostonians had introduced the Copland symphony to us last November, when it was played both in the Brooklyn Academy of Music and at Carnegie Hall. A noteworthy feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making is that when he presents a new work which he considers of particular consequence he gives it an introduction that is as widespread as possible. Mr. Copland's third symphony, for instance, not only has had three performances here but four in Boston and several others in this orchestra's westward tour. This is a good record for a work completed only a little more than three months ago. The symphony fully justifies Dr. Koussevitzky's desire to make it widely known. In inventiveness, emotional content, construction and orchestration it is a work of unusual consequence, and its vital and eloquent interpretation was followed by much applause for the composer, the conductor and his instrumentalists.

The "Eroica" symphony also found the conductor and orchestra in excellent form. The first movement gave, here and there, an impression of swiftness, but the interpretation as a whole was vital and expressive, with a persuasive realization of the various moods of this mighty work. The funeral march was marked by dignified eloquence, but also by a momentum which did not conflict with the essential spirit of the movement, and the close of the symphony was memorably climactic. The concert left no doubt as to the high position of this conductor and orchestra among the symphonic organizations of our day.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 10 1947

CONCERT STIRS TRUMAN

President Stands and Applauds Koussevitzky and Orchestra

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded tonight in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

The President's wife and daughter, Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, also were enthusiastic about the performance. The Presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE

[illegible] 1947

Trumans Applaud Koussevitzky

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9 (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded tonight in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitutional Hall.

The President's wife and daughter Margaret, whom he escorted to the concert, were enthusiastic, too, about the performance.

The presidential family returned to the White House immediately after the performance.

DES MOINES, IOWA
REGISTER

JAN 10 1947

Truman Stands Up To Applaud Concert

WASHINGTON, D. C. (AP)—President Truman stood and applauded Thursday night in tribute to Director Serge Koussevitzky at the conclusion of a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Constitution hall. The president's wife and daughter Margaret were enthusiastic, too, about the performance.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 11 1947

$7900 Violin Is Object of Police Search

George Zazoski will play his next concert with a strange violin while police in Washington are hunting for his $7900 Italian instrument which dates back to 1754.

He appeared at Constitution Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night. The President and his family were in the audience.

Then, he picked up his valuable violin and headed for Union Station. He is sure he had it when he got on the train.

Zazoski told the police he believed the violin was either left on the concourse at Washington Union Station or in his berth on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad's New York Night Express.

The violin, Zazoski told police, was made in Italy in 1754 by a master craftsman named "J. B. Guadagonin[illegible]."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 11 1947

CONCERTS INCREASED

BOSTON, Jan. 11.—(INS) An increase of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts from nine to 12 this year, and the inclusion of a Beethoven cycle, was announced today by Serge Koussevitzky, musical director.

There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The latter extra concert will follow a Beethoven cycle in Series B.

The Bach program, the first of the festival, will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13. The final program will be given Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10. It will be under the direction of Dr. Kousevitzky, with Aaron Copeland as assistant director.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 11 1947

CONCERTS INCREASED

Boston, Jan. 11.—(INS)—An increase of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts from nine to twelve this year, and the inclusion of a Beethoven cycle, was announced today by Serge Koussevitzky, musical director.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 11 1947

Boston Symphony Features New Works in Boro Concert

By JOHN BALL Jr.

The second concert of the season in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played last night at the Academy of Music. As is usual when this organization appears in the borough, the house was completely sold out, with only standing room available. Again, as usual, the orchestra played exceedingly well.

Musically speaking, it was definitely not pops night. Of the three works on the program two are almost never heard while the third, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," is not programmed any too often either. Dr. Koussevitzky paid the borough a distinct compliment in offering as difficult a program as he did, unrelieved by even so much as a "Hungarian Dance" to inject the note of familiarity. The large audience returned the compliment by giving genuine attention to the offerings of the evening.

First on the program was Richard Strauss' "Metamorphosen," a study for 23 solo string instruments. The work is more admirable as a technical accomplishment than as music. The instruments which participated did not play in sections as they usually do, but proceeded largely on a basis of every man for himself. Under these conditions the composer has an almost unlimited opportunity to manipulate counterpoint, structure and melodic line with a wide breadth of imagination. This Strauss has succeeded in doing, but in so doing the music was somewhat lost in the shuffle. The work is rather fatalistic in outlook, opening in a vein strongly reminiscent of Grieg's "Last Spring" and ending with a strong suggestion of the Funeral March from the "Eroica" Symphony. In between, the new opus sounds more like a technical exercise than music for its own sake.

The second offering of the evening was Martin's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Despite its title this too is a new work now being heard for the first time in America. The chamber orchestra proved to be a more than ample slice of the whole organization; only the brass was noticably absent. In addition to the regular instruments, two pianos were added for the performance

Anyone approaching this work anticipating a re-creation of the classical idiom is in for a rugged surprise. Mr. Martin's opus is dedicated to rhythm rather than to melody; the two pianos proved to be for all practical purposes a notable addition to the percussion section. The concerto is distinctly acid in character without any pronounced melodic content. It was performed very well indeed and is without doubt worthy of a further hearing. It is something which is likely to prove an acquired taste; while we are highly receptive to new and interesting works, we felt that the composer might have added a little of the musical equivalent of bicarbonate of soda to the score in the form of an even fragmentary melodic line. The performance was well received.

"Harold in Italy" which concluded the program, was given a gratifying reading. The viola soloist, Jascha Veissi, demonstrated a fine technique and a tone of exceptional beauty which he extracts from his 500-year-old instrument. During the second movement he was called upon to play long continued harmonics which offer a wide open opportunity for error. This hazard Mr. Veissi eluded completely and performed his solo role with impeccable musicianship. On the basis of his playing Friday evening the violinist is welcome back here whenever he choses to come.

WICHITA, KAN.
BEACON

JAN 12 1947

ORCHESTRA MEMBER LOSES $7,900 VIOLIN

Washington, Jan. 11. (UP)—George Zazoski of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lost a $7,900 Guadagonine violin in Union Station Thursday. Police found it in a pawnshop today. An unidentified man, no violin fancier, had pawned the 174-year-old fiddle for $12.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

JAN 12 1947

$7,900 Violin Pawned for $12

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP)—A missing violin, valued by the owner $7,900, was recovered yesterday i a pawn shop by police, who said had been pawned for $12 by a ma who gave a fictitious address.

George Zazoski, the owner, member of the Boston Symphon orchestra, told W[illegible] police he discovered the loss of the 17 year-old instrument while return ing to Boston Thursday night afte a concert in Constitution hall.

He said the violin was made i Italy in 1754 by J. S. Guadagonin

---

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 12 1947

'Holiday for Strings' Over

Lost Violin Valued at $7900 Recovered for $12 at Pawnshop

A stolen violin valued at $7900 was recovered yesterday in an Alexandria pawnshop where it had been pawned for a trifling $12.

The violin was lost Thursday night, probably at Union Station here, by George Zazoski who had appeared that night at Constitution Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Zazoski told District police his violin was worth $7900 but Irving Smith, 29, part owner of the Bonded Loan Office, 410 King st., Alexandria, made a lower evaluation.

Smith told police a man in shabby clothes brought the violin to his shop Friday afternoon.

"He wanted $15," said Smith, "but I told him I could only let him [illegible] talked for a while and I fin[illegible] to let him have $12. After all, the violin was in a nice case."

Smith picked up his Saturday morning Post and there on Page 1 was a story about police searching for [illegible] violin.

Smith [illegible] the violin, on which he had given $12. Inside he saw the name "J. B. Guadagonine," which clinched the matter. Th name was that of the master crafts man who made the violin in Ital in 1754.

Smith called Boston, trying t contact Zazoski. He talked to th violinist's sister-in-law, who to him Zazoski was in New York an that she would attempt to get th information to him.

It is a routine matter for pawn shops to furnish police with a lis of articles pledged with them When police got the list yesterda and saw that a violin had bee pawned with Smith, they made speedy trip to Alexandria.

Inspector Robert J. Barrett, chie of detectives, took $12 from the police fund and authorized Detective Sergt. Albert B. Hitt to use the money in bailing out the precious violin.

Hitt ch[illegible] name and address given [illegible] man who had pawned the violin. As he had expected, they were fictitious.

Police have wired Zazoski at Carnegie Hall in New York that his violin has been recovered. Until he claims it, it will remain under lock and key at police headquarters.

A Word on Strauss' Latest; Propaganda for Modern Music

Jan 12 Her

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The performance at the most recent Boston Symphony concerts of Richard Strauss' latest composition, "Metamorphoses," gives rise to certain extra-musical reflections to which it might be well to devote a little further discussion. The purely musical content of the work has been well summed up by the critic of the London Observer, who wrote as follows: "There is not a tune or a harmonic progression in 94 pages of score that might not have been written by Strauss 20 or 50 years ago, or for that matter by Schumann or Brahms or any late 19th century Kapellmeister. The fact remains that here is the most sustained and consistent piece of polyphonic writing that Strauss has ever given us. Half an hour is long. Fifteen minutes would have sufficed. But what technical mastery!"

Extra-musical thoughts or, perhaps better, emotions are aroused by that note in the score, "In Memoriam! Garmisch, 12 April 1945," and the sufficiently known fact that Strauss was very complacent about co-operating with and acceding to the wishes of the Nazis. In Memoriam what? Mr. Burk's program note suggests: "The date recalls the fact that American forces occupying Bavaria shortly after this date found Strauss and his family living quietly in their Alpine home at Garmisch." I hardly think that Strauss was commemorating the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt; nor is it at all likely that one would write "In Memoriam" about the entry of triumphant foreign troops into one's home town.

It seems to me that Strauss penned those words and dedicated his rather somber piece to the crumbling of the Nazi regime and the end of an era for Germany. In discussing "Metamorphoses" with people after the concert I found that many felt, as I did, a most unpleasant emotional reaction to the music. There was a certain Uriah Heepish quality about it, an attempt at one and the same time to be ingratiating towards the present and nostalgic towards the past. Anyone who has been in Germany in 1945 will know what I mean, for this mixture of self-pity with a willingness to work industriously for and take whatever can be got from the conquerors is a common attitude among Germans—or at least was in 1945. As one ex-member of our occupying Army put it to me in the lobby of Symphony Hall: "This thing reminds me of an old woman begging for a cigarette."

Technically ingenious but emotionally rotten would be my verdict on Strauss' latest score. Perhaps this is reading too much into it. At any rate it is a candid and immediate reaction. From recent memoirs and history it is becoming clearer that there is an unadmirable side to Strauss' character, that of the time-server. A personal reminiscence is not out of order here. I recollect that in Salzburg in 1934 (the year the Nazis murdered Dolfuss, the Austrian chancellor), there had been the intention of having something of a Strauss festival, with performances of some of his less well known operas and the composer himself in attendance. But the Germans, after the failure of their coup, did everything they could to sabotage the Austrian festival by not co-operating in the exchange of artists and, in particular, by inducing Strauss to absent himself from Salzburg. He did not appear, and the festival authorities retaliated by cutting out many of the Strauss works and putting on more Mozart in their place.

The point in raising this political question in the discussion of a work of art is certainly not that we should not hear Strauss' music at all. Many composers had far from admirable characters, but we do not wish their music banished from the concert hall on that account. I merely question the good taste in rushing to secure the first performance in this country of "Metamorphoses" when there is a moral issue involved and when the work itself is of technical interest only.

"MODERN MUSIC"

It is saddening to learn that the magazine, "Modern Music," is discontinuing publication in 1947. It served a most useful purpose since its beginnings back in 1924. Written mainly by composers it made intelligent propaganda for the new music of the day. Twenty years ago it was probably more needed than it is today. Public opposition to modern music is not now what it then was. Nevertheless, this yellow covered magazine will be missed. It kept one up to date and persuaded one to give a sympathetic ear to new scores. It was a case of special pleading, if you like, but it stood its own ground resolutely and readably and was a thousand times better than the dreary trade journals which survive it.

DR. LEICHTENTRITT

On the other hand, the way in which artistic propaganda should not be handled is well exemplified in the eminent Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt's little volume on Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony and the New American Music, which, for some reason, the Harvard University Press thought worth printing. This is one of those smug books of almost fulsome praise, which usually succeed only in alienating the independent reader. It belongs, save for its excursions into musical analysis, in a class with those exaggerated books on Toscanini by Paul Stefan and Lawrence Gilman which came out some ten years ago. There is no harm in the purpose of the book: to review the record of Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra in the presentation of American music. It is only the manner which Dr. Leichtentritt has seen fit to employ which is objectionable.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 12 1947

League of Composers

To Honor Koussevitzky at Modern Art Museum

The fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Koussevitzky Foundation will be observed by the League of Composers tonight at the Museum of Modern Art with a program of works commissioned by the foundation. A reception in honor of Serge Koussevitzky will follow the concert. The composers represented are William Bergsma, with his second string quartet; Alexei Haieff and Lukas Foss in works for cello and piano, and Robert Palmer with his second string quartet.

DENVER, COLO.
ROCKY MT. NEWS

JAN 12 1947

Fiddle Worth $7900 Lost; Finder Pawns It for $12

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11.—(UP)—George Zazoski of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lost a $7900 Guadagonine violin in Union Station Thursday. Police found it in a pawnshop today. An unidentified man, no violin fancier, had pawned the 174-year-old fiddle for $12.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS

JAN 13 1947

Commercials couldn't be worse? Look!

By GLENN STACKHOUSE

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 12.-(U.P.) Jack Benny's quartet notwithstanding, the great American singing commerical is destined to reach ever dizzier heights (liter- lly) in the future, according to . D. Willard Jr., executive vice- esident of the National Associa- n of Broadcasters.

The unseen audience, it seems, willing to go along with the nsor's product—if they like the e that sells it.

Hear that Mr. Proctor and Mr. mble? If you want us to use ur soap you've gotta croon that ug.

Never mind telling us what won- rs it will do for our dainty un- erthings. You just set it to mu- c and we'll buy it.

The singing commercial, says illard, is rapidly achieving the tus of an American institution —like Bing Crosby and the hot dog. In fact they've even crashed he classics.

No fooling. The ultra-dignified Boston Symphony Orchestra re- cently gave Bach and Beethoven the go-by and dreamed up a symphonic presentation composed entirely of singing commercial tunes.

nd that cute Pan American ddler—Chiquita Banana— sical sponsor plu n the hit

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 13 1947

STRAUSS SCORE GIVEN

What Richard Strauss meant by the title "Metamorphosen"—"Metamorphoses"—is anybody's guess. Played on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, the work received its first New York performance. Subtitled "Study for Twenty-three Solo String Instruments," it dates from 1945. If nothing else, it affirms Strauss's undisputed knowledge of orchestral balance. Working with so limited a medium as twenty-three strings, the composer achieved clarity in complexity, with a texture that was clean and logical despite the interweaving of many melodic parts.

"Reminiscenes" might be a more suitable title for a work that uses a cadence for the "Funeral March" of Beethoven's "Eroica," echoes of Wagner's "Meistersinger" and "Siegfried Idyll," and suggestions of the composer's own "Tod und Verklaerung." Not until the middle of the work was there a whisper of the familiar Strauss, and then it was a weary whisper.

Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra had the assistance of Bernard Zighera and Lukas Foss at two pianos. The "chamber orchestra" in this case consisted of the normal complement of the Boston Symphony less brass and percussion. Bright, fast-moving, and bracing, this is a clever work written with superior craftsmanship that makes the best of its limited material. Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" followed with Jascha Veissi, solo violinist, joining with Koussevitzky to give a stunning performance of this romantic upheaval.

H. C. S.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 13 1947

Composers Pay Tribute to Koussevitzky

Boston Conductor Honored at New York Reception

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and musical director of the Berkshire Festival, was paid a tribute by the League of Composers last night at a reception and concert in his honor at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. Among the new compositions on the program was a capriccio by Lukas Foss played by Eric Icor Kahn and Benar Heifetz. Mr. Foss was in the audience to acknowledge the applause which followed the performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky was introduced by Aaron Copland. In a prepared address the Boston conductor recalled how he had been met at the pier by a swarm of newspaper reporters when he first arrived in America in 1924. Their first question was "How do you like jazz?" He said that at that time he [illegible] not answer because he did not know jazz. He countered with a question: "Tell me who are your rising young composers? I know the older ones." No one of the reporters could inform him. They suggested "Gershwin," but Koussevitzky knew Gershwin. He continued by pointing out his interest in young composers has never lagged and that he considered the cultivation and encouragement of aspiring young composers one of the most sure ways of establishing a national music foundation.

One of the first to greet Dr. Koussevitzky after the concert was Igor Stravinsky who benefited so much by the honored guest's interest back in the days immediately following World War I when the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris were such a force for the rev[illegible]cation of European music and the encouragement of European composers.

SPONSOR PLANS SCHOLARSHIPS

JOHN HANCOCK Mutual Life Insurance Co. to award scholarships for m[illegible] study at Tanglewood, Mass., to serious [illegible] musicians. Details to be announced on broadcast of Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by [illegible] company on ABC Wednesday [illegible] ing Jan. 21.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 11 1947

Boston Symphony Features New Works in Boro Concert

By JOHN BALL Jr.

The second concert of the season in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played last night at the Academy of Music. As is usual when this organization appears in the borough, the house was completely sold out, with only standing room available. Again, as usual, the orchestra played exceedingly well.

Musically speaking, it was definitely not pops night. Of the three works on the program two are almost never heard while the third, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," is not programmed any too often either. Dr. Koussevitzky paid the borough a distinct compliment in offering as difficult a program as he did, unrelieved by even so much as a "Hungarian Dance" to inject the note of familiarity. The large audience returned the compliment by giving genuine attention to the offerings of the evening.

First on the program was Richard Strauss' "Metamorphosen," a study for 23 solo string instruments. The work is more admirable as a technical accomplishment than as music. The instruments which participated did not play in sections as they usually do, but proceeded largely on a basis of every man for himself. Under these conditions the composer has an almost unlimited opportunity to manipulate counterpoint, structure and melodic line with a wide breadth of imagination. This Strauss has succeeded in doing, but in so doing the music was somewhat lost in the shuffle. The work is rather fatalistic in outlook, opening in a vein strongly reminiscent of Grieg's "Last Spring" and ending with a strong suggestion of the Funeral March from the "Eroica" Symphony. In between, the new opus sounds more like a technical exercise than music for its own sake.

The second offering of the evening was Martin's "Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." Despite its title this too is a new work now being heard for the first time in America. The chamber orchestra proved to be a more than ample slice of the whole organization; only the brass was noticably absent. In addition to the regular instruments, two pianos were added for the performance.

Anyone approaching this work anticipating a re-creation of the classical idiom is in for a rugged surprise. Mr. Martin's opus is dedicated to rhythm rather than to melody; the two pianos proved to be for all practical purposes a notable addition to the percussion section. The concerto is distinctly acid in character without any pronounced melodic content. It was performed very well indeed and is without doubt worthy of a further hearing. It is something which is likely to prove an acquired taste; while we are highly receptive to new and interesting works, we felt that the composer might have added a little of the musical equivalent of bicarbonate of soda to the score in the form of an even fragmentary melodic line. The performance was well received.

"Harold in Italy" which concluded the program, was given a gratifying reading. The viola soloist, Jascha Veissi, demonstrated a fine technique and a tone of exceptional beauty which he extracts from his 500-year-old instrument. During the second movement he was called upon to play long continued harmonics which offer a wide open opportunity for error. This hazard Mr. Veissi eluded completely and performed his solo role with impeccable musicianship. On the basis of his playing Friday evening the violinist is welcome back hera whenever he choses to come.

A Word on Strauss' Latest; Propaganda for Modern Music

Jan 12 Her

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The performance at the most recent Boston Symphony concerts of Richard Strauss' latest composition, "Metamorphoses," gives rise to certain extra-musical reflections to which it might be well to devote a little further discussion. The purely musical content of the work has been well summed up by the critic of the London Observer, who wrote as follows: "There is not a tune or a harmonic progression in 94 pages of score that might not have been written by Strauss 20 or 50 years ago, or for that matter by Schumann or Brahms or any late 19th century Kapellmeister. The fact remains that here is the most sustained and consistent piece of polyphonic writing that Strauss has ever given us. Half an hour is long. Fifteen minutes would have sufficed. But what technical mastery!"

Extra-musical thoughts or, perhaps better, emotions are aroused by that note in the score, "In Memoriam! Garmisch, 12 April 1945," and the sufficiently known fact that Strauss was very complacent about co-operating with and acceding to the wishes of the Nazis. In Memoriam what? Mr. Burk's program note suggests: "The date recalls the fact that American forces occupying Bavaria shortly after this date found Strauss and his family living quietly in their Alpine home at Garmisch." I hardly think that Strauss was commemorating the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt; nor is it at all likely that one would write "In Memoriam" about the entry of triumphant foreign troops into one's home town.

It seems to me that Strauss penned those words and dedicated his rather somber piece to the crumbling of the Nazi regime and the end of an era for Germany. In discussing "Metamorphoses" with people after the concert I found that many felt, as I did, a most unpleasant emotional reaction to the music. There was a certain Uriah Heepish quality about it, an attempt at one and the same time to be ingratiating towards the present and nostalgic towards the past. Anyone who has been in Germany in 1945 will know what I mean, for this mixture of self-pity with a willingness to work industriously for and take whatever can be got from the conquerors is a common attitude among Germans—or at least was in 1945. As one ex-member of our occupying Army put it to me in the lobby of Symphony Hall: "This thing reminds me of an old woman begging for a cigarette."

Technically ingenious but emotionally rotten would be my verdict on Strauss' latest score. Perhaps this is reading too much into it. At any rate it is a candid and immediate reaction. From recent memoirs and history it is becoming clearer that there is an unadmirable side to Strauss' character, that of the time-server. A personal reminiscence is not out of order here. I recollect that in Salzburg in 1934 (the year the Nazis murdered Dolfuss, the Austrian chancellor), there had been the intention of having something of a Strauss festival, with performances of some of his less well known operas and the composer himself in attendance. But the Germans, after the failure of their coup, did everything they could to sabotage the Austrian festival by not co-operating in the exchange of artists and, in particular, by inducing Strauss to absent himself from Salzburg. He did not appear, and the festival authorities retaliated by cutting out many of the Strauss works and putting on more Mozart in their place.

The point in raising this political question in the discussion of a work of art is certainly not that we should not hear Strauss' music at all. Many composers had far from admirable characters, but we do not wish their music banished from the concert hall on that account. I merely question the good taste in rushing to secure the first performance in this country of "Metamorphoses" when there is a moral issue involved and when the work itself is of technical interest only.

"MODERN MUSIC"

It is saddening to learn that the magazine, "Modern Music," is discontinuing publication in 1947. It served a most useful purpose since its beginnings back in 1924. Written mainly by composers it made intelligent propaganda for the new music of the day. Twenty years ago it was probably more needed than it is today. Public opposition to modern music is not now what it then was. Nevertheless, this yellow covered magazine will be missed. It kept one up to date and persuaded one to give a sympathetic ear to new scores. It was a case of special pleading, if you like, but it stood its own ground resolutely and readably and was a thousand times better than the dreary trade journals which survive it.

DR. LEICHTENTRITT

On the other hand, the way in which artistic propaganda should not be handled is well exemplified in the eminent Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt's little volume on Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony and the New American Music, which, for some reason, the Harvard University Press thought worth printing. This is one of those smug books of almost fulsome praise, which usually succeed only in alienating the independent reader. It belongs, save for its excursions into musical analysis, in a class with those exaggerated books on Toscanini by Paul Stefan and Lawrence Gilman which came out some ten years ago. There is no harm in the purpose of the book: to review the record of Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra in the presentation of American music. It is only the manner which Dr. Leichtentritt has seen fit to employ which is objectionable.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 13 1947

STRAUSS SCORE GIVEN

What Richard Strauss meant by the title "Metamorphosen"—"Metamorphoses"—is anybody's guess. Played on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, the work received its first New York performance. Subtitled "Study for Twenty-three Solo String Instruments," it dates from 1945. If nothing else, it affirms Strauss's undisputed knowledge of orchestral balance. Working with so limited a medium as twenty-three strings, the composer achieved clarity in complexity, with a texture that was clean and logical despite the interweaving of many melodic parts.

"Reminiscenes" might be a more suitable title for a work that uses a cadence for the "Funeral March" of Beethoven's "Eroica," echoes of Wagner's "Meistersinger" and "Siegfried Idyll," and suggestions of the composer's own "Tod und Verklaerung." Not until the middle of the work was there a whisper of the familiar Strauss, and then it was a weary whisper.

Martinu's Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra had the assistance of Bernard Zighera and Lukas Foss at two pianos. The "chamber orchestra" in this case consisted of the normal complement of the Boston Symphony less brass and percussion. Bright, fast-moving, and bracing, this is a clever work written with superior craftsmanship that makes the best of its limited material. Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" followed with Jascha Veissi, solo violinist, joining with Koussevitzky to give a stunning performance of this romantic upheaval.

H. C. S.

WICHITA, KAN.
BEACON

JAN 12 1947

ORCHESTRA MEMBER LOSES $7,900 VIOLIN

Washington, Jan. 11. (UP)—George Zazoski of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lost a $7,900 Guadagonine violin in Union Station Thursday. Police found it in a pawnshop today. An unidentified man, no violin fancier, had pawned the 174-year-old fiddle for $12.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

JAN 12 1947

$7,900 Violin Pawned for $12

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP)—A missing violin, valued by the owner [illegible] $7,900, was recovered yesterday [illegible] a pawn shop by police, who said [illegible] had been pawned for [illegible] by a ma[illegible] who [illegible] a fictitious address.

George Zazoski, the owner, [illegible] member of the Boston Symphon[illegible] orchestra, told [illegible] he discovered the loss [illegible] the 17[illegible] year-old instrument while retur[illegible] ing to Boston Thursday night afte[illegible] a concert in Constitution hall.

He said the violin was made [illegible] Italy in 1754 by J. S. Guadagonin[illegible]

WASHIN[illegible]
[illegible]

[illegible] 2 1947

'Holiday for Strings' Over

Lost Violin Valued at $7900 Recovered for $12 at Pawnshop

A stolen violin valued at $7900 was recovered yesterday in an Alexandria pawnshop where it had been pawned for a trifling $12.

The violin was lost Thursday night, probably at Union Station here, by George Zazoski who had appeared that night at Constitution Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Zazoski told District police his violin was worth $7900 but Irving Smith, 29, part owner of the Bonded Loan Office, 410 King st., Alexandria, made a lower evaluation.

Smith told police a man in shabby clothes brought the violin to his shop Friday afternoon.

"He wanted $15," said Smith, "but I told him I could only let him [illegible] talked for a while and I fin[illegible] to let him have $12. [illegible] the violin was in a nice [illegible]

Smith [illegible] his Saturday morning [illegible] on Page [illegible] was [illegible] police search-ing for [illegible]

Smith [illegible] the violin [illegible] which he had given $12. Inside he saw the name "J. B. Guadagonine," which clinched the matter. The name was that of the master craftsman who made the violin in Ital[illegible] in 1754.

Smith called Boston, trying [illegible] contact Zazoski. He talked to th[illegible] violinist's sister-in-law, who tol[illegible] him Zazoski was in New York an[illegible] that she would attempt to get th[illegible] information to him.

It is a routine matter for pawn shops to furnish police with a lis[illegible] of articles pledged with them. When police got the list yesterday and saw that a violin had been pawned with Smith, they made [illegible] speedy trip to Alexandria.

Inspector Robert J. Barrett, chief of detectives, took $12 from the police fund and authorized Detective Sergt. Albert B. Hitt to use the money in bailing out the precious violi[illegible]

Hitt [illegible] and address given [illegible] man who had pawned the violin. As he had expected, they were fictitious.

Police have wired Zazoski at Carnegie Hall in New York that hi[illegible] violin has been recovered. Until he claims it, it will remain under lock and key at police headquarters.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
[illegible]BUNE

League of Composers

To Honor Koussevitzky at Modern Art Museum

The fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Koussevitzky Foundation will be observed by the League of Composers tonight at the Museum of Modern Art with a program of works commissioned by the foundation. A reception in honor of Serge Koussevitzky will follow the concert. The composers represented are William Bergsma, with his second string quartet; Alexei Haieff and Lukas Foss in works for cello and piano, and Robert Palmer with his second string quartet.

DENVER, COLO.
ROCKY MT. NEWS

JAN 12 1947

Fiddle Worth $7900 Lost; Finder Pawns It for $12

WASHINGTON, Jan. 11—(UP)—George Zazoski of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lost a $7900 Guadagonine violin in Union Station Thursday. Police found it in a pawnshop today. An unidentified man, no violin fancier, had pawned the 174-year-old fiddle for $12.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS

[illegible] 1947

Commercials couldn't be worse? Look!

By GLENN STACKHOUSE

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 12.—(UP) Jack Benny's quartet notwithstanding, the great American singing commerical is destined to reach ever dizzier heights (literally) in the future, according to . D. Willard Jr., executive vice-esident of the National Association of Broadcasters.

The unseen audience, it seems, willing to go along with the onsor's product—if they like the s that sells it.

Hear that Mr. Proctor and Mr. amble? If you want us to use ur soap you've gotta croon that ug.

Never mind telling us what wonrs it will do for our dainty unerthings. You just set it to muc and we'll buy it.

The singing commercial, says illard, is rapidly achieving the tus of an American institution —like Bing Crosby and the hot dog. In fact they've even crashed he classics.

No fooling. The ultra-dignified Bo[illegible] Symphony Orchestra recently gave Bach and Beethoven the go-by and dreamed up a symphonic presentation composed entirely of singing commercial tunes. [illegible] that cute Pan American [illegible] Chiquita Banana—[illegible] sponsor plu[illegible]

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 13 1947

Composers Pay Tribute to Koussevitzky

Boston Conductor Honored at New York Reception

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and musical director of the Berkshire Festival, was paid a tribute by the League of Composers last night at a reception and concert in his honor at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. Among the new compositions on the program was a capriccio by Lukas Foss played by Eric Icor Kahn and Benar Heifetz. Mr. Foss was in the audience to acknowledge the applause which followed the performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky was introduced by Aaron Copland. In a prepared address the Boston conductor recalled how he had been met at the pier by a swarm of newspaper reporters when he first arrived in America in 1924. Their first question was "How do you like jazz." He said that at that time he could not answer because he did not know jazz. He countered with a question: "Tell me who are your rising young composers? I know the older ones." No one of the reporters could inform him. They suggested "Gershwin," but Koussevitzky knew Gershwin. He continued by pointing out how his interest in young composers has never lagged and that he considered the cultivation and encouragement of aspiring young composers one of the most sure ways of establishing a national music foundation.

One of the first to greet Dr. Koussevitzky after the concert was Igor Stravinsky who benefited so much by the honored guest's interest back in the days immediately following World War I when the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris were such a force for the revivification of European music and the encouragement of European composers.

SPONSOR PLANS SCHOLARSHIPS

JOHN HANCOCK Mutual Life Insurance Co. [illegible] to award scholarships for music [illegible] Tanglewood, Mass., to serious m[illegible] tails to be announced on broadcas[illegible] Symphony Orchestra, sponsored [illegible] company on ABC Wednesday e[illegible] ing Jan. 21.

1/13/47

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 14 1947

Composers League

Kousseritzky Is Honored in Chamber Music Concert

LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS, concert at the Museum of Modern Art in honor of Serge Koussevitzky and the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Assisting artists: the Walden String Quartet [illegible] Bernar Heifetz [illegible] Pro- [illegible] by the Kous- [illegible]
[illegible] ....William Bergsma
Second String Quartet ....Alexei Haieff
[illegible] .... Lukas Foss
[illegible] ....Robert Palmer
Second String Quartet

By Arthur V. Berger

The League of Composers playing host to Serge Koussevitzky Sunday night in the auditorium of the Museum of Modern Art was in the nature of a reunion of two important and gratifying forces in the dissemination of contemporary music, and American music in particular. More than twenty years ago, as he reminisced in a brief talk after the intermission, Mr. Koussevitzky had conducted concerts for the league soon after his arrival here and shortly after the organization's inception. Sunday he was honored as a non-participating guest, from the performance angle at least—a guest whose presence was acknowledged by a display of some of his beneficences. Five years ago, in memory of his wife, he established the Koussevitzky Foundation to consolidate his activities on behalf of American composers. While most of the works commissioned by the foundation are orchestral, and duly find their way into the repertory of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, some have been chamber works. And these were deployed last night, most of them for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his advisers have a flair for searching out the cream of American talent and four of the younger members of this category were represented. As programs of young composers go, this was a superior evening. But once this much has been granted I should like to voice a certain impatience with the academism that manifested itself in the two quartets that consumed the major part of the evening. William Bergsma is a fine craftsman and Robert Palmer has come upon inspirations that are energetic, original and tricky. But the cello works by Alexei Haieff and Lukas Foss, each little over five minutes in length, seemed to have a much better sense of music as an entity in time, as a dramatic progression of changing values in a fluid temporal continuum.

I must qualify my remarks by indicating that I was able to hear only a lengthy first movement and part of the second in the Palmer. But in what I heard of his music, he develops motives arduously along the worn-out lines (fugatos and all) in a desire to achieve unity over a broad span. If he did so with more distinction than Mr. Bergsma, he fell into some of the same predictable successions, and he kept on driving his points long after their relevancy was apprehended.

Mr. Haieff is the most spontaneous, least pretentious and, as craftsman, the most suave and imaginative of last night's composers. He is one of Stravinsky's most notable heirs, and, as a Russian by parentage, legitimately so. Mr. Foss needs more selectivity in weeding out the routine from his inspirations—such routine, for example, as the etude-like figures he gave the cello Sunday.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 15 1947

CONDUCTOR ANNOUNCES MUSIC SCHOLARSHIPS

Boston, Jan. 15 — A series of scholarships for study at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival and Summer center of activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston. The scholarships will be awarded by John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company which takes over sponsorship of the WJZ broadcasts of the orchestra Jan. 21.

The purpose of the awards, according to officials of the company, is to encourage musicians with high standards "in the pursuit of their chosen profession."

Dr. Koussevitzky recently received a 1946 New York Newspaper Guild Award for establishing the annual Festival of American Music.

Details of the scholarship plan will be announced during the first WJZ broadcast under the new sponsorship.

Valued Violin Recovered

Washing Pt 1/14/47

Post Staff Photo

SWEET TUNE—George Zazoski, Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist, plays his $7900 violin which disappeared Thursday and later found by District detectives in a pawn shop. The instrument had been pawned for $12. Zazoski is shown giving an impromptu concert for the detectives at Police Headquarters last night. (Story on Page B-1)

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 15 1947

Boston Symphony Heard in Concert

Under the guest leadership of the great Viennese classicist, Bruno Walter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~last night at Bushnell Memorial~~ gave a warmingly Viennese performance without losing one iota of its fabulous precision and clarity and virtuosity.

You could stand in the Prater and almost throw the figurative stone to each of the several spots from which the program material stemmed, to Haydn's Esterhaz, to the aesthetic environs of Richard Strauss' early inspirations and to the Portchach of Brahms' Second Symphony.

* * *

THIS CALM visionary seemed so to inspire the Bostonians that, whereas they have always been able to astonish us with their technical perfection, they now carried us away on a tide of eloquence at once human and veracious. The players applauded their leader spontaneously and heartily. A great orchestra, regularly under anointed leadership, was sojourning with a great leader and they had found common ground. This is by no means an implicit chemistry.

The hot-blooded poetry of Don Juan was the climax of this wonder-working. It was as though that vaulting, proclamative opening page was for the first time being hurled in the face of a fagged and unsuspecting world. Walter has this recreative touch in the highest degree. He combed out of this dramatic work the suggestions of rhetoric, the recurrent vestiges of commonness and gave it a conviction and urgency not to be denied.

* * *

THE OXFORD Symphony had a simple honesty rather than exquisitness and an abiding songfulness. Walter's rapid tempi were relaxed but effervescent.

He gave a sense of elevation to the Brahm's Symphony which kept it buoyant in spite of an unusually deliberate pace. It seems as though he can suspend music in mid-air. No one shall ever forget the closing pages of the first movement which fell like a benediction upon the scenic and philosophical felicities of this idyllic symphony.

Even the "Tragic" Overture had a Viennese sobriety and thoughtfulness far removed from pessimism or morbidness.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is an instrument of tremendous power and delicate adjustment; only the most skillful and understanding of leaders can successfully play upon it. That we heard one of the most memorable concerts of the Bushnell series is a tribute to the mastery and artistry of Bruno Walter.

C.E.L.

The Lost Chord?

Violin Found, Owner Plays For Police

(Picture on Page 1.)

An impromptu concert on a $7900 violin was provided police at headquarters last night as a finale to the recovery of the violin in a pawn shop.

And for it all, George Zazoski received a fat tangerine—and, of course, the mellowed appreciation of a hardbitten audience.

Zazoski's 200-year-old instrument was found Saturday in an Alexandria loan office where it had been pawned for $12. The instrument was lost Thursday night following a concert at Constitution Hall.

When Zazoski first saw the violin case in General Assignment squad last night, he exclaimed, "That's not my violin."

Zipper Cover Missing

However, after the case was opened and Zazoski looked at the violin inside, he explained that he didn't recognize the case because its usual canvas zipper cover was missing.

The virtuoso went over the ancient instrument inch by inch, breathing on it gently and polishing its surface with a handkerchief. He moaned over several fresh scratches on the back of the violin.

Zazoski plucked the strings lovingly and expressed indignation over the mere $12 the fiddle had brought in a pawn shop.

Values Bow at $400

"The bow alone is worth $400," he exclaimed angrily.

Then the musician, who plays in Koussevitsky's Boston Symphony Orchestra, gripped the violin with his chin and played a short concert—"Turkey in the Straw," "Danny Boy," and a tune which music experts of the police and press failed to recognize.

After he finished, Zazoski was given a tangerine by fruit peddler John A. Charles, 64, who said he used to play the violin as a boy in Olympia, Greece.

The musician slipped the tangerine in his pocket and dashed off to catch a plane for Boston where he said his violin would be placed in the hands of a specialist for a complete checkup.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

JAN 14 1947

Bruno Walter conducts the Boston Symphony in Brahms' Tragic Overture and Second Symphony in D Major, 8:30 p.m., WINN.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

JAN 15 1947

Boston Symphony Concerts Get New Sponsor

Beginning Tuesday, Jan. 21, the regular weekly radio concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be sponsored by the John Hancock Insurance company of Boston.

The inaugural broadcast will originate from Boston's Symphony Hall and will be heard in Houston over station KXYZ at 7:30 p. m., an hour earlier than the present time for the program.

Under Bruno Walter, the opening program will offer the Prometheus overture, by Beethoven; Haydon's Symphony in G Major, No. 92, and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Strauss.

Bruce Patterson, general agent of the insurance company in Houston sees in the new arrangement a gesture to the growing musical culture of the nation.

"The sponsorship of the Boston orchestra's radio concerts indicates our company's awareness of the fact that great music is now an indispensable part of good living in America," he said. "We are most happy that we can furnish this service to music lovers of Houston, whose support of our own orchestra has given this city a significant place in the nation's musical life."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 14 1947

Composers League

Koussevitzky Is Honored in Chamber Music Concert

LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS, concert at the Museum of Modern Art in honor of Serge Koussevitzky and the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky M[illegible] Foundation. Assisting artists: the Walden String Quartet (in residence at Cornell University); Bernar Heifetz, [illegible] Frederick Kahn, pianist. Program of works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation:

[illegible] String Quartet........William Bergsma
[illegible]........Alexei Haieff
[illegible]........Lukas Foss
[illegible]........Robert Palmer
[illegible] String Quartet

By Arthur V. Berger

The League of Composers playing host to Serge Koussevitzky Sunday night in the auditorium of the Museum of Modern Art was in the nature of a reunion of two important and gratifying forces in the dissemination of contemporary music, and American music in particular. More than twenty years ago, as he reminisced in a brief talk after the intermission, Mr. Koussevitzky had conducted concerts for the league soon after his arrival here and shortly after the organization's inception. Sunday he was honored as a non-participating guest, from the performance angle at least—a guest whose presence was acknowledged by a display of some of his beneficences. Five years ago, in memory of his wife, he established the Koussevitzky Foundation to consolidate his activities on behalf of American composers. While most of the works commissioned by the foundation are orchestral, and duly find their way into the repertory of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, some have been chamber works. And these were deployed last night, most of them for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his advisers have a flair for searching out the cream of American talent and four of the younger members of this category were represented. As programs of young composers go, this was a superior evening. But once this much has been granted I should like to voice a certain impatience with the academism that manifested itself in the two quartets that consumed the major part of the evening. William Bergsma is a fine craftsman and Robert Palmer has come upon inspirations that are energetic, original and tricky. But the cello works by Alexei Haieff and Lukas Foss, each little over five minutes in length, seemed to have a much better sense of music as an entity in time, as a dramatic progression of changing values in a fluid temporal continuum.

I must qualify my remarks by indicating that I was able to hear only a lengthy first movement and part of the second in the Palmer. But in what I heard of his music, he develops motives arduously along the worn-out lines (fugatos and all) in a desire to achieve unity over a broad span. If he did so with more distinction than Mr. Bergsma, he fell into some of the same predictable successions, and he kept on driving his points long after their relevancy was apprehended.

Mr. Haieff is the most spontaneous, least pretentious and, as craftsman, the most suave and imaginative of last night's composers. He is one of Stravinsky's most notable heirs, and, as a Russian by parentage, legitimately so. Mr. Foss needs more selectivity in weeding out the routine from his inspirations—such routine, for example, as the etude-like figures he gave the cello Sunday.

Valued Violin Recovered

Washing Po 1/14/47

Post Staff Photo

SWEET TUNE—George Zazoski, Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist, plays his $7900 violin which disappeared Thursday and later found by District detectives in a pawn shop. The instrument had been pawned for $12. Zazoski is shown giving an impromptu concert for the detectives at Police Headquarters last night. (Story on Page B-1)

The Lost Chord?

Violin Found, Owner Plays For Police

(Picture on Page 1.)

An impromptu concert on a $7900 violin was provided police at headquarters last night as a finale to the recovery of the violin in a pawn shop.

And for it all, George Zazoski received a fat tangerine—and, of course, the mellowed appreciation of a hardbitten audience.

Zazoski's 200-year-old instrument was found Saturday in an Alexandria loan office where it had been pawned for $12. The instrument was lost Thursday night following a concert at Constitution Hall.

When Zazoski first saw the violin case in General Assignment squad last night, he exclaimed, "That's not my violin."

Zipper Cover Missing

However, after the case was opened and Zazoski looked at the violin inside, he explained that he didn't recognize the case because its usual canvas zipper cover was missing.

The virtuoso went over the ancient instrument inch by inch, breathing on it gently and polishing its surface with a handkerchief. He moaned over several fresh scratches on the back of the violin.

Zazoski plucked the strings lovingly and expressed indignation over the mere $12 the fiddle had brought in a pawn shop.

Values Bow at $400

"The bow alone is worth $400," he exclaimed angrily.

Then the musician, who plays in Koussevitsky's Boston Symphony Orchestra, gripped the violin with his chin and played a short concert—"Turkey in the Straw," "Danny Boy," and a tune which music experts of the police and press failed to recognize.

After he finished, Zazoski was given a tangerine by fruit peddler John A. Charles, 64, who said he used to play the violin as a boy in Olympia, Greece.

The musician slipped the tangerine in his pocket and dashed off to catch a plane for Boston where he said his violin would be placed in the hands of a specialist for a complete checkup.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 15 1947

Boston Symphony Heard in Concert

Under the guest leadership of the great Viennese classicist, Bruno Walter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last ~~night at Bushnell Memorial~~ gave a warmingly Viennese performance without losing one iota of its fabulous precision and clarity and virtuosity.

You could stand in the Prater and almost throw the figurative stone to each of the several spots from which the program material stemmed, to Haydn's Esterhaz, to the aesthetic environs of Richard Strauss' early inspirations and to the Portchach of Brahms' Second Symphony.

* * *

THIS CALM visionary seemed so to inspire the Bostonians that, whereas they have always been able to astonish us with their technical perfection, they now carried us away on a tide of eloquence at once human and veracious. The players applauded their leader spontaneously and heartily. A great orchestra, regularly under anointed leadership, was sojourning with a great leader and they had found common ground. This is by no means an implicit chemistry.

The hot-blooded poetry of Don Juan was the climax of this wonder-working. It was as though that vaulting, proclamative opening page was for the first time being hurled in the face of a fagged and unsuspecting world. Walter has this recreative touch in the highest degree. He combed out of this dramatic work the suggestions of rhetoric, the recurrent vestiges of commonness and gave it a conviction and urgency not to be denied.

* * *

THE OXFORD Symphony had a simple honesty rather than exquisitness and an abiding songfulness. Walter's rapid tempi were relaxed but effervescent.

He gave a sense of elevation to the Brahm's Symphony which kept it buoyant in spite of an unusually deliberate pace. It seems as though he can suspend music in mid-air. No one shall ever forget the closing pages of the first movement which fell like a benediction upon the scenic and philosophical felicities of this idyllic symphony.

Even the "Tragic" Overture had a Viennese sobriety and thoughtfulness far removed from pessimism or morbidness.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is an instrument of tremendous power and delicate adjustment; only the most skillful and understanding of leaders can successfully play upon it. That we heard one of the most memorable concerts of the Bushnell series is a tribute to the mastery and artistry of Bruno Walter.

C.E.L.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

JAN 14 1947

Bruno Walter conducts the Boston Symphony in Brahms' Tragic Overture and Second Symphony in D Major, 8:30 p.m., WINN.

HO[illegible]

[illegible]N 15 1947

Boston Symphony Concerts Get New Sponsor

Beginning Tuesday, Jan. 21, the regular weekly radio concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be sponsored by the John Hancock Insurance company of Boston.

The inaugural broadcast will originate from Boston's Symphony Hall and will be heard in Houston over station KXYZ at 7:30 p. m., an hour earlier than the present time for the program.

Under Bruno Walter, the opening program will offer the Prometheus overture, by Beethoven; Haydon's Symphony in G Major, No. 92, and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Strauss.

Bruce Patterson, general agent of the insurance company in Houston sees in the new arrangement a gesture to the growing musical culture of the nation.

"The [illegible] of the Boston orchestra's radio concerts indicates our company's awareness of the fact that great music is now an indispensable part of good living in America," he said. "We are most happy that we can furnish this service to music lovers of Houston, whose support of our own orchestra has given this city a significant place in the nation's musical life."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 15 1947

CONDUCTOR ANNOUNCES MUSIC SCHOLARSHIPS

Boston, Jan. 15 — A series of scholarships for study at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival and Summer center of activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston. The scholarships will be awarded by John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company which takes over sponsorship of the WJZ broadcasts of the orchestra Jan. 21.

The purpose of the awards, according to officials of the company, is to encourage musicians with high standards "in the pursuit of their chosen profession."

Dr. Koussevitzky recently received a 1946 New York Newspaper Guild Award for establishing the annual Festival of American Music.

Details of the scholarship plan will be announced during the first WJZ broadcast under the new sponsorship.

Walter Here As Conductor Of Symphony

1-15-47

Haydn, Strauss and Brahms Are Offered By Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Bruno Walter as conductor, was presented in concert at the Bushnell Memorial Auditorium Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony No. 92, G Major	Haydn
Don Juan	Strauss
Tragic Overture	Brahms
Symphony No. 2, D Major	Brahms

The concert which Bruno Walter conducted here last night earned him as near an ovation as any musician has received in this city in a long time. It was in fact a little hard to compute whether the audience or the members of the Boston Symphony themselves more lavishly applauded him. A smallish man, kindly and unassuming off the podium and riant-faced like the Koussevitzky he replaced, he became compact of intense fervors once he began music-making, with a fine disdain for the strict formalities of time-beating, a habit of swapping his baton from one hand to the other and of carving the shape of the performance on the air with both arms.

The music which Mr. Walter evoked from a lush program was the epitome of German romanticism at its best. It was full of a rich poetry and with a heart, a great big heart for anything. It was indelibly Germanic from the tenderness of the Haydn to the gaudy drama of the Strauss, and the Brahms palpitated like a bosom. And there was an inescapable air of authenticity about it. There are other ways of interpreting these works, ways perhaps more saving for greater calm, more reserve, but as Mr. Walter set them out one had to agree the readings were undeniably what the composers had in soul.

Highly Personal Readings.

In detail, however, Mr. Walters' interpretations were highly personal. Many passages last night were read and played so completely differently that they sounded almost novel here. Mr. Walter has a loving heart for the sensitive and delicate measure, the shy and hidden detail, and an adoring ear for the caressing melodic statement. In each work he started off as if stoutly determined to play it for the main, over-all effect, but in each work he soon s[illegible] some blue flower by the ways which he must nuture with special pains. And in many instance the result, as far as the particular section of the music went, was ravishingly beautiful.

But in many instances too, the movement as a whole was so pulled out of perspective, the impetus was so let down, the direction of the music so lost, that one wondered whether Mr. Walter would ever be able to find his way back to the main road again. Nor did the lingering tempi help the players much, and in fact there were frequent passages where one held one's breath for fear that the performance itself would break. This was especially true in the Brahms symphony where the men were accustomed to the free, galleon sweep of Dr. Koussevitzky's readings, and it was almost more due to the tenacity of the players than to Mr. Walter that nothing actually fell apart.

Beauty By Episodes.

Yet, despite this fault, and it was a rather large and precarious fault, Mr. Walter provided an eveningful of remarkably beautiful music. It was rather necessary to view it as made up of many handsome episodes rather than as a whole, showy mansion, but the beauty was certainly there and the hearty enthusiasms of the listeners and the players were well-founded. Fussy though the adagio of the Haydn was, it had a myriad exquisite fragments, and the closing section tripped along with marvelous warm delicacy. From the Strauss Mr. Walter drew endless measures of magnificent orchestration only too often lost in the giddy rush and emotional goings-on which many conductors impart to "Don Juan." The deviations in the Brahms were the hardest to accept, but again the rich, inventive, ever-poetic passages made up a long way for the architechtural grandeurs lacking as a whole.

The individual virtuosi of the orchestra played with striking skill and beauty last night. They had to, to perform the details as Mr. Walter wanted them, and the conductor encouraged each one anxiously and with pleasure. But the overall magnificence of the Boston still only appears for Dr. Koussevitzky, its imperator.

T. H. P.

JAN 15, 1947 THE HARTFORD TIMES.

Boston Symphony Heard in Concert

Under the guest leadership of the great Viennese classicist, Bruno Walter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Bushnell Memorial gave a warmingly Viennese performance without losing one iota of its fabulous precision and clarity and virtuosity.

You could stand in the Prater and almost throw the figurative stone to each of the several spots from which the program material stemmed, to Haydn's Esterhaz, to the aesthetic environs of Richard Strauss' early inspirations and to the Portchach of Brahms' Second Symphony.

* * *

THIS CALM visionary seemed so to inspire the Bostonians that, whereas they have always been able to astonish us with their technical perfection, they now carried us away on a tide of eloquence at once human and veracious. The players applauded their leader spontaneously and heartily. A great orchestra, regularly under anointed leadership, was sojourning with a great leader and they had found common ground. This is by no means an implicit chemistry.

The hot-blooded poetry of Don Juan was the climax of this wonder-working. It was as though that vaulting, proclamative opening page was for the first time being hurled in the face of a fagged and unsuspecting world. Walter has this recreative touch in the highest degree. He combed out of this dramatic work the suggestions of rhetoric, the recurrent vestiges of commonness and gave it a conviction and urgency not to be denied.

* * *

THE OXFORD Symphony had a simple honesty rather than exquisitness and an abiding songfulness. Walter's rapid tempi were relaxed but effervescent.

He gave a sense of elevation to the Brahm's Symphony which kept it buoyant in spite of an unusually deliberate pace. It seems as though he can suspend music in mid-air. No one shall ever forget the closing pages of the first movement which fell like a benediction upon the scenic and philosophical felicities of this idyllic symphony.

Even the "Tragic" Overture had a Viennese sobriety and thoughtfulness far removed from pessimism or morbidness.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is an instrument of tremendous power and delicate adjustment; only the most skillful and understanding of leaders can successfully play upon it. That we heard one of the most memorable concerts of the Bushnell series is a tribute to the mastery and artistry of Bruno Walter.

C.E.L.

SANTA MARIA, CAL
COURIER
1/16/47

Daniel Eisler, violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard over KCOY each Tuesday evening at 6:30, at his favori pastime of taking wrecked and discarded pianos and giving the the ability to make music again.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT
JAN 1 9 1947

A SERIES OF

. . . Tanglewood Music scholarships will be awarded by the John Hancock Insurance company according to announcement made this week and the full details will be made known at the broadcast concert of the orchestra over the American network on Tuesday evening at 7:30. The offer of the scholarships has been accepted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, founder of the summer school at Tanglewood. Dr. Koussevitsky points out that there have been relatively few Americans playing in the first desk positions in the leading symphony orchestras. In the Boston orchestra the first oboist and the first desk double bass player are both American born musicians who received their training at Tanglewood. Thor Johnson, recently appointed conductor of the Cincinnati symphony is another American who studied at the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood as did Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland.

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
JAN 18 1947

Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony, studying piano as a youth in Vienna, wrote his father, "What is to come of it all if successful? I do not know. But this is clear. I have then improved my own powers, which is every man's duty."

When lameness in his arms forever precluded a musical career, he was seized with the desire to return to Boston, and to become rich in order to provide a first class orchestra for his beloved city.

In 1881 his plan fructified; he was successful in business, and had created the Boston Symphony Orchestra practically single handed. He engaged George Henschl, a singer, as conductor for $3,000, with sixty instrumentalists at $1,500 each, for a year. The musicians could not play under any other conductor while under contract, but must agree to rehearse as often as need be, furnishing one public rehearsal and one performance a week at popular prices. He figured that there would be a deficit of about one-half the cost of the orchestra, which he would have to supply.

Subsequent conductors have been Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, Monteux and Koussevitzky. Always the Boston Symphony has been in the forefront of musical progress and achievement.

* * *

About fifty Meriden persons go to the Symphony concerts in Hartford, many having had course tickets since the series first opened in 1930 in Bushnell Hall. The Boston Symphony used to play at Parson's Theater, at the Armory, or at Poli's, before Bushnell Hall was built. In the early years of this century our Meriden enthusiasts always made the trip to the concerts by train, forming a happy cluster in the station as they com-[illegible]

N. Y. Journal

New Strauss Opus Offered

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Still experimenting at 81, Richard Strauss has remained a remarkable composer. The first New York performance of his "Metamorphoses," conducted by Kousevitsky at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night, reveals him the expert craftsman that he has always been.

Written two years ago, this latest work is designated a study for 23 solo string instruments. As such, it is definitely a novelty. It appears to say the same thing over and over, but the way in which the idea is worked out has its fascination. Strauss knows his strings.

The music brings "the eternal note of sadness in." Its ebb and flow becomes a kind of philosophical benediction. What it all means is not clearly defined in a single hearing. But its melodies sing and there is sustained beauty. However tame it may sound for Strauss, it is nevertheless an unusual work, lovely in texture.

The Bostonians also played Martinu's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with Jascha Veissi as the viola soloist, completed the program. It also provided enough lush romanticism to compensate those who could not relish the contemporary music. The whole program will be repeated in Carnegie Hall this afternoon.

Tagliavini Sings

Ferruccio Tagliavina's debut in "La Boheme" caused considerable furor at the Metropolitan last night. As the first real Italian tenor to come here in years, he was news.

But the audience actually stole the show. It shouted and cheered and had a grand old time. The claque was there to make the evening a traditional one.

When the tumult died away, it was found that Tagliavini was good, if not sensational. He has a fine voice, a good sense of style and should prove a valuable addition to the company. No tenor has yet equalled Bjorling's debut.

Since the atmosphere was charged with excitement, the performance went all out. The work allowed it. So did Sodero in the pit.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
1/17/47

Tanglewood Scholarships Planned To Aid U.S.-born Orchestral Men

A series of scholarships for study at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival and Summer centre of activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor.

The scholarships will be awarded by the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company which takes over sponsorship of the ABC broadcasts of the Boston Symphony on Tuesday, January 21.

The purpose of the awards, according to officials of the company, is to encourage musicians with high standards "in the pursuit of their chosen profession."

In announcing the awards, Dr. Koussevitzky noted that there are relatively few American musicians occupying first-desk positions in the principal symphony orchestras of this country. In the Boston Symphony, the conductor pointed out, the oboist and first desk double bassist are both American-born and both received their final training at Tanglewood.

inoff); Adagio movement from Sonata in D minor (Brahms); Intermezzo to Act III from Suor Angelica (Puccini); Two movements from Concerto in E minor

---

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JAN 1 9 1947

AS EXECUTIVE of a major recording company, he [illegible]tuted negotiations with Kous[illegible]vitzky which were directly responsible for the recognition of a union by the directors of the orchestra.

Originally scheduled for tomorrow, Koussevitzky has been postponed until Feb. 15.

WICHITA, KAN.
BEACON
JAN 1 9 1947

SPONSOR SERIES OF BROADCASTS

Beginning Tuesday, January 21, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company will sponsor a series of Tuesday evening broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Locally, the concerts will be aired over KFBI.

Under its present conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra has attained a degree of perfection which makes it one of the finest symphonies of the world.

Conducting the first program Tuesday will be Bruno Walter. Broadcast from Symphony Hall in Boston, the initial concert will include the Prometheus Overture, Beethoven; Symphony in G major, "Oxford," No. 92, Haydn; and "Don

---

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
JAN [illegible] 1947

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will move his Boston Symphony broadcasts from 8:30 to 7:30 p.m. starting Tuesday on WMPS.

[77]

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD

JAN 19 1947

Boston's Illustrious Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard; $3

It's Boston's turn today in the book news as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music news; The Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume and the orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitzky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt, the Boston Symphony played to its fortunate audiences 66 new American composers for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Though these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitzky's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their juniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

JAN 19 1947

Koussevitzky Offers Music Scholarships

Boston Symphony Director Will Sponsor Course At Tanglewood

A series of scholarships for study at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival and Summer center of activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ensemble. The scholarships will be awarded by the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company which takes over sponsorship of the ABC broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Jan. 21.

The purpose of the awards, according to officials of the company, is to encourage musicians with high standards "in the pursuit of their chosen profession."

In announcing the awards, Dr. Koussevitzky noted that there are relatively few American musicians occupying first-desk positions in the principal symphony orchestras of this country. In the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the conductor pointed out, the first oboist and first desk double bassist are both American-born and both received their final training at Tanglewood.

Thor Johnson, recently named to succeed Eugene Goossens as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is a Tanglewood graduate. Among other prominent Americans who studied there are Leonard Bernstein, conductor, and Aaron Copland, now regarded as the dean of contemporary American composers.

Dr. Koussevitzky recently received a 1946 New York Newspaper Guild Award for establishing the annual festival of American Music at Tanglewood.

Details of the scholarship plan will be announced during the first ABC broadcast under the new sponsorship on January 21.

TRENTON, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES ADVERTISER

JAN 19 1947

New Sponsor Offers Music Scholarships

Great conductors are constantly seeking the most skilled instrumentalists to fill important posts in today's large symphonic orchestras. In line with this, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has revealed plans for a series of Tanglewood music scholarships to be awarded by the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company in conjunction with its radio sponsorship of the concerts.

In order to further the conductor's plan to promote the cultural heritage of America, the insurance company will award scholarships at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival, in Lenox, Mass., where Dr. Koussevitzky has created a Summer school for musicians of accomplishment and promise. Dr. Koussevitzky recently won the New York Newspaper Guild's 1946 Page One Award for his part in establishing the annual Tanglewood Festival of American Music.

Further details on qualifications to participate in the scholarships will be announced on the first broadcast of the new series over WJZ and the American Broadcasting Company on Tuesday. Beginning that night the program will be heard one hour earlier at 8:30 p. m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 19 1947

New Publishers

House Will Specialize in Books on Music

Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., a new firm specializing in books on musical subjects, will issue its first publication, Moses Smith's biography of Serge Koussevitzky, on Feb. 15. A revised and enlarged version of "Music Comes to America" by David Ewen, director of the firm, is also scheduled for February; Robert Goffin's "Horn of Plenty; the Story of Louis Armstrong" for March; a new edition of Franz Werfel's "Verdi, a Novel of the Opera" for April, and "The Columbia Book of Musical Masterworks," edited by Goddard Lieberson, for May. A new annual, "The Year in American Music," edited by Julius Bloom, will make its first appearance next October.

Olin Downes, music critic of "The New York Times," has signed a contract with this firm for a biography of Chopin, which is expected to be ready for publication in 1949, the year of the centenary of Chopin's death.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 19 1947

OPERAS: It was hoped that the opera Marc Blitzstein is writing on commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation would be done this summer at Tanglewood. But the composer reports that it is dubious if it will be ready. Unlike his previous efforts, this one is based on a story written by someone else. So far the operatic rights are not fully secured. Samuel Barber reports that since the war interruption he has not started again on his opera for the foundation. He still hasn't the right libretto.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 19 1947

COMPOSERS' PLACE

Conductor Sees Advances In Past Two Decades

Last Sunday night at the Museum of Modern Art the League of Composers presented a program of modern music in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation which, in memory of the conductor's wife, has commissioned many new works by American composers. Mr. Koussevitzky spoke during the intermission, and after some preliminary extemporaneous remarks about the position of the American composer in this country as he saw it when he first came here more than two decades ago, he went on to comment on the situation today:

TODAY, more than twenty years later, we can witness a great change and a great progress in the musical life of this country. Today, the American composer occupies a prominent place in American life: his countrymen take interest and pride in his work and show concern for his well-being.

But that is not enough: no matter how much is done for the composer—it is not enough! Because the composer is the ever-living source, the life-giving oxygen without which music cannot exist.

His is the highest mission and, therefore, the more responsible and often precarious.

The path of the composer is not without danger and temptation, especially when his growth has been fast. Let him not forget that a young composer may be technically mature yet emotionally still in his infancy.

Where Art Begins

Let him remember that true creative art begins at a moment of deep contemplation, when the artist tries to clarify to himself his own innermost and confused emotions; when the object of art becomes the soul of the artist, reflecting his feelings and his ideals.

Let the present-day composer beware of the sign of our time—that is, mechanization. It is disastrous for a composer to fall into the artifice of mechanization, to work out a formula and, following this artificial means, not create but "formulate" music.

Such music is inevitably dated.

The supreme goal of the composer is to conquer time—to be in the past, in the present and in the future, to convey the infinity of thought, emotion and ideal, symbolizing eternity.

I have always maintained that artists are prophets and foresee events in social and political life.

The founding of the League of Composers in 1923 was such an instance.

Is not the League of Composers a "United Nations" in its realm?

Is it not the purpose and aim of the League of Composers to unite all the musical creative forces, promoting their art and sustaining an interest in their work?

Musical art adapts itself to this idea because, more than any other art, it may be compared to an immense work-shop, where the greatest harmony is required of all concerned.

In music a score completed at the desk of a composer is only the beginning of the work to be accomplished; its fulfillment demands the cooperation of an auxiliary energy and a body of active and organized forces.

What Music Can Do

In this sense, music has a drawing faculty enhancing harmony among men: it speaks to every heart, breaks down the antagonism of nationality and creates that particular unity and accord among the peoples of the world which found expression in Schiller's "Ode to Joy" and inspired Beethoven's immortal Ninth symphony.

In music, indeed, we sense the approach of a new dawn—an era of which, to this day, we could only dream—an era of brotherhood and love of all men, without discrimination or dissonance, without animosity, violence or passion, appeasing and unifying mankind into one harmonious family. Differences may remain, but all disparity will vanish.

Here lies the deep significance of music incomparable and unique among the arts. Here lies the extraordinary, pacifying and powerful influence of this all-embracing art, upon human society, the individual mind and spiritual consciousness of all men.

Our hope in the future of music is high, and our gratitude deep to the creators of harmony.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

JAN 19 1947

Scholarships In Music Offered

New York, Jan. 18.—Great conductors are constantly seeking the most skilled instrumentalists to fill important posts in today's large symphonic orchestras. In line with this, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has revealed plans for a series of Tanglewood music scholarships to be awarded by the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company in conjunction with its radio sponsorship of the concerts.

The insurance company will award scholarships at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival, in Lenox, Mass., where Doctor Koussevitzky has organized a summer school for musicians of accomplishment and promise.

In accepting these scholarships for the Berkshire Music Center Doctor Koussevitzky noted that there had been relatively few Americans playing in the first-desk positions of leading symphony orchestras. Now, in the Boston Symphony itself, Doctor Koussevitzky said, the first oboist and the first-desk double bass player are both American-born musicians. They received final training at Tanglewood. The recently appointed conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, Thor Johnson, is another American who studied at the Berkshire Music Center. Other famous musicians who studied at Tanglewood are Leonard Bernstein, young American composer-conductor, and Aaron Copland, now considered dean of American contemporary composers.

Further details on qualifications to participate in the scholarships will be announced on the first broadcast in the new series over station KXYZ and the American Broadcasting Company, Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. C. S. T.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

JAN 19 1947

Koussevitzky Sees Progress In U. S. Music

By W. G. ROGERS

New York —(AP)— "A great change and a great progress" in American music in the last two decades were reported here this week by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in an address to the League of Composers.

The League sponsored a meeting in honor of the Boston conductor and the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and the program consisted of chamber works commissioned by the Foundation.

Aaron Copland, introducing Koussevitzky, recalled that the Foundation already had commissioned 20 works, most of them for orchestra; and noted that the league was formed in 1923, that Koussevitzky came to this country in 1924, and that he immediately conducted a New York concert featuring contemporary compositions. The status of the American composer is much improved, Koussevitzky said, and "our hope in the future of music is high."

The program consisted of two admirable string quarters by William Bergsma who teaches music in New York, and Robert Palmer, who teaches at Cornell; they were played by the Walden String Quartet, now in residence at Cornell. There were also compositions by violoncello and piano, "Eclogue" by Alexei Haieff of this city and a fine "Capriccio" by Lukas Foss, of Boston, with Benar Heifetz as 'cellist and Erich Itor Kahn at the piano.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE-STATES

JAN 19 1947

Noted Conductor Says Future of Music Is Bright

(The Associated Press)

New York — "A great change and a great progress" in American music in the last two decades were reported here this week by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in an address to the League of Composers.

The league sponsored a meeting in honor of the Boston conductor and the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and the program consisted of chamber works commissioned by the foundation. Aaron Copland, introducing Koussevitzky, recalled that the foundation already had commissioned 20 works, most of them for orchestra, and noted that when Koussevitzky came to this country in 1924, he immediately conducted a New York concert featuring contemporary compositions.

The status of the American composer is much improved, Koussevitzky said, and "our hope in the future of music is high."

The program consisted of two string quartets by William Bergsma, who teaches music in New York, and Robert Palmer, who teaches at Cornell. They were played by the Walden String Quartet, now in residence at Cornell. There was also "Eclogue" by Alexei Haieff of this city and "Capriccio" by Lukas Foss of Boston with Benar Heifetz as 'cellist and Erich Itor Kahn at the piano.

Jan 18 Herald

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 13th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon Symphony Hall. The program was follows:
Symphony in G major, "Oxford," No. 92 .... Haydn
"Don Juan," Tone Poem, Op. 20 .. Strauss
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 .... Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It seems strange in the extreme that Bruno Walter has not conducted the Boston Symphony since 1923. A leader of acknowledged mastery, he has been available for an invitation to be guest conductor but during all those years the Boston Symphony has not so availed itself. At any rate the omission has now been repaired, and yesterday we were privileged to welcome this great musician once again to Symphony Hall.

Mr. Walter's first program was a thoroughly conventional one, save that the Haydn Symphony had not been played here since 1910. But if the Strauss Tone Poem and the Brahms 2nd Symphony were familiar to all, the manner of their recreation was the reverse of humdrum. Especially notable was the performance of Strauss's "Don Juan," an amazingly eloquent and brilliant interpretation. In a way it was rather surprising that yesterday's audience applauded the Haydn with more warmth than did the Strauss. I can only suppose that the Boston Symphony audiences have heard "Don Juan" so often that they have become a little blase about it. But what a performance!

Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony deserves more than one performance every 36 years. The witty and sparkling finale alone would merit more frequent attention to it. But all of the Symphony, as with all of Haydn's later works, is full of novel twists and delightful trouvailles. Mr Walter, who is one of the world's greatest interpreters of Haydn and Mozart, secured a wonderfully just and clear performance, for which he was recalled many times to the stage.

Finally there was the Brahms 2nd Symphony for overflowing good measure. Everyone has his favorite ranking of the Brahms symphonies, in which amiable pastime I should put this one last. But if anyone could persuade a listener that he ought to amend his judgment, Mr. Walter is the magician to do so. The performance by exception with the Boston Symphony's work had a few orchestral blemishes, which will undoubtedly not reappear in subsequent repetitions tonight and next week.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Walter will again be guest conductor and will lead the orchestra in Wagner's "Faust" Overture, Mozart's G minor Symphony and Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 (in the original version).

es Next Week—The Symphony Concert

Jan 19, 1947

Bruno Walter Wins Ovation as Guest Conductor

By L. A. Sloper

Bruno Walter entered this week on his first fortnight's term as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Directing yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall the first of the thirteenth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, he offered Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony in G major, No. 92, Strauss' "Don Juan," and Brahms' Second Symphony. The visitor was warmly welcomed by audience and orchestra on his first appearance and he received an ovation at the conclusion of each number of the program. He was quick to share the applause with the orchestra.

* * *

This was a memorable concert. Mr. Walter is of course one of the great conductors of our time, imired particularly for his inrpretations of the music of the isters of the eighteenth and ieteenth centuries whose cas centered on Vienna. He had conducted this orchestra for ears, although he had directed e operas in Boston for the ropolitan. His return therefore eagerly awaited, and the it [illegible]ceeded anticipation. He [illegible] top of his form, he [illegible] had the enthusiastic [illegible]n of the great orchestra, and the result was an afternoon of rare musical delights.

It is difficult to realize that Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony had gone unheard at these concerts for 37 years, but that appears to be the case. Its neglect for so long is a major mystery of program making, for it is one of the most fascinating works of one of the greatest of composers, filled with original ideas, deftly developed, with charming harmonic and contrapuntal devices; and as for unexpected turns, there are enough to make a dozen more G major Surprise symphonies. The performance was a marvel of precision, clarity, balance and lyrical fluency.

These qualities were evident too in the Strauss, a score so utterly different, yet equally well divined and realized in performance. The conductor here, as ever, was in full control, and he obtained his wishes with a minimum of exertion. The music itself contained less of nervous strain than it sometimes seems to have, because conductor and orchestra appeared to be just doing what came naturally. The work was both dramatic and lyrical, both passionate and tender, with endless revelations of unsuspected or forgotten orchestral beauties.

* * *

The Brahms symphony was more lyrical than dramatic, in line with its mode and its design; although full value was given to its more emotional passages, there was no sense of stress. The rhythms, which are so important to Brahms, were both firm and supple, as in the preceding works. This reading, quite different from that to which we have been long accustomed, appealed strongly to the audience.

We are fortunate to have Mr. Walter with us. The good fortune extends to the subscribers to the other Boston series, who will hear these same works performed next Tuesday and the following Sunday. And of course the radio listeners will hear some of them on Tuesday evening too. Next Friday and Saturday Mr. Walter will present for the first time in Boston the original version of Bruckner's unfinished Symphony No. 9 in D minor.

Violin Ensemble

Announcement is made of the program to be given by the Ondříček Violin Artist Ensemble of New York in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening Jan. 29. Robert Menga, violinist, and Luise Vosgerchian, pianist, will take part.

Concerto for 4 Violins and Piano	Telemann
Chaconne	Purcell
Praeludium in D minor for 8 Violins and Organ	Pisendel
Violin Concerto in E minor	Mendelssohn
Sonata No. 12	Paganini
Two Études, No. 22 and 28	Fiorillo
Furiant (Czech Dance)	arr. Ondříček
Four Intermezzi	Martinů

Malcuzynski

Witold Malcuzynski, pianist, will give a Chopin recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 2. The program:

Ballade in G minor
Two Nocturnes: C minor, C sharp minor
Sonata in B flat minor
Three Mazurkas
Three Études, No. 4, Op. 10; No. 7, Op. 25; No. 12, Op. 10.
Waltz
Scherzo in B flat minor

CITIZEN-NEWS

JAN 22 1947

advertising meeting.

Printed leaflets, outlining the programs of the "Boston Symphony Orchestra" for several weeks in advance, will be offered listeners by the new sponsors. The leaflets will also contain interesting information concerning the orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

JAN 19 1947

Smith Biography On Koussevitzky Wins Guild Award

THE publication of Koussevitzky, a comprehensive but informal biography by Moses Smith (Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.) coincides with the recent presentation of some important honors to that great conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Newspaper Guild of New York has given Dr. Koussevitzky the "Page One Annual Award" for his outstanding contributions to music.

Moses Smith's four-hundred page biography, illustrated with many candid-camera shots, is perhaps the completest story of the fabulous career of Koussevitzky—and one of the most personal and revealing portraits of the man yet to be found within the covers of a book. From his personal contacts with Koussevitzky, and from his experiences as music critic in Boston for two decades, Smith has assembled a great deal of first-hand material—particularly about the relations between conductor and orchestra men—much of which is here revealed for the first time.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

JAN 21 1947

* * *

A SERIES OF SCHOLARSHIPS for study at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival and Summer center activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the ensemble. The scholarships will be awarded by the new sponsor of the Boston Symphony broadcasts which are heard each Tuesday from 7 to 8 p.m. over The News-Age-Herald station WSGN. The purpose of the awards, according to officials of the company, is to encourage musicians with high standards "in the pursuit of their chosen profession." Dr. Koussevitzky noted that there are relatively few American musicians occupying first-desk positions in the principal symphony orchestras of this country. In the Boston Symphony, he pointed out, the first oboist and first desk double bassist are both American-born and both received their final training at Tanglewood. Thor Johnson, recently named to succeed Eugene Goossens as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is a Tanglewood graduate. Among other prominent Americans who studied there are Leonard Bernstein, conductor, and Aaron Copeland, composer. Dr. Koussevitzky recently received a 1946 New York Newspaper Guild Award for establishing the annual festival of American Music at Tanglewood. Details of the scholarship plan will be announced during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony

KOUSSEVITZKY

NBC THE OTHER DAY turned back its calendar 10 years to get a glimpse of broadcasting activities about that time and this is what was found: Minnie, the singing mouse that made an auspicious debut last month on NBC, was recalled for an appearance as guest star, this time on National Barn Dance. Jack Benny enlisted the aid of Buck Jones, cowboy screen star, as he continued his mad chase for Cactus Face Elmer, the desert desperado in his "Buck Benny Rides Again" series. Fred Allen took up verbal cudgels against Jack Benny in a transcontinental feud between the two on "Town Hall Tonight." Feud started when Fred cast aspersions on Jack's ability as a violinist.

Colonel Stoopnagle claimed to have discovered a country called Stooptopia, where women rise and give their seats to men in crowded streetcars and buses, and days begin at noon so everybody can sleep late in the morning. Edgar Bergen was signed for an extended engagement with Rudy Vallee's variety hour. Ethel Barrymore played the lead in "The Last of Mrs. Cheney." Graham McNamee headed the announcing staff for NBC's coverage of the inauguration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt as he entered his second term. John Held, Jr., was emcee of a new series," Varsity Show," whose first broadcast originated from the campus of the University of Michigan. And that was life at NBC 10 years ago.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 19 1947

RECORDS

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

FOR those who are fond of Mozart's music, there are rich pickings this month. Arturo Toscanini has conducted the NBC Symphony Orchestra in the Symphony No. 41, in C, known as the Jupiter (Victor, four twelve-inch records), and this album takes precedence over all other recordings of the magnificent score. The performance is lucid, rich in tone, paced more rapidly than usual but justifiably so and radiant in feeling—in short, superb. The recording is good; the resonance of the orchestra has been captured on these disks.

Nor is this album the only fragrant Mozart bouquet. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have recorded on one twelve-inch record (Victor) the Symphony No. 26, in E flat, K. 184, and here, too, the playing is of the highest quality. The brief, early Mozart symphony is a score of amazing maturity and depth of feeling. If you can buy only one record this month, put this one first on your list.

Then there are Three Sonatas for Violin and Harpsichord—the B flat major, K. 378; the F major, K. 296, and the G major, K. 379—played by Alexander Schneider and Ralph Kirkpatrick (Columbia, six twelve-inch records). These scores disclose other facets of Mozart's mastery, and the performances [illegible] rate.

COMPOSERS' PLACE

Times

Conductor Sees Advances In Past Two Decades

Jan 19 '47

Last Sunday night at the Museum of Modern Art the League of Composers presented a program of modern music in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation which, in memory of the conductor's wife, has commissioned many new works by American composers. Mr. Koussevitzky spoke during the intermission, and after some preliminary extemporaneous remarks about the position of the American composer in this country as he saw it when he first came here more than two decades ago, he went on to comment on the situation today:

TODAY, more than twenty years later, we can witness a great change and a great progress in the musical life of this country. Today, the American composer occupies a prominent place in American life: his countrymen take interest and pride in his work and show concern for his well-being.

But that is not enough: no matter how much is done for the composer—it is not enough! Because the composer is the ever-living source, the life-giving oxygen without which music cannot exist.

His is the highest mission and, therefore, the more responsible and often precarious.

The path of the composer is not without danger and temptation, especially when his growth has been fast. Let him not forget that a young composer may be technically mature yet emotionally still in his infancy.

Where Art Begins

Let him remember that true creative art begins at a moment of deep contemplation, when the artist tries to clarify to himself his own innermost and confused emotions; when the object of art becomes the soul of the artist, reflecting his feelings and his ideals.

Let the present-day composer beware of the sign of our time—that is, mechanization. It is disastrous for a composer to fall into the artifice of mechanization, to work out a formula and, following this artificial means, not create but "formulate" music.

Such music is inevitably dated.

The supreme goal of the composer is to conquer time—to be in the past, in the present and in the future, to convey the infinity of thought, emotion and ideal, symbolizing eternity.

I have always maintained that artists are prophets and foresee events in social and political life.

The founding of the League of Composers in 1923 was such an instance.

Is not the League of Composers a "United Nations" in its realm?

Is it not the purpose and aim of the League of Composers to unite all the musical creative forces, promoting their art and sustaining an interest in their work?

Musical art adapts itself to this idea because, more than any other art, it may be compared to an immense work-shop, where the greatest harmony is required of all concerned.

In music a score completed at the desk of a composer is only the beginning of the work to be accomplished; its fulfillment demands the cooperation of an auxiliary energy and a body of active and organized forces.

What Music Can Do

In this sense, music has a drawing faculty enhancing harmony among men: it speaks to every heart, breaks down the antagonism of nationality and creates that particular unity and accord among the peoples of the world which found expression in Schiller's "Ode to Joy" and inspired Beethoven's immortal Ninth symphony.

In music, indeed, we sense the approach of a new dawn—an era of which, to this day, we could only dream—an era of brotherhood and love of all men, without discrimination or dissonance, without animosity, violence or passion, appeasing and unifying mankind into one harmonious family. Differences may remain, but all disparity will vanish.

Here lies the deep significance of music incomparable and unique among the arts. Here lies the extraordinary, pacifying and powerful influence of this all-embracing art, upon human society, the individual mind and spiritual consciousness of all men.

Our hope in the future of music is high, and our gratitude deep to the creators of harmony.

ARLINGTON, N.J
PLAIN DEALER
1/23/47

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Mr. Paul F. Clark, president of John Hancock Mutual Life, express pleasure in the sponsorship by the insurance company of the orchestra's network program. The Boston Symphony is heard over WJZ-ABC on Tuesday at 9:30 p.m., EST.

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 24 1947

Berkshire Festival Will Be Enlarged

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased next summer from nine to twelve and will include a Beethoven cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra.

There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Bethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven cycle in Series B.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 24 1947

MUSIC CENTER CONCERT PROGRAMS TO BE OPEN

Membership Acquired by Voluntary Contributions

Music lovers planning to attend the annual Berkshire Festival concerts at the Tanglewood bowl in Lenox this summer also may attend the various performances of the Music center, it was announced today. No tickets are sold for the latter concerts, but they are open to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Membership in the center is acquired by voluntary contribution to its support.

The Fetival concerts, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will begin on Sunday afternoon, July 13, with other dates being as follows: July 20, 24, 26, 27, and 31 and Aug. 2, 3, 5, 7, 9, and 10.

JAN 24 1947

Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony Recorded By Koussevitzky

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, one of the foremost champions of music by contemporary composers, was guest of honor at a concert and reception held at the Museum of Modern Art in New York, by the League of Composers in connection with the celebration of the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. It was Dr. Koussevitzky who gave the American premiere, on Nov. 14, 1945, of Serge Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 5," and who recorded it shortly thereafter for RCA Victor, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is sheduled for release in the near future.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 25 1947

Berkshire Music Festival Concerts To Be Increased

The Boston Symphony orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to twelve. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B. given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, opens July 24. The final program of the festival will be given August 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30th and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JAN 25 1947

Berkshire Festival This Year To Offer Twelve Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to twelve. These will include a Beethoven cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Kouseitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven cycle in series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, opens July 24. The final program of the festival will be given August 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue thru August 10, under the direction of Dr. Kousseyitsky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JAN 25 1947

Berkshire Festival Dates Announced

The Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will include 12 concerts this year. This will include a Beethoven cycle and three extra concerts, two on Sunday afternoons, July 13 and 20, and the third on Tuesday evening, Aug. 5. These will be devoted respectively to the music of Bach, Mozart and the Beethoven Ninth symphony.

The first series will be given July 24, July 26 and July 27; the second, the Beethoven cycle, on July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; and the third on Aug. 7, 9 and 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10. It will be under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Instruction will be offered in orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, choral singing and ensemble playing.

Further information concerning the festival and the music center may be obtained from G. E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, at Symphony hall, Boston 15, Mass.

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN

JAN 25 1947

Berkshire Festival Plans

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to 12. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5. The first of the three regular week-end series opens July 24. The final program of the festival will be given August 10.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As a community we may be said to enjoy an acquaintance with great music. Some of it, thanks to our present-day habits, has become almost a drug on the market. It was an unusual experience, then—and for a fortunate few a rather crushing and shattering one—to be brought face to face at yesterday's Symphony Concert for the first time in 33 years with one of the greatest things in all music. The work in question, the Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, was restore to us (in its original, unedited form) by Bruno Walter, and no hand would have been worthier for the task.

To give Dr. Koussevitzky his due, he has planned more than once to revive the Bruckner Ninth; but intention is one thing and accomplishment another. Accordingly, to Mr. Walter our deepest gratitude. The three movements of the Symphony which Bruckner left unfinished on his deathbed, and which he desired to dedicate to "the dear God," are not easy to take in at a first hearing. Nor would many yesterday have remembered the three previous performances in Symphony Hall between 1904 and 1914. The advantage lay with those who have been able to familiarize themselves with the work through its recording, while only last year Mr. Walter broadcast it from New York.

The tremendous first movement is a direct descendent of the first movement of Beethoven's Ninth, and Bruckner, alone among subsequent symphonists, was able to wield the thunderbolts of the Jove of Bonn. Will the last trump sound in more awful accents than the chief theme? Yet there are few things in music more beautiful than the group of melodies that bring the needed contrast. Surely no one yesterday could have had any difficulty with the scherzo, which an early critic called the ugliest piece of music ever written, though many may have found the long adagio a hard nut to crack. In this music Bruckner tried to piece the veil which separates us from the Beyond. You may find some of it cryptic, but blind is he who cannot see in it celestial visions. Mr. Walter, who conducted as a priest before the alter, had his reward, if he so considered it, in the cheers that accompanied his final return to the stage. He had given us a performance that we will not soon forget.

While naturally of less significance, the first part of the program was nevertheless something to be treasured. Mr. Walter began by recalling to us the fine "Faust" Overture of Wagner, an early work revised in the composer's middle years that makes

Amusements

u wish that he had written more r the concert hall. The other num-r, Mozart's G minor Symphony, was ayed as we knew in advance that would be played. With Mozart no e surpasses Walter. We have him w for two more days and then for o weeks in the spring. That is mething to look forward to.

-Bruno Walter as Guest Conductor A

Christian Science Monitor 1/25/47

Music of Wagner, Mozart, and Bruckner Presented

By L. A. Sloper

Bruno Walter, for the second program of his guest-conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, had chosen these works: Wagner, A Faust Overture; Mozart, Symphony in G minor (K. 550); Bruckner, Symphony No. 9 in D minor (unfinished).

The Bruckner Ninth was heard on this occasion in the original version for the first time in Boston. Even Ferdinand Löwe's edition had been played here only three times, and its last hearing was under Muck, 33 years ago. There has been a lively controversy over the merits of the two versions. Since I have not compared the scores, and have not the faintest recollection of the 1914 performance, I can say only that the symphony as heard yesterday is eminently Brucknerian.

Dr. Walter is a broad-minded musician. His tastes are catholic enough to embrace Bach and Wagner, Haydn and Bruckner, Mozart and Mahler. He is apparently equally receptive to the classic and the romantic, the Apollonian and Dionysiac. This is of course an admirable trait in a conductor. Members of the audience have the privilege of preferring one school to another, and of defending their choice with fervor, but a conductor must be more tolerant if he is not to become monotonous.

The controversy over the two versions of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony is mild compared to the hostilities over Bruckner himself. To his supporters he is a genius of the first order, to his detractors, a gifted but clumsy peasant. Here, again, it is useless to join in the fray. If your predilection is for the Bach-Haydn-Mozart line, you still cannot deny that Bruckner, for all his debt to Wagner, had individuality and was a master of composition and orchestration. If you belong to the other wing, you will not mind, will indeed revel in, his episodic style, his verbosity, his surcharged emotion.

Regardless of sides, there was no disputing the masterly quality of yesterday's performance, which was as persuasive a statement of Bruckner's case as can be imagined. Dr. Walter left no beauty unrevealed, no climax understated. His success repeated that of last week, with ovations again from audience and orchestra for every number, including both the chaste Mozart and the impetuous Wagner of the "Flying Dutchman" period. It is pleasant to reflect that we are to have another fortnight of Dr. Walter later in the season.

Other Amusement news will be found on Page 4.

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Jan 25

WE CAN all sympathize with the permanent conductor of an orchestra who finds a guest leader praised to the skies. The Boston Symphony's Dr. Serge Koussevitzky told the assembled reviewers at his Brookline home last fall that it greatly distressed him to have these visitors commended for what they accomplish with an organization which he has brought to its present eminence. Nor does he take kindly to the suggestion that Mr. So-and-So's reading of some particular piece was in the nature of a revelation—that we had to wait until that particular performance to learn how or how well a certain composition should or could sound.

Nevertheless, all of these things can be explained in a way that reflects no discredit upon either Dr. Koussevitzky's admittedly remarkable powers as orchestral director, in the more technical sense, or his skill and understanding as interpreter of works old and new, native and foreign. It has been said that on general principles an orchestra will play better for a guest than for its regular leader. At any rate, if he has the goods the men will give him enthusiastic co-operation. Whereas the permanent conductor must rule with an iron hand, the guest can well afford to be a good fellow. The men are flattered by his praise, charmed by his friendly attitude, and for the time being everything is rosy.

As far as the critics are concerned, there is a considerable degree of truth in the old adage that the grass is always greener in your neighbor's yard and in the still older one that variety delights. Let us admit that A and B are each of them eloquent exponents of a particular symphony, tone poem, or what you will, but that each projects the music in a different way. Surely, everyone at all conversant with such matters knows that even with the same forces no two conductors of equal eminence will produce the identical result with a given symphonic or operatic work. There will be variations that the experienced observer will detect in a moment. I am also willing to concede that the imagination plays its part. A conductor's physical appearance, his manner on the podium will color your hearing of the music. Heard but not "seen," the two performances might exhibit less striking divergences.

* * *

But what it boils down to is this: If you have been long accustomed to A's performance, if the latter is of any comparable quality, you will welcome B's, and you would react in the same way if their positions were reversed. Furthermore, no matter who or how great the conductor, thre will always be some piece, some composer, some whole school of music with which another man will do a bettetr job. Such things are a matter of personality or of temperament, and still more often of race and background. To come down to cases, we have just heard at Symphony Hall remarkable performances of French music under Charles Muench and of German and Austrian music under Bruno Walter. It is more than probable that neither could have worked the other's wonders with that gentleman's program or programs. And it is likely that Dr. Koussevitzky would be a more satisfactory interpreter of the lot of them than would Mr. Muench or Mr. Walter, though either might have something on him where his work or that was concerned. In addition to being unexcelled as a projector of more than one composer, Dr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of exceptional versatility. Of course, neither he nor anyone else is the greatest living interpreter of everything under the sun.

There are two composers for whom Bruno Walter is by general consent the foremost spokesman: Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. We have just experienced his impressive disclosure of the elder master's unfinished Ninth Symphony, not heard here in any form since 1914 and never before as Bruckner originally wrote it, undoctored by his well-meaning disciple, the conductor Ferdinand Loewe. When he returns in the spring he will give us the Mahler Fourth, with which we have at last become acquainted through the efforts of that local Mahler enthusiast, Richard Burgin. Mr. Walter has but lately conducted this symphony with various European orchestras, the London Philharmonic and BBC, the Orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam and the leading orchestras of Brussels and Zurich. He reports that they are as good as they ever were, or better. Recognizing that its spiritual needs were greater even than its material wants, the countries of Europe immediately saw to it that the former should be properly satisfied.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Thanks to guest conductor Bruno Walter, the Boston Symphony concerts this week are distinctly occasions, for they bring the first local performances since 1914 of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony. The program begins with "A Faust Overture" by Wagner and includes the "great" G minor Symphony of Mozart (K. 550). While the Bruckner is a rarity, neither of the other two pieces has been overdone here in recent seasons. Wagner's early Overture was last heard at the Symphony concerts in 1936, and the Mozart Symphony, in these series, in 1940.

Every time a work of Bruckner is performed, and that sadly is not often, the whole question of "Bruckner-and Mahler" is brought up again. Those two late romantic composers of the 19th Century are regarded as great by some, and by others as negligible. At any rate, while the music of Bruckner and Mahler is still hotly disputed, the fact remains that Mahler is not frequently performed here, and Bruckner even less so.

It may be that the warmest advocates have done the two composers a disservice by the very heat of their admiration. Perhaps, according to the laws of action and reaction, they have provoked equal and unjustified opposition. If the public—and musicians—were to regard Bruckner and Mahler simply as the extraordinarily gifted composers they were, and hear their music without ascribing divine qualities to either of them, then perhaps we would hear more of both. That would be to everyone's advantage.

The Bruckner Ninth shares with its fellows those typical Brucknerian qualities of remarkable orchestral counterpoint, soaring expression, vast formal scope and towering visions. It is really a great symphony in its facture and in what a [illegible] naive and peasant soul succeeded in expressing. It is at once austere and intimate, general and personal, passionate and tender as, in the greatest of all paradoxes, great works of art can be.

If the first movement is the most heroic of the three, the closing adagio, rapt and exalted, is the peak and crown of the Symphony. Surely it is true that while the Ninth, from a formal point of view, may be unfinished, no finale could follow the adagio, which was Bruchner's valedictory. Incidentally, Mr. Walter gives us this week not the Ferdinand Loewe edition, but the "urtext," the original score as Bruckner left it.

As last week, Mr. Walter's conducting is an almost miraculous blend of expression genius, consummate orchestral technic and profound scholarship. This is as true with Wagner as with Bruckner, and I hope I shall not forfeit my place among the Wagnerian faithful by declaring "A Faust Overture" to be a curiosity, groping and immature, rather than a masterpiece. If there could be a finer, more delicate or profound performance of Mozart's troubled Symphony, I cannot imagine it. Mr. Walter's visit has been a revelation. We may be thankful he is returning in March.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
JAN 25 1947

Berkshire Festivals To Be Enlarged This Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire festival concerts will be increased in number next Summer from nine to 12, including a Beethoven cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra.

There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven cycle in series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, Aug. 5. Series A, the first of the three regular weekend series, opens July 24. The final program of the festival will be given Aug. 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's Summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments, orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season, or are there during the festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, opera, and student orchestra performances of the music center, for which no tickets are sold. These concerts are open to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the center constituting membership in the society.

For further information about the fesitval, the music center and the Friends, letters may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15; after June 1 to "Tanglewood," Lenox.

NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, JANUARY 26,

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

Berkshire Festival Lists Extra Concerts Devoted to Bach, Mozart and Beethoven

Twelve instead of only nine concerts will be given next Summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Berkshire Festival Concerts, it has been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra, from Symphony Hall, Boston. These will include a Beethoven cycle.

The usual three series of three concerts each will be given, with three extra concerts, one devoted to Bach, one to Mozart and one to a performance of Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, which will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given on Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program on Sunday afternoon, July 20, and Beethoven's Ninth on Tuesday evening, Aug. 5. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, will open on July 24. The closing program of the Festival will be given on Sunday, Aug. 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may buy tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will begin its six-week term at Tanglewood on Monday, June 30, continuing through Aug. 10 under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty, as heretofore, will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and choral conducting; orchestral playing and chamber music; composition; opera and choral singing, and ensemble playing.

The many instrumental, choral, operatic and student orchestra performances of the center will be open to visitors at and before the festival without tickets. These concerts are open free to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the center resulting in membership in the society.

The complete schedule for the regular nine festival concerts follows: Series A, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26, 27; Series B, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; Series C, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, 9 and 10. Information may be obtained from the Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., and after June 1 in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 14th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

A Faust Overture.................Wagner
Symphony in G minor, K. 550.....Mozart
Symphony No. 9 in D minor.....Bruckner

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert proved to be an afternoon of mixed musical pleasure, unless the listener happened to be an ardent admirer of all Bruckner's music in which case there would be no misgivings at all. Once again, however, the interpretations were singularly fine. Mr. Walter surely got all there is to get out of Wagner's Faust Overture, a most eloquent reading. He is a famous interpreter of Mozart, and his sympathetic insight into Bruckner's music makes him probably the foremost conductor in this field.

For me, though, the concert, considered purely as an occasion for rejoicing, began and ended with the Mozart G minor Symphony. This transcendently great masterpiece was beautifully set forth by the orchestra. Mr. Walter's tempi were exactly right. Violinists, pianists and conductors frequently sin by taking Mozart's fast movements at breakneck speed. This Mr. Walter avoided to the great advantage of the musical structure. One reservation about the performance could be made. In so short a work why did not Mr. Walter make the repeats in the sonata-form movements?

And so to Bruckner. The most dismal fate that can befall a man is to be remembered by posterity after an industrious and respectable career as nothing more than a vandal. The man who replaced gothic carvings with golden oak, the 18th century poets who re-wrote the Psalms in heroic couplets, the Bowdlers of this world have not suffered for their crimes any worse than has the memory of Ferdinand Loewe for what, with the best of intentions, he did to Bruckner's Ninth. No more vociferous musical cult exists than the adherents of Bruckner and Mahler, and the fact that Loewe himself was a fervent disciple of the former did not save him fram their wrath. Mr. Burk in the program notes has well told the story of the battle for the original version, which we heard yesterday in Boston for the first time.

The test performance of both versions in 1932, with the foregone conclusion that the original would win, must have been a trial for all but the faithful. To have to listen to the Symphony twice in an afternoon would not be my idea of a good concert. Mercifully Bruckner did not compose a finale, for he was always at his weakest in last movements and the Symphony would then take over an hour.

There are fine passages and splendid moments in the 9th Symphony, and the scherzo is a completely satisfying movement. But what is annoying in Bruckner is the ceaseless repetition. Those interminable sequences, leading nowhere in particular except to further repetitions of other themes, end by getting some of us down. I emerge by unfairly condemning the whole Symphony, while your true Brucknerite, doubtless, considers it a monumental triumph. For him the repetitions are just so much added joy and nobility, but not for everybody.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Leonard Bernstein will be the guest-conductor in Gluck's Overture to "Alceste," Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps and Beethoven's 7th Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 25 1947

12 CONCERTS LISTED BY BERKSHIRE FETE

Boston Symphony Will Offer Extra Programs Devoted to Bach, Mozart, Beethoven

Twelve instead of only nine concerts will be given next Summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Berkshire Festival Concerts, it has been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra, from Symphony Hall, Boston. These will include a Beethoven cycle.

The usual three series of three concerts each will be given, with three extra concerts, one devoted to Bach, one to Mozart and one to a performance of Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, which will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given on Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program on Sunday afternoon, July 20, and Beethoven's Ninth on Tuesday evening, Aug. 5. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, will open on July 24. The closing program of the Festival will be given on Sunday, Aug. 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may buy tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will begin its six-week term at Tanglewood on Monday, June 30, continuing through Aug. 10 under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty, as heretofore, will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and choral conducting; orchestral playing and chamber music; composition; opera and choral singing, and ensemble playing.

The many instrumental, choral, operatic and student orchestra performances of the center will be open to visitors at and before the festival without tickets. These concerts are open free to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the center resulting in membership in the society.

The complete schedule for the regular nine festival concerts follows: Series A, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26, 27; Series B, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; Series C, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, 9 and 10. Information may be obtained from the Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., and after June 1 in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 2 6 1947

Festival Concerts Will Total 12 At Berkshire Event

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts will be increased this coming summer from nine to 12, it was announced Friday by George E. Judd manager.

In addition to the customary three series of three concerts each, three extra concerts will be played. One will be devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

As now planned, the first two extra concerts will be played on Sunday afternoons of July 13 and July 20. Series A of the regular concerts will be held Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26 and 27. Series B will take place on the corresponding days, July 31, August 2 and 3. The third extra concert is slated for Tuesday evening, August 5 and Series C of the regular concerts, Thursday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, August 7, 9 and 10.

TRENTON, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES ADVERTISER

JAN 2 6 1947

The publication of "Koussevitzky," a comprehensive but informal biography by Moses Smith coincides with the recent presentation of some important honors to that great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Newspaper Guild of New York has given Dr. Koussevitzky the "Page One Annual Award" for his outstanding contributions to music, and recently the League of Composers honored him at a luncheon on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Foundation. The biography is published by Allen, Towne & Heath.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

JAN 2 7 1947

12 Concerts Are Scheduled At Tanglewood

Berkshire Music Festival to Have 3 Extra Programs

Twelve instead of nine concerts will comprise the Boston symphony orchestra's Berkshire festival at Tanglewood near Lenox, Mass., this summer.

In addition to the customary three series of three concerts each there will be three extra programs, one on July 13 to be devoted to the music of Bach, another on July 20 to present music of Mozart, nad the third on Aug. 5 to include Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony."

Concerts in the first of the three regular series will be given July 24, 26 and 27; in the second, July 31 and Aug. 2 and 3; and in the third, Aug. 7, 9 and 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire music center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood June 30.

Further information may be obtained from G. E. Judd, Symphony hall, Boston, 15, Mass.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JAN 2 6 1947

Music

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to 12. These will include a Beethoven cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A. the first of the three regular week-end series, opens July 24. The final program of the Festival will be given August 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

Ruth Woodin Baumbach, cellist and Mrs. Mary Findley Ades organist will give a joint recital in Trinity Methodist church this evening at 7:30 o'clock. The program will include compositions of Mozart, Bach, Tschaikowsky, Grieg, and Debussy. The recital is open to the public.

Oil and gasoline are combinations of hydrogen and carbon atoms, called hydrocarbons.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 6 1947

Works of Beethoven and Stravinsky to Be Presented

CONDUCTED by Leonard Bernstein, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a Beethoven-Stravinsky program at its third Providence concert Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theater. Inasmuch as the first part of the program, the Beethoven music, will be broadcast the concert will begin promptly at 8:30 o'clock.

The latter part of the bill will be what is said to be the first performance here of Stravinksy's celebrated "Le Sacre du Printemps," which caused something of a revolution in the musical world at the time of its composition before World War I.

Conducted Here in 1944

Bernstein conducted the Bostonians here in November, 1944, and his present engagement as guest conductor calls for appearances in Boston following his Providence concert. He studied conducting with Koussevitzky at Tanglewood and later graduated to guest conductorship of Boston's symphony during its leader's Winter vacations. He is at present conductor of the New York City Center Orchestra.

Last Summer Bernstein was chosen to appear both as guest conductor and piano soloist at the semi-centennial celebration of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra in Prague.

Bernstein is noted as a pianist as well as composer. In the latter field his range is indicated by his "Jeremiah" Symphony, a song cycle titled "Five Kid Songs, I Hate Music," the ballet, "Fancy Free," and the musical comedy, "On the Town." His program for Tuesday night follows:

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 .... Beethoven
Symphony No. 7 in A-major, Op. 92 .... Beethoven
"Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring")
Pictures of Pagan Russia .... Stravinsky
I. "The Adoration of the Earth"
Introduction—Harbingers of Spring Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Towns—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
II. "The Sacrifice"
Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—The Sacrifilcal Dance of the Chosen One.

Concert By Verdandi

The Verdandi Male Chorus will present the program for the first annual concert by the Men's Brotherhood Class of the People's Church Thursday evening, Feb. 6, in Cranston High School Auditorium. Assisting will be Helen Place, soprano; Constance Perry, harpist, and Barbara Perry, reader. The committee in charge consists of Walter Thierfelder, chairman; Gustave Josephson, treasurer, and Thomas Matteson.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

JAN 2 8 1947

Music Lovers Advised To Patronize Local Civic Orchestra

To the Editor of The American:

I tried to buy two tickets for the Boston Symphony concert at Bushnell Memorial in Hartford last Tuesday evening, Jan. 14. There was "Standing Room Only" at $2.40 a ticket.

The same story is true when the Boston Symphony is in New Haven.

I am willing to grant that our Civic Orchestra is not the Boston Symphony. They do not pretend to be but I feel many people in Waterbury are missing a real treat when they fail to attend our Civic Orchestra concerts.

The concert Sunday evening was wonderful — not alone the soloist but the orchestra was splendid.

Why not give Mr. DiCecco and the orchestra the thrill of "Standing Room Only" at the next concert on March 9.

CHARLOTTE WEBSTER SHINN,
Waterbury, Jan. 24. 1947.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

JAN 2 9 1947

Koussevitzky Plans Beethoven Cycle

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 28.—A Beethoven cycle of three concerts, a special concert including Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and a special concert, each devoted to Bach and Mozart, will be included in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1947 Berkshire Festival, according to Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. Twelve concerts instead of the usual nine, with three three-concert series plus three extra concerts, are scheduled between July 13 and Aug. 10.

The complete schedule follows: Bach concert, July 13; Mozart concert, July 20; series A, July 24-26-27; Beethoven cycle, series B, July 31 and Aug. 2-3; Beethoven extra concert, Aug. 5; series C, Aug. 7-9-10.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open a six-week term at Tanglewood June 30, to close Aug. 10. With Koussevitzky as director, assisted by Aaron Copland, the faculty as in the past will include orchestra principals, and instruction will be offered in orchestra and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, choral singing and ensemble playing.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 9 1947

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Conducted by Leonard Bernstein

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the third of its concerts of the current season in Providence at the Metropolitan Theater last evening. Leonard Bernstein conducted a program consisting of the Leonore Overture No. 3 and the Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, both by Beethoven, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring—Pictures of Pagan Russia).

Mr. Bernstein is an extremely talented and brash fellow. As a conductor he displayed what is still a derivative style which, while adept, lacks the experienced control of Dr. Koussevitsky in more ways than one. Some of this was expected. It was surprising to find the right wrist not fluid in a good many places, and to find the hand getting to the beat before it should at the beginning of the concert, though.

As an actor, Mr. Bernstein came off pretty well. His profile angled into the lights magnificently all evening, and there was a wave that kept falling into his eyes from time to time (before intermission, that is).

The Leonore Overture was frankly over-directed. The Boston Orchestra can play the thing blindfolded. The conductor made a gallant effort to out-Toscanini Toscanini on the dynamics, largely by a device of poking at the orchestra. They seemed to take it in good spirits, or else they were ignoring the whole thing.

In the Beethoven Symphony the orchestra missed Lennie's most titanic efforts. They seemed to be turning pages every time he reached a climax. The Allegretto was as restless as it could be, while the third movement (Presto) seemed to be a complete poker game with Lennie shuffling the cards, tossing out the chips and playing all the hands himself. In the fourth movement I went across the ice with little Eva, went through darkest Egypt with the Pharoahs, was stroke man at the bottom of a trireme, mushed to the relief of Nome and stoked a defective furnace in a temperature of 50 below. Somehow there was mighty little Beethoven in it all.

The Stravinsky came off much better. Mr. Bernstein here showed a feeling for the music which would have been better if it had not included doing all the parts of the ballet himself, but it was still first-rate conducting. It seemed that the audience responded well to it, too, considering that Le Sacre du Printemps is still a controversial piece more than 30 years since it first appeared. We wish the Boston Symphony would bring more of the controversial material here to air, ourselves.

In case the above impression of Lennie seems unduly harsh, perhaps it should be explained that "we knew him when," as an undergraduate at Harvard, and that he did not impress us as a genius then, nor does he now. The fact remains, though, that he has produced and is producing and deserves a lot of credit for exploiting the breaks and will go a long way, especially when he finally decides to be himself.

The orchestra was perfection, as always.

BUTLER, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 3 0 1947

Modern Library has added to its excellent series The Life & Works of Beethoven, by John N. Burk, historian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra $1.10), and Henry James' The Wings of the Dove [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
JAN 29 1947

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENTS

Koussevitzky Adds Concerts At Berkshire

The Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next Summer from nine to twelve, according to an announcement by Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's musical director. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow a Beethoven Cycle scheduled for the middle three concerts of the regular series.

The Bach program will be presented Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart on Sunday afternoon, July 20, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven on Tuesday evening, Aug. 5. The opening three regular week-end concerts (Series A) will take place Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26 and 27. Series B, featuring the Beethoven Cycle, is scheduled for July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; Series C, for the final week end, Aug. 7, 9 and 10.

The orchestra's Summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Instruction will be offered in five departments; orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

Music lovers who arrive in the Berkshires early in the season, or are there during the Festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, opera, and student orchestra performances of the Music Center, for which no tickets are sold, by joining the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. A voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constitutes membership in the society.

For ticket prices and further information about the Festival and the Music Center, letters may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., before June 1; after that date, to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. For living accommodations in the Berkshires, which should be reserved well in advance, letters may be addressed to the Berkshire Hills Conference, Courthouse, Pittsfield, Mass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 29 1947

Reviews of Music

Leonard Bernstein Is Conductor At Boston Symphony Concert

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the third of its concerts of the current season in Providence at the Metropolitan Theater last evening. Leonard Bernstein conducted a program consisting of the Leonore Overture No. 3 and the Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, both by Beethoven, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring—Pictures of Pagan Russia).

Mr. Bernstein is an extremely talented and brash fellow. As a conductor he displayed what is still a derivative style which, while adept, lacks the experienced control of Dr. Koussevitsky in more ways than one. Some of this was expected. It was surprising to find the right wrist not fluid in a good many places, and to find the hand getting to the beat before it should at the beginning of the concert, though.

As an actor, Mr. Bernstein came off pretty well. His profile angled into the lights magnificently all evening, and there was a wave that kept falling into his eyes from time to time (before intermission, that is).

The Leonore Overture was frankly over-directed. The Boston Orchestra can play the thing blindfolded. The conductor made a gallant effort to out-Toscanini Toscanini on the dynamics, largely by a device of poking at the orchestra. They seemed to take it in good spirits, or else they were ignoring the whole thing.

In the Beethoven Symphony the orchestra missed Lennie's most titanic efforts. They seemed to be turning pages every time he reached a climax. The Allegretto was as restless as it could be, while the third movement (Presto) seemed to be a complete poker game with Lennie shuffling the cards, tossing out the chips and playing all the hands himself. In the fourth movement I went across the ice with little Eva went through darkest Egypt with the Pharoahs, was stroke man at the bottom of a trireme, mushed to the relief of Nome and stoked a defective furnace in a temperature of 50 below. Somehow there was mighty little Beethoven in it all.

The Stravinsky came off much better. Mr. Bernstein here showed a feeling for the music which would have been better if it had not included doing all the parts of the ballet himself, but it was still first-rate conducting. It seemed that the audience responded well to it, too considering that Le Sacre du Printemps is still a controversial piece more than 30 years since it first appeared. We wish the Boston Symphony would bring more of the controversial material here to air, ourselves.

In case the above impression of Lennie seems unduly harsh, perhaps it should be explained that "we knew him when," as an undergraduate at Harvard, and that he did not impress us as a genius then, nor does he now. The fact remains, though, that he has produced and is producing and deserves a lot of credit for exploiting the breaks and will go a long way, especially when he finally decides to be himself.

The orchestra was perfection, as always.

CT

Extra Concerts For Berkshire Festival Listed

Twelve instead of only nine concerts will be given next summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Berkshire Festival Concerts, it has been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the [illegible] from Symphony Hall, B[illegible] will include a Beethoven [illegible]

The usual three series of three concerts each will be given and three extra concerts, one devoted to Bach, one to Mozert, and one to [illegible] mance of Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, which will [illegible] the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will [illegible] on Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program on Sunday afternoon, July 20, and Beethoven's Ninth on Tuesday evening, Aug. 5. Series A, the first of the three regular weekend series, will open on July 24. The closing program of the Festival will be given on Sunday, Aug. 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may buy tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will begin its six-week term at Tanglewood on Monday, June 30, continuing through Aug. 10 under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty, as heretofore, will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and choral conducting; orchestral playing and chamber music; composition; opera and choral singing, and ensemble playing.

The many instrumental, choral, operatic and student orchestra performances of the center will be open to visitors at and before the festival without tickets. These concerts are open free to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the center resulting in membership in the society.

The complete schedule for the regular nine festival concerts follows: Series A, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26, 27; Series B, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; Series C, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, 9 and 10. Information may be obtained from the Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., and after June 1 in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

TANGLEWOOD A PLACE FOR IDYLLIC VACATION

Binghamton N.Y.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Management Now Reserving Seats for 1947 Summer Concerts

1-30-47

By SARA LANE

After some data appeared in this column last year concerning the Berkshire music festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., several inquiries about the festival were received.

Some information about the 1947 festival came this morning and it occurred to me that these inquirers and perhaps others would like to know more about the Boston Symphony Orchestra project.

The Tanglewood concert program this year will be opened July 13 and the closing event is scheduled for Aug. 5.

Musicians and music lovers who have had the opportunity to attend any of the concerts in a Summer series at Tanglewood have found the experience especially delightful. The idyllic location in rural Massachusetts of the out of door concert stage enables patrons of the symphonic entertainments to enjoy the rare privilege of breathing the fragrant air of the Berkshire hills and seeing a delightful portion of New England beauty, while listening to the inspiring music of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and other masters of musical composition.

The 1947 festival will consist of 12 concerts, some of them on Sunday afternoons and some on Sunday nights.

In connection with the symphony concerts, the Berkshire Music Center in Boston, was established in 1940 by the trustees of the orchestra and the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This center was created to provide opportunity for music study in relation to the festival concerts.

Conductor Heads Faculty

A six-week session in held from June 30 to Aug. 10 in each year, with a faculty including the conductor and principal players in the orchestra.

Five departments of instruction are offered: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, choral singing and ensemble playing.

At the Music Center, instrumental choral and operatic performances are given and are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. No tickets are sold for these events, but a contribution to the support of the center is necessary to entitle an individual to membership. Forty performances were given during the 1946 session.

People's ideas of a vacation vary so widely that there's usually little point in suggesting a type of holiday that might please a great many people.

For this very reason though, it would seem that a few weeks of loitering in rural Massachusetts, in an atmosphere of combined nature and art would be ideal for a particular person who needs a rest and who is a devotee of music.

Does a suggestion for a Summer vacation offered in mid-Winter seem incongruous to you?

Well people who know about the Tanglewood enterprise are buying tickets for the Summer concerts now. Some of those who have been there in former years are reserving the same seats they've occupied before as the reservation list is being kept open for them for a certain length of time.

By the way, what kind of a vacation are you planning?

If you say you're not planning any, you're not one of those canny persons who buy Christmas gifts in July or August. You're like the rest of us who resolve to do it every year in the midst of a hectic search for things we can afford to buy and that seem worthy of our shrunken dollars and then forget all about it.

Vacation planning like Christmas planning is, for the most part, rather poorly done.

Anyway, if you are thinking of a Summer holiday, you now know about Tanglewood.

MILLBROOK, N.Y
ROUND TABLE
1/31/47

Berkshire Festival Will Be Enlarged

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to twelve. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, opens July 24. The final program of the Festival will be given August 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments. Orchestral and Choral Conducting, Orchestral Playing and Chamber Music Composition, Opera, and Choral Singing and Ensemble Playing.

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season, or are there during the Festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, opera and student orchestra performances of the Music Center, for which no tickets are sold. These concerts are open to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constituting membership in the society.

For further information about the Festival, the Music Center and the Friends, letters may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts and after June 1 to "Tan[illegible] Lenox, Mass. For living [illegible] in the Berkshire[illegible] be addressed to the Berkshire Hills Conference, Courthouse, Pittsfield, Massachusetts.

Berkshire Festival Will Be Enlarged This Year

Jan 30 47

Additional Concerts Include Beethoven Cycle Announces Serge Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to twelve. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program wlil be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, opens July 24. The final program of the Festival will be given August 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and Choral Conducting, Orchestral Playing and Chamber Music, Composition, Opera, and Choral Singing and E[illegible]ay.

PRIZE TURKEYS FROM ANCRAMDALE

Starting last May Mrs. B. E. David of Ancramdale hand-raised 18 prize turkeys which now hit the scales [illegible] 508 lbs. picked. Three [illegible] gigantic birds total 92 [illegible] present they are on displ[illegible] Ganung's who considers [illegible] the finest turkeys with the [illegible]ish he has ever seen. [illegible] them have been promised [illegible]. Margaret Reid of The O[illegible]st Inn, who says it will take [illegible] two-fisted eater to handle these double-breasted birds.

[83]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
JAN 29 1947

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENTS

Koussevitzky Adds Concerts At Berkshire

The Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next Summer from nine to twelve, according to an announcement by Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's musical director. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow a Beethoven Cycle scheduled for the middle three concerts of the regular series.

The Bach program will be presented Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart on Sunday afternoon, July 20, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven on Tuesday evening, Aug. 5. The opening three regular week-end concerts (Series A) will take place Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26 and 27. Series B, featuring the Beethoven Cycle, is scheduled for July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; Series C, for the final week end, Aug. 7, 9 and 10.

The orchestra's Summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Instruction will be offered in five departments; orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

Music lovers who arrive in the Berkshires early in the season, or are there during the Festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, opera, and student orchestra performances of the Music Center, for which no tickets are sold, by joining the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. A voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constitutes membership in the society.

For ticket prices and further information about the Festival and the Music Center, letters may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., before June 1; after that date, to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. For living accommodations in the Berkshires, which should be reserved well in advance, letters may be addressed to the Berkshire Hills Conference, Courthouse, Pittsfield, Mass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 29 1947

Reviews of Music

Leonard Bernstein Is Conductor At Boston Symphony Concert

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the third of its concerts of the current season in Providence at the Metropolitan Theater last evening. Leonard Bernstein conducted a program consisting of the Leonore Overture No. 3 and the Symphony No. 7 in A major, Opus 92, both by Beethoven, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring—Pictures of Pagan Russia).

Mr. Bernstein is an extremely talented and brash fellow. As a conductor he displayed what is still a derivative style which, while adept, lacks the experienced control of Dr. Koussevitsky in more ways than one. Some of this was expected. It was surprising to find the right wrist not fluid in a good many places, and to find the hand getting to the beat before it should at the beginning of the concert, though.

As an actor, Mr. Bernstein came off pretty well. His profile angled into the lights magnificently all evening, and there was a wave that kept falling into his eyes from time to time (before intermission, that is).

The Leonore Overture was frankly over-directed. The Boston Orchestra can play the thing blindfolded. The conductor made a gallant effort to out-Toscanini Toscanini on the dynamics, largely by a device of poking at the orchestra. They seemed to take it in good spirits, or else they were ignoring the whole thing.

In the Beethoven Symphony the orchestra missed Lennie's most titanic efforts. They seemed to be turning pages every time he reached a climax. The Allegretto was as restless as it could be, while the third movement (Presto) seemed to be a complete poker game with Lennie shuffling the cards, tossing out the chips and playing all the hands himself. In the fourth movement I went across the ice with little Eva went through darkest Egypt with the Pharoahs, was stroke man at the bottom of a trireme, mushed to the relief of Nome and stoked a defective furnace in a temperature of 50 below. Somehow there was mighty little Beethoven in it all.

The Stravinsky came off much better. Mr. Bernstein here showed a feeling for the music which would have been better if it had not included doing all the parts of the ballet himself, but it was still first-rate conducting. It seemed that the audience responded well to it, too considering that Le Sacre du Printemps is still a controversial piece more than 30 years since it first appeared. We wish the Boston Symphony would bring more of the controversial material here to air, ourselves.

In case the above impression of Lennie seems unduly harsh, perhaps it should be explained that "we knew him when," as an undergraduate at Harvard, and that he did not impress us as a genius then, nor does he now. The fact remains, though, that he has produced and is producing and deserves a lot of credit for exploiting the breaks and will go a long way, especially when he finally decides to be himself.

The orchestra was perfection, as always.

Extra Concerts For Berkshire Festival Listed

Twelve instead of only nine concerts will be given next summer by the Boston Symphony Orch[illegible] Berkshire Festival Concerts, [illegible] been announced by Serge K[illegible]zky, music director of [illegible] from Symphony Hall. [illegible] will include a Beethov[illegible]

The usual three series [illegible] certs each will be [illegible] extra concerts, one dev[illegible] one to Mozert, and one [illegible] mance of Beethoven's Nin[illegible] Symphony, which [illegible] Beethoven Cycle in Se[illegible]

The Bach program [illegible] Sunday afternoon, July [illegible] program on Sunday [illegible] 20, and Beethoven's Nin[illegible] day evening, Aug. 5. Series A [illegible] of the three regular week-end [illegible] will open on Julv 24. The closing [illegible] gram of the Festival will be given on Sunday, Aug. 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may [illegible] tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer [illegible] Berkshire Music Center, will [illegible] six-week term at Tanglewood on Monday, June 30, continuing through Aug. 10 under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty, as heretofore, will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and choral conducting; orchestral playing and chamber music; composition; opera and choral singing, and ensemble playing.

The many instrumental, choral operatic and student orchestra performances of the center will be open to visitors at and before the festival without tickets. These concerts are open free to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the center resulting in membership in the society.

The complete schedule for the regular nine festival concerts follows: Series A, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26, 27; Series B, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; Series C, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, 9 and 10. Information may be obtained from the Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., and after June 1 in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

TANGLEWOOD A PLACE FOR IDYLLIC VACATION

Binghamton N.Y.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Management Now Reserving Seats for 1947 Summer Concerts

By SARA LANE

1/30/47

After some data appeared in this column last year concerning th Berkshire music festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tangle wood, Lenox, Mass., several inquiries about the festival were received.

Some information about the 1947 festival came this morning and i occurred to me that these inquirers and perhaps others would like t know more about the Boston Symphony Orchestra project.

The Tanglewood concert program this year will be opened July 1 and the closing event is scheduled for Aug. 5.

Musicians and music lovers who have had the opportunity to attend any of the concerts in a Summer series at Tanglewood have found the experience especially delightful. The idyllic location in rural Massachusetts of the out of door concert stage enables patrons of the symphonic entertainments to enjoy the rare privilege of breathing the fragrant air of the Berkshire hills and seeing a delightful portion of New England beauty, while listening to the inspiring music of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and other masters of musical composition.

The 1947 festival will consist of 12 concerts, some of them on Sunday afternoons and some on Sunday nights.

In connection with the symphony concerts, the Berkshire Music Center in Boston, was established in 1940 by the trustees of the orchestra and the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

This center was created to provide opportunity for music study in relation to the festival concerts.

Conductor Heads Faculty

A six-week session in held from June 30 to Aug. 10 in each year, with a faculty including the conductor and principal players in the orchestra.

Five departments of instruction are offered: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, choral singing and ensemble playing.

At the Music Center, instrumental choral and operatic performances are given and are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. No tickets are sold for these events, but a contribution to the support of the center is necessary to entitle an individual to membership. Forty performances were given during the 1946 session.

People's ideas of a vacation vary so widely that there's usually little point in suggesting a type of holiday that might please a great many people.

For this very reason though, it would seem that a few weeks of loitering in rural Massachusetts, in an atmosphere of combined nature and art would be ideal for a particular person who needs a rest and who is a devotee of music.

Does a suggestion for a Summer vacation offered in mid-Winter seem incongruous to you?

Well people who know about the Tanglewood enterprise are buying tickets for the Summer concerts now. Some of those who have been there in former years are reserving the same seats they've occupied before as the reservation list is being kept open for them for a certain length of time.

By the way, what kind of a vacation are you planning?

If you say you're not planning any, you're not one of those canny persons who buy Christmas gifts in July or August. You're like the rest of us who resolve to do it every year in the midst of a hectic search for things we can afford to buy and that seem worthy of our shrunken dollars and then forget all about it.

Vacation planning like Christmas planning is, for the most part, rather poorly done.

Anyway, if you are thinking of a Summer holiday, you now know about Tanglewood.

MILLBROOK, N.Y
ROUND TABLE
1/31/47

Berkshire Festival Will Be Enlarged

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to twelve. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, opens July 24. The final program of the Festival will be given August 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments. Orchestral and Choral Conducting, Orchestral Playing and Chamber Music Composition, Opera, and Choral Singing and Ensemble Playing.

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season, or are there during the Festival period, may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, opera and student orchestra performances of the Music Center, for which no tickets are sold. These concerts are open to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constituting membership in the society.

For further information about the Festival, the Music Center and the Friends, letters may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts and after June 1 to "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass. For living accommodations in the Berkshires, letters may be addressed to the Berkshire Hills Conference, Courthouse, Pittsfield, Massachusetts.

Berkshire Festival Will Be Enlarged This Year

Jan 30-47

Additional Concerts Include Beethoven Cycle Announces Serge Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to twelve. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program wlil be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday evening, August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular week-end series, opens July 24. The final program of the Festival will be given August 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and Choral Conducting, Orchestral Playing and Chamber Music, Composition, Opera, and Choral Singing and E

PRIZE TURKEYS FROM ANCRAMDALE

Starting last May Mrs. B. E. David of Ancramdale hand-raised 18 prize turkeys which now hit the scales [illegible] 508 lbs. picked. Three of [illegible] gigantic birds total 92 [illegible] present they are on displ[illegible] Ganung's who conside[illegible] the finest turkeys with the [illegible] finish he has ever seen. [illegible] them have been promised [illegible]s. Margaret Reid of The O[illegible]st Inn, who says it will take a two-fisted eater to handle these double-breasted birds.

[83]

…ahill
…mace
…d 1/31/47

…nly nine concerts
… summer by the
…Orchestra at its
…Concerts, it has
…Serge Koussevit-
…of the orchestra,
…l, Boston. These
…ven cycle.
…ies of three con-
…given, with three
…devoted to Bach,
…ne to a perfor-
…'s Ninth (Choal)
…will follow the
…Series B.
… will be given on
…uly 13; the Mozart
…y afternoon, July
…Ninth on Tues-
…Series A. the first
…ar weekend series,
… The closing pro-
…l will be given on
…Subscribers to any
…ar series may buy
…tra concerts at a

…ummer school the
…nter, will begin its
…nglewood on Mon-
…uing through Aug.
…ion of Dr. Kousse-
…Copland as assist-
…faculty, as hereto-
…e principal players
…mphony Orchestra.
…offered in five de-
…ral and choral con-
…playing and cham-
…sition; opera and
… ensemble playing.
…strumental, choral
…t orchestra perfor-
…ter will be open to
…efore the festival
…hese concerts are
… members of the
… of the Berkshire
…untary contribution
…the center resulting
…he society.
…hedule for the reg-
…l concerts follows:
…ay and Saturday
…day afternoon, July
… B, Thursday and
… and Sunday after-
… 2 and 3; Series C
…urday evenings and
… Aug. 7, 9 and 10
…e obtained from the
…oston 15, Mass., and
… Tanglewood, Lenox

…ar
…thoven
…vitzky

…hony Orches-
…val Concerts
…number next
… to twelve.
…a Beethoven
…n announce-
…ony Hall by
…music Direc-
… There will
…ree series of
… and three
…evoted to the
… to Mozart,
…clude a per-
…oven's Ninth
…t extra con-
…e Beethoven

… will be giv-
…n, July 13;
… Sunday af-
…d the Ninth
…oven Tuesday
…following the
…evoted to his
…e first of the
…-end series,
…inal program
…e given Aug-
… to any of the
… may obtain
… concerts at

…ummer school.
… Center, will
…erm at "Tan-
… 30 and con-
…st 10, under
… Koussevitzky,
… as assistant
…he past, the
… will include
…s of the Bos-
…rchestra. In-
…ffered in five
…estral and
… Orchestral
…mber Music
…and Choral

Composers League

Koussevitzky Is Honored in Chamber Music Concert

LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS, concert at the Museum of Modern Art in honor of Serge Koussevitzky and the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Assisting artists: the Walden String Quartet (in residence at Cornell University); Benar Heifetz, [illegible] Itor Kahn, pianist. Program [illegible] of works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation:

[illegible] Second String Quartet ....William Bergsma
[illegible] ....Alexei Haieff
[illegible] ....Lukas Foss
Second String Quartet ....Robert Palmer

By Arthur V. Berger

The League of Composers playing host to Serge Koussevitzky last night in the auditorium of the Museum of Modern Art was in the nature of a reunion of two important and gratifying forces in the dissemination of contemporary music, and American music in particular. More than twenty years ago, as he reminisced in a brief talk after the intermission, Mr. Koussevitzky had conducted concerts for the league soon after his arrival here and shortly after the organization's inception. Last night he was honored as a non-participating guest, from the performance angle at least—a guest whose presence was acknowledged by a display of some of his beneficences. Five years ago, in memory of his wife, he established the Koussevitzky Foundation to consolidate his activities on behalf of American composers. While most of the works commissioned by the foundation are orchestral, and duly find their way into the repertory of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, some have been chamber works. And these were deployed last night, most of them for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his advisers have a flair for searching out the cream of American talent and four of the younger members of this category were represented. As programs of young composers go, this was a superior evening. But once this much has been granted I should like to voice a certain impatience with the academism that manifested itself in the two quartets that consumed the major part of the evening. William Bergsma is a fine craftsman and Robert Palmer has come upon inspirations that are energetic, original and tricky. But the cello works by Alexei Haieff and Lukas Foss, each little over five minutes in length, seemed to have a much better sense of music as an entity in time, as a dramatic progression of changing values in a fluid temporal continuum.

I must qualify my remarks by indicating that I was able to hear only a lengthy first movement and part of the second in the Palmer. But in what I heard of his music, he develops motives arduously along the worn-out lines (fugatos and all) in a desire to achieve unity over a broad span. If he did so with more distinction than Mr. Bergsma, he fell into some of the same predictable successions, and he kept on driving his points long after their relevancy was apprehended.

Mr. Haieff is the most spontaneous, least pretentious and, as craftsman, the most suave and imaginative of last night's composers. He is one of Stravinsky's most notable heirs, and, as a Russian by parentage, legitimately so. Mr. Foss needs more selectivity in weeding out the routine from his inspirations—such routine, for example, as the etude-like figures he gave the cello last night.

Scientists, Symphony To Lose Some Land

A strip of land 10 feet wide will be taken from the park in front of the Christian Science Church, and a three-foot strip of sidewalk will be cut from in front of Symphony Hall, under plans announced by Mayor Curley today for improving traffic and parking conditions.

The plan is part of a program to widen Huntington avenue for traffic. Work will begin next month and will cost an estimated $16,000.

The widening will be done along a 600-foot stretch of the avenue between Norway and Gainsborough streets, the mayor said.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and several Christian Scientists met with the mayor to discuss the plans, with Dr. Koussevitsky urging the mayor not to take the three lower steps from Symphony Hall.

Hancock Sponsors ABC Boston Symphony Series

Making its debut in broadcasting, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. is sponsoring a series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over a Coast-to-Coast network of the American Broadcasting Co.

The first concert in the series will be broadcast from Symphony Hall in Boston Jan. 21.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We have waited a long time to experience again the extraordinary combination of Bruno Walter and the Boston Symphony. And when that greatly gifted conductor was here 24 years ago the orchestra was hardly the body that it is today, while the years have added to rather than detracted from Mr. Walter's stature. At

…he is today in the fullness of his powers.

No conductor of any age could have given a more fiery reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" than the one that so stirred yesterday's audience. And if any music is a young man's music, it is these glowing pages which Strauss penned before he had reached 25. Performances of this tone poem have long been of frequent occurrence at Symphony Hall, and many are the conductors who have interpreted it for us. Mr. Walter's projection of it, which seems at the moment the most eloquent of them all, was one that respected the music's structure, its superbly planned design, one that glowed with passion, that steadily ravished the ear and that in its intensely dramatic quality reminded us that Mr. Walter is as much at home in the pit of an opera house as on the concert platform.

This performance of the Strauss may have been in its way the climax of the concert but it was far from being all that the occasion had to offer. For the first time since 1910 we heard the beautiful "Oxford" Symphony of Haydn, and in a performance that heightened and enhanced its intrinsic loveliness and charm. Although the Minuet is not quite up to the level of the other three movements, this is one of the master's finest. Why, then, have we been deprived of it so long?

If "Don Juan" is a common experience at the Hall, Brahms' Second Symphony, the remaining number on this week's program, is a commoner one, and for some the yearly repetitions have tended to dull the music. Yet Mr. Walter made it fresh again. There was no straining after effect but, as with Haydn and Strauss, there was nothing in the score that went by the board and there was much that was transfigured by the warmth and understanding of Mr. Walter's approach. After all, this is his music; we are not made to feel that it has been translated into an alien tongue. Finally, the orchestra itself on this memorable afternoon sounded as we have seldom heard it. The playe… were both at their ease and abo… their usual selves. Mr. Walter neith… drove them nor left them on the… own. And in the midst of so muc… that was notable, a word must still b… spoken for the horn playing of M… Valkenier. We had not properly ap… preciated it before.

Personally, I Think Sen. Barkley Should Shave It Immediately

By EVELYN PEYTON GORDON

HAVE you ever really met a great artist? Probably you have. But until last night I'd never seen one in action at a formal reception—and I mean one who acted like a human being. Boston's great Koussevitzky and his orchestra had taken the town by storm. And the maestro himself took society by storm later when he received a hundred or more guests at the French Embassy with the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet.

You see Koussevitzky is not a young man. But he has great charm. Greeting friends and admirers he was a simple man. "I am tired tonight. For three nights I've conducted. Tomorrow I must conduct again. It takes a great deal from me."

He's a strong looking man. But I noticed the veins of strain on his brow. He was a genial man, who held the receiving line a long time because he wanted to chat with each and every person who entered that embassy. The great Koussevitzky did not spare himself one dash!

Henri Bonnet, the host was ever present greeting guests as they arrived in the great hall of the embassy. Mme. Bonnet in beautiful black velvet . . . off-the-shoulders and made by her favorite French couturiere, Nina Ricci . . . stood with the maestro.

* * *

THE music-loving world was on hand . . . Mrs. Carroll Glover, Mrs. Robert Bacon, Mrs. Truxtun Beale, Mrs. "Pa" Watson, the great concert pianist in her own right making one of her first public appearances since the demise of the popular military aide to FDR.

Most popular of the guests was former Sen. Warren Austin. Next in line was Sen. Barkley, who discussed the question of his new mustache. "Some even say I look like Pat Hurley!" Personally I think he looks like Gen. Knudsen, and advocate the removal of the hirsute growth immediately.

There was a magnificent buffet. Even the extra butlers were enchanted." This cook of Mme. Bonnet's is better than any chef in town. and . . . she's a woman!" Rep. Edith Rogers, still intent on her veterans, which have been her pals since World War I, looked a little startled when Justice Felix Frankfurter addressed her as "my Congressman." I discovered later that it was because Mrs. Rogers' late husband had been at college with Frankfurter!

Veteran Sen. Joseph O'Mahoney can't find room on his Washington office wall for his most recent certificate of election. The legislator who first entered the Senate in 1933 is serving his third full term. Previously he had served a short term by appointment.

The very day that Commerce Secretary Averell Harriman's name went to the Senate for confirmation— despite the fact he'd been around the town and on the job for seven months —rumors were flying that Donald Nelson will be the next Commerce big-wig.

Beneke at Symphony Hall

Next Monday night the music of the late Glenn Miller will find a perfect setting at Boston's Symphony Hall where Tex Beneke will lead 35 of the world's greatest musicians and entertainers as they play a concert from 8 to 9 p. m. and then for dancing till 12:30. Beneke plays Tuesday at Lyonhurst in Marlboro . . . Bob Chester totes his trombone and band to the Grove in Manchester, N. H. next Wednesday and down at Roseland, Taunton, Thursday . . . Dancers from all sections north of Boston are finding the new Memorial Hall in Melrose an ideal Saturday night spot with Ted Herbert's band . . . Jess Stacy back on piano with Benny Goodman . . . Sam Donahue's band is touring theatres with the King Cole Trio . . . Woody Herman, Les Brown and Harry James on vacation in Hollywood but will soon be reorganizing . . . Andover, Lawrence and Haverhill dancers will flock to the Lowell Commodore tonight to enjoy Frankie Kahn's music . . . New faces continue to show up at Moseley's new spot in Dedham where Johnny McAteer holds forth on the ivories . . . Peter Chase at Lyonhurst tonight . . . Baron Hugo in 37th month at Totem Pole . . . Buddy Welcome is back with Mal Hallet tonight at the Symphony Ballroom . . . Syd Ross at Roseland, Taunton, tonight . . . Ray Belaire's orchestra is the current rave of Gus Peachy down at his Canoe Club Ballroom in West Bridgewater every Friday and Saturday.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We have waited a long time to experience again the extraordinary combination of Bruno Walter and the Boston Symphony. And when that greatly gifted conductor was here 24 years ago the orchestra was hardly the body that it is today, while the years have added to rather than detracted from Mr. Walter's stature. At 70 he is today in the fullness of h… powers.

No conductor of any age could ha… given a more fiery reading of Straus… "Don Juan" than the one that … stirred yesterday's audience. And … any music is a young man's music, … is these glowing pages which Strau… penned before he had reached 25. Pe… formances of this tone poem ha… long been of frequent occurrence … Symphony Hall, and many are th… conductors who have interpreted … for us. Mr. Walter's projection of … which seems at the moment the mo… eloquent of them all, was one that r… spected the music's structure, its s… perbly planned design, one th… glowed with passion, that steadi… ravished the ear and that in its i… tensely dramatic quality reminded us that Mr. Walter is as much at home in the pit of an opera house as on the concert platform.

This performance of the Strauss may have been in its way the climax of the concert but it was far from being all that the occasion had to offer. For the first time since 1910 we heard the beautiful "Oxford" Symphony of Haydn, and in a performance that heightened and enhanced its intrinsic loveliness and charm. Although the Minuet is not quite up to the level of the other three movements, this is one of the master's finest. Why, then, have we been deprived of it so long?

If "Don Juan" is a common experience at the Hall, Brahms' Second Symphony, the remaining number on this week's program, is a commoner one, and for some the yearly repetitions have tended to dull the music. Yet Mr. Walter made it fresh again. There was no straining after effect but, as with Haydn and Strauss, there was nothing in the score that went by the board and there was much that was transfigured by the warmth and understanding of Mr. Walter's approach. After all, this is his music; we are not made to feel that it has been translated into an alien tongue. Finally, the orchestra itself on this memorable afternoon sounded as we

---

Society Hails Koussevitzky At Reception

By Marie McNair

WITH THE applause of an enthusiastic audience still ringing in his ears, Serge Koussevitzky went on from Constitution Hall last evening to the French Embassy for the reception in his honor given by the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet.

Most of the guests at the reception had heard the Boston Symphony Concert, had watched Mr. Koussevitsky's magic fingers lead his men through the familiar Fourth Symphony by Tschaikowsky, the difficult "La Mer" by Debussy, and Mendelssohn's beloved "Italian Symphony."

The Ambasasdor and Mme. Bonnet occupied a box, having among their guests the former Attorney General and Mrs. Francis Biddle.

Mrs. Robert Low Bacon had in her box former Senator and Mrs. Warren Austin, who are her guests for the week, the Austins having come down for the White House reception Tuesday evening from New York where Mr. Austin is now chief United States delegate to the United Nations Security Council.

With Judge and Mrs. George D. Neilson in their box were the Nicaraguan Ambassador, Dr. Guillermo Sevilla Sacasa; the Philippine Ambassador, Joaquin Elizadae, and Mrs. Tom Clark, wife of the Attorney General.

The Cuban Ambassador and Senora de Belt came in after their dinner party had broken up, and with them were the Brazilian Ambassador, Carlos Martins, and the Egyptian Ambassador and Mme. Hassan, who had been in the dinner company.

The Italian Ambassador and Signora Tarchiani were there and the Peruvian Ambassador and Senora de Prado, the Swiss Minister and Mme. Bruggmann, the New Zealand Minister and Lady Berendsen, the Honduran Ambassador and Senora de Caceres and the Swedish Minister and Mme. Eriksson.

O. Max Gardner, United States Ambassador to Great Britain, and Mrs. Gardner were in the gathering, and others were Justice and Mrs. Felix Frankfurter, Senator and Mrs. J. William Fulbright, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown; Senator and Mrs. Edward V. Robertson, the Undersecretary of War and Mrs. Kenneth Royall, Representative Edith Nourse Rogers, Representative and Mrs. Richard Wigglesworth and the Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. Willard Thorp.

Representative and Mrs. Estes Kefauver were among those offering congratulations to Mr. Kousseviztky, and then there were Representative Sol Bloom and his daughter, Miss Vera Bloom; former Ambassador Joseph Grew and Mrs. Grew, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Glover, jr.; Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Meyer, Mrs. Warren Delano Robbins.

Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, musically minded Mrs. Truxtun Beale and Mrs. Leland Harrison were in the group and—Jonkheer and Mme. Rene van Swinderen, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lippmann, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Elliston, Mr. and Mrs. Harry White, Mr. and Mrs. Andre Visson and Mr. and Mrs. Edgar A. Mowrer.

◆

TWO popular ladies of the Diplomatic Corps—Lady Berendsen, wife of the Minister of New Zealand, and Mrs. Harry Andrews, wife of the South African Minister—were the guests in whose honor Mrs. Charles Fletcher Martin, wife of Colonel Martin, entertained at tea yesterday at the Sulgrave Club.

The author of innumerable short stories, the hostess has also written three books, best known of which are "Green Gods Pavilion" and "The Lingering Faun." She has spent much time abroad and lived in Paris when Colonel Martin was Assistant Military Attache of our Embassy there.

Guests of honor wore floor-length black gowns —Mrs. Martin's was green—and all three wore corsage bouquets of roses. Lady Berendsen's gown was simply made with a short jacket and her flowers were red rosebuds and stephanotis. Mrs. Andrews had chosen a bustle back frock of crepe with lace top and long lace sleeves and a cluster

Continued … e 6, Column 4.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening programs this week and next at Symphony Hall.

[84]

Composers League

Koussevitzky Is Honored in Chamber Music Concert

LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS, concert at the Museum of Modern Art in honor of Serge Koussevitzky and the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Assisting artists: the Walden String Quartet (in residence at Cornell University); Benar Heifetz, cellist, and Erich Itor Kahn, pianist. Program of works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation:

Second String Quartet........William Bergsma
Eclogue ....Alexei Haieff
Capriccio ....Lukas Foss
Second String Quartet..........Robert Palmer

By Arthur V. Berger

The League of Composers playing host to Serge Koussevitzky last night in the auditorium of the Museum of Modern Art was in the nature of a reunion of two important and gratifying forces in the dissemination of contemporary music, and American music in particular. More than twenty years ago, as he reminisced in a brief talk after the intermission, Mr. Koussevitzky had conducted concerts for the league soon after his arrival here and shortly after the organization's inception. Last night he was honored as a non-participating guest, from the performance angle at least—a guest whose presence was acknowledged by a display of some of his beneficences. Five years ago, in memory of his wife, he established the Koussevitzky Foundation to consolidate his activities on behalf of American composers. While most of the works commissioned by the foundation are orchestral, and duly find their way into the repertory of his Boston Symphony Orchestra, some have been chamber works. And these were deployed last night, most of them for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his advisers have a flair for searching out the cream of American talent and four of the younger members of this category were represented. As programs of young composers go, this was a superior evening. But once this much has been granted I should like to voice a certain impatience with the academism that manifested itself in the two quartets that consumed the major part of the evening. William Bergsma is a fine craftsman and Robert Palmer has come upon inspirations that are energetic, original and tricky. But the cello works by Alexei Haieff and Lukas Foss, each little over five minutes in length, seemed to have a much better sense of music as an entity in time, as a dramatic progression of changing values in a fluid temporal continuum.

I must qualify my remarks by indicating that I was able to hear only a lengthy first movement and part of the second in the Palmer. But in what I heard of his music, he develops motives arduously along the worn-out lines (fugatos and all) in a desire to achieve unity over a broad span. If he did so with more distinction than Mr. Bergsma, he fell into some of the same predictable successions, and he kept on driving his points long after their relevancy was apprehended.

Mr. Haieff is the most spontaneous, least pretentious and, as craftsman, the most suave and imaginative of last night's composers. He is one of Stravinsky's most notable heirs, and, as a Russian by parentage, legitimately so. Mr. Foss needs more selectivity in weeding out the routine from his inspirations—such routine, for example, as the etude-like figures he gave the cello last night.

Scientists, Symphony To Lose Some Land

A strip of land 10 feet wide will be taken from the park in front of the Christian Science Church, and a three-foot strip of sidewalk will be out from in front of Symphony Hall, under plans announced by Mayor Curley today for improving traffic and parking conditions.

The plan is part of a program to widen Huntington avenue for traffic. Work will begin next month and will cost an estimated $16,000.

The widening will be done along a 600-foot stretch of the avenue between Norway and Gainsborough streets, the mayor said.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and several Christian Scientists met with the mayor to discuss the plans, with Dr. Koussevitzky urging the mayor not to take the three lower steps from Symphony Hall.

Hancock Sponsors ABC Boston Symphony Series

Making its debut in broadcasting, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. is sponsoring a series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over a Coast-to-Coast network of the American Broadcasting Co.

The first concert in the series will be broadcast from Symphony Hall in Boston Jan. 21.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We have waited a long time to experience again the extraordinary combination of Bruno Walter and the Boston Symphony. And when that greatly gifted conductor was here 24 years ago the orchestra was hardly the body that it is today, while the years have added to rather than detracted from Mr. Walter's stature. At today in the fullness of his powers.

No conductor of any age could have given a more fiery reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" than the one that so stirred yesterday's audience. And if any music is a young man's music, it is these glowing pages which Strauss penned before he had reached 25. Performances of this tone poem have long been of frequent occurrence at Symphony Hall, and many are the conductors who have interpreted it for us. Mr. Walter's projection of it, which seems at the moment the most eloquent of them all, was one that respected the music's structure, its superbly planned design, one that glowed with passion, that steadily ravished the ear and that in its intensely dramatic quality reminded us that Mr. Walter is as much at home in the pit of an opera house as on the concert platform.

This performance of the Strauss may have been in its way the climax of the concert but it was far from being all that the occasion had to offer. For the first time since 1910 we heard the beautiful "Oxford" Symphony of Haydn, and in a performance that heightened and enhanced its intrinsic loveliness and charm. Although the Minuet is not quite up to the level of the other three movements, this is one of the master's finest. Why, then, have we been deprived of it so long?

If "Don Juan" is a common experience at the Hall, Brahms' Second Symphony, the remaining number on this week's program, is a commoner one, and for some the yearly repetitions have tended to dull the music. Yet Mr. Walter made it fresh again. There was no straining after effect but, as with Haydn and Strauss, there was nothing in the score that went by the board and there was much that was transfigured by the warmth and understanding of Mr. Walter's approach. After all, this is his music; we are not made to feel that it has been translated into an alien tongue. Finally, the orchestra itself on this memorable afternoon sounded as we have seldom heard it. The players were both at their ease and above their usual selves. Mr. Walter neither drove them nor left them on their own. And in the midst of so much that was notable, a word must still be spoken for the horn playing of Mr. Valkenier. We had not properly appreciated it before.

Personally, I Think Sen. Barkley Should Shave It Immediately

By EVELYN PEYTON GORDON

HAVE you ever really met a great artist? Probably you have. But until last night I'd never seen one in action at a formal reception—and I mean one who acted like a human being. Boston's great Koussevitzky and his orchestra had taken the town by storm. And the maestro himself took society by storm later when he received a hundred or more guests at the French Embassy with the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet.

You see Koussevitzky is not a young man. But he has great charm. Greeting friends and admirers he was a simple man. "I am tired tonight. For three nights I've conducted. Tomorrow I must conduct again. It takes a great deal from me."

He's a strong looking man. But I noticed the veins of strain on his brow. He was a genial man, who held the receiving line a long time because he wanted to chat with each and every person who entered that embassy. The great Koussevitzky did not spare himself one dash!

Henri Bonnet, the host was ever present greeting guests as they arrived in the great hall of the embassy. Mme. Bonnet in beautiful black velvet . . . off-the-shoulders and made by her favorite French couturiere, Nina Ricci . . . stood with the maestro.

• • •

THE music-loving world was on hand . . . Mrs. Carroll Glover, Mrs. Robert Bacon, Mrs. Truxtun Beale, Mrs. "Pa" Watson, the great concert pianist in her own right making one of her first public appearances since the demise of the popular military aide to FDR.

Most popular of the guests was former Sen. Warren Austin. Next in line was Sen. Barkley, who discussed the question of his new mustache. "Some even say I look like Pat Hurley!" Personally I think he looks like Gen. Knudsen, and advocate the removal of the hirsute growth immediately.

There was a magnificent buffet. Even the extra butlers were enchanted." This cook of Mme. Bonnet's is better than any chef in town, and . . . she's a woman!" Rep. Edith Rogers, still intent on her veterans, which have been her pals since World War I, looked a little startled when Justice Felix Frankfurter addressed her as "my Congressman." I discovered later that it was because Mrs. Rogers' late husband had been at college with Frankfurter!

Veteran Sen. Joseph O'Mahoney can't find room on his Washington office wall for his most recent certificate of election. The legislator who first entered the Senate in 1933 is serving his third full term. Previously he had served a short term by appointment.

The very day that Commerce Secretary Averell Harriman's name went to the Senate for confirmation—despite the fact he'd been around the town and on the job for seven months—rumors were flying that Donald Nelson will be the next Commerce big-wig.

Beneke at Symphony Hall

Next Monday night the music of the late Glenn Miller will find a perfect setting at Boston's Symphony Hall where Tex Beneke will lead 35 of the world's greatest musicians and entertainers as they play a concert from 8 to 9 p. m. and then for dancing till 12:30. Beneke plays Tuesday at Lyonhurst in Marlboro . . . Bob Chester totes his trombone and band to the Grove in Manchester, N. H. next Wednesday and down at Roseland, Taunton, Thursday . . . Dancers from all sections north of Boston are finding the new Memorial Hall in Melrose an ideal Saturday night spot with Ted Herbert's band . . . Jess Stacy back on piano with Benny Goodman . . . Sam Donahue's band is touring theatres with the King Cole Trio . . . Woody Herman, Les Brown and Harry James on vacation in Hollywood but will soon be reorganizing . . . Andover, Lawrence and Haverhill dancers will flock to the Lowell Commodore tonight to enjoy Frankie Kahn's music . . . New faces continue to show up at Moseley's new spot in Dedham where Johnny McAteer holds forth on the ivories . . . Peter Chase at Lyonhurst tonight . . . Baron Hugo in 37th month at Totem Pole . . . Buddy Welcome is back with Mal Hallet tonight at the Symphony Ballroom . . . Syd Ross at Roseland, Taunton, tonight . . . Ray Belaire's orchestra is the current rave of Gus Peachy down at his Canoe Club Ballroom in West Bridgewater every Friday and Saturday.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We have waited a long time to experience again the extraordinary combination of Bruno Walter and the Boston Symphony. And when that greatly gifted conductor was here 24 years ago the orchestra was hardly the body that it is today, while the years have added to rather than detracted from Mr. Walter's stature. At 70 he is today in the fullness of his powers.

No conductor of any age could have given a more fiery reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" than the one that so stirred yesterday's audience. And if any music is a young man's music, it is these glowing pages which Strauss penned before he had reached 25. Performances of this tone poem have long been of frequent occurrence at Symphony Hall, and many are the conductors who have interpreted it for us. Mr. Walter's projection of it, which seems at the moment the most eloquent of them all, was one that respected the music's structure, its superbly planned design, one that glowed with passion, that steadily ravished the ear and that in its intensely dramatic quality reminded us that Mr. Walter is as much at home in the pit of an opera house as on the concert platform.

This performance of the Strauss may have been in its way the climax of the concert but it was far from being all that the occasion had to offer. For the first time since 1910 we heard the beautiful "Oxford" Symphony of Haydn, and in a performance that heightened and enhanced its intrinsic loveliness and charm. Although the Minuet is not quite up to the level of the other three movements, this is one of the master's finest. Why, then, have we been deprived of it so long?

If "Don Juan" is a common experience at the Hall, Brahms' Second Symphony, the remaining number on this week's program, is a commoner one, and for some the yearly repetitions have tended to dull the music. Yet Mr. Walter made it fresh again. There was no straining after effect but, as with Haydn and Strauss, there was nothing in the score that went by the board and there was much that was transfigured by the warmth and understanding of Mr. Walter's approach. After all, this is his music; we are not made to feel that it has been translated into an alien tongue. Finally, the orchestra itself on this

---

Society Hails Koussevitzky At Reception

By Marie McNair

WITH THE applause of an enthusiastic audience still ringing in his ears, Serge Koussevitzky went on from Constitution Hall last evening to the French Embassy for the reception in his honor given by the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet.

Most of the guests at the reception had heard the Boston Symphony Concert, had watched Mr. Koussevitzky's magic fingers lead his men through the familiar Fourth Symphony by Tschaikowsky, the difficult "La Mer" by Debussy, and Mendelssohn's beloved "Italian Symphony."

The Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet occupied a box, having among their guests the former Attorney General and Mrs. Francis Biddle.

Mrs. Robert Low Bacon had in her box former Senator and Mrs. Warren Austin, who are her guests for the week, the Austins having come down for the White House reception Tuesday evening from New York where Mr. Austin is now chief United States delegate to the United Nations Security Council.

With Judge and Mrs. George D. Neilson in their box were the Nicaraguan Ambassador, Dr. Guillermo Sevilla Sacasa; the Philippine Ambassador, Joaquin Elizadae, and Mrs. Tom Clark, wife of the Attorney General.

The Cuban Ambassador and Senora de Belt came in after their dinner party had broken up, and with them were the Brazilian Ambassador, Carlos Martins, and the Egyptian Ambassador and Mme. Hassan, who had been in the dinner company.

The Italian Ambassador and Signora Tarchiani were there and the Peruvian Ambassador and Senora de Prado, the Swiss Minister and Mme. Bruggmann, the New Zealand Minister and Lady Berendsen, the Honduran Ambassador and Senora de Caceres and the Swedish Minister and Mme. Eriksson.

O. Max Gardner, United States Ambassador to Great Britain, and Mrs. Gardner were in the gathering, and others were Justice and Mrs. Felix Frankfurter, Senator and Mrs. J. William Fulbright, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown; Senator and Mrs. Edward V. Robertson, the Undersecretary of War and Mrs. Kenneth Royall, Representative Edith Nourse Rogers, Representative and Mrs. Richard Wigglesworth and the Assistant Secretary of State and Mrs. Willard Thorp.

Representative and Mrs. Estes Kefauver were among those offering congratulations to Mr. Koussevitzky, and then there were Representative Sol Bloom and his daughter, Miss Vera Bloom; former Ambassador Joseph Grew and Mrs. Grew, Mr. and rs. C. C. Glover, jr.; Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Meyer, s. Warren Delano Robbins.

r. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, musically mind- rs. Truxtun Beale and Mrs. Leland Harrison in the group and—Jonkheer and Mme. Rene vinderen, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lippmann, Mrs. Herbert Elliston, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Ir. and Mrs. Andre Visson and Mr. and r A. Mowrer.

lar ladies of the Diplomatic Corps— endsen, wife of the Minister of New Mrs. Harry Andrews, wife of the inister—were the guests in whose les Fletcher Martin, wife of Col- rtained at tea yesterday at the nnumerable short stories, the itten three books, best known en Gods Pavilion" and "The e has spent much time abroad hen Colonel Martin was As- he of our Embassy there. re floor-length black gowns green—and all three wore roses. Lady Berendsen's with a short jacket and her uds and stephanotis. Mrs. bustle back frock of crepe lace sleeves and a cluster

6, Column 4.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening programs this week and next at Symphony Hall.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 13th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Oxford," No. 92 .... Haydn
"Don Juan," Tone Poem, Op. 20...Strauss
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It seems strange in the extreme that Bruno Walter has not conducted the Boston Symphony since 1923. A leader of acknowledged mastery, he has been available for an invitation to be guest conductor, but during all those years the Boston Symphony has not so availed itself. At any rate the omission has now been repaired, and yesterday we were privileged to welcome this great musician once again to Symphony Hall.

Mr. Walter's first program was a thoroughly conventional one, save that the Haydn Symphony had not been played here since 1910. But if the Strauss Tone Poem and the Brahms 2nd Symphony were familiar to all, the manner of their recreation was the reverse of humdrum. Especially notable was the performance of Strauss's "Don Juan," an amazingly eloquent and brilliant interpretation. In a way it was rather surprising that yesterday's audience applauded the Haydn with more warmth than it did the Strauss. I can only suppose that the Boston Symphony audiences have heard "Don Juan" so often that they have become a little blase about it. But what a performance!

Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony deserves more than one performance every 36 years. The witty and sparkling finale alone would merit more frequent attention to it. But all of the Symphony, as with all of Haydn's later works, is full of novel twists and delightful trouvailles. Mr. Walter, who is one of the world's greatest interpreters of Haydn and Mozart, secured a wonderfully just and clear performance, for which he was recalled many times to the stage.

Finally there was the Brahms 2nd Symphony for overflowing good measure. Everyone has his favorite ranking of the Brahms symphonies, in which amiable pastime I should put this one last. But if anyone could persuade a listener that he ought to amend his judgment, Mr. Walter is the magician to do so. The performance by exception with the Boston Symphony's work had a few orchestral blemishes, which will undoubtedly not reappear in subsequent repetitions tonight and next week.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Walter will again be guest conductor and will lead the orchestra in Wagner's "Faust" Overture, Mozart's G minor Symphony and Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 (in the original version).

The Problem of the Philharmonic

Artur Rodzinski's resignation as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, in spite of a proffered three-year contract, has brought into the open a "secret" that has long been common knowledge in the world of music. That secret is simply the fact that the manager of that orchestra, Mr. Arthur Judson, by reason of the force of his personality and of his powerful business associations, inevitably limits the freedom of the orchestra in its musical policy.

The business experience of Mr. Judson has not been questioned, any more than have the musical abilities of Dr. Rodzinski. What musicians are asking one another is whether any conductor of the Philharmonic can do a proper musical job under the circumstances. Certainly since its merger in 1922 with the New York Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Rodzinski is the first Philharmonic conductor to have essayed the assumption of full musical responsibility. Very probably he has manifested a bit of temperament here and there—though surely no more than most other artists of his power. It is his contention that the management has been overbearing out of all proportion to what is beneficial to good music making.

The Philharmonic has the largest budget and one of the heaviest concert schedules of any orchestra in the country. Its advantages and its responsibilities mark it for a musical position second to none. They require, as well, if that position is to be maintained, that the musical director, the business management and the board of directors co-operate loyally. Mr. Judson's business occupations are many. As president of Arthur Judson, Inc., a concert management handling a great many musical artists, including several hundred conductors, and as president also of the Columbia Concerts Corporation, a consortium of managements, he is both a busy man and a star of some magnitude in his own right.

The suitability of his managing the Philharmonic has long been questioned. Dr. Rodzinski's refusal of a long-term contract as musical director of the organization has aroused, under the circumstances, much favorable comment. To have exposed the orchestra's weak spot (weak from excess of strength) is a courageous gesture. It is to be devoutly hoped by all music lovers that the board of directors will take serious thought before refusing to remedy a situation that has long been recognized as unfavorable to music. The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra occupies too important a position in the musical life of the community to be compromised by any alliance that hampers its musical independence.

Dr. Kaussevitzky Conducted Rarely Heard Orchestral Works

Herald 1/14/47

The ceond Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took plans before a capacity audience Friday night in the Opera House of the Academy of Music.

Dr. Serge Kousevitzky conducted a program of three rarely heard orchestral works: 'Metamorphosen,' by Richard Strauss, a Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra by the contemporary Czech composer, Bahuslav Martinu, and "Harold in Italy," a symphony by Berliox. The soloists in the Martinu work were Lukas Foss and Bernard Ziphera, pianists. The viold solo in the Berlioz symphony was played by Jascha Veissi.

Box No. 1, originally reserved by Mrs. Edward G. Blum, was occupied by Miss Anna Alexandre of Manhattan, and friends.

Mrs. Dea Osborne, hostess in Box. No. 2, entertained the Judge James M. Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, Mr. and Mrs Alfred Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Robertson and Mrs. Thomas Frohne.

Box No. 3 was occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince and her guests: Dr. and Mrs. John Howland Lathrop. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Courtenay Hoge, Jr. Dr.and Mrs. Mrs. Kastendieck, Mrs. Karp P. Mikalenkoff, Leslie Hodgson and Charles R. Breer.

Members of the Brooklyn Womens Club were seated in Box No. 4; Miss Mary E. Tuthill, president; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, vice president; Mrs. B. Parks Gooden, Mrs. Wm. E. Howes, Mrs. Robert F Ives, Mrs. Henry Wilbur Gross, Miss Lois Pinney Clark and Mrs. Henry J. Nauer

Seated in Box No. 5 ere Miss Ema Jessie Ogg, Miss Jessie Lockitt, and her guest, Miss Anne Mackey, Mrs. William B. Parker, and her guests. Miss Kathryn Parker, Miss Patricia Root, and Miss Jean Long.

Box No. 7 as occupied by members of the United Nations personnel, who were guests of the Brooklyn committee fo rthe Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Haughton Btll, chairman.

Tickets for Box No. 8 were given by the Institute to officers of the United States Naval Station in Brooklyn.

The third concert of the 1946-1947 season will take place on Feb. 14.

Reception at French Embassy Honors Distinguished Musician

By Katharine M. Brooks

"This is Massachusetts Night, isn't it?" said Representative Edith Nourse Rogers to Mrs. Felix Frankfurter as they arrived at the French Embassy last evening. The occasion was a very delightful reception given by the French Ambassador and Mrs. Henri Bonnet in honor of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The invitations were for "10 o'clock—after the concert" and many of the guests arrived before Mr. Koussevitsky.

The Ambassador and Mrs. Bonnet stood at the door of the large drawing room on the west side of the Embassy to receive until the arrival of their honor guest. Then Mrs. Bonnet stood with Mr. Koussevitsky in the handsomely paneled room opposite the front door, and presented the guests to him.

Before the revolution in Russia Mr. Koussevitsky maintained his own orchestra and acted as conductor. Following the overthrow of the Czar the Soviet took his wealth, but he continued to conduct concerts for which the government remunerated him. This was not satisfactory to him and he went to Paris. There he gave "Koussevitsky concerts" each season until the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought him to this country. Mr. Koussevitsky was a talented artist of the double bass before developing his gifts as a conductor.

The two hundred or more guests were representative of Capital society—those particularly interested in the best in music. Mrs. Bonnet, always gracious and charming, made a graceful picture in a black gown of taffeta with satin stripes, made with full skirt and dropped shoulders. A large star set with diamonds was pinned in the narrow bertha-like band of the neckline. She wore no other jewels.

The Peruvian Ambassador and Mrs. Jorge Prado were among the early arrivals extolling the music they had just heard. Mrs. Prado wore an unusual costume of gold color satin having long sleeves and built high in the neck and buttoned down the back with tiny emerald green buttons matching her suede gloves. About her neck hung a string of jade beads and tiny crystals.

The permanent chairman for the United States at the United Nations and Mrs. Warren R. Austin also arrived early, the latter expressing the wish that they could stay longer in Washington but promising to be back as often as possible.

The minority leader of the Upper House of Congress, Senator Alben W. Barkley was there, though he admitted he had missed the concert. Leaders in music circles in Washington predominated last evening and among them were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Carroll Glover, the latter chairman of the Woman's Committee of the National Symphony Orchestra, and the founder of that committee, Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe. Also from that group was Mrs. Truxtun Beale, chairman of the entertainment branch.

A delicious buffet supper was served in the dining room at 11 o'clock and about the prettily appointed table were the Panamanian Ambassador and Mrs. J. J. Vallarino, the Cuban Ambassador and Mrs. Guillermo Belt, the Italian Ambassador and Mrs. Alberto Tarchiani, Lady Berenden, the Swedisn Minister and Mrs. Herman Eriksson and the Swiss Minister and Mrs. Charles Bruggman.

Stately Mrs. J. Borden Harriman was telling interested listeners about the fun of having her granddaughter and her young children with her and Mr. and Mrs. George Maurice Morris came in from the concert. Mrs. Morris told of their proposed trip to South America and that her mother, Mrs. Wilbur W. Hubbard, would probably fly to Mexico City while they are gone.

Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, a devotee of music in its highest forms, kept her short chinchilla cape about her shoulders and Miss Carolyn Nash was discussing with old friends her proposed trip abroad next summer. Others at the delightful fete last evening were Mr. and Mrs. Leslie L. Biffle, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Feis, the latter wearing her hair piled high on her head; Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mr. and Mrs. Barnet Nover, Miss Irene Boyle, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Meyer and Mrs. Jouett Shouse, the latter wearing intriguing spectacles with white plastic rims studded with tiny diamonds.

GASTONIA, N. C.
GAZETTE

New Books On Music

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC, by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard;) $3); THE LIFE AND WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, by John N. Burk (Modern Library; $1.10).

It's Boston's turn today in the book column as it is so very often Boston's turn in a music column; the Bay State's illustrious conductor is the subject of one volume and his orchestra's historian is the author of the other.

From 1924, when Russian-born Koussevitzky assumed his present post, to 1944, according to Leichtentritt's count, the Boston Symphony played for its fortunate audiences 66 new American compositions for the first time, and in all 162 American works. Though these figures are of course very small compared to the total number programmed, they probably break all records set by other orchestras, and that is eternally to Koussevitzky's credit.

Of these compositions, 12 were by E. B. Hill, 11 by Aaron Copland, nine by Ernest Bloch, nine by Walter Piston, and so on. Whether by older men like Hill and Hadley, or by their juniors such as Copland, Schuman, Bernstein and Barber, the compositions are briefly analyzed and assigned their places in our general musical scene. Among other judgments unlikely to start any argument are the high rank given to Martinu's First Symphony, Piston's Second and Harris' Third, and the primacy accorded Copland's "Appalachian Spring" among his other works.

The author speaks with some reservations, however, about Copland and Bernstein, and dismisses Antheil, Varese and Ives somewhat brusquely. His chapter on "Artist Koussevitzky," as conductor, is not too helpful. In general he tends to assume that American music and Boston music are synonymous. Chicago, Philadelphia and New York are apt sourly to wish he had got around a little more. . . but the fact is, if you live in Boston, you don't need to.

Burk's book, first published in 1943, is divided about evenly between biography and a catalogued description of the 135 numbered works plus some others.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Bruno Walter made his long and pleasantly anticipated appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. This is not his first visit to us as a symphonic conductor, for he directed Boston's orchestra in 1923.

This time the elder statesman among conductors will be with us for two weeks. Then he will return late in March for another fortnight. Mr. Walter's first program is mostly familiar and conservative, but good. The first number, however — Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony, and one of his greatest—is conservative rather than familiar, for the last performances of it by this orchestra were in 1910. The other items are Strauss' "Don Juan" and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

It is extremely rewarding to have heard, within a month, three great conductors, a Frenchman (Charles Munch), a Russian (Mr. Koussevitzky), and a German (Mr. Walter). They are all great and they are completely different, one from another. Mr. Walter, by temperament and training, goes back to the classic succession of German conductors in the 19th century. He makes everything "sing" and everything clear, down to the least obtrusive inner voice.

As one member of the audience, who knew, said: "This reminds me more than anything else of the days when Dr. Muck conducted the Boston Symphony." The essence of Walter's technical and interpretive character is a blend of romanticism and simplicity, mellow rather than dramatic classic rather than spectacular.

He is inclined to slow tempi, and for me the last movement of the Brahms Symphony was mannered because it went so slowly. Yet it is extraordinary how the rhythms pulse under his straightforward beat and how Haydn can sound so timeless when played without interpretive complications. "Don Juan" can be made to sound much more involved, even neurotic, but the broad sweep and healthy vigor of a Walter performance makes it as passionate as you could wish. No one would realize, either by Mr. Walter's appearance or the rich, vibrant tone which he obtains, that he passed his 70th birthday last September.

Unlike most of the guests, who do not alter Mr. Koussevitzky's individual seating of the orchestra, Mr. Walter temporarily placed first violins on the audience's left, the seconds on the right; behind the seconds, the violas, and behind the first, the cellos. Some expert opinion to the contrary, I think that the Walter arrangement cuts down the volume of the violas. But that is a small matter.

AUS DER MUSIKWELT

Von WOLFGANG STRESEMANN

Koussevitzky dirigiert Strauss' "Metamorphosen"

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, dem wir so viele interessante Erstaufführungen verdanken, dirigierte am Sonnabend nachmittag in Carnegie Hall eine neue Komposition von Richard Strauß, die sich "Metamorphosen" nennt und die für 23 Solo-Streicher (10 Violinen, 5 Bratschen und Celli und drei Kontrabässe) geschrieben ist. Das Werk, daß der über 80jährige Strauß im Winter 1944/45 komponiert hat, wurde vor rund einem Jahre in Zürich in Anwesenheit des Komponisten uraufgeführt.

Es ist selbstverständlich schwer, wenn nicht unmöglich, ein endgültiges Urteil über ein Werk von der Dauer von 26 Minuten nach einmaligem Anhören abzugeben, insbesondere, wenn es sich um die Schöpfung eines Genies handelt. Wohl aber läßt sich ein erster Eindruck wiedergeben und dieser besagt im Falle der "Metamorphosen": Richard Strauß ist ein großer Wurf gelungen. Er hat ein erschütterndes, tiefes Werk geschrieben, das mit seinen früheren Schöpfungen kaum etwas zu tun hat, das geradezu einen neuen Stil in seinem Schaffen aufweist und das in Form und Inhalt eine wahre Meisterleistung darstellt. Wir haben in den letzten 20 Jahren viele Kompositionen von Strauß gehört, die eine deutliche Abnahme der Erfindung offenbarten. Man hat daher den Komponisten vielfach zum alten Eisen geworfen. Aber mit diesem Werk hat er bewiesen, daß sein Genie nicht ausgelöscht war, sondern daß es offenbar nur einer neuen Anregung, eines großen Erlebnisses bedurfte. Das furchtbare Schicksal seines Vaterlandes und das Ende "seiner Welt" haben Strauß schwer erschüttert. Die Frucht dieser Erschütterung ist offensichtlich seine neue Komposition, die zu den tragischsten gehört, die je gschrieben worden sind.

Das Werk, das ohne Unterbrechung gespielt wird, zerfällt formell in drei Teile. Es beginnt mit einem dunklen Adagio in C-Moll. Dieses geht allmählich in ein lichteres C-Dur (Allegro) über. In dem Augenblick aber, in dem der Höhepunkt des Dur-Teiles erreicht ist, bricht erneut die tragische Stimmung des Adagio durch, die sich dann bis zum Schluß im Rahmen einer freien Reprise mit Coda behauptet. Der Titel "Metamorphosen" deutet auf den Aufbau der Komposition: es handelt sich um fortlaufende Neu- und Umgestaltungen von verschiedenen Hauptthemen in einer kunstvollen Verarbeitung, die die letzte Meisterschaft von Strauß verrät. Auch von dieser Partitur darf man getrost sagen: Nur ein Richard Strauß konnte sie schreiben!

Was nun die Musik selbst anbetrifft, so finden wir kaum irgendwelche Anklänge an jene brillanten Klänge und Melodien, mit denen der Komponist sich seiner Zeit die Welt eroberte. Man hat ihm oft mit Recht zum Vorwurf gemacht, daß seine Musik der Tiefe entbehre, sich bisweilen zu sehr dem Trivialen nähere. Diesen Vorwurf kann man bei den "Metamorphosen" nicht mehr erheben. Denn die Musik zu dieser Komposition ist in erster Linie nach innen gekehrt, sie ist bisweilen geradezu grüblerisch und ihr oft ganz verklärter, in dem Dur-Teil beseeligter Laut ist dem Virtuosen gänzlich abgewandt. Strauß' Tonsprache hat vieles mit den letzten Werken großer Komponisten gemeinsam. Auch er nimmt Abschied von der Welt. Er hat in den "Metamorphosen" sein eigenes Requiem geschrieben und zugleich auch das für sein Vaterland, dessen Zertrümmerung er bei der Niederschrift der Komposition miterleben mußte. "In memoriam", so heißt es am Ende der Partitur. Auf wen sich dieses Gedenken bezieht, hat Strauß nicht mitgeteilt. Aber man dürfte nicht fehlgehen, wenn man diese Worte auf das Deutschland bezieht, in dem er einstmals glücklichere Tage gesehen hat. Die ergreifende Tragik der Musik, deren Intensität an die des von Strauß am Ende zitierten Eroica-Trauermarsches heranreicht, spricht dafür, daß dieses Werk unter dem Eindruck der deutschen Katastrophe geschrieben wurde, mit dem Strauß seinen eigenen Abschiedsgesang verbunden hat.

Unendlich viel mehr ließe sich über diese elegische und gleichzeitig aufwühlende Komposition sagen, besonders auch über die eigenartige Behandlung der 23 Soloinstrumente, die das Stück rein äußerlich zu einem Kammermusikwerk stempelt, für das Carnegie Hall an sich zu groß ist. Doch beschränken wir uns in diesem Augenblick auf die Feststellung, daß dieser ersten Komposition, die aus Deutschland nach dem zweiten Weltkrieg zu uns kommt, von einer wunderbaren seelischen und geistigen Größe ist, und daß wir Dr. Serge Koussevitzky zu tiefstem Dank dafür verpflichtet sind, daß er die "Metamorphosen" auf seine Programme gesetzt hat. Er dirigiert das Werk mit großartiger Intensität, und verstand es meisterhaft, den Inhalt der Komposition plastisch herauszubringen. Er verdient aber auch dafür Anerkennung, daß er den Mut hatte, überhaupt ein neues Werk von Richard Strauß aufzuführen, das in der "Nazi-Zeit" komponiert worden ist. Er hat damit zum Ausdruck gebracht, daß schöpferische Kunst und Politik grundsätzlich nichts miteinander zu tun haben, eine Erkenntnis, die diejenigen beherzigen sollten, die nach wie vor alle deutschen Komponisten, die unter den Nazis gelebt haben, boykottieren wollen.

Auf dem glänzend aufgebauten Programm stand weiterhin Martinus "Concerto Grosso" für Kammerorchester und zwei Klaviere, einem frischen und kraftvollen Werk, das von dem Orchester und den beiden Pianisten Lukas Foss und Bernard Zighera unter der anfeuernden Leitung des Dirigenten mit schönem Schwung gespielt wurde. — Nach der Pause gab es Berlioz' "Harald in Italien." Das selten gespielte Werk ist in dieser Saison nun bereits zweimal aufgeführt worden, nachdem Toscanini es als Hauptnummer für sein diesjähriges Eröffnungskonzert bei NBC gewählt hatte. Wir müssen gestehen, daß uns die blutvolle, romantisch, leidenschaftliche Wiedergabe des Werks durch Dr. Koussevitzky weit mehr beeindruckt hat, als mehr sachliche Aufführung bei NBC. Ausgezeichnete Tempi, dramatische Spannung und außerordentliche Klangeffekte zeichneten die Interpretationsleistung von Koussevitzky aus, da auch Solist Jascha Veissi seinen Bratschenpart mit großer Klangschönheit und Musikalität spielte, gab es eine Aufführung, die mitriß und die von der Meisterschaft des Orchesters und ihres Dirigenten erneut Zeugnis ablegte.

Ein denkwürdiges Konzert!

Music

Boston Symphony, Dame Myra Hess Appear at Met

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented Dame Myra Hess as soloist last evening at the second concert of the series at the Metropolitan Theatre. Serge Koussevitzky conducted and as at the opening concert, even standing room was at a premium. The audience stood as the distinguished English pianist came on the stage. The record of her wartime concerts in the National Gallery is a legend by now. The record of her musicianship is still being written and a brilliant page of the story was reached last evening as she played the Beethoven Concerto in G with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

The program:

Beethoven
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Mendelsshon
Symphony in A major, No. 4, "Italian," Op. 90
I. Allegro vivace
II. Andante con moto
III. Con moto moderato
IV. Saltarello: presto
INTERMISSION
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
Nuages
Fetes
Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 4 in G major, Op. 58
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante con moto
III. Rondo, vivace

Soloist
DAME MYRA HESS

The "Egmont" Overture made a splendid opening for the concert. The solid writing of the Beethoven score settled the listeners into a receptive mood and the familiar themes were clearly presented.

The Mendelssohn Symphony was never more skillfully played. The affable and pleasant first movement was followed by the wistful Andante. Viola tones of exquisite quality shared the honors with the two flutes. It was in the Saltarello that the orchestra outdid itself in virtuosity. The clever phrases were tossed about from choir to choir with breathless speed. This performance brought an ovation for the orchestra.

A reading of the two Debussy Nocturnes, quite up to the usual standard, followed and this delightful excursion away from the romantic school of writing served its clever purpose. It afforded the opportunity to let one's imagination wander with the gossamer clouds and the carnival crowds.

When the stage was arranged for the piano concerto, there was a breathless moment until the entrance of Dame Myra. She played the Beethoven as it will seldom be heard in a lifetime of concert going. Clarity, tonal beauty and rhythmic verve seem trite phrases to use. It was in the slow movement that the greatness of her art was apparent. In simple fashion she stated anew the lasting qualities of beauty. Her statement somehow included Beethoven, Koussevitzky, the orchestra and us.

Page THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1947

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein is back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his program for the week includes one of the great—if still disputed — masterpieces of this century: "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Igor Stravinsky. The other numbers are Gluck's Overture to "Alceste" (in the edition of Felix Weingartner), and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The exceptional talents of young Mr. Bernstein are still undergoing development and refinement on the evidence of his performances yesterday. He still prefers to work without a baton, and, as in the Beethoven Symphony, without a score before him when he feels that is proper. He still naturally shows the resilient vigor of youth, but he also showed, especially in Beethoven, an authority both of style and interpretation which he has not had before to such a degree.

I could not help feeling, through the course of the Seventh Symphony, that perhaps a good deal of Beethoven, this symphony included, is perhaps more young than old men's music. While there were a few places in the last movement that were a bit raw, and while that surging dance rhythm seemed to run away with him (as it often does with more experienced conductors), I nevertheless felt that his Beethoven touches the fundamentals of expression.

Everything "sang," and in the fast movements everything "danced"; most of the time the texture was clear and the sound evenly balanced. He avoided the tempting pitfall of making the allegretto either too fast or too slow; the trio of the scherzo was retarded just enough for contrast, but it never dragged. His Gluck had the right tempo and interpretive approach. (A less discerning man would have borne down more heavily on those three trombones which lend such weight of drama to the score.)

But it was in "Le Sacre du Printemps," that fiendishly difficult work, with tricky rhythms, changing metrical signatures and irregular accents that Mr. Bernstein really showed his technical mettle. Here there was no question of surface refinement or polished sound; what mattered was the insistent rhythm, the proper speed and the force of accents. Mr. Bernstein came through handsomely, and his performance had a "bite" not only appropriate but which added an extra thrill to music that, paradoxically, represents a peak of intellectual organization and an extreme of primitive, even visceral feeling.

Although I did not observe everyone in the hall, my eyes being glued to Stravinsky's score, I did not see anyone walk out on the grinding dissonances of "Le Sacre du Printemps." In fact, some of the older subscribers were heard to express delight with what was once considered a tonal nightmare. Evidently time will fix everything. Hurray!

CHICAGO, ILL.
DIAPASON

FEB 1 - 1947

PRESENT NEW WORK FOR ORGAN AND STRINGS

WALTER PISTON'S PRELUDE and Allegro for organ and strings is here being studied by the composer, and by the organist and the director of the orchestra playing the new American work. In the picture, reading from left to right, are Serge Koussevitzky, Mr. Piston and E. Power Biggs. The music was written in 1943 and is dedicated to Mr. Biggs. After a first performance on the Columbia System Sunday broadcasts, Mr. Koussevitzky programmed the work extensively with the Boston Symphony in Boston, New York and on the radio. It was the featured work of the occasion on which Koussevitzky was made an honorary associate by the American Guild of Organists.

In tunefulness and spirit this Prelude and Allegro is rated as a contemporary masterpiece. It is an example of modern writing in classic style. The organ part of the Prelude is in the form of a canon and the Allegro a classic toccata. The work is described as a modern counterpart of Mozart in its charm and melody and, unlike much modern music, is readily enjoyable. Thus a contemporary American composer continues and develops the form of organ music with instruments—a form made popular by Arcangelo Corelli in his trio-sonatas and developed by Handel in his concertos.

A recording of the new work is set for release by Victor in March. This is believed to mark the first recording of organ music by a major symphony orchestra.

Mr. Biggs, English-born concert organist, celebrates his tenth anniversary in this country as an American citizen this season. First and only organist to be signed by Columbia Concerts, Inc., he is just now on a recital tour which takes him from Florida all the way to Los Angeles and the Pacific Northwest. His schedule avoids any conflict with the regular Sunday programs over CBS.

Herald Feb 1, '47

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Alceste" ....Gluck
"Le Sacre du Printemps" ....Stravinsky
Symphony No. 7 in A minor Op 92 Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. Bernstein yesterday gave us a most brilliant concert which promises well for the future ones he will conduct. Not that anyone had expected less than brilliance from this talented conductor, and the fact was that there was much more to his interpretations yesterday than that often over-rated and over-sought quality. To begin with the last, I have seldom if ever heard a finer or more eloquent performance of the Beethoven 7th Symphony. This work, known to and beloved by all, was presented with complete understanding and no overstatement.

Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps is nowadays to most of us, if still not to all, an old friend and, moreover, one whose renewed acquaintance brings increased pleasure. It is an astonishing masterpiece of rhythm. Its discords, which still shock the unprepared or unsympathetic listener, are a necessary adjunct to the artistic idea for which Stravinsky was striving. Nor does the Sacre in any sense date, and it has had some 34 years of buffeting in the musical world.

It is still a most difficult work to perform and conduct. Mr. Bernstein secured the most clean-cut rhythmical performance that I can recall. The music became amazingly clear, as it was when Mr. Koussevitzky last played it in 1939. Mr. Bernstein never seemed for a moment at a loss through the maze of changing tempi which must make any conductor sweat beforehand. With only one detail would I quarrel. In the flute melody after the short English horn theme in the second part Mr. Bernstein injected a "blues" feeling to the music which I am sure was not in Stravinsky's mind in 1912. But that is a minor and disputable blemish in a magnificent performance.

This admirable concert opened with a splendid performance of Gluck's nobly tragic Overture to "Alceste," a piece which has unaccountably never been played before at a Boston Symphony concert.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Bernstein will conduct Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto (with Ruth Posselt as soloist) and Schubert's 7th Symphony.

Post Feb 1, '47

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's young protege, 29-year-old Leonard Bernstein, had charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the first of a series of concerts he will conduct during Dr. Koussevitzky's absence. The case of Mr. Bernstein, whose meteoric rise to fame a few years ago was the talk of several towns, can't be casually dismissed with a few of the usual general remarks. He presents something of a giant question mark to the interested observer.

The program he had chosen for this concert ranged from Gluck's overture to "Alceste" through Beethoven's dance symphony, the Seventh. In between came Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" which gave the conductor an excellent opportunity to display the development of his conducting technique since he was last here. And, indeed, the co-ordinated and controlled use of his hands and body are a pleasure to watch, even though much of it is unadulterated Koussevitzky.

Both the Overture to "Alceste" and the Seventh Symphony were played with a charming precision. The opportunity to make more of them than that was not utilized because of Mr. Bernstein's almost dangerous penchant to concentrate exclusively on rhythm and sensuous sound. But with "Le Sacre" he shone brilliantly. Brittle, brutal rhythms often in conflicting juxtaposition and weird flashes of orchestral colors were made the most of. The jazz influence in Mr. Bernstein's career helped him considerably in the execution of this work. Incidentally, the deliberately brutal qualities in this composition that caused such a sensation in its Paris premiere have been considerably mitigated by time. In fact only one person was seen to leave the hall during its performance visibly shaken by the proceedings. With all that there is still no doubt that time has not lessened the difficulties of conducting and playing the music.

Three factors in particular make it difficult to write a sound review of Mr. Bernstein's ability as a conductor. In the first place he hasn't been heard conducting over a considerable length of time in a variety of works that would reveal all facets of his personality. Secondly, he hits neither the heights as a great conductor showing flashes of imaginative inspiration nor does he fall to the lowest depths of inadequacy. He has what may be a superficial brilliance and a tremendous poise that make it extremely difficult to evaluate him. In the third place he has only been heard (by this reviewer) to conduct what—to paraphrase Dr. Koussevitzky—is already a perfectly trained organ of expert musicians.

To sum it up best, perhaps you can say tentatively that diligent effort, a certain amount of obvious talent and quick facility, the most expert instruction available and the opportunity to conduct the best orchestras in the country have earned Mr. Bernstein a rapid reputation that he has so far succeeded in living up to.

Feb 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's young protege, 29-year-old Leonard Bernstein, had charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the first of a series of concerts he will conduct during Dr. Koussevitzky's absence. The case of Mr. Bernstein, whose meteoric rise to fame a few years ago was the talk of several towns, can't be casually dismissed with a few of the usual general remarks. He presents something of a giant question mark to the interested observer.

The program he had chosen for this concert ranged from Gluck's overture to "Alceste" through Beethoven's dance symphony, the Seventh. In between came Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" which gave the conductor an excellent opportunity to display the development of his conducting technique since he was last here. And, indeed, the co-ordinated and controlled use of his hands and body are a pleasure to watch, even though much of it is unadulterated Koussevitzky.

Both the Overture to "Alceste" and the Seventh Symphony were played with a charming precision. The opportunity to make more of them than that was not utilized because of Mr. Bernstein's almost dangerous penchant to concentrate exclusively on rhythm and sensuous sound. But with "Le Sacre" he shone brilliantly. Brittle, brutal rhythms often in conflicting juxtaposition and weird flashes of orchestral colors were made the most of. The jazz influence in Mr. Bernstein's career helped him considerably in the execution of this work. Incidentally, the deliberately brutal qualities in this composition that caused such a sensation in its Paris premiere have been considerably mitigated by time. In fact only one person was seen to leave the hall during its performance visibly shaken by the proceedings. With all that there is still no doubt that time has not lessened the difficulties of conducting and playing the music.

Three factors in particular make it difficult to write a sound review of Mr. Bernstein's ability as a conductor. In the first place he hasn't been heard conducting over a considerable length of time in a variety of works that would reveal all facets of his person-

a Feb 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Alceste" ....Gluck
"Le Sacre du Printemps" ....Stravinsky
Symphony No. 7 in A minor Op 92 Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. Bernstein yesterday gave us a most brilliant concert which promises well for the future ones he will conduct. Not that anyone had expected less than brilliance from this talented conductor, and the fact was that there was much more to his interpretations yesterday than that often over-rated and over-sought quality. To begin with the last, I have seldom if ever heard a finer or more eloquent performance of the Beethoven 7th Symphony. This work, known to and beloved by all, was presented with complete understanding and no overstatement.

Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps is nowadays to most of us, if still not to all, an old friend and, moreover, one whose renewed acquaintance brings increased pleasure. It is an astonishing masterpiece of rhythm. Its discords, which still shock the unprepared or unsympathetic listener, are a necessary adjunct to the artistic idea for which Stravinsky was striving. Nor does the Sacre in any sense date, and it has had some 34 years of buffeting in the musical world.

It is still a most difficult work to perform and conduct. Mr. Bernstein secured the most clean-cut rhythmical performance that I can recall. The music became amazingly clear, as it was when Mr. Koussevitzky last played it in 1939. Mr. Bernstein never seemed for a moment at a loss through the maze of changing tempi which must make any conductor sweat beforehand. With only one detail would I quarrel. In the flute melody after the short English horn theme in the second part Mr. Bernstein injected a "blues" feeling to the music which I am sure was not in Stravinsky's mind in 1912. But that is a minor and disputable blemish in a magnificent performance.

This admirable concert opened with a splendid performance of Gluck's nobly tragic Overture to "Alceste," a piece which has unaccountably never been played before at a Boston Symphony concert.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Bernstein will conduct Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto (with Ruth Posselt as soloist) and Schubert's 7th Symphony.

CHICAGO, ILL.
DIAPASON

FEB 1 - 1947

PRESENT NEW WORK FOR ORGAN AND STRINGS

WALTER PISTON'S PRELUDE and Allegro for organ and strings is here being studied by the composer, and by the organist and the director of the orchestra playing the new American work. In the picture, reading from left to right, are Serge Koussevitzky, Mr. Piston and E. Power Biggs. The music was written in 1943 and is dedicated to Mr. Biggs. After a first performance on the Columbia System Sunday broadcasts, Mr. Koussevitzky programmed the work extensively with the Boston Symphony in Boston, New York and on the radio. It was the featured work of the occasion on which Koussevitzky was made an honorary associate by the American Guild of Organists.

In tunefulness and spirit this Prelude and Allegro is rated as a contemporary masterpiece. It is an example of modern writing in classic style. The organ part of the Prelude is in the form of a canon and the Allegro a classic toccata. The work is described as a modern counterpart of Mozart in its charm and melody and, unlike much modern music, is readily enjoyable. Thus a contemporary American composer continues and develops the form of organ music with instruments—a form made popular by Arcangelo Corelli in his trio-sonatas and developed by Handel in his concertos.

A recording of the new work is set for release by Victor in March. This is believed to mark the first recording of organ music by a major symphony orchestra.

Mr. Biggs, English-born concert organist, celebrates his tenth anniversary in this country as an American citizen this season. First and only organist to be signed by Columbia Concerts, Inc., he is just now on a recital tour which takes him from Florida all the way to Los Angeles and the Pacific Northwest. His schedule avoids any conflict with the regular Sunday programs over CBS.

Post Feb 1, '47

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's young protege, 29-year-old Leonard Bernstein, had charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the first of a series of concerts he will conduct during Dr. Koussevitzky's absence. The case of Mr. Bernstein, whose meteoric rise to fame a few years ago was the talk of several towns, can't be casually dismissed with a few of the usual general remarks. He presents something of a giant question mark to the interested observer.

The program he had chosen for this concert ranged from Gluck's overture to "Alceste" through Beethoven's dance symphony, the Seventh. In between came Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" which gave the conductor an excellent opportunity to display the development of his conducting technique since he was last here. And, indeed, the co-ordinated and controlled use of his hands and body are a pleasure to watch, even though much of it is unadulterated Koussevitzky.

Both the Overture to "Alceste" and the Seventh Symphony were played with a charming precision. The opportunity to make more of them than that was not utilized because of Mr. Bernstein's almost dangerous penchant to concentrate exclusively on rhythm and sensuous sound. But with "Le Sacre" he shone brilliantly. Brittle, brutal rhythms often in conflicting juxtaposition and weird flashes of orchestral colors were made the most of. The jazz influence in Mr. Bernstein's career helped him considerably in the execution of this work. Incidentally, the deliberately brutal qualities in this composition that caused such a sensation in its Paris premiere have been considerably mitigated by time. In fact only one person was seen to leave the hall during its performance visibly shaken by the proceedings. With all that there is still no doubt that time has not lessened the difficulties of conducting and playing the music.

Three factors in particular make it difficult to write a sound review of Mr. Bernstein's ability as a conductor. In the first place he hasn't been heard conducting over a considerable length of time in a variety of works that would reveal all facets of his personality. Secondly, he hits neither the heights as a great conductor showing flashes of imaginative inspiration nor does he fall to the lowest depths of inadequacy. He has what may be a superficial brilliance and a tremendous poise that make it extremely difficult to evaluate him. In the third place he has only been heard (by this reviewer) to conduct what—to paraphrase Dr. Koussevitzky—is already a perfectly trained organ of expert musicians.

To sum it up best, perhaps you can say tentatively that diligent effort, a certain amount of obvious talent and quick facility, the most expert instruction available and the opportunity to conduct the best orchestras in the country have earned Mr. Bernstein a rapid reputation that he has so far succeeded in living up to.

Herald Feb 1, '47

THE

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Alceste"	Gluck
"Le Sacre du Printemps"	Stravinsky
Symphony No. 7 in A minor Op 92	Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. Bernstein yesterday gave us a most brilliant concert which promises well for the future ones he will conduct. Not that anyone had expected less than brilliance from this talented conductor, and the fact was that there was much more to his interpretations yesterday than that often over-rated and over-sought quality. To begin with the last, I have seldom if ever heard a finer or more eloquent performance of the Beethoven 7th Symphony. This work, known to and beloved by all, was presented with complete understanding and no overstatement.

Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps is nowadays to most of us, if still not to all, an old friend and, moreover, one whose renewed acquaintance brings increased pleasure. It is an astonishing masterpiece of rhythm. Its discords, which still shock the unprepared or unsympathetic listener, are a necessary adjunct to the artistic idea for which Stravinsky was striving. Nor does the Sacre in any sense date, and it has had some 34 years of buffeting in the musical world.

It is still a most difficult work to perform and conduct. Mr. Bernstein secured the most clean-cut rhythmical performance that I can recall. The music became amazingly clear, as it was when Mr. Koussevitzky last played it in 1939. Mr. Bernstein never seemed for a moment at a loss through the maze of changing tempi which must make any conductor sweat beforehand. With only one detail would I quarrel. In the flute melody after the short English horn theme in the second part Mr. Bernstein injected a "blues" feeling to the music which I am sure was not in Stravinsky's mind in 1912. But that is a minor and disputable blemish in a magnificent performance.

This admirable concert opened with a splendid performance of Gluck's nobly tragic Overture to "Alceste," a piece which has unaccountably never been played before at a Boston Symphony concert.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Bernstein will conduct Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto (with Ruth Posselt as soloist) and Schubert's 7th Symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's youn protege, 29-year-old Leonard Bern stein, had charge of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra yesterday after noon in the first of a series of concert he will conduct during Dr. Koussevit sky's absence. The case of Mr. Bern stein, whose meteoric rise to fame a few years ago was the talk of several towns, can't be casually dismissed with a few of the usual general remarks. He presents something of a giant question mark to the interested observer.

The program he had chosen for this concert ranged from Gluck's overture to "Alceste" through Beethoven's dance symphony, the Seventh. In between came Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" which gave the conductor an excellent opportunity to display the development of his conducting technique since he was last here. And, indeed, the co-ordinated and controlled use of his hands and body are a pleasure to watch, even though much of it is unadulterated Koussevitzky.

Both the Overture to "Alceste" and the Seventh Symphony were played with a charming precision. The opportunity to make more of them than that was not utilized because of Mr. Bernstein's almost dangerous penchant to concentrate exclusively on rhythm and sensuous sound. But with "Le Sacre" he shone brilliantly. Brittle, brutal rhythms often in conflicting juxtaposition and weird flashes of orchestral colors were made the most of. The jazz influence in Mr. Bernstein's career helped him considerably in the execution of this work. Incidentally, the deliberately brutal qualities in this composition that caused such a sensation in its Paris premiere have been considerably mitigated by time. In fact only one person was seen to leave the hall during its performance visibly shaken by the proceedings. With all that there is still no doubt that time has not lessened the difficulties of conducting and playing the music.

Three factors in particular make it difficult to write a sound review of Mr. Bernstein's ability as a conductor. In the first place he hasn't been heard conducting over a considerable length of time in a variety of works that would reveal all facets of his person-

a Feb 1

THE

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:
Overture to "Alceste" .... Gluck
"Le Sacre du Printemps" .... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 7 in A minor Op 92 Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. Bernstein yesterday gave us a most brilliant concert which promises well for the future ones he will conduct. Not that anyone had expected less than brilliance from this talented conductor, and the fact was that there was much more to his interpretations yesterday than that often over-rated and over-sought quality. To begin with the last, I have seldom if ever heard a finer or more eloquent performance of the Beethoven 7th Symphony. This work, known to and beloved by all, was presented with complete understanding and no overstatement.

Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps is nowadays to most of us, if still not to all, an old friend and, moreover, one whose renewed acquaintance brings increased pleasure. It is an astonishing masterpiece of rhythm. Its discords, which still shock the unprepared or unsympathetic listener, are a necessary adjunct to the artistic idea for which Stravinsky was striving. Nor does the Sacre in any sense date, and it has had some 34 years of buffeting in the musical world.

It is still a most difficult work to perform and conduct. Mr. Bernstein secured the most clean-cut rhythmical performance that I can recall. The music became amazingly clear, as it was when Mr. Koussevitzky last played it in 1939. Mr. Bernstein never seemed for a moment at a loss through the maze of changing tempi which must make any conductor sweat beforehand. With only one detail would I quarrel. In the flute melody after the short English horn theme in the second part Mr. Bernstein injected a "blues" feeling to the music which I am sure was not in Stravinsky's mind in 1912. But that is a minor and disputable blemish in a magnificent performance.

This admirable concert opened with a splendid performance of Gluck's nobly tragic Overture to "Alceste," a piece which has unaccountably never been played before at a Boston Symphony concert.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Bernstein will conduct Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto (with Ruth Posselt as soloist) and Schubert's 7th Symphony.

CIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1947 Art—Music—Theater 5

how—The Symphony Under Leonard Bernstein

Stravinsky's 'The Rite of Spring' for the First Time in Eight Years

By L. A. Sloper

Leonard Bernstein yesterday began a four-week engagement as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His initial program, the fifteenth of the Friday series, included Gluck's Overture to "Alceste," Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The young leader again demonstrated his technical mastery, his authority and his musicianship. These qualities were most clearly manifested in Stravinsky's ballet score. This performance was in effect a revival, since the work had not been heard in this series of concerts for eight years. There was no doubt that Mr. Bernstein knew his way about in the score. Although he had the book before him, he referred to it seldom. He had not only knowledge of but a feeling for the music, with its barbaric yawps and its complex rhythmic patterns. It was a stirring performance, which won an ovation from the audience.

The dance was much in evidence in this program. But Beethoven's dance forms are far from Stravinsky's, and Mr. Bernstein is not quite so much at home with them. Rhythmically he was lively enough, but he missed a good deal of the lyricism of the score, and both his phrasing and his tempi were unimaginative. The beginning of the Allegretto was a little too quick and a little too loud, leaving small opportunity for an effective crescendo and accelerando. The fugato was well balanced, but elsewhere greater clarity would have been welcome. There was a similar lack of expression in the Trio of the Scherzo, and the final movement was taken so fast and with such imperfect definition that it became confused.

Gluck's Overture to "Alceste" had its first performance at these concerts, but I am afraid we shall have to await another interpretation of it in order to enjoy its essential beauty. Mr. Bernstein used a large orchestra, and played the overture with scant realization of its classical style. His reading was heavy-handed and literal, without the necessary sense of remoteness and mystery

---

age THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein is back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his program for the week includes one of the great—if still disputed—masterpieces of this century: "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Igor Stravinsky. The other numbers are Gluck's Overture to "Alceste" (in the edition of Felix Weingartner), and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The exceptional talents of young Mr. Bernstein are still undergoing development and refinement on the evidence of his performances yesterday. He still prefers to work without a baton, and, as in the Beethoven Symphony, without a score before him when he feels that is proper. He still naturally shows the resilient vigor of youth, but he also showed, especially in Beethoven, an authority both of style and interpretation which he has not had before to such a degree.

I could not help feeling, through the course of the Seventh Symphony, that perhaps a good deal of Beethoven, this symphony included, is perhaps more young than old men's music. While there were a few places in the last movement that were a bit raw, and while that surging dance rhythm seemed to run away with him (as it often does with more experienced conductors), I nevertheless felt that his Beethoven touches the fundamentals of expression.

Everything "sang," and in the fast movements everything "danced"; most of the time the texture was clear and the sound evenly balanced. He avoided the tempting pitfall of making the allegretto either too fast or too slow; the trio of the scherzo was retarded just enough for contrast, but it never dragged. His Gluck had the right tempo and interpretive approach. (A less discerning man would have borne down more heavily on those three trombones which lend such weight of drama to the score.)

But it was in "Le Sacre du Printemps," that fiendishly difficult work, with tricky rhythms, changing metrical signatures and irregular accents that Mr. Bernstein really showed his technical mettle. Here there was no question of surface refinement or polished sound; what mattered was the insistent rhythm, the proper speed and the force of accents. Mr. Bernstein came through handsomely, and his performance had a "bite" not only appropriate but which added an extra thrill to music that, paradoxically, represents a peak of intellectual organization and an extreme of primitive, even visceral feeling.

Although I did not observe everyone in the hall, my eyes being glued to Stravinsky's score, I did not see anyone walk out on the grinding dissonances of "Le Sacre du Printemps." In fact, some of the older subscribers were heard to express delight with what was once considered a tonal nightmare. Evidently time will fix everything. Hurray!

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 2 - 1947

Berkshire Festival Enlarged

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next Summer from nine to twelve. These will include a Beethoven Cycle. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season, or are there during the Festival period, may attend numerous instrumental, choral, opera, and student orchestra performances of the Music Center, for which no tickets are sold. Those concerts are open to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constituting membership.

For further information letters may be addressed to Spmphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 2 - 1947

Berkshire Festival

The following schedule is announced for the 1947 Berkshire Music Festival under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

There will be 12 concerts in all, including three series of three concerts each, and three extra concerts. The first of these special concerts will be devoted to the music of Bach (Sunday afternoon, July 13), one devoted to the music of Mozart (Sunday afternoon, July 20), and the third (Tuesday evening, August 5), to include a performance of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony."

The three regular series will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons on these dates—(July 24, 26, and 27) (July 31, Aug. 2, and 3), Aug. 7, 9, 10).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 2 - 1947

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give twelve concerts in the 1947 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. In addition to the usual three subscription series of three concerts each on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 24, 26 and 27; July 31, Aug. 2 and 3, and Aug. 7, 9 and 10, there will be three extra concerts. The first two, on Sunday afternoons, July 13 and 20, will be devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, respectively. The third, on Tuesday night, Aug. 5, will include Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Subscribers to the regular concerts have first choice of tickets for the extra concerts, at preferential rates. The second subscription series (Series B) will be devoted to Beethoven's music. The renewal option for subscribers to last summer's festival closes Feb. 15.

The Berkshire Music Center, with Dr. Koussevitzky as director and Aaron Copland as assistant director, opens its six weeks' term on June 30. As before, its activities will include many orchestral, chamber music, choral and operatic programs. Tickets for these are not sold but are obtainable by application to contributing members of the Society of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Information about the festival, the center and the society may be obtained by writing to Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass. Information about living accommodations is obtainable by writing to the Berkshire Hills Festival, Court House, Pittsfield, Mass. Such accommodations should be reserved as early as possible.

Not counting the 1944 and 1945 chamber orchestra programs, the 1947 series will be the eleventh symphonic festival in the Berkshires, the eighth at Tanglewood, the eighth with the participation of the Boston Symphony and the ninth under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.-
NEW YORKER

FEB 2 - 1947

Berkshire Festival Includes 12 Concerts

Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be increased in number next summer from nine to 12. These will include a Beethoven Cycle, according to an announcement from Boston Symphony hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the much of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven Cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be given Sunday afternoon, July 13; the Mozart program Sunday afternoon, July 20; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven Tuesday, Aug. 5, after the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular weekend series, opens July 24. The final program of the festival will be given Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY
SMITH

IT HAD not been my intention to return immediately to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its conductors, its concerts and related matters. There are, however, new developments, straws in the wind and controversial issues that call for comment. First of all, the rumors that Dr. Koussevitzky is intending to resign have begun to fly again. They are denied by the orchestra's trustees, who are famous for keep- their own council until the time ne for making public announce- s. Nevertheless, coming events cast their shadow before and here are some adumbrations, that are in part mere conjecture and hearsay.

No longer does the Symphony program book, or "concert bulletin," list Dr. Koussevitzky as the orchestra's conductor, but rather as its "music director," while still referring to Richard Burgin as the "associate conductor." The announcement of next summer's Berkshire Festival, which Dr. Koussevitzky certainly plans to conduct, also calls him the music director, so it may be that he prefers this title, as signifying that he supervises every activity of the orchestra. It is an open secret that he has the power of veto where the guest conductor's program is concerned and at least a considerable say as to who shall be invited in the first place.

* * *

The trustees, along with everyone else, have been in something of a dither over the guest appearances of Bruno Walter, which for the time being ended last Sunday. There is an unconfirmed report that he will return to us next season for a longer period than the total of four weeks assigned to him this winter and spring. That is a consummation devoutly to be desired. Too many of our guests in recent years have been second-raters or, at best, promising figures among the younger generation. Again, were Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct less than 13 out of the 24 pairs of regular concerts that he alloted himself this season, that would be in line with the way things have been going lately. It is also significant that when the orchestra makes its next trip to New York, it will be directed by Leonard Bernstein. At Symphony Hall Dr. Koussevitzky has been willing and eager to yield his place to others; unless illness prevented, he has always been on the job in Manhattan.

It is no secret that the Berkshire Festival and the school which he founded there are dear to Koussevitzky's heart and many have pictured him as decreasing his winter activities in order to add to the summer ones. Instead of nine concerts next July and August there will be 12, one devoted to Mozart, one to Bach and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, without which no Koussevitzkian year is now complete. This performance of the Ninth will fall on Aug. 5, and the three previous concerts will be devoted to other music by Beethoven, thus constituting a sort of festival within a festival. Last year it was Brahms who was so honored. At this point it may be observed that the John Hancock Life Insurance Co., which now sponsors the Boston Symphony broadcast on Tuesday evenings, has given 10 scholarships to the Berkshire Music Centre, which opens its six-week term on June 30.

The outstanding event of Mr. Walter's visit, the first since 1923, was the restoration to the repertory of Bruckner's great Ninth Symphony, last played here in 1914 under Dr. Muck. It is inconceivable that we shall have to wait that long before hearing it again, though the Symphony did not make an equally favorable impression upon all who heard it. Like his disciple, Mahler, Bruckner is still a controversial figure. Which is really all to the good. The greatness of most music is too calmly accepted.

Among the critical brethren, the one least sold on the Bruckner Ninth complained bitterly of the composer's over-use of that repetitive device known to musicians as the sequence. Far be it from me to deny that Bruckner has never offended in this respect. Nevertheless, the Ninth is less marked by these sequential repetitions—to be found in every classical and romantic symphony—than certain of the master's earlier works. The amusing angle on this is that this dissenter went into ecstacies over the G minor Symphony of Mozart, which appeared on the same program. (Mozart has now supplanted both Bach and Beethoven as the older composer most to be reverenced), yet from start to finish the G minor follows the sequential pattern. We were supposed to be properly impressed with the fact that Mr. Walter gave us the original version of the Ninth, free from the editings and tamperings of his pupil, Ferdinand Loewe, who took it upon himself to retouch the orchestration and here and there the actual text. There are those, including the composer's latest biographer, Werner Wolff, who plump for the revised edition. In any event, what we heard was very good.

management, it was believed ago.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1947

The Berkshire festival is a little farther into the future than the springtime melange in Ann Arbor. And Tanglewood, which is becoming the summer music center of the world, is not very close to our immediate vicinity. It is not likely that great numbers of people from our city will have sufficient free time to enable themselves to hear what the Boston orchestra will be doing. But, whether we attend or not, the Berkshire festival with its school, its superb faculty, its concerts has developed into such a challenging musical undertaking that all news of it is interesting.

The school under the direction of Dr. ~~Koussevitzky~~ will open June 30 and continue through Aug. 10. The first series of concerts will be played Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26, 27; the second series Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; the third series Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, 9, 10.

In addition there will be three extra concerts which will be given over to the music of Bach, Beethoven and Mozart. The Bach program will be performed on Sunday afternoon, July 13, the Mozart program on Sunday afternoon, July 20. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven will be presented on Tuesday evening, Aug. 4.

Information of this festival may be obtained from Symphony hall, Boston, 15, Mass., until June 1. After that date inquiries should be addressed to Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts.

* * *

THIS column was concerned last Sunday with certain thoughts on our native opera, all of them taking momentary impetus from the highly-colored pre-showing publicity which was visited upon the Metropolitan production of the new American opera, "The Warrior,' and the apparent failure of the opera either in content or performance to arouse anything more than negative reactions. And it was implied that the real, living American opera, when and if it comes, will more likely spring out of the theater than out of such organizations as the Metropolitan which are still unaware, it seems, that drama is the basis of any opera which is worth preserving.

It now appears that the dividing line between opera and theater has become very faint in New York. There has been produced there lately a musical version of Elmer Rice's rather famous old play, "Street Scene." Kurt Weill has composed the music. And from all indications in the press this musical play is not only very good but very successful to boot.

In the New York Times of last Sunday Mr. Brooks Atkinson, who is the dramatic critic of that paper, gave no space to a consideration of "Street Scene," among other musical ventures on Broadway, because, as he said, "It comes as close to opera as Broadway dares to go." And Mr. Olin Downes, who is the music critic of the same paper, took the play into his care and devoted a whole column to it.

All this is an excellent sign of progress in the field of our own opera. But more than that it is an indication of enlightened, of intelligent and civilized thinking along these lines by our composers, our producers and our audiences. That is all to the good.

I have noticed that the weather, fickle as it is, has already resumed its winter habits.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 4 - 1947

West Newbury

On Radio Program

A West Newbury man, John N. Burk of Main street, program annotator of ~~the Boston Symphony~~ orchestra appeared on "The Artist Meets the Critics" program, presented over a Boston radio station Sunday afternoon. Mr. Burk, former musical critic for the Boston Evening Transcript, challenged his fellow-critics, Boris Goldovsky and Jules Woffles in questioning "whether any career is made or ruined by a critic." Controversy, however, he contended "always helps and is a good thing."

In answer to a charge from Mr. Goldovsky that sponsors of symphonic programs seem frightened to present new or controversial music, Mr. Burk said: "If I were the sponsor, I would feel the same way. The sponsor pays a very large sum to make his products known. I would not take a chance on challenging music, to which the public will not listen."

Mr. Burk was introduced to the radio-audience as the author of authoritative biographies of Clara Schumann and Beethoven. He is also a frequent contributor of musical book reviews, magazines and newspapers.

LA PORTE, IND.
HERALD-ARGUS
FEB 4 - 1947

The World of Music

New York, Feb. 4—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will ~~increase from nine to 12~~ the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires,

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing and ensemble playing.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, for the first time since before the war, will make an extensive tour this spring. Between April 14 and through May 11, the orchestra will play 28 concerts in 24 cities. Seventeen concerts will be conducted by Artur Rodzinski; the remaining 11 by Leopold Stokowski.

The tour, which will take the orchestra for the first time in its history through the south, has been made possible by its radio sponsorship. The cost involved in moving an organization of 103 musicians some 4,000 miles halfway across the country and back is so high that a large deficit otherwise would have been inevitable, the orchestra's directors said.

The tour opens in Baltimore on April 14 under Stokowski, who also will conduct the next ten concerts in southern cities. Rodzinski takes over on April 25 in Montgomery, Ala.

All concerts will be played in the evening except the four Sundays, which will be afternoon performances broadcast, as usual, over the Columbia network.

ISH WEE

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 3 - 1947

MUS

Smith

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be on the air again regularly this year, but without benefit of its sponsor for the past several years, Allis-Chalmers. Whether the company, in giving up its sponsorship, was yielding to the economic pinch of the strike which has beset it for months or was motivated by the present "more favorable tax structure" (in the cant of the business world) has not been indicated. The latter explanation, at any rate, is not unlikely; it seems more than a coincidence that General Motors gave up sponsorship of the NBC Symphony broadcasts not long ago, while U. S. Rubber cut its sponsorship of the Philharmonic down to the main musical season.

SMITH

The Boston Symphony broadcasts will again, therefore, be on a sustaining basis over the same network, ABC. The broadcast program will be one hour in length, beginning at 9:30, as last season. But the night is to be changed from Saturday to Tuesday. Once more, accordingly,—and this time more radically — the orchestra will accomodate itself to the needs of the radio broadcasting medium, instead of the other way about: the six concerts which in the past have been given in Symphony Hall on Monday evenings will this season be given on Tuesday; and the six which have been given in Sanders Theatre, Cambrige, on Thursdays have been shifted to Tuesdays. Putting these series together with the Providence series and other concerts on the road, the management of the orchestra will be able to provide the network with a weekly schedule of programs picked up, almost without exception, from scheduled Boston Symphony concerts.

The fee which the orchestra will receive from ABC—and which has not been announced—will therefore for be almost entirely "gravy." It will not, however, be anything like the size of the fee received on sponsored broadcasts. Fortunately other portents are favorable: the ticket sales are very good, and record royalties are good. The corporate financial structure is probably pretty secure, as judged in terms of non-profit institutions like symphony orchestras. And without attempting to minimize the serious loss of reveune for the orchestra as an institution entailed in the cancellation of the commercial broadcasts, I should say the greater hardship is to be suffered by the individual musicians, each of whom will automatically lose a minimum of seven or eight hundred dollars annually in his pay checks.

These things, meanwhile, are a reminder that, for better or worse, the leading American symphony orchestras — Boston, New York Philharmonic, NBC and Philadelphia — are in big business. Their annual budgets approach nearer and nearer to a million dollars each. To take advantage of subsidy from radio they adjust their concert schedules more and more to radio's needs. They have not yet had to adjust these schedules to the needs of the companies for which all four make phonograph records and from which they now receive an appreciable portion of their income. Yet you would be surprised to learn, perhaps, that the needs (or demands) of these record companies are frequently reflected in the composition of the orchestras' programs.

I have no desire here to smear the increasingly commercial tendencies of concerts of the leading symphony orchestras during the past two decades. It's something that can scarcely be stopped. It has brought damage in its train. But it has also brought enormous benefit, on a broad democratic base, to millions of listeners.

One accidental by-product of the Boston Orchestra's recent misfortune is a blessing for radio listeners. It breaks into the almost total monopoly of the weekend on the best—and, at any rate, the leading—musical programs on the air: the four orchestral broadcasts indicated above, plus the Metropolitan Opera broadcast, have all been regularly scheduled on Saturdays or Sundays. It will be good to hear some solid music in the middle of the week for a change—and by "solid" I don't mean a hot jazz band.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD STAR
FEB 4 - 1947

CENTER TO BE READY FOR CONCERT ON 13TH

From White Plains Bureau

Barring unexpected work stoppage or difficulties, the County Center auditorium will be open for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert ~~Feb. 13, the~~ Public Works Department has informed the County Recreation Commission.

The auditorium will then be closed two more weeks for finishing of the floor, and will open for full use on Feb. 28.

Professional boxing will be resumed March 4.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
FEB 4 - 1947

Writer Lauds Switch Of Boston Symphony To New Airing Time

BY MAGEE ADAMS.

In this section, music lovers are profiting by ABC's shift of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program to 8:30 p. m. today. Formerly it was heard an hour later. Coming immediately before WSAI's "Evening Concert," that would have produced two and a half hours of symphonic music locally. So WSAI wisely transcribed the program and aired it on Sunday morning.

At its new time on WSAI, the Boston Orchestra program is doubly welcome. It provides the sort of superior music that Tuesday schedules sorely need. And it is available at a convenient mid-evening hour.

Moreover, the Boston program has the same technical advantage already noted here in connection with the Detroit Orchestra's "Sunday Evening Hour." The music has a much wider range of volume than most symphonic broadcasts.

Evidently, ABC is adopting this advanced method for all its programs of good music. At any rate, it pays handsome dividends in the case of the Boston Orchestra. The music has a sweep and flexibility instantly distinguishable from a conventional broadcast. A single program seldom gives music lovers so many breaks.

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

FEB 4 - 1947

Scholarships Are Radio Prizes

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
Radio, Drama, Music Editor

Plans for awarding of 10 scholarships to the Berkshire Music Center this Summer will be explained tonight on the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast over Station WSGN and the ABC Network at 7:30.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

Application blanks for the scholarships, which include study with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and other distinguished musicians, may be obtained from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Dr. Koussevitzky personally will select the winners and the scholarship students will have many unusual opportunities awaiting them.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are being carried to 60 countries abroad, including the Far East and Latin Americas, by shortwave through the courtesy of the State Department.

Tonight's concert will find Leonard Bernstein conducting the works of Mozart and Schubert, the featured symphony being Schubert's Seventh.

* * *

GOLDEN GLOVES—The final bouts in the annual Golden Gloves Tournament will be broadcast over WSGN at 9 p.m. from the ringside.

* * *

...cilities of WTNB. The topic under discussion on tonight's 8:30 Forum will be one of interest to all who rent their homes: "Will Raising the Rent Ceilings Solve the Housing Problem?" The speakers chosen for this discussion are Sen. Albert W. Hawkes (R., N. J.., George M. Englar, president of the National Apartment Owners Association; Ray Sawyer, national commander of AMVETS and David Ginsberg, former counsel-general of the OPA. As usual, Theodore Granik will preside over the meeting and maintain order if the debaters become too heated in their arguments for and against this discussion problem. . . . "The Settlement of Hanita," another in the series "The Drama of Palestine," which is presented weekly over WTNB at 6:30 on Tuesday evenings, will be tonight's dramatized episode.

DETECTIVE DRAMA ON THE AIR—Mutual and WJLD present two thrilling half hours from 7-8 tonight as "Scotland Yard" and "The Falcon" take stage center. During the latter half hour, the old adage "honor among thieves" is cast aside when two bank robbers attempt to cut the third member of their gang from his share of the loot. The climax finds Detective Waring unravelling a complicated plot. . . . Sen. Albert Hawkes, George Englar, Ray Sawyer and David Ginsburg are featured tonight on "America's Forum of the Air" (Mutual-WJLD, 8:30 p.m.) in a discussion on "Will Raising the Rent Ceiling Solve the Housing Problem?"

Rodzinski Quits Symphony Post After Assailing Judson Control

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Artur Rodzinski, who has been musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra since 1943, resigned last night, effective Oct. 1, after delivering an indictment of the orchestra's management before an afternoon meeting of the executive committee of the Philharmonic's board of directors.

Mr. Rodzinski's contract was automatically renewed for one year last November, and a three-year contract was offered to him by the full board last month. He deferred immediate acceptance of this longer-term contract until today, waiting until he could confer with the executive committee.

At the meeting of the executive committee, which was attended also by Arthur Judson, manager of the orchestra, Mr. Rodzinski arose to give what he called "a state of the orchestra" report. It is understood that his report lasted for more than an hour, and that the meeting was stormy.

Among the statements Mr. Rodzinski made to the executive committee he was willing to repeat two at his home at 1160 Park Avenue last night.

"I told them," he said, "that the three pillars of a soundly run orchestra are the board, the manager and the musical director. As the New York Philharmonic is run, these three pillars are not of equal importance, as they must be. The board and musical director revolve

Continued on Page 32, Column 6

DAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1947. AMUSEMENTS

NDUCTOR RESIGNS

Artur Rodzinski

Murillo, 193

RODZINSKI QUITS POST IN SYMPHONY

Continued From Page 1

around the manager as if they were satellites.

"I told them also that Columbia Concerts, Inc., a concert management agency, of which Mr. Judson is also president, is often more important than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, which is treated as a subsidiary on occasion."

Mr. Rodzinski summed up with the observation that, as things stood, the musical director had that title "pro forma" but not "de facto."

After he completed his report, Mr. Rodzinski was asked by Charles Triller, president of the Philharmonic - Symphony Society, what his conclusions were. The conductor replied that he would let the board have his answer in twenty-one hours. A few hours later he sent the following telegram to Mr. Triller at his home, 109 East Thirty-fifth Street:

"I am deeply touched with your appreciation of my work which found expression in offering me a long-term contract as conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra. It has been my goal to make this great orchestra the greatest orchestra in the world. It is already on its way, but the job is not finished yet. Unfortunately the existing circumstances and the organizational shortcomings make the attainment of this goal impossible. Therefore, with great regret, I would appreciate your releasing me from all conductorial duties as of October, 1947."

Directors to Meet Today

Commenting briefly on the resignation, Mr. Triller said that "the only thing that surprises me about Mr. Rokzinski's action is that he has done it." He added that it would "be placed before the society's board of directors" today.

Mr. Judson could not be reached for comment last night.

When Mr. Rodzinski took over as musical director of the orchestra, it was agreed that the ensemble was not at the artistic level it should have attained as the oldest and one of the outstanding symphony orchestras in the country. Among his first acts was to change fourteen members of the orchestra, and that drastic change created a heated controversy that lasted for many weeks.

In succeeding years Mr. Rodzinski made other changes, if not so many at one time. In sum, there were a few shifts in the string section, more in the woodwinds and a great many in the brass section. Reviewers and audiences this year have pronounced the orchestra's playing better than it has been at any time since Arturo Toscanini ended his tenure as musical director in 1936.

Making of Decisions at Issue

While Mr. Rodzinski would not elaborate last night on the factors he found wrong with the orchestra management, it was believed that in his reference to the musical director not being one "de facto," he was suggesting that the musical director was not allowed to make important decisions on artistic matters.

It was explained that in organizations like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, had a vital voice in decisions relating to guest conductors, soloists and such matters as who would conduct the orchestra in recording engagements. It was understood that Mr. Rodzinski's voice in these matters was not similarly controlling.

Mr. Rodzinski conducted the first ten weeks of the current season. While he has been on vacation, there have been several guest conductors, including George Szell, Leopold Stokowski and Charles Muench, with Bruno Walter due to take over for a fortnight starting this week.

Mr. Rodzinski came to this country in 1926 from Poland, where he was born, to be Mr. Stokowski's assistant conductor with the Philadelphia Orchestra. In 1929 he became conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and in 1933 took over the Cleveland Orchestra. He referred to himself last night as an "orchestra builder."

Asked whether he had other plans, Mr. Rodzinski nodded, adding, "I can't tell them for another ten days."

Mr. Rodzinski said that he had severed his personal connection with Mr. Judson, who had been his manager, about a year and a half ago.

FEBRUARY 5, 1947.

RODZINSKI DROPPED BY PHILHARMONIC

Continued From Page 25

the orchestra are being terminated effective immediately rather than in October, as his resignation specified.

"Regardless of Mr. Rodzinski's views, the policies of the society have been established by its board of directors and any action taken by its officers, or by Mr. Judson as manager, has been taken in accordance with such policies which were at all times subject to review by the board of directors.

"The board today unanimously adopted resolutions expressing its high regard for Mr. Judson and its complete confidence in him as the manager of the society's orchestra."

Judsosn Has No Comment

Mr. Judson, who had been the prime target of Mr. Rodzinski's charges that he was turning the orchestra into a subsidiary of Columbia Concerts, Inc., of which he is president, declined to comment "at this time."

As to the orchestra of 100-odd musicians, it rehearsed as usual yesterday, with Mr. Walter in charge. It was learned that before and during pauses in the rehearsal, Mr. Rodzinski's resignation was the main topic of conversation among the men.

Monday was the last day for notification of resignations by instrumentalists, and only one player William Namen, second horn for the last two years, had notified the management that he was leaving at the end of the season.

Mr. Namen had made his decision to return to the Cleveland Orchestra, of which he had been a member for many years before coming to New York, before he knew of Mr. Rodzinski's action, and he had decided to go back to Cleveland, it was learned, because of a very favorable offer.

At Mr. Rodzinski's home at 1160 Park Avenue it was disclosed yesterday that he had received scores of telephone calls and messages commending him for his action and for frank speaking.

One of these telegrams came from Henry H. Reichhold, president of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, who wired:

"Congratulations on your forthright and courageous stand for musical freedom and independence. As president of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra I would like to assure you of our full moral support. You have done much to emphasize our own stand of full independence in all musical matters for the conductor. As you know, our musical director, Dr. Karl Kreuger, is not dominated by any concert or financial interest. Good luck."

Earlier in the day, before the board had announced its decision, Mr. Rodzinski had said that he was glad he had acted as he had and had got the issues aired publicly.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1947.

Rodzinski's Resignation Accepted By Philharmonic, Effective at Once

Society Votes Confidence in Judson as the Conductor Weighs Lawsuit—Stokowski Likely to Become Musical Director

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The board of directors of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society accepted yesterday Artur Rodzinski's resignation as musical director but made it effective immediately, instead of in October, as Mr. Rodzinski had specified.

In a special two-and-a-half-hour meeting that was called to take action after Mr. Rodzinski's resignation Monday and his statement attacking Arthur Judson, manager of the orchestra, the board expressed its complete confidence in Mr. Judson.

When Mr. Rodzinski was told of the board's action, he said that he would reserve comment until he had received official notification. In the meantime, he spent several hours last night in conference with his lawyers to decide whether he could and should take legal action against the society.

Mr. Rodzinski was scheduled to return to the orchestra on Feb. 20 after his midseason vacation. He was to conduct the final eight weeks of the New York season as well as about half of the long post-season tour in the West and South. Leopold Stokowski was engaged some months ago to handle part of the tour concerts.

The executive committee of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society will meet tomorrow to decide on what conductors are to finish the season. Bruno Walter, who will be guest conductor for two weeks, is scheduled to end his stay on Feb. 16.

It was believed that Mr. Stokowski, formerly conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra for many years, was the most likely choice to take over as many of the season's remaining concerts as he could fit in. It was thought possible that Charles Muench, who, like Mr. Stokowski, has served as guest conductor this season, would be invited back if his other engagements would permit.

It was not certain yesterday whether the board of the Philharmonic-Symphony would be able to deal with the problem of naming a new musical director for next season immediately. It was thought that a decision on this matter would be deferred for a while.

Nevertheless, musical circles buzzed with rumors as to likely candidates, with Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Muench leading the list. Mr. Stokowski, it has been said, would not be averse to becoming the musical director of the country's oldest orchestra. If he should be invited to take the post, Mr. Muench, French conductor who made his American debut this season with considerable success, would probably be asked to serve as guest leader for an extended stay.

The executive committee of the board met early yesterday afternoon, and that meeting was followed by one of the full board. After the latter session, Charles Triller, chairman of the board and president of the society, issued the following statement:

"The board today accepted Mr. Rodzinski's resignation as its musical director. However, he is being notified that his relations with

Continued on Page 31, Column 4

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD STAR

FEB 5 - 1947

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO REOPEN CENTER

From White Plains Bureau

The County Center auditorium, closed for 14 months for repairs, will have a gala reopening Feb. 13 when Mrs. Julian Olney presents the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its ~~first Westchester~~ appearance. It will mark the 14th season of Olney concerts.

The orchestra has been directed by Serge Koussevitsky for 23 years. Leonard Bernstein, young composer and conductor, will be guest conductor.

The program will open with Serenade No. 1 in A Major by Brahms, in four movements, followed by Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore." After an intermission the orchestra will play four movements of Schubert's Symphony in C Major.

Not only does the auditorium have a new roof and decorations but acoustics have been improved.

(3 805,967)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 5 - 1947

CENTER NEARLY FINISHED

Main Auditorium in Westchester to Open Feb. 13 With Concert

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Feb. 4—Extensive repairs to the County Center here are nearing completion after numerous delays caused by shortages of materials. The main auditorium will be opened on the night of Feb. 13 for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Westchester officials announced today.

Although parts of the building have remained open, the large auditorium has been closed fourteen months because of cracks in its wooden roof. James O. Harding, County Commissioner of Public Works, said the new roof is of concrete, supported by steel trusses and acoustically treated inside. The repairs, he said, have cost $175,000.

After the Feb. 13 concert the auditorium will be closed for completion of painting, then will be opened in early March with a full calendar of events, the Recreation Commission said.

HERALD 2/6/47

A Note to New York

On matters of music Boston can still speak to New York in big-brother fashion. Thanks in equal parts to the artistic leadership of Serge Koussevitzky and to the cohesive, supporting policies of the board of trustees, the Boston Symphony Orchestra proceeds smoothly from triumph to triumph. Unhappily, New York's Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra seems to be almost continuously in upheaval. The latest blow to its prestige is the resignation, effective next October, of Arthur Rodzinski, its conductor since 1943, who has been doing an increasingly good job in restoring the orchestra to its one-time eminent position.

From this distance it appears that the Philharmonic's troubles do not stem from a personal quarrel between Mr. Rodzinski and Arthur Judson, the manager, or between Mr. Rodzinski and any members of his orchestra. They arise from a fundamental defect in supervisory organization. It is simply too big to operate effectively. For example, it is headed by a group of nine officers. This is followed by a board of directors of 30 members, a smaller board of trustees, and an almost innumerable list of auxiliary boards and committees. Compare this with the Boston orchestra's single board of 14 trustees, which has sole and complete power.

Under the New York set-up it is almost inevitable that schisms should occur and factions arise. One group wants Mr. Stokowski to be the next conductor. Another wants Mr. Muench. Still another, presumably, is loyal to Mr. Rodzinski. Social jealousies, racial prejudices, and financial rivalries all have room to thrive and grow. The Philharmonic will never have artistic peace and financial prosperity, we make so bold as to suggest, until its control is centered in a small, responsible group which, after appointing a conductor, will back him to the limit.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 6 - 1947

IN THE DAY'S MAIL

Lette
but Lette

Panning the Critic

Editor:

The review by William Dinneen, headed "Music," which appeared in the issue of Jan. 28 and apparently was considered by you a proper critical review of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, struck as unpleasant a chord in my mind as it must have in the minds of many of your readers.

I happened to be present at that concert, and while granting that Mr. Bernstein laid himself open to criticism for being over-theatrical, I submit that Mr. Dinneen's vicious and totally unnecessary remarks were both beside the point and disagreeably cheap in tone. Further, that they stem largely from the fact that Mr. Bernstein at an early age is conducting the Boston Symphony and other famous orchestras while his former fellow undergraduate at Harvard, Mr. Dinneen, is merely writing in a rather small way about what Mr Bernstein is doing—is painfully obvious.

He would be far more at home back at Harvard writing for the "Crimson," where his sophomoric talents and attitude would reach, I am sure, a more sympathetic audience.

WALLACE CAMPBELL III.

Peace Dale.

Editor:

It would seem no matter how high Mr. Bernstein goes in his chosen fields, he will be to your reviewer, just "Lennie whom I knew at Harvard." Calling him "Lennie" in the review seems to many of us rather poor taste.

Differences of opinion make the world go around and I'll take Koussevitzky's judgment as to the young man's fitness to conduct the world's greatest orchestra.

As to the Stravinsky, if your reporter would like to hear more of such monstrosities under the guise of music he can have the theater all alone and listen to his heart's content. I doubt if he would have the company of a dozen people who heard this one.

MUSIC LOVER.

Cranston.

Editor:

Having read Mr. Dinneen's review of the recent Boston Symphony Concert, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, I would like to comment on the obvious personal antagonism and hostility the reviewer holds for Mr. Bernstein.

I am sure the public would much prefer the reviewer to take care of the "business on hand," omitting the quaint, personal reminiscing and the spurts of literary endeavor.

MRS. J. I. COHEN.

Providence.

Editor:

One of the less important, though obvious, lows to which your paper has sunk was brought to my mind sharply in your review of the recent Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The criticism was inept, amazingly immature, and full of petty, personal prejudices.

ROBERT IRVING.

Providence.

Bad Faith Charged to Rodzinski In Dealing With the Philharmonic

Friends of Board Say It Knew Conductor Was Negotiating With Chicago, but That He Insisted on 3-Year Contract Here

NY. TIMES 2/6/47

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The battle between the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society and its musical director of three and a half years, Artur Rodzinski, flared again yesterday when friends of the board of directors told its side of the story and charged the conductor with failing to act in good faith.

They said that he was negotiating with the Chicago Orchestra for next season, even though he had allowed his contract with the New York Philharmonic to renew itself automatically for another year. They added that at the same time he pressed the New York Philharmonic to replace the one-year contract with a three-year pact.

The board, according to its story, then decided to offer to Mr. Rodzinski a three-year contract, with several modifications, minor and major, of his old agreement. One of the modifications, to which the conductor objected strongly, gave him first choice of repertory, with guest conductors free to choose anything else. In previous contracts Mr. Rodzinski had had the right to approve or disapprove programs of guest conductors, and that led to considerable friction, according to friends of the board.

At the executive committee meeting last Monday Mr. Rodzinski was told by board members that they knew he had been negotiating with the Chicago Orchestra, according to this version. He was urged to accept the Philharmonic three-year contract but was asked that if he decided to go to Chicago to inform the New York board, whereupon arrangements would be made for simultaneous announcement in New York and Chicago.

Mr. Rodzinski, who left New York last night for his home in Lake Placid, declined to make any further comment, but Mrs. Rodzinski said that he had received a flood of letters and telegrams from points throughout the country, commending him for his stand against Arthur Judson, manager of the New York Philharmonic and president of Columbia Concerts, Inc.

At the Philharmonic offices it was said that many conductors had sent messages to Mr. Judson, approving of his managerial methods with the orchestra.

In the meantime, Ralph F. Colin, lawyer for the Philharmonic-Symphony, conferred with Mr. Rodzinski's legal advisers. Mr. Colin said that he was seeking to "work out the terms of severance in an amicable and equitable settlement."

Whether Mr. Rodzinski would accept the Philharmonic's offer of a payment of a lump sum was not revealed yesterday, but it was understood that he had still under advisement a plan to reject the offer and bring the issue to court.

In preparation for today's meeting of the executive committee of the Philharmonic-Symphony board, Mr. Judson and his staff were canvassing the conductors' field to find out who would be available to complete the season. It was thought that Bruno Walter might be able to take on an extra week, that Leopold Stokowski might agree to do several weeks and that Charles Muench might conduct several weeks, if he could get permission from Paris, where he is committed to conduct in April.

It was also learned yesterday that Arturo Toscanini, for many years musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, had phoned the orchestra office several times to check on the latest developments. It was thought that the Italian maestro could be induced to conduct some concerts with his old ensemble next season, if the NBC Symphony management would agree.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

FEB 6 - 1947

Programs Released For Music Festival

Koussevitzky Reports Bernstein and Shaw to be Guest Conductors at Tanglewood Next Summer.

Music to be heard during the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer was announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra during most of the series of concerts. Dr. Koussevitzky also announced that Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw will be guest conductors, as well as members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music center.

The first of three "extra" concerts on July 13, by an orchestra of chamber music proportions, will feature the music of Bach, while the second on July 20 will be devoted to Mozart's works. The third, on Aug. 5, will be a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony.

The first in the series by the full orchestra will include Brahms' Second symphony, Schubert's Seventh, Copland's Third, Rachmaninoff's Third, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, Hindemith's violin concerto, Barber's overture, "School for Scandal," Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse," and Martinu's Concerto Grosso. Miss Ruth Posselt will be soloist for the Hindemith concerto and William Primrose for the Berlioz work.

The second series, July 31 and Aug. 2 and 3, will be devoted to a Beethoven cycle, and the final series, Aug. 7, 9, and 10, will include a Haydn symphony, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, Schumann's Second, Tchaikovsky's Fourth, Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," and Mozart's Requiem, with chorus and soloists.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

FEB 7 - 1947

Bernstein, Shaw To Be Guest Conductors at Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky has invited Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw to be guest conductors at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer. Dr. Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the greater part of the festival of 12 concerts, announces music that will be included in the programs.

The opening concert by an orchestra of chamber music proportions on July 13 will be devoted to the works of Bach and the second concert July 20 to Mozart.

Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include in the first series of concerts by the full orchestra, July 24, 26 and 27, Brahm's Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh, Copland's Third, Rachmaninoff's Third, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Barber's Overture, "School for Scandal,' Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse" and Martinu's Concerto Grosso. Miss Ruth Possett will be the soloist for the Hindemith Concerto and William Primrose for the Berlioz Symphony.

Ninth Symphony Aug. 5

The second week end, July 31 and Aug. 2 and 3, will be devoted to a Beethoven cycle, and will be followed on Aug. 5 by a performance of the Ninth Symphony in a special concert.

In the final series, Aug. 7, 9 and 10, will be a Haydn symphony, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Schuman's Second Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mozart's Requiem, with chorus and soloists.

Mr. Bernstein, who conducted the Rochester Orchestra in the Community Concert series in Pittsfield last year, has studied conducting under Dr. Koussevitzky. He has for two years been conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, and was assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski three years ago. He is a pianist and composer of note.

Mr. Shaw, who trained and directed choral groups at Tanglewood last summer, is on the faculty of the Juillard School. New York. Both men will be members of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, as they were last summer.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 8 1947

Conductor Pleads For Jewish Cause

Boston, Feb. 8. (AP)—Composer-Conductor Leonard Bernstein says that until Palestine has a government which Jews can support "we won't have a Jewish nation, art or music."

Bernstein, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony during Serge Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation, spoke at Temple Israel Friday night. He pleaded for a Jewish homeland around which Jews of the world "can rally and unite to produce art and music."

DOVER, OHIO
DAILY REPORTER

FEB 7 - 1947

The World Of Music

NEW YORK—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director.

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

FEB 7 - 1947

Berkshire Music Festival's Dates

The first announcement of the repertory for next Summer's Berkshire Festival has been received from Serge Koussevitsky, who is now on his mid-Winter vacation in Florida. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give 12 concerts at its Summer home at Tanglewood, Massachusetts next Summer. These will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart respectively by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13,20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed, the middle week to be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, August 2, 3), the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (August 5).

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

FEB 7 1947

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PROGRAM ANNOUNCED FOR NEXT SUMMER

The first announcement of th repertory for next summer's Berkshire Festival has been received a Symphony Hall from Serge Koussevitzky, who is now on his mid winter vacation in Florida. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give 12 concerts at its summe home at Tanglewood next summer These will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart respectively by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13, 20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed, the middle week to be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, Aug. 2, 3), the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (Aug. 5).

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the greater part of the Festival, and has invited two guest conductors, Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw, both of whom are to be on the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, which will be currently in session at Tanglewood.

Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include in the concerts of July 24, 26, 27 Brahms' Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh Symphony, Rach- Copland's Third Symphony, maninoff's Third Symphony, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony (Viola soloist: William Primrose), Hindemith's Violin Concerto (Soloist: Ruth Posselt), Barber's Overture "School for Scandal," Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse," and Martinu's Concerto Grosso.

Following the Beethoven cycle the last week of the Festival, with concerts on Aug. 7, 9, 10, will include a Symphony by Haydn, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Schumann's Second Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemp and Mozart's Requiem (with chorus and soloists).

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 7 - 1947

Bernstein, Shaw Guest Conductors For Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky has invited ~~Leonard Bernstein and~~ Robert Shaw to be guest conductors at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer. Dr. Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in the greater part of the festival of 12 concerts, announces music to be included in the programs for the concerts. The guest conductors will be members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, which will be in session at the orchestra's summer home in July and early August.

The opening concert on July 13, by an orchestra of chamber music proportions, will be devoted to the music of Bach and the second concert on July 20 to that of Mozart.

In the first series of concerts, July 24, 26 and 27, by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include Brahms' Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh Symphony, Copland's Third Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Barber's Overture, "School for Scandal," Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse" and Martinu's Concerto Grosso. Miss Ruth Posselt will be the soloist for the Hindemith Concerto and William Primrose for the Berlioz Symphony.

The second week end, July 31 and August 2 and 3, will be devoted to a Beethoven cycle, and will be followed on August 5 by a performance of the Ninth Symphony in an extra concert.

In the final series, August 7, 9 and 10, will be a Haydn Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Schumann's Second Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mozart's Requiem, with chorus and soloists.

Information and subscriptions may be obtained from the festival office, Symphony hall, Boston

---

FEB 7 - 1947

Kapell, Boston Orchestra Disc Rhapsodic Concerto

By Corbin Patrick

TWO SPECIAL notices merit the attention of record collectors before we proceed with consideration of the latest releases from the major studios.

Dmitri Mitropolous and the Minneapolis orchestra, whose waxed performances are included in many well-stocked record collections, will play a concert at the Murat next Friday night under the auspices of the Indiana State Symphony Society. While most of their currently available discs were made by Columbia, the Mitropolous-Minneapolis team recently transferred to the RCA-Victor fold.

Columbia has announced that it will issue a recording of Handel's great oratorio, "The Messiah," on or about Feb. 17, as performed in concert by the Huddersfield Choral Society and Liverpool Philharmonic orchestra, conducted by Malcolm Sargent, with four English soloists. It will be the longest recording of a single work Columbia ever has issued—19 discs, in two albums.

MEANWHILE, we have an attractive list of February releases from Victor. Most interesting, from a local point of view, perhaps is the recording of Khatchaturian's concerto for piano and orchestra by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, with the brilliant young virtuoso, William Kapell, as soloist. ~~Kapell's two appe~~arances with the Indianapolis orchestra have won him many friends and admirers here, and he justifies their faith in a scintillating performance of this rhapsodic work. Khatchaturian is a native of Armenia, and much of his music is adapted from its folklore. While its treatment is alertly modern, the concerto also has a piquant oriental quality. The Bostonians wave a rich orchestral tapestry around Kapell's vivid pianism. The surfaces are excellent. There are four large discs in the set. This is, incidentally, Kapell's first recording with orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 7 - 1947

Boston Symphony Lists Tanglewood Programs

Berkshire Festival Includes 12 Concerts Next Summer

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday some of the principal works which Serge Koussevitzky plans to present at the Berkshire Festival next summer at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. As already announced, the festival will include the usual three subscription series of three concerts each, on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon, and three extra concerts.

Among the works to be heard in Series A (July 24, 26 and 27) are Brahms's second symphony, Schubert's symphony in C major, Copland's third symphony, Rachmaninoff's third symphony, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as viola soloist; Hindemith's violin concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; Barber's overture to "The School for Scandal," Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse" and Martinu's Concerto Grosso.

Series B (July 31, Aug. 2 and 3) will be devoted to Beethoven's music. Series C (Aug. 7, 9 and 10) will include a Haydn symphony, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, Schumann's second symphony, Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, Debussy's "La Mer," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mozart's Requiem.

The first two extra concerts, on Sunday afternoon, July 13 and 20, will be devoted to music of Bach and Mozart, played by an orchestra of chamber-music proportions. Beethoven's ninth symphony will be played in the third extra concert on Tuseday night, Aug. 5. Further information is obtainable from the Berkshire Festival office at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Feb 8

CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

These guest conductors at Symphony Hall are opening our eyes, or, rather, our ears, in the music they elect to play and in the way in which they present it. Leonard Bernstein is in charge again this week and his current program opens with the so-called "Linz" Symphony of Mozart, which, according to the record, had been played here in 1882, 1900 and 1920. Yet no less an authority than Sir Donald Tovey has seen fit to rank it with the composer's last three. It is surely one of the most incredible manifestations of Mozart's altogether incredible genius.

Another miracle man of music was represented yesterday, Franz Schubert. Since the 150th anniversary of his birth fell Jan. 31 last, Mr. Bernstein has seen fit to mark the occasion by playing Schubert's last and greatest symphony, that in C major, called the "great" C major, to distinguish it from the Sixth in the same key. Schubert did not write this Symphony in three days. That would have been impossible, but we know that it did not take him long and that he was both physically ill and mentally harassed when, in the last year of his tragically short life, he wrote this supremely joyous music. When Mr. Bernstein has become a little more mature he will see in the work essentially Schubertian qualities which were missed in yesterday's undeniably exciting performance.

Between these two masterpieces was set a modern work with more than the usual amount of stuff in it, the Violin Concerto by Hindemith. Introduced to this country by the Boston Symphony, with Richard Burgin as the soloist, it was repeated yesterday with his wife, Ruth Posselt, in that exacting role. While clearer structurally and melodically than many contemporary compositions, the Concerto still makes terrific demands upon all concerned.

Mr. Bernstein shows remarkable sympathy for music of many schools. We naturally expect him to be at home with contemporary works, and he is. Miss Posselt, too, has a reputation as exponent of the moderns.

In this Concerto she outdid herself yesterday. Her performance was marked by the utmost virtuosity, and in the slow movement by the depth of feeling appropriate to music that is itself deeply felt. The performance provoked a demonstration on the part of the audience, but so, for that matter, did those of the two symphonies.

This Clipping From TIFFIN, OHIO
ADVERTISER-TRIBUNE

8 1947

Something Makes Mr. Lilienthal Awfully Tired

Hours of vehement speech-making by his foe, Sen. Kenneth McKellar, of Tennessee, backed up by testimony of witnesses, such as Mrs. Agnes Waters, of Washington, D. C., shown in passionate outburst at left, evidently had their effect on David E. Lilienthal. He's pictured at right, in attitude of utter weariness during Senate hearing on his confirmation as member of Atomic Energy Commission.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC SEASON EXTENDED BY BOSTON DATES

NEW YORK, Feb. 8—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts — one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing and ensemble playing.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, for the first time since before the war, will make an extensive tour this spring. Between April 14 and through May 11, the orchestra will play 28 concerts in 24 cities. Seventeen concerts will be conducted by Artur Rodzinski; the remaining 11 by Leopold Stokowski.

The tour, which will take the orchestra fro the first time in its history through the South, has been made possible by its radio sponsorship. The cost involved in moving an organization of 103 musicians some 4,000 miles halfway across the country and back is so high that a large deficit other wise would have been inevitable, the orchestra's directors said.

The tour opens in Baltimore on

LATROBE, PA.
BULLETIN

FEB 8 - 1947

The World Of Music

★ ★ ★

Berkshire Music Festival Extended—N. Y. Philharmonic To Go on Tour—Toscanini Back on Air

New York, Feb. 8—(U.P.)—The Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert on Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copeland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing and ensemble playing.

April 14 under Stokowski, who also will conduct the next ten concerts in southern cities. Rodzinski takes over on April 25 in Montgomery, Ala.

All concerts will be played in the evening except the four Sundays, which will be afternoon performances broadcast, as usual, over the Columbia network.

[92]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 16th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major, "Linz," No. 36 ...... Mozart
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ...... Hindemith
Symphony in C major No. 7 ...... Schubert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. Bernstein's second concert proved to be fully as rewarding as his first last week. The program was chiefly distinguished by Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, which has unaccountably not been played by the Boston Symphony since 1920, and Hindemith's Violin Concerto, which allowed us to hear some superb fiddle playing by Ruth Posselt.

The first and last movements of the Concerto wear the best. The andante is a bit long drawn out and finds Hindemith writing the sort of music which he has done much better before, in "Mathis der Maler" for instance. There are fine things in the slow movement, a forte climax with a marvelously wrought diminuendo and other moments; but they seem rather few and far between. The first movement and the finale are top-notch Hindemith, his personal idiom, mature and highly developed.

The Concerto provides a lot for the soloist to do, including an appropriately placed and thought out cadenza in the finale. Miss Posselt shrugged off the difficulties of the score as though they did not exist. She is, in fact, a splendid violinist. We all say this of her every year and then every year she gets even better. Does she not know how embarrassing it is for a critic to heap praises on an artist one season and then find that next year he must search for even purpler adjectives? It was a magnificent performance, in which Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra had a by no means modest share. After it there were cheers and bravos for Miss Posselt, a reaction which Hindemith's music does not usually arouse.

Mozart's "Linz" Symphony is actually one of his most celebrated and probably best known, but you would not gather this as a Boston Symphony subscriber. The answer, of course, is that the symphonic literature of both Mozart and Haydn is so rich that it is virtually impossible for an orchestra to do justice to them. Mr. Bernstein was eminently right in resurrecting this one, for it is singularly lovely and has an unusual slow movement. The performance was just right, neither too fragile nor sentimental, the two great sins in playing Mozart. Again the audience's response was unusually cordial, for Mr. Bernstein was recalled to the stand three times.

Finally we had Schubert's familiar C major Symphony, making a fairly long concert for a change. Mr. Bernstein injected a good deal of fire into the performance, which was just as well since it is perilously easy for musicians to go to sleep in this work.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra goes to New York. When it returns on Feb. 21 Mr. Bernstein will conduct Brahms' Serenade in A major, Bartok's Music for strings and percussion and Schumann's 2nd Symphony in C major.

1947 Feb 8

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Mozart of the "Linz" Symphony (K. 425); Hindemith of the Violin Concerto and Schubert of the C major or "Heavenly length" Symphony make a solid and effectively contrasted program at the Boston Symphony concerts this week. The conductor is again Leonard Bernstein, now in the second of the three weeks he will be guest with us in Boston. Ruth Posselt is soloist in the Hindemith Concerto.

If it is incomprehensible why certain of the Haydn symphonies are not played nowadays, it is equally hard to fathom why the "Linz" Symphony of Mozart has been absent from this orchestra's programs since 1920. It is also amazing that such compact and concentrated music should have been written in a mere three days! Here you have the essential Mozart, of fecund ideas and deft hand, with an instinctive sense of proportion and form and yet, for his time, adventurously expressive. The "Linz" has a good deal of the brave flourish of the "Haffner" Symphony, which preceded it by a year, and at the same time it looks forward to the weight and intimacy of the "Great" G minor.

Mr. Bernstein's conducting of the "Linz" Symphony, like that of the Schubert C major, was interesting because it was so close to interpretive maturity. Haydn, Mozart and Schubert are almost deceptively simple. They invite no interpretive mannerisms but they require thorough understanding of the composer's style and a straightforward handling of the structure and "line" of the music.

For these reasons theirs may well be the last music that a young conductor really masters. In middle age it is easier to be simple than it is in youth. Mr. Bernstein did admirably by Mozart, and only the menuet seemed heavy and overemphasized. Otherwise the "Linz" Symphony flowed and sang like a clear brook.

It was a somewhat different story with Schubert. A good deal of the C major Symphony was too angular, too muscular, dynamically forced. As he grows artistically, Mr. Bernstein may likely take the andante slower and make the scherzo more gentle. As it was, apart from these reservations, we enjoyed a bright and vital performance of one of the greatest lyrico-dramatic masterpieces among symphonies.

Hindemith's Violin Concerto could stand more frequent hearings. This is a remarkable modern Concerto which is both a virtuoso piece for the solo instrument and of intense logic and consistent musical worth. But only two sets of performances in eight seasons are not enough to get deeply into the score, for it is by no means simple.

One of the most resourceful of contemporary technicians, Hindemith did wonders in balancing the solo violin against the orchestra and simultaneously making that part an integral factor of the whole work. And while the style may be dissonant, it is also lyrical. Miss Posselt played brilliantly, and Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra partnered her superbly.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 9 1947

Serge Koussevitzky Announces Berkshire Festival Repertory

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 8.—The first announcement of the repertory for next summer's Berkshire Festival has been received at Symphony Hall from Serge Koussevitzky, who is now on his mid-winter vacation in Florida.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give twelve concerts at its summer home at Tanglewood next summer. These will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart respectively by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13, 20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed, the middle week to be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, Aug. 2, 3), the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (Aug. 5).

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the greater part of the Festival, and has invited two guest conductors, Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw, both of whom are to be on the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, which will be currently in session at Tanglewood.

Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include in the concerts of July 24, 26, 27, Brahms' Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh Symphony, Copland's Third Symphony, Rachmaninov's Third Symphony, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony (Viola soloist: William Primrose), Hindemith's Violin Concerto (Soloist: Ruth Posselt), Harber's Overture "School for Scandal," Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse," and Martinu's Concerto Grosso.

Following the Beethoven cycle the last week of the Festival, with concerts on Aug. 7, 9, 10, will include a Symphony by Haydn, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Schumann's Second Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mozart's Requiem (with chorus and soloists).

Prospective subscribers should address the Festival office at Symphony Hall in Boston.

BURBANK, CALIF.
REVIEW

D 8 1947

NEW YORK (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program anc close with the concert of Aug. 10

The orchestra's summer school the Berkshire Music Center, wil open its six-week term at Tangle wood on June 30 and continu through August -0, under the d rection of Dr. Koussevitzky, wit Aaron Copland as assistant dire tor. As in the past, the facult of the center will include th principal players of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra. Instru tion will be offered in five d partments: orchestral and chor conducting,. orchestral playin and chamber music, compositio opera and horal singing and e semble playing.

TORONTO, CANADA
GLOBE & MAIL

FEB 8 - 1947

erkshire Festival rogram List s Announced

First announcement of the reperory for next summer's Berkshire estival has been received from erge Koussevitzky, who is now on is mid-winter vacation in Florida. he Boston Symphony Orchestra is o give 12 concerts at its summer ome at Tanglewood next summer. hese will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, respectively, by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13, 20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed, the middle week to be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, Aug. 2, 3), the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (Aug. 5).

Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include in the concerts of July 24, 26, 27 Brahms' Second Symphony; Schubert's Seventh Symphony; Copland's Third Symphony; Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony; Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony (viola soloist: William Primrose); Hindemith's Violin Concerto (soloist: Ruth Posselt); Barber's Overture "School for Scandal"; Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse"; and Martinu's Concerto Grosso.

Following the Beethoven cycle, the last week of the festival, with concerts on Aug. 7, 9, 10, will include a Symphony by Haydn; Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Schumann's Second Symphony; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mazart's Requiem (with chorus and soloists).

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

FEB 9 - 1947

Berkshire Auditions To Be Held This Week

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held this week in New York. The Music Center, operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and directed by ~~Serge Koussevitsky~~, will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from June 30 to Aug. 10.

The auditions will be held at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall Friday morning, violin and viola at 9 A. M., 'cello and bass at 10, woodwinds at 10.30, brass at 11. Auditions for tympani will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday at 6.30. Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry, Jr., at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, before Thursday noon. Formal applications may be made at the auditions.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 8 - 1947

NEW YORK, Feb. 8 (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one of Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of August 10.

The Berkshire ~~Music Center~~, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing and ensemble playing.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

FEB 9 - 1947

The Boston symphony orchestra will increase from 9 to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony."

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through Aug. 10. under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER

FEB 9 1947

Serge Koussevitzky To Conduct Concerts

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the greater part of the concerts this year which the Boston Symphony orchestra will present at its summer home at Tanglewood. Included in the 12 concerts will be two devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart respectively by an orchestra of chamber proportions July 13 and July 20, and three week of concerts by the full orchestra i the Shed.

Dr. Koussevitsky has invited tw guest conductors, Leonard Bernste and Robert Shaw, both of whom a to be on the faculty at the Ber shire Music Center, which will in session at Tanglewood.

Included in the concerts of J 24, July 26 and July 27 will Brahms' Second Symphony, Sc bert's Seventh Symphony, Coplan Third Symphony, Rachmanino Third Symphony, Berlioz' 'Har in Italy" Symphony (viola solo William Primrose), Hindemith's lin concerto (soloist: Ruth Poss Barber's Overture "School for Sc dal," Ravel's "Pavane" and Valse," and Martinu's Conc Grosso.

After the Beethoven cycle July Aug. 2 and Aug. 3, concerts on last week of the Festival will be 7, Aug. 9 and Aug. 10 featur Haydn Symphony, Mendelss "Italian" Symphony, Schuma Second Symphony, Tschaikow Fourth Symphony, Debussy's Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacr Printemps" and Mozart's Req (with chorus and soloists.)

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 9 - 1947

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held Friday morning at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, New York City. The center, operated by the Boston Symphony, is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland ~~as assistant~~ director and Stanley Chapple as dean. The center will be in session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from June 30 to August 10. Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry Jr. at Symphony Hall, Boston, before Thursday noon. Formal application may be made at the auditions.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

B 9 - 1947

—World of Music—

12 Concerts Booked for Berkshires

United Press

New York—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing and ensemble playing.

THE NEW YORK Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, for the first time since before the war, will make an extensive tour this spring. Between Apr. 14 and through May 11, the orchestra will play 28 concerts in 24 cities. Seventeen concerts will be conducted by Artur Rodzinski; the remaining 11 by Leopold Stokowski.

The tour, which will take the orchestra for the first time in its history through the South, has been made possible by its radio sponsorship. The cost involved in moving an organization of 103 musicians some 4,000 miles halfway across the country and back is so high that a large deficit otherwise would have been inevitable, the orchestra's directors said.

The tour opens in Baltimore on Apr. 14 under Stokowski, who also will conduct the next ten concerts in southern cities. Rodzinski takes over on Apr. 25 in Montgomery, Ala.

All concerts will be played in the evening except the four Sundays, which will be afternoon performances broadcast, as usual, over the Columbia network.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 9 - 1947

Works Listed For Festival In Berkshires

Koussevitzky Announces Features of His 1947 Tanglewood Programs

Serge Koussevitzky has announced some of the principal works to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in next summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. These are scheduled as follows:

Series A: Thursday and Saturday, July 24 and 26, 8:30, and Sunday, July 27, 3:30. Brahms, Symphony No. 2; Schubert, Symphony in C major; Copland, Symphony No. 3; Rachmaninoff, Symphony No. 3; Berlioz, "Harold in Italy" (viola solo, William Primrose); Hindemith, violin concerto (soloist, Ruth Posselt); Barber, Overture to "The School for Scandal;" Ravel, "Pavane" and "La Valse;" Martinu, Concerto Grosso.

Series B: Thursday and Saturday, July 31, Aug. 2; Sunday, Aug. 3. All-Beethoven.

Series C: Thursday and Saturday, Aug. 7, 8; Sunday, Aug. 10. Haydn, Symphony; Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Schumann, Symphony No. 2; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4; Debussy, La Mer; Stravinsky, Le Sacre du Printemps; Mozart, Requiem.

Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw will be guest conductors. The extra concerts of Bach and Mozart works on Sunday afternoons, July 13 and 20, will be played by an orchestra of chamber music proportions. The third extra concert, presenting the Ninth Symphony on Tuesday night, Aug. 5, will round out the Beethoven cycle.

Music Center Auditions

Members of the Boston Symphony will hold auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center's student orchestra next Friday morning in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall at the following times: violin and viola, 9 o'clock; cello and double-bass, 10; woodwinds, 10:30; brass, 11. Auditions for tympanists will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 6:30. Applicants are asked to notify Thomas D. Perry jr., Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., as soon as possible. The Music Center opens its six-week term under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction on June 30. William Primrose, who will play the viola solo in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," will head the chamber music department.

Concert in Greenwich

The Greenwich-Stamford Society of Music will present two concerts by a small orchestra under Fritz Kitzinger's direction. The first will take place next Sunday, Feb. 16, at 5 o'clock in the Playhouse at Greenwich, Conn., with a program including Schubert's fifth symphony, Mozart's violin concerto in D major, arias from Mozart operas, two songs by Hugo Wolf and Bela Bartok's Romanian Dances. Diez Weissmann, violinist, and Ralph Magelessen, barytone, will be the soloists. The place and program of the second concert, on Sunday, April 27, will be announced later.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

FEB 9 - 1947

Koussevitzky in Beethoven Cycle Among Berkshire Festival Events

THE FIRST ANNOUNCEMENT of the repertory for next summer's Berkshire Festival has been received at Symphony Hall from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, now on his mid-winter vacation in Florida. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give 12 concerts in its summer home in Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass. These will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart respectively by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13, 20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed, the middle week to be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, Aug. 2, 3), the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (Aug. 5). Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the greater part of the Festival, and has invited two guest conductors, Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw, both of whom are to be on the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, currently in session at Tanglewood.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY plans to include in the concerts of July 24, 26, 27 Brahms' Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh Symphony, Copland's Third Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony (Viola soloist: William Primrose), Hindemith's Violin Concerto (soloist: Ruth Posselt), Barber's Overture "School for Scandal," Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse," and Martinu's Concerto Grosso. Following the Beethoven cycle the last week of the Festival, with concerts on Aug. 7, 9, 10, will include a Symphony by Haydn, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Schumann's Second Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Debussy's "The Sea," Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mozart's Requiem (with chorus and soloists). Prospective subscribers should address the Festival office at Symphony Hall in Boston.

RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS-OBSERVER

FEB 9 - 1947

Speaking of Records—

Khatchaturian: Concerto for Piano and Orchestra (1936). William Kapell, Pianist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor. Victor Album DM-1084. $4.85.

The name of Khatchaturian is still new to the musical world that a ort bigraphical note is in order. orn in Tiflis in 1904, this Armenian mposer did not manifest his in rest in music until he was 19. hen he entered the Gnessin School f Music in Moscow and later tudied at the Moscow Conservatory. is ability as a composer was recognized immediately and in a few hort years he has risen to be classed long with the great figures of the ontemporary Russian school. In this ountry he is known principally for is Armenian folk-ballet "Gayane," nd two piano works—the Concerto nd a Toccata.

The Concerto is frankly a virtuoso piece in the manner of Liszt and Tschaikowsky with a 20th century armonic and orchestral conception. An interesting facet is the strong Armenian folk-music flavor of the themes of the first two movements. The spontaneous spirit and verve of this work caught the fancy of the American audiences at its first performances and it is well on its way to great popularity.

It was a happy choice that brought Kapell and Koussevitsky together for this performance. Kapell's youthful vigor, enthusiasm, and virtuosity make him an ideal interpretor of this Concerto. Koussevitsky's deep understanding of the modern Russian school and his superb musicianship make the performance well-nigh perfect in every respect. These facts plus a rich and live recording assure the success of this album.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

FEB 9 - 1947

Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its plans for the 1947 Berkshire Festival, which will be held as usual at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. According to word received from Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra, will increase the number of concerts next summer from nine to 12.

The Berkshire Music Center will be in operation at Tanglewood from June 30 to August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

For further information about the festival and the Music Center, address Symphony Hall, Boston 15. For living accommodations in the Berkshires, address Berkshire Hills Conference, Courthouse, Pittsfield, Mass.

The complete schedule for the festival concerts: Extra concerts (music of Bach and Mozart respectively), Sunday afternoons, July 13 and 20; Series A, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 24, 26, 27; Series B, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, July 31, August 2, 3; extra concert (to include Beethoven's Ninth Symphony), Tuesday evening, August 5; Series C, Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, August 7, 9, 10.

Jul 7 47

Works Listed For Festival In Berkshires

Koussevitzky Announces Features of His 1947 Tanglewood Programs

Serge Koussevitzky has announced some of the principal works to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in next summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. These are scheduled as follows:

Series A: Thursday and Saturday, July 24 and 26, 8:30, and Sunday, July 27, 3:30. Brahms, Symphony No. 2; Schubert, Symphony in C major; Copland, Symphony No. 3; Rachmaninoff, Symphony No. 3; Berlioz, "Harold in Italy" (viola solo, William Primrose); Hindemith, violin concerto (soloist, Ruth Posselt); Barber, Overture to "The School for Scandal;" Ravel, "Pavane" and "La Valse;" Martinu, Concerto Grosso.

Series B: Thursday and Saturday, July 31, Aug. 2; Sunday, Aug. 3. All-Beethoven.

Series C: Thursday and Saturday, Aug. 7, 8; Sunday, Aug. 10. Haydn, Symphony; Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Schumann, Symphony No. 2; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4; Debussy, La Mer; Stravinsky, Le Sacre du Printemps; Mozart, Requiem.

Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw will be guest conductors. The extra concerts of Bach and Mozart works on Sunday afternoons, July 13 and 20, will be played by an orchestra of chamber music proportions. The third extra concert, presenting the Ninth Symphony on Tuesday night, Aug. 5, will round out the Beethoven cycle.

Music Center Auditions

Members of the Boston Symphony will hold auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center's student orchestra next Friday morning in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall at the following times: violin and viola, 9 o'clock; cello and double-bass, 10; woodwinds, 10:30; brass, 11. Auditions for tympanists will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 6:30. Applicants are asked to notify Thomas D. Perry jr., Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., as soon as possible. The Music Center opens its six-week term under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction on June 30. William Primrose, who will play the viola solo in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," will head the chamber music department.

Concert in Greenwich

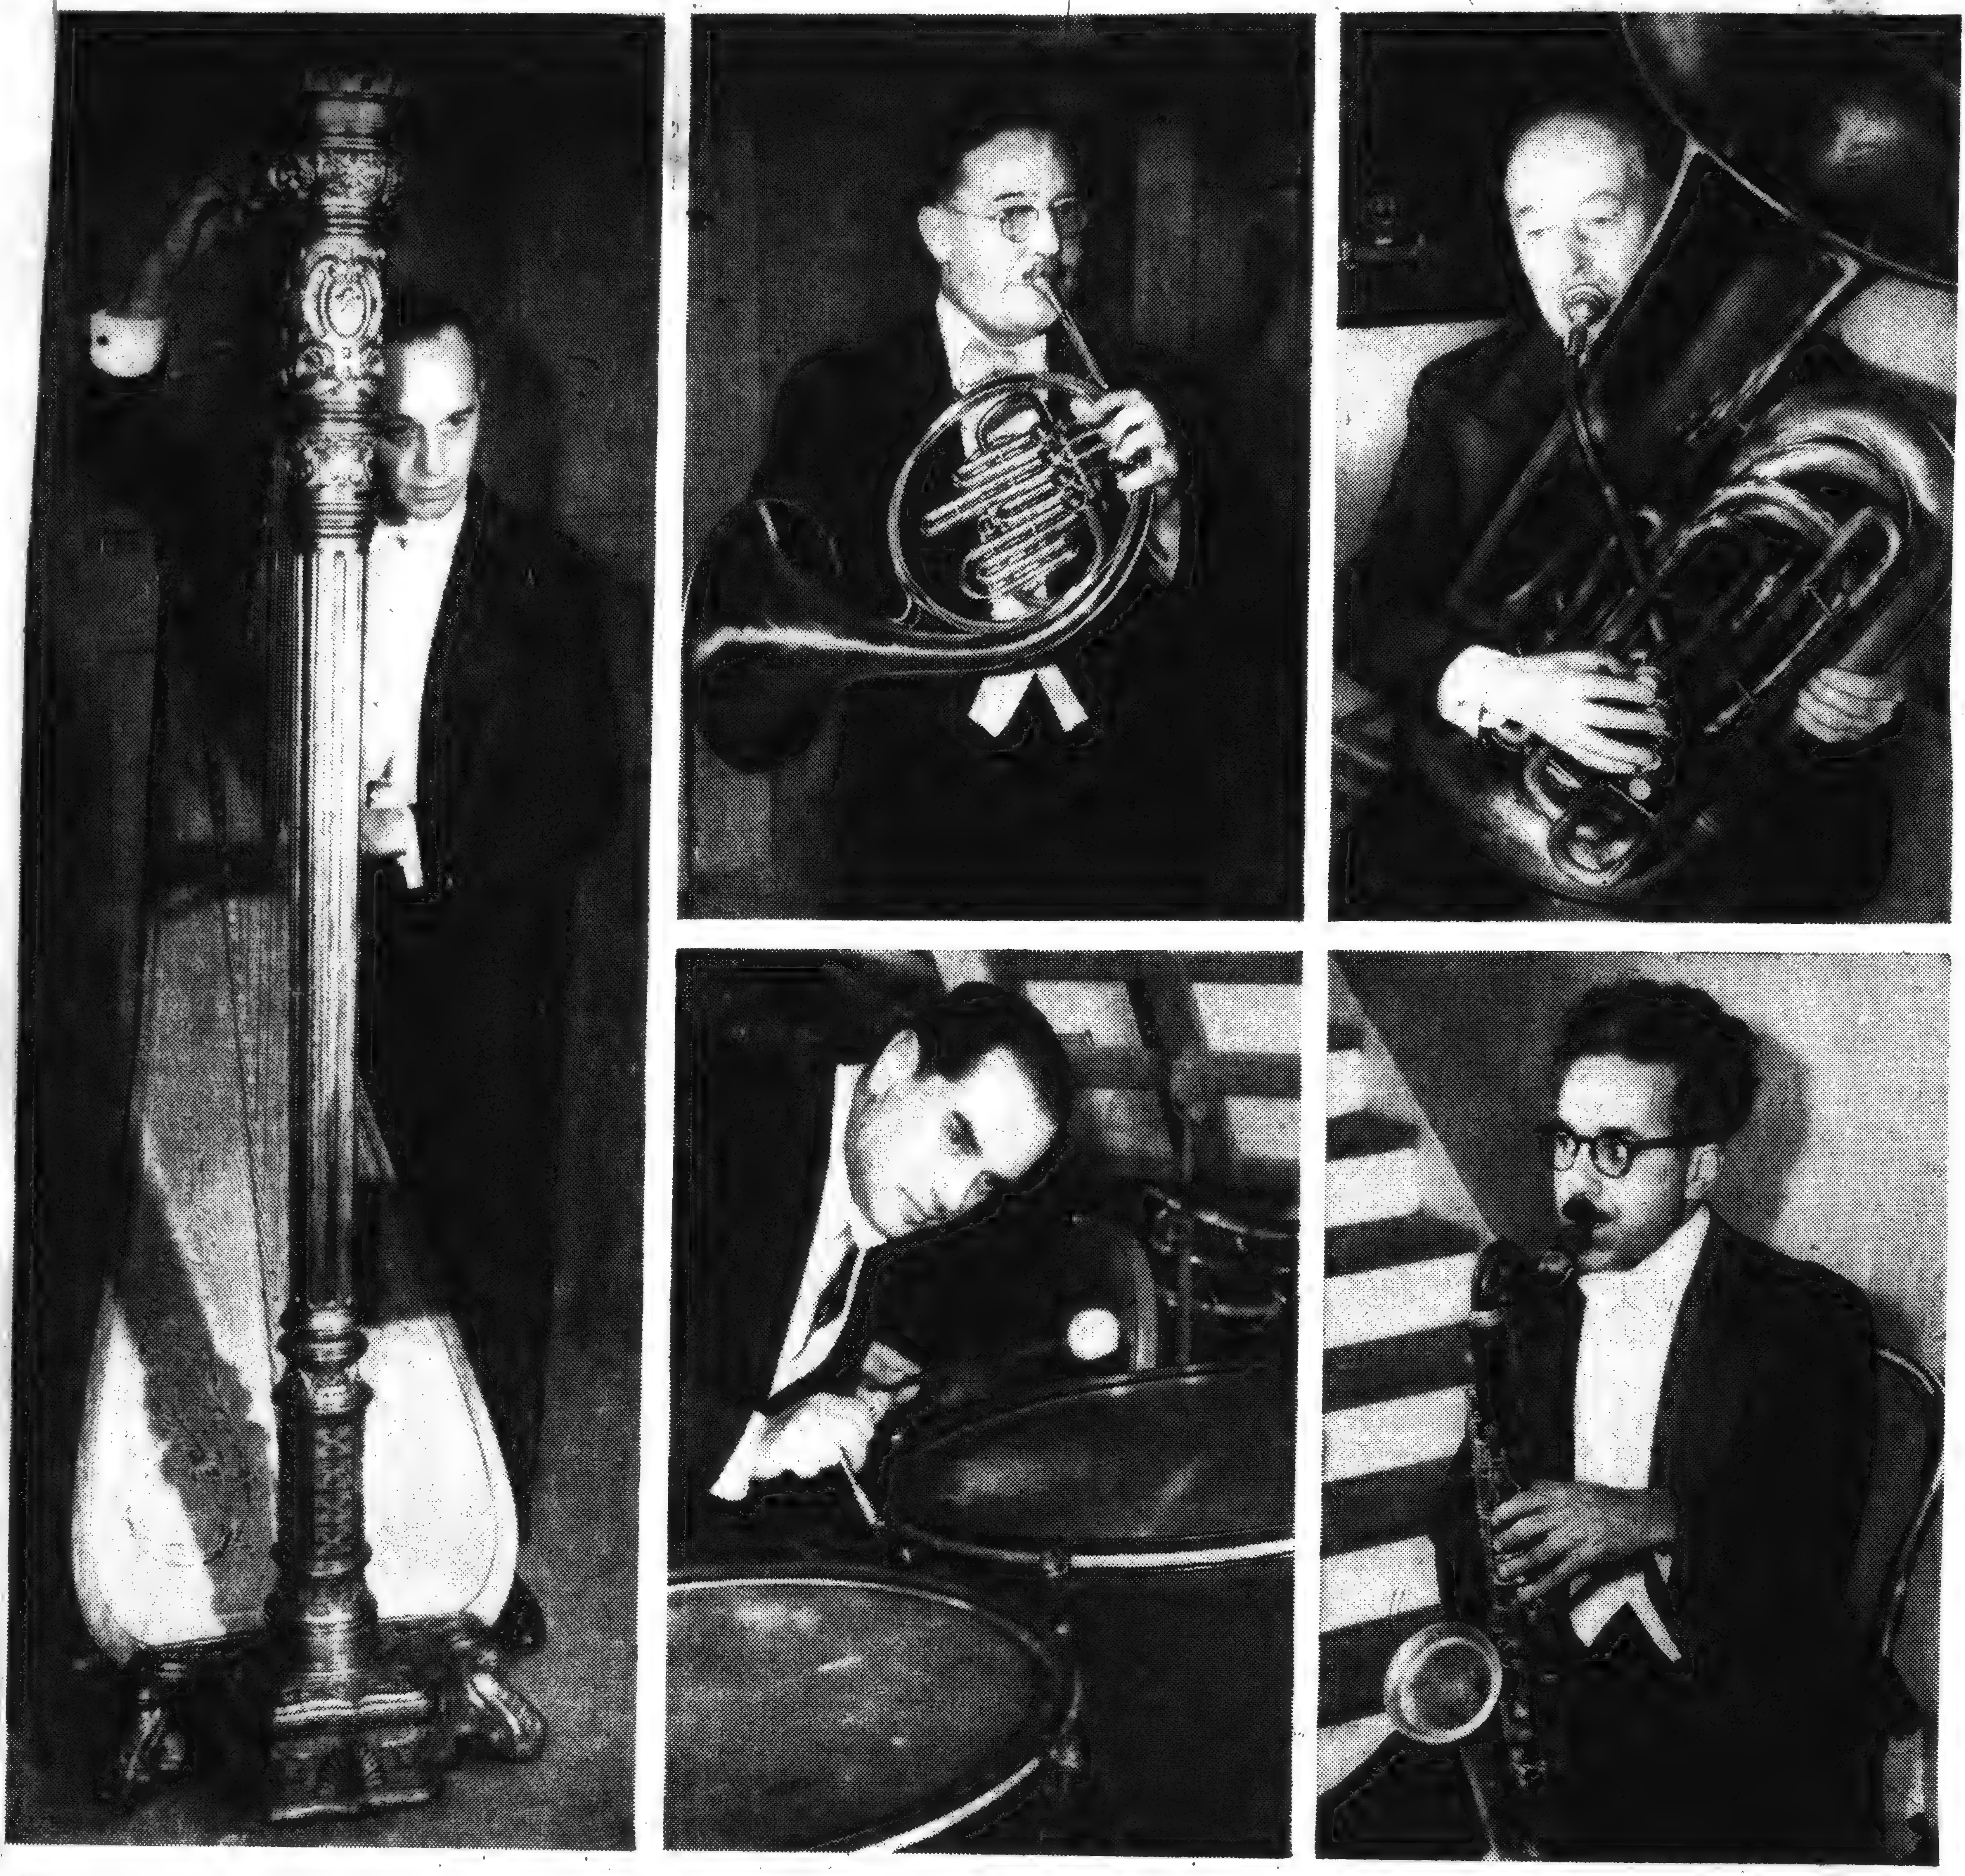
The Greenwich-Stamford Society of Music will present two concerts by a small orchestra under Fritz Kitzinger's direction. The first will take place next Sunday, Feb. 16, at 5 o'clock in the Playhouse at Greenwich, Conn., with a program including Schubert's fifth symphony, Mozart's violin concerto in D major, arias from Mozart operas, two songs by Hugo Wolf and Bela Bartok's Romanian Dances. Diez Weissmann, violinist, and Ralph Magelessen, barytone, will be the soloists. The place and program of the second concert, on Sunday, April 27, will be announced later.

Layman's Music Course

Owing to the holiday, there will be no lecture Wednesday afternoon in the Layman's Music Course conducted by Olga Samaroff-Stokowski. The next lecture with "How do you regard the soloist at a symphony concert?" as its theme, will take place Wednesday Feb. 19, at 5:30 in Town Hall.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1947. MU

Members of the Boston Symphony, in Town This Week, Warm Up for Concert



David W. Nilsson

It's usually the conductor on whom the spotlight falls. For a change, then, we turn to some of the less publicized players. Left, Bernard Zighera tunes his harp. Upper left, Willem Valkeneier, first horn player, and upper right, Eugene Adam, bass tuba player, try out a few preparatory notes. Lower left, Roman Szulc tunes up his kettle drums. Lower right, Rosario Masseo tries out his bass clarinet. The Boston Symphony will be directed by Leonard Bernstein on this visit to New York

---

This Clipping From BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

FEB 10 1947

DISCUSSING the first Boston Symphony broadcast under sponsorship of John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., over ABC Jan. 21, are (l to r): Mark Woods, ABC president; Bruno Walter, conductor; Craig Lawrence, general manager of WCOP Boston, originating station; Sydney [illegible] Jr., John Hancock, director. A reception was held at the Ritz-Carlton in Boston following the broadcast.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 10 1947

Berkshire Center Schedules Auditors

Auditions for the Berkshire Music Center Student Orchestra will be held at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, New York, Friday morning, Feb. 14. The schedule: Violins and viola, 9; violoncello and contrabass, 10; wood winds, 10:30; brass, 11. Auditions for tympani will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 12, at 6:30 p. m.

The judges are members of the Boston Symphony who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry Jr. at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., before Wednesday noon, Feb. 12. Formal application may be made at the auditions.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1947.

Members of the Boston Symphony, in Town This Week, Warm Up for Concert

David W. Nilsson

It's usually the conductor on whom the spotlight falls. For a change, then, we turn to some of the less publicized players. Left, Bernard Zighera tunes his harp. Upper left, William Valkeneier, first horn player, and upper right, Eugene Adam, bass tuba player, try out a few preparatory notes. Lower left, Roman Szulc tunes up his kettle drums. Lower right, Rosario Mazzeo tries out his bass clarinet. The Boston Symphony will be directed by Leonard Bernstein on this visit to New York

---

This Clipping From BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

FEB 10 1947

DISCUSSING the first Boston Symphony broadcast under sponsorship of John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., over ABC Jan. 21, are (l to r): Mark Woods, ABC president; Bruno Walter, conductor; Craig Lawrence, general manager of WCOP Boston, originating station; Sy[illegible] Jr., John Hancock, director. A reception was held at the [illegible] in Boston following the broadcast.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 10 1947

Berkshire Center Schedules Auditors

Auditions for the Berkshire Music Center Student Orchestra will be held at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, New York, Friday morning, Feb. 14. The schedule: Violins and viola, 9; violoncello and contrabass, 10; wood winds, 10:30; brass, 11. Auditions for tympani will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 12, at 6:30 p. m.

The judges are members of the Boston Symphony who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry Jr. at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., before Wednesday noon, Feb. 12. Formal application may be made at the auditions.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 9 1947

ORCHESTRA CONTROL

Philharmonic Dispute Raises Question Anew of Conductor-Manager Relations

By OLIN DOWNES

It is clear that the growing pains of our justly famous American orchestras, even the oldest of them, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, are not at an end. The unfortunate altercation between Dr. Rodzinski and the management and directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, which has resulted in the sudden and complete severance of their relations, points up this fact.

It cannot be said that as regards the technical status of the orchestra itself or the strongly differing characteristics and artistic qualities of the conductors it has engaged its course has run precisely smooth since the time, some eleven seasons ago, when Mr. Toscanini departed from its podium. Nor has this course been invariably easy to explain. Circumstances have given evidence in these years of confused counsels and conflicting guidances of the orchestra's destinies. Why John Barbirolli, for example, was made musical director of the orchestra after Toscanini's departure and maintained there, with exception of artistic authority, for seasons after he had conclusively demonstrated his insufficiency for that post, is still a mystery which has been impossible to solve. As a result the orchestra quickly and appallingly retrograded in its discipline and its technical quality, while reviewers became positively embarrassed to record the level of mediocrity, or worse, in the performances.

Rebuilding the Ensemble

Dr. Rodzinski, when he became Barbirolli's successor, had to pick up after him, partially reorganize the orchestra, refurbish it in personnel and quality—a direction in which he had made notable progress at the time of the deplorable and complete collapse of the relations, both personal and professional, with the Society. Little has been published of the actual complaints and charges that Dr. Rodzinski made when he tendered his resignation in a manner so conclusive and uncompromising that further discussion was impossible; and little more, up to the time of this writing, of the society's rejoinders. This pot still boils furiously, and the end of the matter is not yet. The details of this matter are not this column's present concern. But the situation emphasizes a matter which is of decided interest to the musical public as well as the future of the Philharmonic-Symphony. That is, the question of what the relations of the conductor to the management and the directors of a great symphony orchestra and what the balance of musical and managerial power should be.

In general an excellent principle is observed in American orchestral organization. It is observed in different ways and degrees, and perhaps, in some instance, honored more in the breach than the observance. But that prevailing principle is the separation of the musical and business policies of the orchestra, by which the conductor is given full and practically sovereign powers in his choice of players and of programs, and all that pertains to the musical results, while the management of the orchestra is entrusted with full control of its practical affairs. But the practical problems, and the deficits arising therefrom, are not permitted to dominate the conductor.

It is obvious that while theoretically this division can be made cleanly, in the practice neither the artistic side nor the business organization of the orchestra can be wholly independent of each other. The orchestra has to be financed. It never pays its way from the sale of seats to the concerts. There are usually deficits, often heavy ones. There are public spirited citizens who meet these deficits. The deficits must have a limit; the donors have some rights, indeed obligations, to themselves as well as the public, to know how the funds that they have so often contributed to keep our great symphony orchestra going are being spent, and for what artistic and as well as practical objectives.

Days That Are Gone

In the olden days these problems were simpler than they are now and they were met, if not less generously, less democratically. When Maj. Henry L. Higginson established the Boston Symphony in 1881, and the orchestra, under his patronage, rapidly took the leading position among American symphonic organizations, he laid down the above principles and they were strictly maintained. Major Higginson had at his side Charles A. Ellis, a gentleman and business man of large means, who managed the Boston Symphony—and leading artists as well—with a zeal which companioned the ideals of his friend, the orchestra's founder.

Practical modifications in the workings of the principle inevitably developed with the years. Major Higginson, virtually sole guarantor of the orchestra's heavy annual deficits, went to his rest. A board of directors, in place of a single imperious person, now controlled the orchestra's policies. Of these directors, one, Ernest B. Dane, was the principal payer of the annual deficits. He died. Circumstances of the depression and multiplied income taxes had discouraged donors. The orchestra was debarred from income from records and sponsored radio, since it remained for a long time non-union. It then joined the Musicians Union. Its budget is now balanced, we understand—balanced or better. Fortunately, the principle of the conductor's artistic ascendancy remains what it was from the beginning. Dr. Koussevitzky's exceptional achievements and popularity with the public would have assured that had any such assurance been necessary.

Philharmonic Policy

The Philharmonic - Symphony grew up differently from Boston's orchestra. It began as a cooperative enterprise back in 1842. It struggled through many vicissitudes and many phases of management. In due course it attained a supporting Maecenas in the person of Clarence H. Mackay, who wished only one thing at any cost—the orchestra's supremacy. Seasons with Toscanini, Furtwaengler and Mengelberg followed, seasons of great brilliancy and public acclaim but seasons which rested for public support, some unsoundly, on the presence of famous "star" conductors. This policy fell apart by its own inner weakness. Toscanini left and years of conductorial chaos ensued. It was realized that the orchestra must have a musical director with supreme authority during his tenure of office, with guest conductors only as short-term visitors to rest him periodically from his labors. This conductor, for New York's orchestra, has to be at least three things—a brilliant leader, an orchestra builder, a musician with a deep sense of the service his orchestra must render its community, and adjustability, always within the limits of artistic integrity, to other people's arguments and to conditions as well as theories.

The ideal arrangement is as small, intelligent and concentrated an executive organization as possible; a management of experience, firmness and wisdom; a conductor whose final purpose is the orchestra's greatest good and its greatest possible service in the cause of music. Social influence in a conductor's policies there should not be and it should be impossible for such influence to be exerted. The conductor must be engaged on his merits and not his figure or pulchritude, given unrestricted musical powers and kept in position and free to concentrate wholly on his work so long as it is clear that he is acting effectively and selflessly to this end. As previously pointed out, and regardless of either side of the recent altercation, the Philharmonic-Symphony has again before it a choice of really capable conductors and of a policy which will be long range and sound in all its workings. The days of a Stransky following a Mahler, or a Barbirolli a Toscanini, should be definitely past. The development of an orchestra should be free of officious meddling by those without knowledge of the conductor's art, on the one hand, or conductorial vanity or caprice in a situation of public service on the other. The orchestras which have best succeeded in their objectives are the ones that have clung closest to these principles.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 11 1947

Bernstein to Lead Olney Concert

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night in a concert at the Westchester County Center, White Plains, N. Y. The event will be the first of a series to be presented by Mrs. Julian Olney. It will be the first Olney concert there in three years. The Olney series, which were instituted in 1930, were closed because of the war in 1943.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 11 1947

MUSIC AUDITIONS TO OPEN

Trials for the Berkshire Student Orchestra Will Begin Friday

Auditions for membership in the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center will be held on Friday morning at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will listen to applicants.

Violinists and violists will be heard at 9 A. M., 'cellists and contrabassists at 10, wood winds at 10:30 and brasses at 11. Auditions for tympani will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday at 6:30 P. M.

Traveler Feb 12

Koussevitzky Biographer Defends Book

Moses Smith of Brookline defended today his new book, "Koussevitzky," biography of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, against the charge made by Koussevitzky that it "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

LIBEL DENIED

Smith, music critic of two Boston newspapers and subsequently director of Columbia Masterworks of the Columbia Recording Corporation, said:

"As far as I am concerned there's nothing libelous in the book."

He said that he does not know as yet what the exact charge of libel is and that he is leaving for New York today to confer with his lawyer and his publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., who were scheduled to release the book Saturday.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is vacationing in New York, obtained a temporary court order yesterday restraining publication of the book. In his petition he said the book contained "untruthful and unjustified statements, disparaging my ability as a conductor, musician and teacher."

In the foreword of his book Smith wrote that "the ensuing pages are in no sense an 'authorized' biography."

Smith said there was an earlier biography of Koussevitzky, written by his friend Arthur Lourie, but in the foreword he describes the value of this book as a source as being "unfortunately lessened greatly by its numerous errors, by the author's excessively worshipful attitude toward his subject, and by the book's inadequate factual content, particularly as to omissions of important matter about Koussevitzky's origins and early life.

"The special significance of these errors of commission and omission lies in the fact that Lourie's 'Life' was 'authorized' by Koussevitzky," Smith wrote.

"In an effort to correct them I had recourse, among other sources, to those who knew Koussevitzky 'when'—for there are still many such in this country."

Smith said that reference books "unfortunately tend to repeat the same misinformation as is contained in Lourie's 'Life,' even those that were published many years earlier. So do many of the autobiographical statements contained in published interviews with Koussevitzky."

AID DECLINED

Through his counsel, Henry Root Stern of Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, Dr. Koussevitzky contended that publication of the book was without his consent and violates his privacy.

The 72-year-old Russian-born virtuoso set forth in his petition that he had declined to give Smith any information, advising him that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

"The said book untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training," Dr. Koussevitzky complained.

He added that he found the book as a whole "not only disparaging, but very distinctly damaging, not no indication when."

Herald 2/12/48

Koussevitzky Blocks Book On His Life

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a temporary court order today restraining publication of a book which he said "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The book, titled "Koussevitzky" and written by Moses Smith, was scheduled for release next Saturday.

In his petition, the conductor said Smith told him several years ago that he planned to write a biography of him. Koussevitzky said he declined to give the writer any information, advising him that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

Koussevitzky's petition said the book contained "untruthful and unjustified statements, disparaging my ability as a conductor, musician and teacher."

Defendants named beside Smith were Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers, and the Arco Publishing Company, Inc., distributors.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, who granted the interim injunction, will decide later whether the order will be made permanent.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 12 1947

Koussevitzky Acts to Ban Biography

NEW YORK, Wednesday (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a temporary court order yesterday restraining publication of a book which he said "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The book, titled "Koussevitzky" and written by Moses Smith, was scheduled for release next Saturday.

In his petition, the conductor said Smith told him several years ago that he planned to write a biography of him. Koussevitzky said he declined to give the writer any information, advising him that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

Koussevitzky's petition said the book contained "untruthful and unjustified statements, disparaging my ability as a conductor, musician and teacher."

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, who granted the interim injunction, will decide later whether the order will be made permanent.

Koussevitzky Wins Court Order Halting Sale of Biography

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who has sued a publishing firm for $400,000 damages on the grounds that a new biography of him was libelous, today won a court order restraining distribution of the book.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag, who granted the order, said the suit would establish a precedent on rights to publish biographies without the subject's consent.

See BOOK Page 3

Globe 2/12/48

Book

Continued from the First Page

Koussevitzky has charged that the book, written by Boston music critic Moses Smith, was unauthorized and therefore in violation of his civil rights. He also chadged he was libeled by statements in the biography.

His suit was brought against Allen, Towne & Heath, publishing firm, which had scheduled the book for sale Saturday.

The publishing firm said copies of the books already in the hands of booksellers will go on sale that day, but the restraining order will halt further distribution.

A spokesman for the firm said it was with "surprise" that the publishers learned of Koussevitzky's suit because they believed the biography was unbiased and highly laudatory of the conductor.

The publishers said the charge of libel was less important than the question of whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticisms without the consent of the subject.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 12 1947

BOOK SUIT SEEN AS SIGNIFICANT

Koussevitzky Tries to Stop Sale of His Biography.

A suit of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for an injunction restraining publication and distribution of "Koussevitzky," a new biography by Moses Smith, was viewed today as having broad implications for the publishing business.

The 72-year-old conductor, at a preliminary hearing in the New York Supreme Court yesterday, won an interim stay restraining Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., 1 Madison avenue, from publishing or distributing the book. Justice Bernard L. Shientag, who granted the stay pending determination of the musician's application for a temporary injunction, gave opposing attorneys until next Wednesday to submit briefs.

David Ewen, director and editor of the newly formed publishing firm, expressed surprise at Koussevitzky's action. "If Mr. Koussevitzky's contention should prevail," he said, "every publisher who has published any book concerning living people without their consent would be subject to an action for damages for invasion of their private rights."

Conductor's Contentions.

The Russian-born conductor, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern, contended that the publication of the book without his consent was a violation of the State civil rights law; that publication of the photographs in the book also was a violation of that law, and that the biography was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

Koussevitzky's complaint contained notice of a $500,000 libel suit against the publishing firm and the author.

In an affidavit, the conductor asserted that he had refused to give Smith any information for the book, declaring that he contemplated publishing his autobiography. Koussevitzky charged that Smith's book "untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training."

In support of his allegation of incipient libel, Koussevitzky listed sixteen purported excerpts from Smith's book. One of them was alleged to read as follows: "At 50, he really began to learn how to conduct, to learn things about music that a conservatory student is expected to know at 18."

Ewen said that 3,000 of a first printing of 5,000 copies of "Koussevitky" were already in the hands of booksellers, and they were to have gone on sale next Saturday at $4 each. He said 200 copies were already in the hands of reviewers.

"While we, as publishers, may not agree with every phase of Mr. Smith's criticism of Mr. Koussevitzky's musical methods, we believe that his book is not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career and is a vital contribution to the literature of musical biography," Ewen said.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

FEB 12 1947

Koussevitzky Says Biography By Moses Smith Is Libelous

NEW YORK—While the Boston Symphony Orchestra was preparing for its appearance in Woolsey Hall at Yale University in New Haven, Conn., last night, the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was obtaining a temporary court order restraining publication of a biography by Moses Smith which the conductor asserts "wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

Leonard Bernstein was on the podium in New Haven while Dr. Koussevitzky was at his home in Brookline, recently returned from a vacation in Florida. Bernstein will conduct in New York tonight.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, in granting an interim stay pending determination of the musician's application for a preliminary injunction, indicated that the suit would establish a precedent on rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent. Opposing attorneys were directed to submit briefs next Wednesday.

Notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against Moses Smith, a former Boston music critic who is author of the disputed book, "Koussevitzky," and the publishing concern, Allen, Towne & Heath Inc., was filed in the complaint.

First Publication

The book, which was to have been distributed next Saturday, is the initial publication of the company, organized here last July. David Ewen, its editor and director, expressed "surprise" last night at Mr. Koussevitzky's action and reported that 3000 copies of a first printing of 5000 books had been distributed to booksellers. Howard Chipkin, lawyer and the company's secretary, appeared as defense counsel.

Should the court grant a temporary injunction, Mr. Ewen said "every publisher in the country is in dire danger if he ever published a book about any living person, or for that matter a dead person whose family is alive or mentioned in the book."

Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern of Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, listed three points as basis for an injunction. He contended that publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, the "rights of privacy" law.

Publication of photographs in the book also constitute a violation of that law, he charged. Finally, he asserted, the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The 72-year-old Russian-born virtuoso, who almost since his advent in Boston 23 years ago has been the subject of adulatory comment in the musical world, set forth in an affidavit that he had declined to give Mr. Smith any information, advising that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

"The said book untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training," Mr Koussevitzky complained.

He added that he found the book as a whole "not only disparaging but very distinctly damaging, not only to my reputation but to my material resources."

"Furthermore," he continued "this book unjustifiably and untruthfully attacks my integrity as a man and as an artist. It impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work and devotion to the ideals of music, art and culture in the United States and throughout the world."

Mr. Ewen described the book as "not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career." To restrain the right to publish it, he said, would infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts "to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of our society."

The charge of libel, he went on, was less important than the question whether the rights of critics could be infringed by by prohibiting publication of criticisms without the consent of the subject.

Mr. Smith for almost 20 years was music critic for the Boston American and the Boston Transcript and more recently has been director of the Masterworks division of Columbia Records.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 12 1947

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Warmly Received Under Bernstein

It was refreshing to hear a concert of really interesting music, played as well as was the program last night in Woolsey Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Leonard Bernstein, amply lived up to its reputation of being one of the finest orchestras in the world, and Mr. Bernsetin is unquestionably a first rate conductor.

It is unfortunate that the Boston Symphony is one of the few major symphonies in the country that is willing to play works of contemporary composers as well as lesser known works of the great composers of the past. The incessant repetition of the more standard works of the symphonic repertory is neither satisfying musically nor constructive to the musical community in which such a tradition-bound organization functions. Perhaps the recent resignation of Mr. Rodzinski from the New York Philharmonic will stimulate more interest in the public on the question of the proper position of such an organization as a constructive artistic group.

The Brahms Serenade in A major, performed last night by the Boston Symphony, is typical of the great works which are neglected simply because they do not call for the usual full-sized orchestra. It is one of Brahm's most melodic and inspired compositions, and it was given an admirable reading last night by Mr. Bernstein.

The next number on the program was Hindemith's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, with Ruth Posselt as soloist. Miss Posselt played brilliantly, and the concerto is without doubt worthy of being incorporated into the repertory. It is a major work by one of the finest of modern composers, and its enthusiastic reception last night should have convinced even the most conventional, that "modern music" can be, and is, well received by the public when it is given a chance.

Mr. Bernstein is a good-looking young man, whom it is difficult to accept seriously at first as a conductor. But his reading of the Beethoven A major Symphony last night provided adequate proof of his really great gifts as a conductor. Far from being a merely mechanical reproduction of a standard interpretation of this work, Mr. Bernstein gave a vigorous, youthful, and intelligent performance. One had the feeling that he had something new to present, that there was really something different in his conception of the work which he was communicating to his audience. It is unusual to find in such a young artist this originality, and particularly such a valid point of view musically, but it is the mark of greatness in a performer. There were moments when Mr. Bernstein tended to overemphasize dynamics, and, particularly in the Brahms, to let his fine feeling for rhythm get the better of him. But these are not great faults in otherwise excellent readings.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

FEB 12 1947.

Koussevitzky Sues Publishers

New York, Feb. 12. (UP)—The publishers of a forthcoming biography of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky faced a suit today by the Boston director to restrain them from distributing the book and asking for $500,000 damages.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted an interim stay Tuesday to halt distribution of the book, which was to go on sale Saturday, until a hearing could be held on an application for a temporary injunction.

The conductor charged that the biography, written by former Boston Music Critic Moses Smith, a party to the suit, was libelous and an invasion of his civil rights. The action was the first of its kind brought under the New York state civil rights law.

Judge Shientag said the suit would establish a precedent on rights to publish biographies without the subject's consent.

The publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, said copies of the book already in the hands of booksellers will go on sale Saturday as scheduled but that the restraining order will halt further distribution.

A firm spokesman said the publishers learned with "surprise" of Koussevitzky's suit because they believed the biography was unbiased and highly laudatory of the conductor.

The publishers regarded the charge of libel as less important than the question of whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticism without the consent of the subject.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 12 1946

Publishers Face Koussevitzky Suit

NEW YORK, Feb. 12 (UP)—The publishers of a forthcoming biography of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky faced a suit today by the Boston director to restrain them from distributing the book and asking for $500,000 damages.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted an interim stay yesterday to halt distribution of the book, which was to go on sale Saturday, until a hearing could be held on an application for a temporary injunction.

The conductor charged the biography, written by former Boston music critic Moses Smith, a party to the suit, was libelous and an invasion of his civil rights. The action was the first of its kind brought under the New York State Civil Rights Law.

Judge Shientag said the suit would establish a precedent on rights to publish biographies without the subject's consent.

The publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, said copies of the book, already in the hands of booksellers, will go on sale Saturday as scheduled but that the restraining order will halt further distribution.

A firm spokesman said the publishers learned with "surprise" of Koussevitzky's suit, because they believed the biography was unbiased and highly laudatory of the conductor.

The publishers regarded the charge of libel as less important than the question of whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticism without consent of the subject.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 12 1947

Even If It's a Publicity Suit It Raises a Novel Point on Biog's 'Libel'

Test case that will have far-reaching effect in films, radio and legit, a legal puzzler of whether an unauthorized biog can be made of a living person is coming up for decision before the N. Y. state supreme court in a libel suit filed by Serge Koussevitzky against Allen, Towne & Heathe, publishers. Symphony conductor is asking $500,000 damages for libel allegedly contained in biography by Moses Smith, originally scheduled for release Feb. 15 by the publishers. In a preliminary action by N. Y. supreme court Justice Bernard L. Shientag yesterday (Tues.), plaintiff was granted a restraining order putting off the publication date until libel action is settled.

Koussevitsky charges that the book describes him "as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians, incompetent as an instructor of conducting, as a poseur, deficient in musical training." Publishers counter with claims that book, though critical, is generally sympathetic to the conductor.

WINSTED, CONN.
CITIZEN

FEB 12 1947

PUBLISHERS FACE KOUSSEVITZKY SUIT DUE TO BIOGRAPHY

New York, Feb. 12—The publishers of a forthcoming biography of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky faced a suit today by the Boston director to restrain them from distributing the book and asking for $500,000 damages.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted an interim stay yesterday to halt distribution of the book, which was to go on sale Saturday, until a hearing could be held on an application for a temporary injunction.

The conductor charged that the biography, written by former Boston Music Critic Moses Smith, a party to the suit, was libelous and an invasion of his civil rights. The action was the first of its kind under the New York state civil rights law.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

FEB 12 1947

Koussevitzky Sues Biography Publishers

NEW YORK, Feb. 12—(UP)—The publishers of a forthcoming biography of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky faced a suit today by the Boston director to restrain them from distributing the book and asking for $500,000 damages.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted an interim stay yesterday to halt distribution of the book, which was to go on sale Saturday, until a hearing could be held on an application for a temporary injunction.

The conductor charged that the biography, written by former Boston music critic Moses Smith, a party to the suit, was libelous and an invasion of his civil rights. The action was the first of its kind brought under the New York State Civil Rights Law.

MADISON, WIS.
STATE JOURNAL

FEB 1

TANGLEWOOD PLANS: The Boston Symphony orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced [illegible] the customary [illegible] series of three concerts each [illegible] concerts—one devoted [illegible] of Bach, one [illegible] the third to include [illegible] performance of Beethoven's [illegible] symphony.

The season will open July 13 [illegible] Bach program and close [illegible] of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood [illegible] and continue through Aug. 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing, and ensemble playing.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

FEB 12 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY HALTS SALE OF BIOGRAPHY

NEW YORK, Feb. 12.—(UP) The publishers of a forthcoming biography of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky faced a suit today by the Boston director to restrain them from distributing the book and asking for $500,000 damages.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted an interim stay yesterday to halt distribution of the book, which was to go on sale Saturday, until a hearing could be held on an application for a temporary injunction.

The conductor charged that the biography, written by former Boston music critic Moses Smith, a party to the suit, was libelous and an invasion of his civil rights. The action was the first of its kind brought under the New York state civil rights law.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

FEB 12 1947

Last Night's Concert

By E. C. R.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

The second in the series of three additional Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music was held last night in Woolsey Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, was heard.

Mr. Bernstein proved himself to be a most capable director, entering into the spirit of the program with complete understanding, honest and sincere musicianship. It was obvious from the start that he felt deeply and personally a human quality in the music. Woolsey Hall was packed to overflowing to hear this great orchestra and pay tribute to it and to this conductor who was making his first appearance here in New Haven. This great composer-director has studied under Serge Koussevitzky and did this great conductor justice as a substitute for him. For indeed he had many of Kousevitzky's own dynamic mannerism, facial expressions and nuances.

The program opened with Serenades in A Major by Brahms, unique in that the omission of the violins with their high clear voices did not keep these numbers from being definitely symphonic in style and pattern. Softer and richer tones were effected by the use of just the wind instruments, violas, cellos and double basses. It was apparent throughout the entire number that this was written in a most happy and contented time in the life of this great composer. Its melody was good humored, delicate and delightfully gentle.

In the second number, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Hindemith, Miss Ruth Posselt, violinist, scored a triumph. She was a delight to the eye as well as to the ear—a very complete combination of natural talent and youth. Streamlined architecture and forthrightness are characteristics of Hindemith's music.

He has been accused of dryness because of preoccupation with form; however, his ideas are original and abundant, and this Concerto was no exception. In the second movement the clarinet solo took the solo theme as the violinist wove in obligato; while in the Finale the orchestra set the pace with a few lively dance-like measures which Miss Posselt took up, while the wood winds gave a light rhythmic tempo suggestive of the opening. The soloist carried the burden of interest, bringing the climax about triumphantly.

After intermission the best part of the program was presented in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in a Major, Op. 92. Before writing this symphony, Beethoven developed a broader vision and surer musicianship than any of his earlier works had showed. It might be called a Dance Symphony, not because it makes use of actual dance forms but because it has a continuous spirit of rhythmic regularity that makes it irresistible, and it has been called "the apothesis of rhythm," and this description is justified by the animated vitality of at least three of its movements. There is a long slow introduction which promises later rhythmic liveliness that is to follow. The dance gets under way and the second melody follows at top speed, followed by a syncopated pattern in the bass, always on the same notes, while the violins sing innocently above. The second movement has something of the spirit and outline of the Rondo, in which two or more melodies alternate, with the accompaniment in triplets while the bass still hammers at the original rhythmic pattern. The third movement is faster than a minuet. The Finale begins with two exclamations which evidence the Irish music upon which Beethoven was working at the time this Symphony was written. The main dance tune keeps whirling, leaping and twisting, bringing to a close this great symphonic masterpiece.

The third and concluding concert in this additional series will be held April 8th when the duo-pianists, Vronsky and Babin, will be heard.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

FEB 12 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY SUES TO BAR BIOGRAPHY

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS New York Bureau.

NEW YORK, Feb. 12. — Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought suit in the New York Supreme Court Tuesday to restrain a publishing firm from bringing out an unauthorized biography of himself, on the ground that it was an invasion of his civil rights.

"If Mr. Koussevitzky's contention should prevail," said the defendant firm, Allen, Towne & Heath Inc. "every publisher who has published any book concerning living people without their consent would be subject to an action for damages for invasion of their private rights.'

Justice Bernard L. Shientag Tuesday restrained the firm from publishing the book pending his decision on an application for a temporary injunction.

The conductor charged that the biography was an attempt to exploit his personality commercially and might cut into the market for his proposed autobiography; that it contained false statements.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

FEB 12 1947

Court Halts Sale Of Koussevitsky Biography

NEW YORK, (U.P.)—The publishers of a forthcoming biography of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky faced a suit today by the Boston director to restrain them from distributing the book and asking for $500,000 damages.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted an interim stay yesterday to halt distribution of the book, which was to go on sale Saturday, until a hearing could be held on an application for a temporary injunction.

The conductor charged that the biography, written by former music critic, Moses Smith, a party to the suit, was libelous and an invasion of his civil rights. The action was the first of its kind brought under the New York state civil rights law.

Omaha, Neb.
Morn Herald
2-12-47

Conductor Has Book Distribution Halted

New York (U.P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor who has sued a publishing form for 400 thousand dollars damages on the grounds that a new biography of him was libelous, Tuesday won a court order restraining distribution of the book.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag said that the suit would establish a precedent on rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE

FEB 12 1947

Court Bans Koussevitzky Biography

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (U.P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra conductor who has sued a publishing firm for $400,000 damages on the grounds a new biography of his was libelous, today won a court order restraining distribution of the book.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag, who granted the restraining order, said the suit would establish a precedent on rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent.

Koussevitzky has charged that the book, written by Boston Music Critic Moses Smith, was unauthorized and therefore in violation of his civil rights. He also charged he was libeled by statements in the biography.

His suit was brought against Allen, Towne and Heath, publishing firm, which had scheduled the book for sale on Saturday.

The firm said copies of the books already in the hands of booksellers will go on sale that day, but the restraining order will halt further distribution.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 12 1947

Koussevitsky Fights Book

Famous Conductor Files Suit Against Writer of Biography

Serge Koussevitsky, famed Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor long admired by Providence music lovers, has sought an injunction in New York against publication and distribution of "Koussevitsky," a biography, and has filed notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against the author and publishers.

In Supreme Court in New York yesterday Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted an interim stay against the publishing firm of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., pending a decision on the application of Koussevitsky's attorney for a temporary injunction. Both sides were given until next Wednesday to file briefs.

Koussevitsky contends that the book, by Moses Smith, music critic for the now defunct Boston Transcript and later for the Boston American over a period of 20 years, falsely and wrongfully portrays his life and musical career, and that its publication would do him irreparable harm.

Under Civil Rights Law

His action was brought under the New York civil rights law, which prohibits any company from using "for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person." It is the first such action under the law.

Koussevitsky declared that he had declined to give Smith any information and had advised Smith that he intended to publish his autobiography later.

Justice Shientag indicated that the suit would establish a precedent.

In his affidavit the noted conductor declared that "the said book untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training....

"Attacks Integrity"

"Furthermore," he said, "this book unjustifiably and untruthfully attacks my integrity as a man and as an artist. It impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work and devotion to the ideals of music, art and culture in the United States and throughout the world."

He asserted that general release of the book would cause damage impossible to measure in an action at law.

A spokesman for the publisher characterized the book as an unbiased and laudatory exposition of a great musical career and said that restraining the right to publish it would infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts "to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of our society."

He said that 200 copies of the book are in the hands of reviewers, and 3000 others of a first edition of 5000 are in the possession of booksellers. The book is the first publication of the company, formed last Summer to specialize in literature on music.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein is back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his program for the week includes one of the great—if still disputed—masterpieces of this century: "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Igor Stravinsky. The other numbers are Gluck's Overture to "Alceste" (in the edition of Felix Weingartner), and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The exceptional talents of young Mr. Bernstein are still undergoing development and refinement on the evidence of his performances yesterday. He still prefers to work without a baton, and, as in the Beethoven Symphony, without a score before him when he feels that is proper. He still naturally shows the resilient vigor of youth, but he also showed, especially in Beethoven, an authority both of style and interpretation which he has not had before to such a degree.

I could not help feeling, through the course of the Seventh Symphony, that perhaps a good deal of Beethoven, this symphony included, is perhaps more young than old men's music. While there were a few places in the last movement that were a bit raw, and while that surging dance rhythm seemed to run away with him (as it often does with more experienced conductors), I nevertheless felt that his Beethoven touches the fundamentals of expression.

Everything "sang," and in the fast movements everything "danced"; most of the time the texture was clear and the sound evenly balanced. He avoided the tempting pitfall of making the allegretto either too fast or too slow; the trio of the scherzo was retarded just enough for contrast, but it never dragged. His Gluck had the right tempo and interpretive approach. (A less discerning man would have borne down more heavily on those three trombones which lend such weight of drama to the score.)

But it was in "Le Sacre du Printemps," that fiendishly difficult work, with tricky rhythms, changing metrical signatures and irregular accents that Mr. Bernstein really showed his technical mettle. Here there was no question of surface refinement or polish of sound; what mattered was the insistent rhythm, the proper speed and the force of accents. Mr. Bernstein came through handsomely, and his performance had a "bite" not only appropriate but which added an extra thrill to music that, paradoxically, represents a peak of intellectual organization and an extreme of primitive, even visceral feeling.

Although I did not observe everyone in the hall, my eyes being glued to Stravinsky's score, I did not see anyone walk out on the grinding dissonances of "Le Sacre du Printemps." In fact, some of the older subscribers were heard to express delight with what was once considered a tonal nightmare. Evidently time will fix everything. Hurray!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 12 1947

Koussevitzky Halts Biography Publication

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a temporary court order today restraining publication of a book which he said "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The book, "Koussevitzky," was written by Moses Smith. Mr. Smith, Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers, and the Arco Publishing Co., distributors, were named as defendants.

[98]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 12 1947

KOUSSEVITSKY GETS WRIT AGAINST BOOK

Temporary Stay Granted on Conductor's Complaint That Biography Is Libelous

On the ground that a new biography of him is libelous and violates his privacy, Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, won a court order yesterday restraining publication restraining publication and distribution of the book.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, in granting an interim stay pending determination of the musician's application for a preliminary injunction, indicated that the suit would establish a precedent on rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent. Opposing attorneys were directed to submit briefs next Wednesday.

Notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against Moses Smith, a Boston music critic who is author of the disputed book, "Koussevitzky," and the publishing concern, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., was filed in the complaint.

Concern's First Publication

The book, which was to have been distributed next Saturday, is the initial publication of the company, organized here last July. David Ewen, its editor and director, expressed "surprise" last night at Mr. Koussevitzky's action and reported that 3,000 copies of a first printing of 5,000 books had been distributed to booksellers. Howard Chipkin, lawyer and the company's secretary, appeared as defense counsel.

Should the court grant a temporary injunction, Mr. Ewen said "every publisher in the country in dire danger if he ever publish a book about any living person, for that matter a dead perso whose family is alive or mentioned in the book."

Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern of Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, listed three points as basis for an injunction. He contended that publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, the "rights of privacy" law.

Publication of photographs in the book also constituts a violation of that law, he charged. Finally, he asserted, the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The 72-year-old Russian-born virtuoso, who almost since his advent in Boston twenty-three years ago has been the subject of adulatory comment in the musical world, set forth in an affidavit that he had declined to give Mr. Smith any information, advising that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

"The said book untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training," Mr. Koussevitzky complained.

Reputation Seen Damaged

He added that he found the book as a whole "not only disparaging but very distinctly damaging, not only to my reputation but to my material resources."

"Furthermore," he continued, "this book unjustifiably and untruthfully attacks my integrity as a man and as an artist. It impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work and devotion to the ideals of music, art and culture in the United States and throughout the world."

Mr. Ewen described the book as "not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career." To restrain the right to publish it, he said, would infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts "to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of our society."

The charge of libel, he went on, was less important than the question whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticisms without the consent of the subject.

Mr. Smith for almost twenty years was music critic for The Boston American and The Boston Transcript and more recently has been director of the Masterworks Division of Columbia Records.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 12 1947

Koussevitzky Sues Publisher Of Book on Him

Would Halt Unauthorized Biography Not Yet Out; Book Trade Concerned

Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought suit in the New York Supreme Court yesterday to restrain a publishing firm from bringing out an unauthorized biography of himself, on the ground that it was an invasion f his civil rights.

The action was the first of its kind brought under the state civil rights law and, in the judgment of all concerned, has wide implication for the publishing business. "If Mr. Koussevitzky's contention should prevail," said the defendant firm, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., 1 Madison Avenue, "every publisher who has published any book concerning living people without their consent would be subject to an action for damages for invasion of their private rights."

At a preliminary hearing yesterday, Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted the conductor an nterim stay, restraining the firm from publishing or distributing the book, which is titled simply "Koussevitzky," pending his decision on an application for a temporary injunction. He gave both sides until next Wednesday to file supporting briefs.

Saturday Was Sale Date

The book, written by Moses Smith, former music critic for Boston newspapers, was to have gone on sale Saturday at $4 a copy. David Ewen, director and editor of tne publishing house, said 200 copies were already in the hands of reviewers and 3,000 copies of the first edition of 5,000 were in the hands of booksellers.

To obtain the stay, Mr. Koussevitzky posted a $5,000 bond to protect the publisher from possible damages growing out of the action.

In his complaint, the seventy-two-year old conductor charged that the biography was, in effect, an attempt to exploit his personality commercially and might cut into the market for his proposed autobiography; that it contained false and misleading statements and that its publication would do him irreparable harm.

He cited the civil rights statute, which prohibits any firm from using "for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person."

Quotes From Book

The book, he charged, "untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting, and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training."

Mr. Koussevitzky, who obtained an advance copy of the volume through a friend, then cited sixteen excerpts in support of his allegation of incipient libel. One of them, on page 352, was alleged to read as follows: "At fifty, he really began to learn how to conduct, to learn things about music that a conservatory student is expected to know at eighteen."

"If," the complaint continued, "the general release of the said book to the public is permitted, the damage will be impossible to measure in an action at law and will be irreparable. I am informed and believe the defendants are irresponsible financially and will not be able to respond in damages."

Mr. Koussevitzky has conducted the Boston Symphony since 1924, when he arrived in this country. For nearly twenty of those years, according to his publisher, Mr. Smith served as music critic of "The Boston Transcript" and "The Boston American."

The firm of Allen, Towne & Heath was formed last August to specialize in books on musical subjects and the projected "Koussevitzky" is its first publication.

'While we, as publishers," said Mr. Ewen, "may not agree with every phase of Mr. Smith's criticism of Mr. Koussevitzky's musical methods, we believe that his book is not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career and is a vital contribution to the literature of musical biography."

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB 13 1947

Mr. Koussevitzky's Biography.

THE sane Russian who is the leader of New England's perior band, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has gi the courts of New York a question as difficult to ans as any pitched to Information Please, airway citade knowledge.

A Boston music critic did a biography of Serge Kou vitzky. Publishers say it is unbiased, even laudatory.
Koussevitzky's judgment of the book is less favorable; he it libelous and sues for $400,000.

Justice Shientag of the New York Supreme court i a restraint order against distribution of the book, pending ther litigation; also judicial decisions on the right to pu biographies without the consent of the person of who biographer writes.

Biographies of living persons seldom possess histor ue. They are not revealing, hence not a true portrait. I after reading a couple of biographies of Gen. Eisenhow intelligent reader is disappointed . . . the general is too
George Washington of the cherry tree to be human.

Could be, of course, this is how Leader-of-the-Band sevitzky feels about his biography, but, not having
Main street wouldn't know.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

FEB 13 1947

Leonard Bernstein With Bostonians

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

New Yorkers who attend the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall have become accustomed for the last 23 years to think of the ensemble and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, as one. With the exception of a portion of a single concert when Tauno Hannikainen conducted a work by his fellow countryman, Sibelius, last night's event with Leonard Bernstein on the podium was the first to break the precedent.

The young maestro who was in the swing of things with his shoulders, legs, arms, etc., along with his head, made the orchestra sound virile and exciting if at the same different from the effect with its distingushed musical director. His program consisted of two major works, Schubert's Symphony in C Major, No. 7, and Stravinsky's apotheosis of the spirit of primitive man, "Le Sacre du Printemps."

WHITE PLAINS, N.
WESTCHESTER WOM
2/13/47

BOSTON SYMPHON
REOPENS CENTER

The County Center audito closed for over a year, will h gala reopening tonight when Julian Olney presents the B
Symphony Orchestra in its Westchester appearance this se
This will mark the 14th season
Olney concerts.

The orchestra has been direc
by Serge Koussevitsky for 23 yea
Leonard Bernstein, young compos and conductor, will be guest co ductor.

The program will open with Serenate No. 1 in A Major by Brahms, in four movements, followed by Beethoven's Overture to "Lenore." Following intermission, the orchestra will play four movements of Schubert's Symphony in C Major.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

FEB 13 1947

Koussevitzky Tries to Muzzle PM

Here is a letter PM has received from Mudge, Stern, Williams and Tucker, attorneys for Serge Koussevitzky, the well-known orchestra conductor:

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY VS. ALLEN, TOWNE & HEATH, INC., ARCO PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC., AND MOSES SMITH.

Dear Sirs:

We are attorneys for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is the plaintiff in the above entitled action pending in the Supreme Court of the State of New York for the County of New York for an injunction restraining publication and distribution of an alleged biography written by Moses Smith entitled "Koussevitzky," in course of publication by Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and to be distributed by Arco Publishing Company, Inc., and for damages on the ground that said book is libelous and seriously detrimental to Dr. Koussevitzky's reputation and property interests, and also on the ground that it and the pictures therein contained are in violation of his rights under Section 50 and 51 of the New York Civil Rights Law.

Upon application of the plaintiff today Mr. Justice Shientag has signed and caused to be entered an order restraining the defendants, their agents and representatives

"from publishing or distributing or causing the publication or distribution or advancing the release date for public sale of the book written by the defendant, Moses Smith, and entitled 'Koussevitzky,' including the jacket advertisement in which the covers of said book are enfolded, or any excerpts or portions of said book in any language or in any country until the entry of an order upon the decision of this Court on said application for a preliminary injunction."

We have been informed that an advance copy of said book has been sent to you by the defendants, or some of them, and that you intend to publish a review of same at an early date. On behalf of our client we are therefore advising you that you will publish any such review at your peril and risk, and that in such case Dr. Koussevitzky will hold you strictly accountable for any damage which he may sustain.

Kindly acknowledge receipt of this letter.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

FEB 13 1947

Conductor Obtains Book Release Delay

NEW YORK, Feb. 12—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who plans to write his autobiography some day, has obtained a temporary court order holding up the release, scheduled for Saturday, of a book about the conductor by Moses Smith.

In his petition to the State Supreme Court, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contended that Smith's book, "Koussevitzky," "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

He said he declined several years ago to give Smith information about himself, explaining he planned to publish his autobiography later.

ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION

FEB 13 1947

Koussevitzky Halts Biography Release

NEW YORK, Feb. 12—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who plans to write his autobiography some day, has obtained a temporary court order holding up the release, scheduled for Saturday, of a book about the conductor by Moses Smith.

In his petition to the State Supreme Court, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contended that Smith's book, "Koussevitzky," "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

He said he declined several years ago to give Smith information about himself, explaining he planned to publish his autobiography later.

Named defendants with Smith were Allen, Town & Heath, Inc., publishers, and the Arco Publishing Company, Inc., distributors.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

1947 cisions by his subordinates.

Koussevitzky Holds Up Smith's Book About Him

New York, Feb. 12 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who plans to write his autobiography some day, has obtained a temporary court order holding up the release, scheduled for Saturday, of a book about the conductor by Moses Smith.

In his petition to the State Supreme Court, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contended that Smith's book, "Koussevitzky," "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

He said he declined several years ago to give Smith information about himself, explaining he planned to publish his autobiography later.

Named defendants with Smith were Allen, Town and Heath, Inc., publishers, and the Arco Fublishing Company, Inc., distributors.

Worse and more of it — Tod

New York (Continued)

PM, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1947

Koussevitzky Tries to Muzzle PM

Here is a letter PM has received from Mudge, Stern, Williams and Tucker, attorneys for Serge Koussevitzky, the well-known orchestra conductor:

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY vs. ALLEN, TOWNE & HEATH, INC., ARCO PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC., AND MOSES SMITH.

Dear Sirs:

We are attorneys for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is the plaintiff in the above entitled action pending in the Supreme Court of the State of New York for the County of New York for an injunction restraining publication and distribution of an alleged biography written by Moses Smith entitled "Koussevitzky," in course of publication by Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and to be distributed by Arco Publishing Company, Inc., and for damages on the ground that said book is libelous and seriously detrimental to Dr. Koussevitzky's reputation and property interests, and also on the ground that it and the pictures therein contained are in violation of his rights under Section 50 and 51 of the New York Civil Rights Law.

Upon application of the plaintiff today Mr. Justice Shientag has signed and caused to be entered an order restraining the defendants, their agents and representatives

"from publishing or distributing or causing the publication or distribution or advancing the release date for public sale of the book written by the defendant, Moses Smith, and entitled 'Koussevitzky,' including the jacket advertisement in which the covers of said book are enfolded, or any excerpts or portions of said book in any language or in any country until the entry of an order upon the decision of this Court on said application for a preliminary injunction."

We have been informed that an advance copy of said book has been sent to you by the defendants, or some of them, and that you intend to publish a review of same at an early date. On behalf of our client we are therefore advising you that you will publish any such review at your peril and risk, and that in such case Dr. Koussevitzky will hold you strictly accountable for any damage which he may sustain.

Kindly acknowledge receipt of this letter.

AN EDITORIAL

Whose Civil Rights, Koussy?

In the columns above we print a report of a letter from Messrs. Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, attorneys for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky has Messrs. Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker obtaining a court order to restrain publication of a book about him on the ground that the book is libelous and violates his rights under the New York Civil Rights Law, which forbids the use of an individual's name for purposes of trade or advertising.

And, as if that were not enough, he has Messrs. Mudge, etc., writing PM—and, we presume, other newspapers—warning "that you will publish any such review (of the book about Koussevitzky) at your peril and risk, and that in such case Dr. Koussevitzky will hold you strictly accountable for any damage which he may sustain."

To that we say, "Whoa, Koussevitzky!"

The whole business of obtaining injunctions to prevent the publication of anything is very dangerous business, a threat to the civil rights of all of us, not just those of baton-waving Dr. Koussevitzky. American courts have been very sparing about the issuance of injunctions to prevent the publication of allegedly libelous matter. They have weighed the possible injury to the individual claiming to be libelled against the threat to free speech, and they have generally refused the injunction. The attitude has been, "Let them publish what they see fit. If it is libellous, sue for damages, and if the libel is serious enough, the state can prosecute criminally."

Had Koussevitzky's complaint against the publishers been based only on alleged libel, the chances are he would never have gotten the preliminary restraining order. The restraining order is probably based on the alleged invasion of his right of privacy under the Civil Rights Law, which is meant to protect against the use of names or pictures for purposes of trade and advertising and has not hitherto been applied to a biography in this state.

The restraining order is certainly unusual, but it was issued by Justice Sheintag, one of the ablest judges on the bench today; and it is purely a preliminary order which will come up for full argument next week, when all the issues can be thrashed out in open court.

But the letter from Koussevitzky's attorneys to PM is something else. To them—and to Koussevitzky—the editors of PM say only this:

PM will be guided in what it prints by journalistic integrity and the judgment of its editors as to what is worth printing. If that judgment calls for a review of the book about Dr. Koussevitzky which he doesn't like, the book will be reviewed in PM. And if the doctor feels the review libels him or violates his civil rights, he is at liberty to sue PM. PM also has civil rights.

RICHARD G. GREEN, for the Editors of PM.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 13 1947

BERNSTEIN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

By IRVING KOLODIN.

A singular honor came to Leonard Bernstein in Carnegie Hall last night when he appeared to lead the first of two concerts by the Boston Symphony during its current visit to New York. Not only is it difficult to recall when another conductor than Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra here, but it is even more difficult to recall when such an opportunity had gone to a musician of American birth.

So, it was an historic occasion, though Bernstein's choice of the C major symphony of Schubert for the first half of his program did not reveal any special sympathy for this great work. The interpretation was technically clean, and it had momentum; but any number of fine points in the pacing of the music were overlooked, the range of dynamics rarely had the breadth to grant Schubert all the meaning he intended, and Bernstein communicated little of the work's profundity to me. Schubert requires freedom and flexibility no less than Chopin, but the leader compressed him in a straitjacket of time beating and mathematical formula.

For a few details: The first allegro got under way too quickly, with the result that the accelerated tempo indicated later was much too fast. Schubert's use of the trombones in this score as more powerful allies of the French horn was not respected in the brassy sound Bernstein drew from them. Finally, the energy he applied to the orchestra roughened its normal tone more than a little, without any compensating gain in emotional fervor. In sum, this work of Schubert at 31 has an oldness of mind that Bernstein at 29 does not yet comprehend.

Stravinsky's "Sacre."

It was followed by Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," a warhorse of another color, and one much more responsive to Bernstein's whip. As well as possessing the secret of its rhythmic complexities and the technic to convey it to the orchestra, Bernstein has a sense of the poetry and the tenderness which Stravinsky—master that he is—invoked as balance to the barbaric power that first offended the sensitive.

That power was communicated with superlative energy by the orchestra in this performance, but to Bernstein's credit, only as a factor in the drama created by Stravinsky, not its one unremitting theme. The "Ritual of the Ancestors" was delivered with especial sensitivity, suggesting that as well as being a rugged people, Stravinsky's primitives had a normal complement of emotions. The upheaval of the "Dance of the Earth" and the "Sacrificial Dance" (which conclude the first and second sections of the work) were superb in their strength and orchestral execution. Among the audience was Serge Koussevitzky, applauding his protege with enthusiasm.

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS

FEB 13 1947

Koussevitzky In Court

Sergei Koussevitzky, world-renowned conductor of the topnotch Boston Symphony, is currently bolstering the old tradition that an artist outside his natural element is apt to be a fumbler. What he is doing is suing to prevent distribution of a biography of himself, on the ground that such distribution would violate his civil rights and possibly reduce sales of his planned autobiography.

Koussevitzky bases his suit on New York State's civil rights law which prohibits the use by any firm "for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person."

The need for such a law as applied to advertising is obvious, but applying it to publishing would turn the publishing world upside down. Applied to newspapers, it could prevent the publication of anything uncomplimentary about anyone without the consent of that person, who might be Public Enemy No. 1.

What the law means is up to the courts, but it is patent that if it means what Koussevitzky says it does, it should be changed.

In the meantime Koussevitzky, generally hailed as one of the top conductors of his age, is falling into the error of those who unreasonably attempt suppression and defeat their own ends.

Without this suit, Moses Smith's book, "Koussevitzky," might not have made much of a splash. With things as they are, thousands of otherwise apathetic readers will chuckle over the report that the book says: "At fifty, he really began to learn how to conduct, to learn things about music that a conservatory student is expected to know at eighteen."

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 13 1947

Unauthorized Biographies

There is apparently consternation in the world of the book publishers as the result of the suit by Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, against a publishing firm which was planning to release soon an unauthorized biography of the conductor. The book publishers are fearful that success of the suit might mean that henceforth publishers would not be allowed to bring out biographies of living personalities without their consent, and this would be a blow to the book trade.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who has already won an interim injunction, objects to the book, "Koussevitsky," because he says it is an attempt to exploit his personality, an invasion of his civil rights, and would cut into the market for his own autobiography which he hopes to publish. Besides, the conductor says, the book contains some libelous statements which would do him irreparable harm.

If the book does indeed libel the conductor, he is free, of course, to seek recourse under the laws of libel. It remains to be seen, however, whether Mr. Koussevitsky will have a tenable case on the other grounds. Certain people, it would seem, do become public personalities by virtue of their position or accomplishments in life, and the public is usually interested in these personalities. The biographer and the writer of the personality sketch have long made free use of such personalities, without permission from the subjects to write about them.

A decision in favor of Mr. Koussevitsky would have far-reaching consequences. The public would expect to have only authorized biographies, and naturally such biographies would be only about as good as the campaign biographies which are issued by Presidential candidates at election time. Magazines and newspapers would thus be barred against the publication of unauthorized biographies or personality sketches. Such a situation would represent a definite infringement on the traditional principle of freedom of the press.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 13 1947

Bostonians At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK.

Leonard Bernstein put himself on a spot in Carnegie Hall last night. As guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, he tackled a program that would floor more experienced conductors than he. It was a courageous undertaking, but he would have been wiser not to have done it.

There is no questioning his talent. He has scads of it. This was primarily a problem of maturity. The very thing both Schubert's Seventh Symphony and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" demand, he could not give. That is maturity of concept and of experience.

Both performances were technically sound; both were clearly executed. Neither of them gave the listener much emotionally; neither had the cohesive element to bring the music all together. That [illegible] intensity that comes from having lived was not there to enkindle the performances.

The story of the Stravinsky was somewhat different. The music was more akin to Bernstein's temperament and times [illegible] effects that were arresting

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 13 1947

Music

Batonless Bernstein And Bostonians Score

By ROBERT BAGAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town with a guest conductor last night. It was our old young friend Leonard Bernstein, who brought with him to Carnegie Hall two works — the "symphony of heavenly length," C major, No. 7, by Schubert, and the long, but hellish (to play), "Sacre du Printemps" by Stravinsky.

Of the two performances, before a large and cordial audience, this reviewer liked better by far that of the Stravinsky. This composition, with its flossy rhythmic devices, the extraordinary modern orchestration, the teeth-rasping sequences, the piled-up energy which suddenly breaks loose, the instantaneous contrasts, is still, after more than three decades, exciting and novel.

There is nobody who can compose like that now, excepting, perhaps, Honegger. There is not even Stravinsky, apparently, for he seems to be getting more and more mental. It would not be at all surprising, in fact, if one day he should deliver himself of a "metamental" or even a "metaspiritual" composition to match the metaphysical ones he has been concerned with of late. And there, if anybody cares, are a couple of ideas.

As suggested previously, the "Sacre" is one lulu of a score to play. To perform it not one conductor, but a half dozen or so should be de rigeur, what with the quicksilver change of tempo and rhythm and the juxtaposition of snaggy rhythms against snaggy rhythms. The complications in this living, writhing body of music are enormous, to say the least, but the patient is doing quite nicely at 34.

Something Added?

One always takes quite a chance, listening to almost any modern orchestral music, to say that all the notes are being played. How can one tell? And, really what difference would it make, if a few went awry? So, while Mr. Bernstein was truly wonderful in handling all the difficulties of the score, he may have let a good deal of it get away, for all one knows. Nobody was the wiser. I even had the curious thought, for instance, that some notes were added, here and there, by too eager instruments. But I won't swear to it, because after all, that sometimes happens in simpler music.

The Schubert big C major symphony was lacking drive, oddly enough, in most of the second and third movements. Mr. Bernstein's rendering gave the first movement too much tension. It was overtaut, though all of its sections were clear in proportion to each other. At any rate, the finale went very smoothly, for the most part. The young batonist—who conducts without a baton—was enthusiastically received when the concert ended.

Today's Calendar.

Concerts.

CARNEGIE HALL—Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter, conductor. (8:45 p.m.)

CARNEGIE CHAMBER MUSIC HALL—Mary Brawley, mezzo-soprano, and Mae Melville, soprano. (8:30 p.m.)

STUDIO CLUB, YWCA, 210 E. 77th St.—Josef Raieff, pianist. (8:30 p.m.)

Opera.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE—"Romeo and Juliet," with Mmes. Sayao, Greer, Turner; Messrs. Kullman, Thompson, Moscona, Schon, Cehanovsky, Hayward, Marlowe, Kinsman, Hawkins; Emil Cooper, conductor (8 p.m.)

HUNTER COLLEGE PLAYHOUSE—"Cosi Fan Tutti," in English. Repeat of last evening. (8 p.m.)

Dance.

ETHNOLOGIC DANCE CENTER, 110 E. 59th St.—La Meri and Josefina, dances. Program: "Dances of the Good Earth." (9 p.m.)

Night Clubs.

GLASS HAT (Belmont-Plaza Hotel)—Bernie West heads the new all-winter revue, with Paul Sydel, Wendy Bishop and Bonnie and Ray featured.

BAGATELLE—Dorothy Ross begins an engagement.

LA MARTINIQUE—Katherine Dunham and her singing dancers begin a two-week engagement.

Feb 13

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, conductor. Heard last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:
Symphony No. 7 in C major........Schubert
"Le Sacre du Printemps"..........Stravinsky

Leonard Bernstein

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

You Can Listen to Him

STRAVINSKY'S "Rite of Spring," which closed last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, is probably the most influential work of music composed in our century and the most impressive in performance. Not having heard its execution in November by the Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski, the present writer has no basis for a comparison of that reading, which was much admired, with last night's by Leonard Bernstein. He has heard many another, however; and none has seemed to him more straightforward or more moving.

The work does not stand much interpretative tinkering, as a matter of fact. The more rigid its beat the greater its expressive power. What it needs is clean rhythm, clean tonal balances and understanding. Its subject, human sacrifice, is too grand and terrible to require the aid of personal posturing. And Mr. Bernstein, often a sinner in that regard, gave it none. If he did not extract from the score one-tenth of the detailed refinement that older hands at it do—conductors like Monteux and Ansermet and Désormière—he nevertheless got the rhythm right and made the meaning more clear than usual. One felt that he loved the music, understood it and submitted his will in all modesty to its relentless discipline.

* * *

The work is not a clear masterpiece, like the same composer's "Petrouchka"; but it is more original. It cuts farther below the surface of musical convention, goes straight to the heart of the whole stylistic problem of Romantism, comes out both deeply expressive and completely impersonal. Its complex rhythmic interest, its high harmonic tension and its rigid orchestral textures are justly famous. Its patent of mobility, however, lies in the extreme beauty of its melodic material. Partly Russian folklore and partly inventions in the same manner, its themes are short, diatonic and narrow. They rarely cover a larger range than the perfect fifth. They are as plain as granite and as resistant to time. If the work did not lose intensity in the early part of its second half, it would be the solidest single monument of musical art our century has erected. Just possibly it is that in spite of everything.

* * *

Mr. Bernstein's reading of the Schubert C-major Symphony which preceded the Stravinsky work, was open-hearted, animated, youthful and full of life. Texturally it was a little rough, and at no point was it particularly Viennese in lilt. But it was passionate and sweet. Anybody can question another artist's interpretation. What seems to be beyond question in Mr. Bernstein's case is that he is a real interpreter. His orchestral hand is still young and a little heavy, and sometimes his personal projection is overweaning. But his is a real temperament for making music. What he conducts rarely sounds beautiful to a sensuous spirit. And his musical culture is far from mature. But you can listen to him. That is the first and the last test of any interpreter.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1947

CONDUCTS CONCERT

Leonard Bernstein

BERNSTEIN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

As Guest on Podium Here, He Presents Major Works by Schubert and Stravinsky

By OLIN DOWNES

Music is completely a psychological thing. The fact is nowhere more evident than in the wholly invisible relations which exist between a conductor, the music he interprets and the orchestra which he endeavors to infuse with his interpretation. And so it was last night when the young Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Bernstein, invited by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who was in the audience, to conduct this concert, had arranged for himself a program which would have given any conductor pause: the great Schubert C major symphony and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps." The symphony, despite its years and the vast honor in which it is properly held, has a secret which eludes even brilliant and authoritative conductors of today. As for the "Sacre," the mere practical problem that it offers the leader is one that none but a highly accomplished musician and technician should dream of facing.

The results of this situation afforded an exact revelation of the nature of Mr. Bernstein's remarkable talent, his instinct for conducting, his youth, his artistic tendencies and his precise degree of maturity as man and musician. He gave a highly creditable reading of the symphony. There were details which could be argued about, and it would be well if conductors, young and old, heeded more carefully than was done last night the tempo directions of the main body of the opening movement, which are "allegro"—fast—but also "non-troppo"—not too fast.

But as a whole, this was a musicianly, enthusiastic reading. And it fell quite flat because, with all his qualities, Mr. Bernstein got just as much as, and no more, than an orchestra of players who were in a majority older than he chose to give him. Hence the performance was pedestrian, despite a brilliant finale, in which the orchestra sounded more noisy than brilliant. The famous Boston Symphony tone was not often present; the music did not float but was pushed, as it were, from the instruments; the playing was fundamentally routine.

In turn the "Sacre du printemps" got off to a poor start. But here Mr. Bernstein would not be gainsaid, and presently he struck fire. He gave a performance that was electrifying. There was a degree of immoderation in the first part of it. Fine! One had gotten rather tired of moderation and there are higher virtues, anyhow. Furthermore, there was an orchestra to be gotten in hand, which might do something temporarily to impair balances. Mr. Bernstein flung himself tigerishly into the music, which became as fresh and as wildly exciting, in his hands, as it must have sounded when it caused a riot at its première in Paris of a bygone decade.

One wholly believed, all over again, in this amazing piece, with its atomic energy and its primitive emotion. To state that the performance fully restored its primordial ferocity is to state one part of the matter. The greatest moment was that of precisely its greatest page—perhaps the most tender and poignant page of music Stravinsky ever has written—the introduction of the second part, the music of the gestating earth and the brooding spring night.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH

FEB 14 1947

Boston Symphony Received With Enthusiasm at Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN

Playing for the first time in Westchester, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the brilliant young conductor, Leonard Bernstein, opened the 14th season of the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series at the County Center last night. A large and enthusiastic audience from all parts of the county welcomed the composer-conductor and gave ample evidence of its approval of his outstanding performance.

His most important work was the Schubert "Symphony in C Major, No. 7," to which Mr. Bernstein devoted the second half of the program. There is a breadth and depth to this music, one of the greatest of Schubert's works, which was beautifully expressed last night.

All of the innate joyousness underlying the first movement and the lovely tonal colors of the swiftly moving modulations were carefully delineated so as to produce the most effective results. The lovely golden fabric of melody which flows continuously throughout the "Andante con moto" was presented with the utmost simplicity—and the movement became a gem of lyric beauty.

Mood Kept Sustained

In the Scherzo Mr. Bernstein sensed the humor and light, joyous merriment indicated in the score and kept the constant swinging motion to produce a truly sustained mood. However, it was in the Finale that the conductor really showed his complete understanding of the music and his devotion to it. His interpretation was conceived on a broad scale — but he never lost sight of the ever-impelling drive which carries through to the climax.

Polyphonic sections were presented in a clear and forthright manner, but were not permitted to interfere with the ceaseless, restless character of the movement as a whole. Mr. Bernstein produced a magnificent climax—both rhythmically and emotionally—and his entire rendering was a tribute to the skill of the orchestra and to his own artistic abilities.

Conducting Full Of Vigor

The program opened with the "Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72" by Beethoven. Here the interpretation was straightforward and spirited; in fact there is a great deal of vitality about all that Mr. Bernstein does. His conducting is full of vigor and animation, and one is intrigued by the expressiveness of his every motion, working as he does without a baton.

Following the Beethoven work, the program featured the "Serenade No. 2 in A Major, Op. 16" by Brahms. There was a great deal of clarity and precision in this reading, so that the delightful thematic developments and rhythmic patterns were sharply etched. It was an outstanding performance in every way, and the orchestra was enthusiastically received at its conclusion.

Mrs. Olney greeted the subscribers before the program and introduced Mr. Bernstein. The next program in the series will be by Eleanor Steber, soprano, on Feb. 28.

YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD-STATESMAN

FEB 14 1947

4,000 Attend Olney Concert

WHITE PLAINS—An audience of 4,000 crowded the County Center last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program that marked the reopening of the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

Leonard Bernstein conducted the orchestra in its first appearance. For the recital of Vladimir Horowitz on April 11, arrangements have been made to seat an additional 1,000.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 14 1946

Scholarships

Scholarships for musical study at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival, will be awarded by the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, when they assume sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over ABC, Jan. 21. Details will be announced during the first broadcast. Tanglewood is one of the best known music festivals.

BLOOMINGTON, IND
COURIER
2/14/47

a conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

This was the prelude to the best and the strongest build-up of the final pages that we remember. Despite the sectional character of certain of these pages, and the extremely irregular rhythmic patterns, there was one continuous line, with one climax, long and gradually prepared, from those preliminary pages to the last measure. There is such power and novelty in the first part of the "Sacre" that the last part can become an anti-climax. Mr. Bernstein understood the music too well for that. He felt its whole structure and germination, felt it in his bones, and so released it that it seemed almost to rend the orchestra itself with its elemental power. He is a born conductor, a musician of his period, and one of its voices in his art.

York state civil rights law.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 13 1947

Music

Batonless Bernstein And Bostonians Score

By ROBERT BAGAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town with a guest conductor last night. It was our old young friend Leonard Bernstein, who brought with him to Carnegie Hall two works — the "symphony of heavenly length," C major, No. 7, by Schubert, and the long, but hellish (to play), "Sacre du Printemps" by Stravinsky.

Of the two performances, before a large and cordial audience, this reviewer liked better by far that of the Stravinsky. This composition, with its flossy rhythmic devices, the extraordinary modern orchestration, the teeth-rasping sequences, the piled-up energy which suddenly breaks loose, the instantaneous contrasts, is still, after more than three decades, exciting and novel.

There is nobody who can compose like that now, excepting, perhaps, Honegger. There is not even Stravinsky, apparently, for he seems to be getting more and more mental. It would not be at all surprising, in fact, if one day he should deliver himself of a "metamental" or even a "metaspiritual" composition to match the metaphysical ones he has been concerned with of late. And there, if anybody cares, are a couple of ideas.

As suggested previously, the "Sacre" is one lulu of a score to play. To perform it not one conductor, but a half dozen or so should be de rigeur, what with the quicksilver change of tempo and rhythm and the juxtaposition of snaggy rhythms against snaggy rhythms. The complications in this living, writhing body of music are enormous, to say the least, but the patient is doing quite nicely at 34.

Something Added?

One always takes quite a chance, listening to almost any modern orchestral music, to say that all the notes are being played. How can one tell? And, really what difference would it make, if a few went awry? So, while Mr. Bernstein was truly wonderful in handling all the difficulties of the score, he may have let a good deal of it get away, for all one knows. Nobody was the wiser. I even had the curious thought, for instance, that some notes were added, here and there, by too eager instruments. But I won't swear to it, because after all, that sometimes happens in simpler music.

The Schubert big C major symphony was lacking drive, oddly enough, in most of the second and third movements. Mr. Bernstein's rendering gave the first movement too much tension. It was overtaut, though all of its sections were clear in proportion to each other. At any rate, the finale went very smoothly, for the most part. The young batonist—who conducts without a baton—was enthusiastically received when the concert ended.

Today's Calendar.

Concerts.

CARNEGIE HALL—Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter, conductor. (8:45 p.m.)

CARNEGIE CHAMBER MUSIC HALL—Mary Brawley, mezzo-soprano, and Mae Melville, soprano. (8:30 p.m.)

STUDIO CLUB, YWCA, 210 E. 77th St.—Josef Raieff, pianist. (8:30 p.m.)

Opera.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE—"Romeo and Juliet," with Mmes. Sayao, Greer, Turner; Messrs. Kullman, Thompson, Moscona, Schon, Cehanovsky, Hayward, Marlowe, Kinsman, Hawkins; Emil Cooper, conductor (8 p.m.)

HUNTER COLLEGE PLAYHOUSE—"Cosi Fan Tutti," in English. Repeat of last evening. (8 p.m.)

Dance.

ETHNOLOGIC DANCE CENTER, 110 E. 59th St.—La Meri and Josefina, dances. Program: "Dances of the Good Earth." (8 p.m.)

Night Clubs.

GLASS HAT (Belmont-Plaza Hotel)—Bernie West heads the new all-winter revue, with Paul Sydel, Wendy Bishop and Bonnie and Ray featured.

BAGATELLE—Dorothy Ross begins an engagement.

LA MARTINIQUE—Katherine Dunham and her singing dancers begin a two-week engagement.

Feb 13

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, conductor. Heard last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:
Symphony No. 7 in C major..........Schubert
"Le Sacre du Printemps"..........Stravinsky

Leonard Bernstein

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

You Can Listen to Him

STRAVINSKY'S "Rite of Spring," which closed last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, is probably the most influential work of music composed in our century and the most impressive in performance. Not having heard its execution in November by the Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski, the present writer has no basis for a comparison of that reading, which was much admired, with last night's by Leonard Bernstein. He has heard many another, however; and none has seemed to him more straightforward or more moving.

The work does not stand much interpretative tinkering, as a matter of fact. The more rigid its beat the greater its expressive power. What it needs is clean rhythm, clean tonal balances and understanding. Its subject, human sacrifice, is too grand and terrible to require the aid of personal posturing. And Mr. Bernstein, often a sinner in that regard, gave it none. If he did not extract from the score one-tenth of the detailed refinement that older hands at it do—conductors like Monteux and Ansermet and Désormière—he nevertheless got the rhythm right and made the meaning more clear than usual. One felt that he loved the music, understood it and submitted his will in all modesty to its relentless discipline.

* * *

The work is not a clear masterpiece, like the same composer's "Petrouchka"; but it is more original. It cuts farther below the surface of musical convention, goes straight to the heart of the whole stylistic problem of Romantism, comes out both deeply expressive and completely impersonal. Its complex rhythmic interest, its high harmonic tension and its rigid orchestral textures are justly famous. Its patent of mobility, however, lies in the extreme beauty of its melodic material. Partly Russian folklore and partly inventions in the same manner, its themes are short, diatonic and narrow. They rarely cover a larger range than the perfect fifth. They are as plain as granite and as resistant to time. If the work did not lose intensity in the early part of its second half, it would be the solidest single monument of musical art our century has erected. Just possibly it is that in spite of everything.

* * *

Mr. Bernstein's reading of the Schubert C-major Symphony which preceded the Stravinsky work, was open-hearted, animated, youthful and full of life. Texturally it was a little rough, and at no point was it particularly Viennese in lilt. But it was passionate and sweet. Anybody can question another artist's interpretation. What seems to be beyond question in Mr. Bernstein's case is that he is a real interpreter. His orchestral hand is still young and a little heavy, and sometimes his personal projection is overweaning. But his is a real temperament for making music. What he conducts rarely sounds beautiful to a sensuous spirit. And his musical culture is far from mature. But you can listen to him. That is the first and the last test of any interpreter.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1947

CONDUCTS CONCERT

Leonard Bernstein

BERNSTEIN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

As Guest on Podium Here, He Presents Major Works by Schubert and Stravinsky

By OLIN DOWNES

Music is completely a psychological thing. The fact is nowhere more evident than in the wholly invisible relations which exist between a conductor, the music he interprets and the orchestra which he endeavors to infuse with his interpretation. And so it was last night when the young Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Bernstein, invited by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who was in the audience, to conduct this concert, had arranged for himself a program which would have given any conductor pause: the great Schubert C major symphony and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps." The symphony, despite its years and the vast honor in which it is properly held, has a secret which eludes even brilliant and authoritative conductors of today. As for the "Sacre," the mere practical problem that it offers the leader is one that none but a highly accomplished musician and technician should dream of facing.

The results of this situation afforded an exact revelation of the nature of Mr. Bernstein's remarkable talent, his instinct for conducting, his youth, his artistic tendencies and his precise degree of maturity as man and musician. He gave a highly creditable reading of the symphony. There were details which could be argued about, and it would be well if conductors, young and old, heeded more carefully than was done last night the tempo directions of the main body of the opening movement, which are "allegro"—fast—but also "non-troppo"—not too fast.

But as a whole, this was a musicianly, enthusiastic reading. And it fell quite flat because, with all his qualities, Mr. Bernstein got just as much as, and no more, than an orchestra of players who were in a majority older than he chose to give him. Hence the performance was pedestrian, despite a brilliant finale, in which the orchestra sounded more noisy than brilliant. The famous Boston Symphony tone was not often present; the music did not float but was pushed, as it were, from the instruments; the playing was fundamentally routine.

In turn the "Sacre du printemps" got off to a poor start. But here Mr. Bernstein would not be gainsaid, and presently he struck fire. He gave a performance that was electrifying. There was a degree of immoderation in the first part of it. Fine! One had gotten rather tired of moderation and there are higher virtues, anyhow. Furthermore, there was an orchestra to be gotten in hand, which might do something temporarily to impair balances. Mr. Bernstein flung himself tigerishly into the music, which became as fresh and as wildly exciting, in his hands, as it must have sounded when it caused a riot at its première in Paris of a bygone decade.

One wholly believed, all over again, in this amazing piece, with its atomic energy and its primitive emotion. To state that the performance fully restored its primordial ferocity is to state one part of the matter. The greatest moment was that of precisely its greatest page—perhaps the most tender and poignant page of music Stravinsky ever has written—the introduction of the second part, the music of the gestating earth and the brooding spring night.

This was the prelude to the best and the strongest build-up of the final pages that we remember. Despite the sectional character of certain of these pages, and the extremely irregular rhythmic patterns, there was one continuous line, with one climax, long and gradually prepared, from those preliminary pages to the last measure. There is such power and novelty in the first part of the "Sacre" thatthe last part can become an anti-climax. Mr. Bernstein understood the music too well for that. He felt its whole structure and germination, felt it in his bones, and so released it that it seemed almost to rend the orchestra itself with its elemental power. He is a born conductor, a musician of his period, and one of its voices in his art.

REPORTER-DISPATCH

FEB 14 1947

Boston Symphony Received With Enthusiasm at Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN

Playing for the first time in Westchester, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the brilliant young conductor, Leonard Bernstein, opened the 14th season of the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series at the County Center last night. A large and enthusiastic audience from all parts of the county welcomed the composer-conductor and gave ample evidence of its approval of his outstanding performance.

His most important work was the Schubert "Symphony in C Major, No. 7," to which Mr. Bernstein devoted the second half of the program. There is a breadth and depth to this music, one of the greatest of Schubert's works, which was beautifully expressed last night.

All of the innate joyousness underlying the first movement and the lovely tonal colors of the swiftly moving modulations were carefully delineated so as to produce the most effective results. The lovely golden fabric of melody which flows continuously throughout the "Andante con moto" was presented with the utmost simplicity—and the movement became a gem of lyric beauty.

Mood Kept Sustained

In the Scherzo Mr. Bernstein sensed the humor and light, joyous merriment indicated in the score and kept the constant swinging motion to produce a truly sustained mood. However, it was in the Finale that the conductor really showed his complete understanding of the music and his devotion to it. His interpretation was conceived on a broad scale — but he never lost sight of the ever-impelling drive which carries through to the climax.

Polyphonic sections were presented in a clear and forthright manner, but were not permitted to interfere with the ceaseless, restless character of the movement as a whole. Mr. Bernstein produced a magnificent climax—both rhythmically and emotionally—and his entire rendering was a tribute to the skill of the orchestra and to his own artistic abilities.

Conducting Full Of Vigor

The program opened with the "Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72" by Beethoven. Here the interpretation was straightforward and spirited; in fact there is a great deal of vitality about all that Mr. Bernstein does. His conducting is full of vigor and animation, and one is intrigued by the expressiveness of his every motion, working as he does without a baton.

Following the Beethoven work, the program featured the "Serenade No. 2 in A Major, Op. 16" by Brahms. There was a great deal of clarity and precision in this reading, so that the delightful thematic developments and rhythmic patterns were sharply etched. It was an outstanding performance in every way, and the orchestra was enthusiastically received at its conclusion.

Mrs. Olney greeted the subscribers before the program and introduced Mr. Bernstein. The next program in the series will be by Eleanor Steber, soprano, on Feb. 28.

YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD-STATESMAN

FEB 14 1947

4,000 Attend Olney Concert

WHITE PLAINS—An audience of 4,000 crowded the County Center last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program that marked the reoponing of the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

Leonard Bernstein conducted the orchestra in its first appearance. For the recital of Vladimir Horowitz on April 11, arrangements have been made to seat an additional 1,000.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 14 1946

Scholarships

Scholarships for musical study at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Music Festival, will be awarded by the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, when they assume sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over ABC, Jan. 21. Details will be announced during the first broadcast. Tanglewood is one of the best known music festivals.

BLOOMINGTON, IND
COURIER
2/14/47

conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts each plus three extra concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 14 1947

THIN-SKINNED CONDUCTOR

We are certain that the thousands of Brooklynites who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has given a series of concerts here each year, will give that orchestra high praise and will defend the ability of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra. Indeed Mr. Koussevitzzky is generally regarded as one of the ablest of conductors.

At the same time it is difficult to understand why Mr. Koussevitzky should seek to restrain a Boston publishing house from putting out a biography of him on the grounds that it is libelous or why a judge should have granted such restraint, even temporarily. To permit such restraint would certainly seem to us to be an infringement of the freedom of the press.

If the book were unjustifiably critical of the conductor's personal life, he could properly sue the publisher and author for libel. However, Mr. Koussevitzky seems to forget that he is not only a public figure but a member of the entertainment world. A critic has the right to dislike his work and to minimize his ability. One of the fundamental rights of critics is to be able to speak their minds. Few of the greatest stars or the greatest [illegible] do not have their detractors. Certainly in the world of music few composers or performers have had anything like universal acclaim during their lives. We have had instances of reviews of the same performance which were diametrically opposite in appreciation.

It is true that the biography by the Boston critic might hurt Mr. Koussevitzky materially, but any unfavorable review might do the same. In the same manner anyone who advised another person not to go to a certain show might be judged guilty of slander. For that matter the person who booed a Brooklyn Dodger or a visiting player at Ebbets Field might be adjudged guilty of hurting that player materially.

Men far greater than Mr Koussevitzky have weathered criticism far more vicious and derogatory than that contained in the Boston biography. It is considered part of the artist's and the entertainer's job to take harsh criticism with good grace.

TIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 14 1947

The Boston Symphony struggled through with a 3.6 on its first program for its new sponsor, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. (ABC, Tuesday nights). The competition throve and got ratings ranging from 5.7 for Real Stories on Mutual to a whacking 24.2 for Amos 'n' Andy on NBC.

The other new highbrow musical program, the Detroit Symphony in the Sunday Evening Hour, which Musical Digest Magazine is putting on ABC Sunday nights, made an even less impressive showing against some more impressive competition. Its first rating, 2.3, gave it only 5.4% of the total listening audience. Almost everyone was listening to Charlie McCarthy and Fred Allen on NBC, who had ratings of 28.0 and 26.6 and shares of audience of 63.7 and 63.3 respectively. The only competing program which has a lower rating than the symphony was Special Investigator, sponsored by the Commercial Credit Corp. on Mutual; it got only 1.4.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 14 1947

SYMPHONY OPENS CENTER

Boston Orchestra First to Play at Remodeled White Plains Hall

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Feb. 13—Remodeled and redecorated, the main auditorium of the County Center here was reopened tonight for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It had been closed for the last fourteen months while $175,000 improvements, including a new roof, were being installed.

Tonight's concert was attended by a capacity audience of 3,500. It was the opening event in another of the Mrs. Julian Olney series. Leonard Bernstein conducted and the program included Brahms' Serenade No. 2 in A major, Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3 and Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 7.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 14 1947

Is an Unauthorized Biography a Violation of Civil Rights Rule?

If a publisher brings out an unauthorized biography which offends the subject, can the latter bring a successful action under the civil rights statute which prohibits any firm from using "for the purposes of trade the name, portrait or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person"?

If so, the implications are such as to bring consternation among publishers in any state in which a civil rights statute is interpreted in such manner.

Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has brought suit in New York against Allen, Towne and Heath Inc., publisher of a biography, "Koussevitzky," written by Moses Smith, former music critic for Boston newspapers.

The conductor charges among other things that the biography was an attempt to exploit his personality commercially and might cut into the market for his proposed autobiography. That might be said to be true of any biography of any living person. The significance of the complaint is clear.

The meat of his charges, however, seems to be in the complaint that the book "untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor in conducting, and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training."

The court will be called upon to decide whether the civil rights statute can properly be employed in what boils down to a libel action. It may be asked whether the conductor would have complained of injury had the biography been complimentary instead of critical. If in the judgment of the court he would not, the exploitation complaint probably would be rejected, leaving little but the angle of defamation. If the court then is willing to hear defamation arguments, Mr. Koussevitzky's case will be little different from that of any artist who contests the right of critics to be critical of his work. The case may hinge on whether the court says in effect, "This is nothing but a libel action and should have been brought as such."

MONTICELLO, N.Y
REPUBLICAN
2/14/47

The WORLD of MUSIC

Berkshire Music Festival Ex[illegible]ed—N. Y. Philharmonic To Go on Tour—Toscanini Back on Air

NEW YORK, Feb. 8 (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing and ensemble playing.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, for the first time since before the war, will make an extensive tour this spring. Between April 14 and through May 11, the orchestra will play 28 concerts in 24 cities. Seventeen concerts will be conducted by Artur Rodzinski; the remaing 11 by Leopold Stokowski.

The tour, which will take the orchestra for the first time in its history through the South, has been made possible by its radio sponsorship. The cost involved in moving an organization of 103 musicians some 4,000 miles halfway across the country and back is so high that a large deficit otherwise would have been inevitable, the orchestra's directors said.

The tour opens in Baltimore on April 14 under Stokowski, who also will conduct the next ten concerts in southern cities. Rodzinski takes over on April 25 in Montgomery, Ala.

All concerts will be played in the evening except the four Sundays, which will be afternoon performances broadcast, as usual, over the Columbia network.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE

FEB 14 1947

Biographers, Attention!

The order of New York State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag restraining distribution of a biography of Serge Koussevitzky, which the Boston Symphony conductor does not like, is interesting because of its possible wide implications if it should stand up in the higher courts.

We have to remember first off that in New York the State Supreme Court is not what it is in most other States. In New York it is only the lowest court of record and corresponds to the Superior Court in California. Hence, Justice Shientag's order and whatever judgment results from the $400,000 damage suit Koussevitzky has brought is subject to review, first in the New York Appellate Division and then in the Court of Appeals, the highest judicial body in that State. After that the Federal courts may have successive whacks at the case.

But if Koussevitzky should win in the end? Could anyone then publish any biography of any living person without that person's consent and approval of its contents? Some existing biographies of individuals now living can hardly be pleasing to their subjects. What about political biographies, which are written by foes as well as by friends? The question of civil rights which Koussevitzky has raised seems equally applicable to all persons.

Would the rule, if such a one should be set up, extend also to persons not living? Would their families or descendants have a cause of action against a biographer and his publisher whose book displeased them?

The outcome of this suit is to be watched with interest by all biographers, present and prospective.

SYMPHONY APPLAUDED

Boston, Nov. 29.—(AP)—The first symphony of a South American to be played by the 66-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra was applauded today after its performance under the baton of the composer, Camargo Guarnieri. One critic found the work, first in that form to be composed by Guarnieri, municipal director of music in Sao Paolo, Brazil. "definitely modern and vigorous."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 14 1947

THIN-SKINNED CONDUCTOR

We are certain that the thousands of Brooklynites who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has given a series of concerts here each year, will give that orchestra high praise and will defend the ability of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra. Indeed Mr. Koussevitzzky is generally regarded as one of the ablest of conductors.

At the same time it is difficult to understand why Mr. Koussevitzky should seek to restrain a Boston publishing house from putting out a biography of him on the grounds that it is libelous or why a judge should have granted such restraint, even temporarily. To permit such restraint would certainly seem to us to be an infringement of the freedom of the press.

If the book were unjustifiably critical of the conductor's personal life, he could properly sue the publisher and author for libel. However, Mr. Koussevitzky seems to forget that he is not only a public figure but a member of the entertainment world. A critic has the right to dislike his work and to minimize his ability. One of the fundamental rights of critics is to be able to speak their minds. Few of the greatest stars or the greatest productions do not have their detractors. Certainly, in the world of music few composers or performers have had anything like universal acclaim during their lives. We have had instances of reviews of the same performance which were diametrically opposite in appreciation.

It is true that the biography by the Boston critic might hurt Mr. Koussevitzky materially, but any unfavorable review might do the same. In the same manner anyone who advised another person not to go to a certain show might be judged guilty of slander. For that matter, the person who booed a Brooklyn Dodger or a visiting player at Ebbets Field might be adjudged guilty of hurting that player materially.

Men far greater than Mr Koussevitzky have weathered criticism far more vicious and derogatory than that contained in the Boston biography. It is considered part of the artist's and the entertainer's job to take harsh criticism with good grace.

TIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 14 1947

The Boston Symphony struggled through with a 3.6 on its first program for its new sponsor, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. (ABC, Tuesday nights). The competition throve and got ratings ranging from 5.7 for Real Stories on Mutual to a whacking 24.2 for Amos 'n' Andy on NBC.

The other new highbrow musical program, the Detroit Symphony in the Sunday Evening Hour, which Musical Digest Magazine is putting on ABC Sunday nights, made an even less impressive showing against some more impressive competition. Its first rating, 2.3, gave it only 5.4% of the total listening audience. Almost everyone was listening to Charlie McCarthy and Fred Allen on NBC, who had ratings of 28.0 and 26.6 and shares of audience of 63.7 and 63.3 respectively. The only competing program which has a lower rating than the symphony was Special Investigator, sponsored by the Commercial Credit Corp. on Mutual; it got only 1.4.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 14 1947

SYMPHONY OPENS CENTER

Boston Orchestra First to Play at Remodeled White Plains Hall

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Feb. 13—Remodeled and redecorated, the main auditorium of the County Center here was reopened tonight for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It had been closed for the last fourteen months while $175,000 improvements, including a new roof, were being installed.

Tonight's concert was attended by a capacity audience of 3,500. It was the opening event in another of the Mrs. Julian Olney series. Leonard Bernstein conducted and the program included Brahms' Serenade No. 2 in A major, Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3 and Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 7.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 14 1947

Is an Unauthorized Biography a Violation of Civil Rights Rule?

If a publisher brings out an unauthorized biography which offends the subject, can the latter bring a successful action under the civil rights statute which prohibits any firm from using "for the purposes of trade the name, portrait or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person"?

If so, the implications are such as to bring consternation among publishers in any state in which a civil rights statute is interpreted in such manner.

Sergei Koussevitzsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has brought suit in New York against Allen, Towne and Heath Inc., publisher of a biography, "Koussevitzsky," written by Moses Smith, former music critic for Boston newspapers.

The conductor charges among other things that the biography was an attempt to exploit his personality commercially and might cut into the market for his proposed autobiography. That might be said to be true of any biography of any living person. The significance of the complaint is clear.

The meat of his charges, however, seems to be in the complaint that the book "untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor in conducting, and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training."

The court will be called upon to decide whether the civil rights statute can properly be employed in what boils down to a libel action. It may be asked whether the conductor would have complained of injury had the biography been complimentary instead of critical. If in the judgment of the court he would not, the exploitation complaint probably would be rejected, leaving little but the angle of defamation. If the court then is willing to hear defamation arguments, Mr. Koussevitzsky's case will be little different from that of any artist who contests the right of critics to be critical of his work. The case may hinge on whether the court says in effect, "This is nothing but a libel action and should have been brought as such."

MONTICELLO, N.Y
REPUBLICAN
2/14/47

The WORLD of MUSIC

Berkshire Music Festival Expanded—N. Y. Philharmonic To Go on Tour—Toscanini Back on Air

NEW YORK, Feb. 8 (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase from nine to 12 the number of concerts it will give this summer at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Serge Koussevitzky announced there would be the customary three series of three concerts—one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The season will open on July 13 with the Bach program and close with the concert of Aug. 10.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at Tanglewood on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera and choral singing and ensemble playing.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, for the first time since before the war, will make an extensive tour this spring. Between April 14 and through May 11, the orchestra will play 28 concerts in 24 cities. Seventeen concerts will be conducted by Artur Rodzinski; the remaing 11 by Leopold Stokowski.

The tour, which will take the orchestra for the first time in its history through the South, has been made possible by its radio sponsorship. The cost involved in moving an organization of 103 musicians some 4,000 miles halfway across the country and back is so high that a large deficit otherwise would have been inevitable, the orchestra's directors said.

The tour opens in Baltimore on April 14 under Stokowski, who also will conduct the next ten concerts in southern cities. Rodzinski takes over on April 25 in Montgomery, Ala.

All concerts will be played in the evening except the four Sundays, which will be afternoon performances broadcast, as usual, over the Columbia network.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE
FEB 14 1947

Biographers, Attention!

The order of New York State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag restraining distribution of a biography of Serge Koussevitzky, which the Boston Symphony conductor does not like, is interesting because of its possible wide implications if it should stand up in the higher courts.

We have to remember first off that in New York the State Supreme Court is not what it is in most other States. In New York it is only the lowest court of record and corresponds to the Superior Court in California. Hence, Justice Shientag's order and whatever judgment results from the $400,000 damage suit Koussevitzky has brought is subject to review, first in the New York Appellate Division and then in the Court of Appeals, the highest judicial body in that State. After that the Federal courts may have successive whacks at the case.

But if Koussevitzky should win in the end? Could anyone then publish any biography of any living person without that person's consent and approval of its contents? Some existing biographies of individuals now living can hardly be pleasing to their subjects. What about political biographies, which are written by foes as well as by friends? The question of civil rights which Koussevitzky has raised seems equally applicable to all persons.

Would the rule, if such a one should be set up, extend also to persons not living? Would their families or descendants have a cause of action against a biographer and his publisher whose book displeased them?

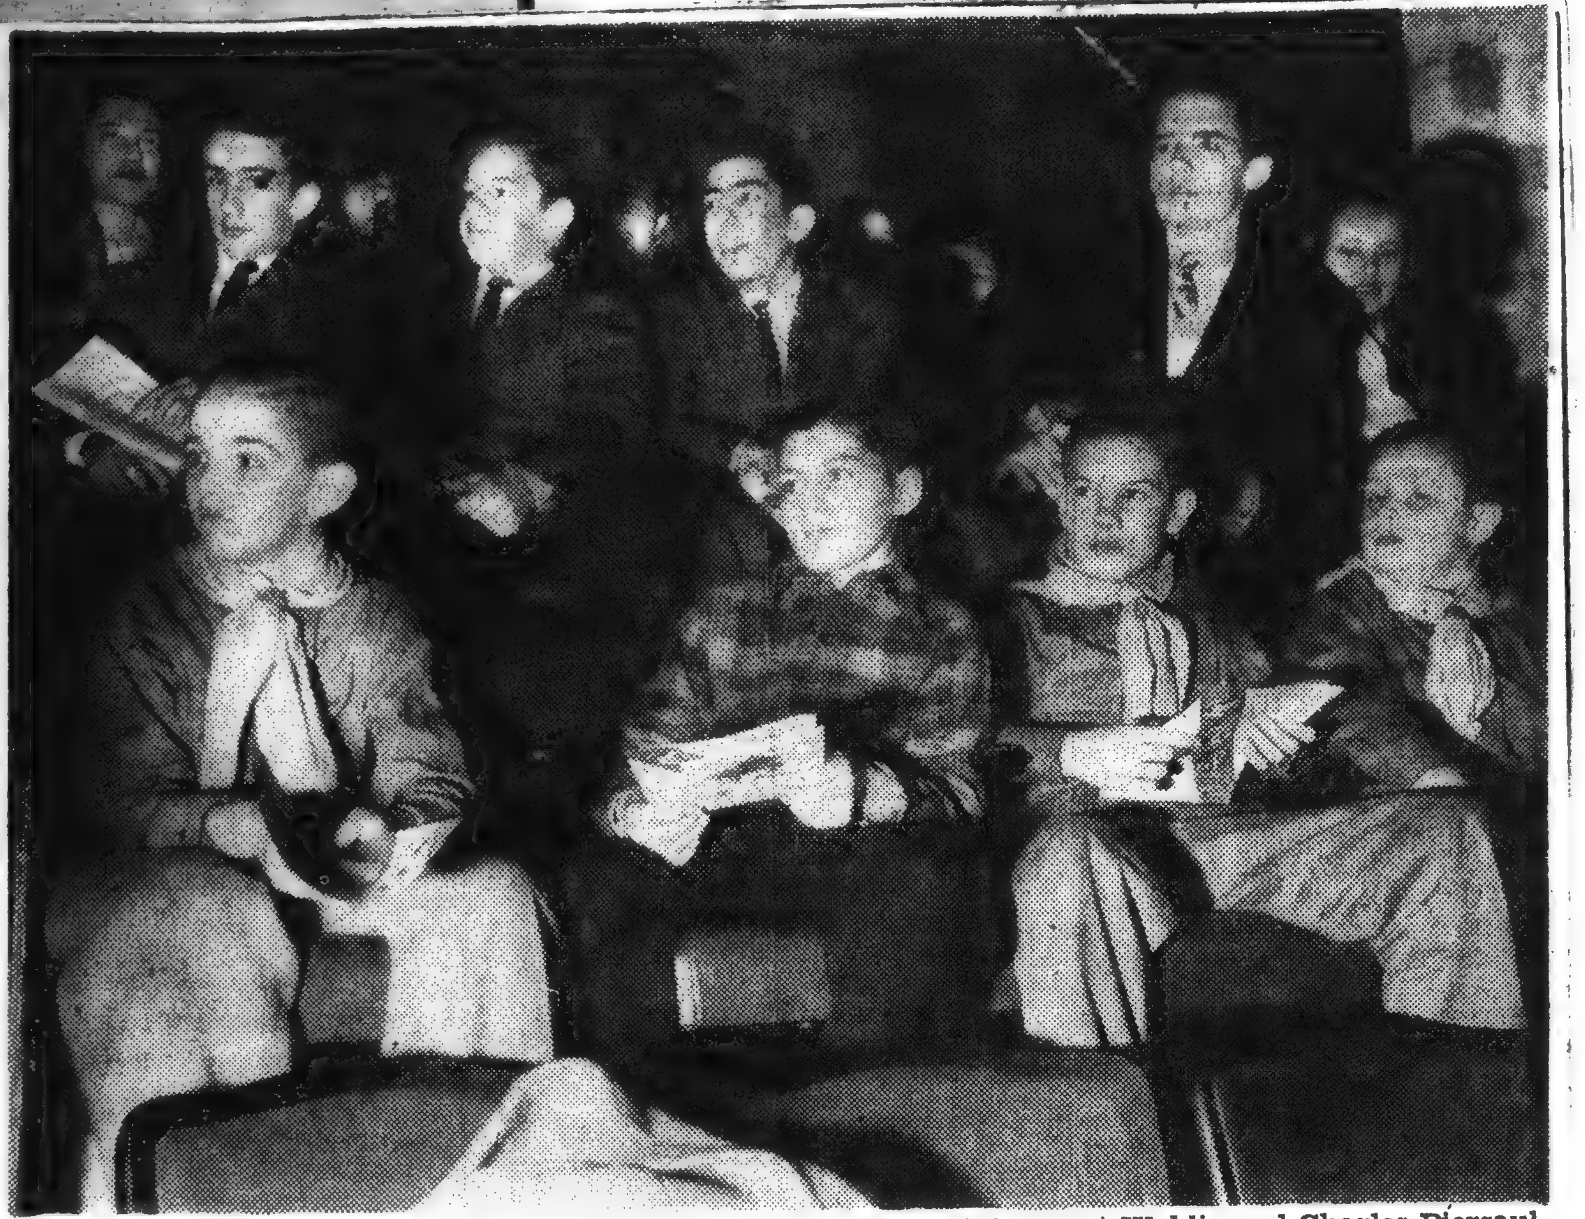
The outcome of this suit is to be watched with interest by all biographers, present and prospective.

SYMPHONY APPLAUDED

Boston, Nov. 29.—(AP)—The first symphony of a South American to be played by the 66-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra was applauded today after its performance under the baton of the composer, Camargo Guarnieri. One critic found the work, first in that form to be composed by Guarnieri, municipal director of music in Sao Paolo, Brazil, "definitely modern and vigorous."

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD STAR

FEB 14 1947



FIRST ROW gallery at the County Center, White Plains, was filled with school boys last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its initial appearance here. Pictured (left to right) are Louis Ackerman, Donald Thiappinelli, Robert Waldie and Charles Piersaul, all of Mount Kisco. About 4,000 persons attended the affair, the first major musical program at the Center since the new roof was affixed. The occasion marked the re-opening of the Mrs. Julian Olney Concert Series. Leonard Bernstein was conductor. —Staff Photo

Boston Symphony Received With Enthusiasm at Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN
White Plains Bureau Staff Writer

Playing for the first time in Westchester, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the brilliant young conductor, Leonard Bernstein, opened the 14th season of the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series at the County Center last night. A large and enthusiastic audience from all parts of the county welcomed the composer-conductor and gave ample evidence of its approval of his outstanding performance.

His most important work was the Schubert "Symphony in C Major, No. 7," to which Mr. Bernstein devoted the second half of the program. There is a breadth and depth to this music, one of the greatest of Schubert's works, which was beautifully expressed last night.

All of the innate joyousness underlying the first movement and the lovely tonal colors of the swiftly moving modulations were carefully delineated so as to produce the most effective results. The lovely golden fabric of melody which flows continuously throughout the "Andante con moto" was presented with the utmost simplicity—and the movement became a gem of lyric beauty.

Mood Kept Sustained

In the Scherzo Mr. Bernstein sensed the humor and light, joyous merriment indicated in the score and kept the constant swinging motion to produce a truly sustained mood. However, it was in the Finale that the conductor really showed his complete understanding of the music and his devotion to it. His interpretation was conceived on a broad scale — but he never lost sight of the ever-impelling drive which carries through to the climax.

Polyphonic sections were presented in a clear and forthright manner, but were not permitted to interfere with the ceaseless, restless character of the movement as a whole. Mr. Bernstein produced a magnificent climax—both rhythmically and emotionally—and his entire rendering was a tribute to the skill of the orchestra and to his own artistic abilities.

Conducting Full Of Vigor

The program opened with the "Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72" by Beethoven. Here the interpretation was straightforward and spirited; in fact there is a great deal of vitality about all that Mr. Bernstein does. His conducting is full of vigor and animation, and one is intrigued by the expressiveness of his every motion, working as he does without a baton.

Following the Beethoven work, the program featured the "Serenade No. 2 in A Major, Op. 16" by Brahms. There was a great deal of clarity and precision in this reading, so that the delightful thematic developments and rhythmic patterns were sharply etched. It was an outstanding performance in every way, and the orchestra was enthusiastically received at its conclusion.

Mrs. Olney greeted the subscribers before the program and introduced Mr. Bernstein. The next program in the series will be by Eleanor Steber, soprano, on Feb. 28.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 15 1947

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Again in Brooklyn

By JOHN BALL Jr.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in Brooklyn last night for the third time this season. Instead of Dr. Koussevitzky, Leonard Bernstein was on the podium to conduct the concert this time at the Academy of Music.

The orchestra offered performances of three works, the familiar and popular "Linz" symphony of Mozart, the less frequently heard "Serenade" for wind instruments, violas, 'cellos, and doublebasses, by Brahms, and the Beethoven "Symphony No. 7." The choice of program met with unmistakable approval from the audience.

The opening Mozart work was offered in somewhat of a soft-focus interpretation. Mozart is one composer to whom there are many approaches. Mr. Bernstein used a define dynamic restraint which gave a mellow ring to the score. The orchestra played splendily, as it almost invariably does; a bad performance by the Boston orchestra is a possibility, but little more than that.

The Brahms "Serenade," in so far as this listener is concerned, was the major success of the evening. This lovely work is richly infused with the warmth of Autumn sunshine and the glow of pleasant living. This is music that was meant to be listened to as music, for enjoyment, for relaxation, and as a light tonic to abolish the cares of day-to-day living. No great and heroic message is conveyed here, just good melodic Gomutlichkeit softened still further by elimination of the violins. Mr. Bernstein's interpretation of the score gave us a great deal of satisfaction and won an enthusiastic vote of confidence from the capacity house.

The final offering of the evening was the Beethoven "Symphony No. 7." The well-known work has been widely performed and discussed. Last night's reading impressed us as a good realization of this music without adding anything new to what has already been done. The dynamic range was wide, somewhat at the expense of tonal appeal, a compromise entirely appropriate to this composer and this symphony.

The chief feature of the concert, from the standpoint of strict reporting, was the appearance of young Mr. Bernstein as conductor. First of all he merits praise for being given the assignment to conduct a major appearance by this magnificent musical organization. If the orchestra sounded slightly less brilliant under his leadership, it should be understood that this constitutes a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky rather than a reflection on Mr. Bernstein.

Mr. Bernstein conducts in what is rapidly becoming a fashion, without either score or baton. More particularly he seems to be half dancing to the music at the same time that he is directing his men. He responds fluently to rhythm and sways to the music with gestures which represent a meeting ground halfway between Uday Shan-Kar and Leonid Kinsky. On the way out of the concert hall we heard several comments concerning Mr. Bernstein's beautiful hands. We would have liked even more to have heard them comment, instead, on his beautiful music.

PATERSON, N. J
EXAMINER
2/15/47

★ MUSIC ★

A NEW PUBLISHER SCORES WITH A FINE MUSICAL BIOGRAPHY

This is properly the review not only of a new book but of a new publisher. Allen, Towne & Heath is a firm dedicated to the publication of books for the music lover. Today (February 15) marks the issuance of its first book and it is an event of importance both to book lovers and music lovers. For in Moses Smith's Koussevitsky, Allen, Towne, & Heath indicates that its performance will equal its promise.

KOUSSEVITSKY

That promise is "to provide sound, authoritative, non-technical books in all branches of music—books which will not only be informative, but entertaining as well." Mr. Smith's engaging biography of Serge Koussevitsky squares with the promise on all fours.

It could not have been an easy task to write an interesting life-story of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's venerable conductor. In the first place, Koussevitsky's life has been almost entirely in the world of music, his private life as well as his public. There are no provocative amorous episodes, no psychological aberrations, no political involvements. The story is one simply of a man whose entire life was devoted to conducting, most of it in one city and in front of one orchestra. Yet, Smith has co-ordinated his material so skillfully and written it so well that even the bare recital of concert programs takes on a glow.

It is no mere paean of praise which Smith has composed for Koussevitsky. Smith was for many years a discerning music critic on the Boston American and the Boston Transcript and he knows Koussevitsky's shortcomings as well as anyone. What one does get is a well-rounded picture of a man who rose above his inadequate training and accomplished the difficult feat of becoming a great conductor after the age of 50. If any person can be said to be "dedicated", Koussevitsky is that man. In Russia he organized an orchestra which gave concerts not only in the large metropoli but made several fabulous tours down the Volga River, bringing music to the smallest hamlets of the Russian hinterland.

This missionary spirit has dominated Koussevitsky all his life. It is doubtful that any conductor has introduced more new music than he, and certainly no one has given over as many concerts to new works of American composers. The creation of the Berkshire Music Center, which bids fair to rival the famous old world festivals at Salzburg and Bayreuth, was also chiefly due to Koussevitsky's devotion to the muse.

From Smith's gifted typewriter the story emerges with both authority and excitement, lightened with deft anecdotes concerning the conductor's relationships with his nephew (the conductor, Fabien Sevitzky), the musicians' union, the men in his orchestra, the trustees of the Boston Symphony. No one who is interested in music or in biography should miss this scholarly, and at the same time entrancing, book.

KOUSSEVITZKY BOOK REMAINS UNDER BAN

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag denied yesterday a motion to vacate an interim stay he signed last Tuesday restraining the publication and delivery of a biographical book entitled "Koussevitzky." The book was written by Moses Smith, former Boston music critic, and was scheduled for release today by the publishing concern of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.

The stay will remain in effect until Justice Shientag acts on an application for a temporary injunction, won by Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who charged that the book was an unauthorized biography of himself and an invasion of his civil rights.

Morris Ernst, counsel for the publisher, in seeking to have the stay vacated, argued that such action was "unknown in literary history."

"This is not nearly as complicated as you make it," Justice Shientag replied. "I didn't enjoin the publishing field in general in granting this interim stay, I simply enjoined one publisher. Koussevitzky contends that this book constitutes a violation of his rights of privacy. There was enough basis to grant the stay. I granted it."

In seeking the stay, Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern, said the publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, and that the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 15 1947

Publication Stay Upheld On Koussevitzky Book

Court Holds Up Unauthorized Biography of Conductor

A motion to vacate an interim stay restraining the publication today of Moses Smith's unauthorized biography of Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was denied in the New York Supreme Court yesterday by Justice Bernard L. Shientag.

Justice Shientag said that publication of the biography pending his decision on an application for a temporary injunction might do irreparable harm to Mr. Koussevitzky, while postponement of the publication date would do no such harm to the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., 1 Madison Avenue.

Morris L. Ernst, of 285 Madison Avenue, attorney for the publishers, pleaded that the interim stay abridges the freedom of the press under the Constitution. He argued that a precedent will be set by which all biographies of living persons, including biographical magazine articles, will be subject to suppression at the whim of the subject.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who was represented by Henry Root Stern, attorney, of 20 Pine Street, has charged violation of his right of privacy under Sections 50 and 51 of the state civil practice act following his refusal to consent to the biography. The seventy-two-year-old conductor complained that the book, which is titled "Koussevitzky," contains false and misleading statements, and that the defendants are irresponsible financially and will not be able to respond in damages.

York state civil rights law.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB [illegible] 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY BOOK REMAINS UNDER BAN

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag denied yesterday a motion to vacate an interim stay he signed last Tuesday, restraining the publication and delivery of a biographical book entitled "Koussevitzky." The book was written by Moses Smith, former Boston music critic, and was scheduled for release today by the publishing concern of Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.

The stay will remain in effect until Justice Shientag acts on an application for a temporary injunction, won by Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who charged that the book was an unauthorized biography of himself and an invasion of his civil rights.

Morris Ernst, counsel for the publisher, in seeking to have the stay vacated, argued that such action was "unknown in literary history."

"This is not nearly as complicated as you make it," Justice Shientag replied. "I didn't enjoin the publishing field in general in granting this interim stay, I simply enjoined one publisher. Koussevitzky contends that this book constitutes a violation of his rights of privacy. There was enough basis to grant the stay. I granted it."

In seeking the stay, Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern, said the publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, and that the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

FEB 16 1947

Scores Chosen For Berkshire Music Festival

Boston, Feb. 15.—First announcement of the repertory for next summer's Berkshire Festival has been received at Symphony Hall from Serge Koussevitzky, who is now on his midwinter vacation in Florida.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give 12 concerts at its summer home at Tanglewood next summer. These will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, respectively, by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13, 20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed. The middle week will be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, August 2, 3), with the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (August 5).

Invites Bernstein, Shaw

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the greater part of the festival and has invited two guest conductors, Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw, both of whom are to be on the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, which will be concurrently in session at Tanglewood.

Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include in the concerts of July 24, 26, 27, Brahms' Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh Symphony, Copland's Third Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony, Ber[illegible]oz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony (v[illegible]la soloist, William Primrose), H[illegible]mith's Violin Concerto (soloist, [illegible] Posselt), Barber's Overture [illegible]ool for Scandal."

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

FEB 16 1947

Copland: A Lincoln Portrait: Melvyn Douglas, narrator. Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Two 12-inch Victor records DM-1088.

Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait is given a warm and vital reading by Koussevitzky in Victor's first waxing of the work. Recorded a few months ago by Rodzinski and the New York Philharmonic for Columbia, this present release is superior in sheer orchestral warmth and melodic beauty. The score, itself, is impressive and Dr. Koussevitzky's reading reflects his fond affection for modern American music. Melvyn Douglas of the screen, is the narrator, and also inserts Lincoln's famous Gettysburg address in the closing of the composition.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 16 1947

Review of 'Koussevitzky'

The review of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky," which appears in THE NEW YORK TIMES Book Review today, went to press before Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag issued a court order restraining publication and distribution of the book. Dr. Koussevitzky charges that the book is libelous and violates the State's Civil Rights Law, or "rights of privacy" law. The volume originally had been scheduled for publication yesterday.

Oklahoma City
Oklahoma

[illegible] 6 1947

THE Boston Symphony orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to 12. These will include a Beethoven cycle, according to an announcement from Symphony hall by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. This last extra concert will follow the Beethoven cycle in Series B.

The Bach program will be July 13, the Mozart program July 20, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven August 5, following the cycle in Series B devoted to his works. Series A, the first of the three regular weekend series, opens July 24. The final program of the festival will be given August 10. Subscribers to any of the three regular series may obtain tickets for the extra concerts at a special rate.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30 and continue through August 10, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Instruction will be offered in five departments: Orchestral and choral conducting, orchestral playing and chamber music, composition, opera, and choral singing and ensemble playing.

Music lovers who arrive on the Berkshire scene early in the season or are there during the festival period may attend the numerous instrumental, choral, opera and student orchestra performances of the music center for which no tickets are sold.

For further information about the festival, the music center and the Friends, letters may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., and after June 1 to "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 16 1947

Koussevitzky: The Life and Times of a Great Conductor

KOUSSEVITZKY. By Moses Smith. Illustrated. 400 pp. New York: Allen, Towne & Heath. $4.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY had a big career in Russia, followed it with an equally significant one in France and has crowned it with more than twenty years here, where he has not only integrated his work into the life of the country but has become a friend, leader and spokesman of America's creative forces in music. The story of his life, rich in action and accomplishment, is now told in a biography by Moses Smith, who was for years a music critic in Boston and later in charge of the masterworks section of Columbia Records. The book is the first under the imprint of the new firm of Allen, Towne and Heath, which plans to devote itself entirely to books dealing with music.

Mr. Smith is at pains to point out that this is no "authorized" biography, meaning, no doubt, that his intention was to speak frankly. And that he does. He brings to light new facts and throws new light on old situations. But it appears that he deliberately avoided consulting his subject on some matters under discussion, and you get the impression that you are not always hearing both sides of the case.

Whatever the truth may be on some points, there is no questioning the general outlines of the story, and it is a story of tremendous achievement. It began in 1874 in the small town of Vishny - Volotchok, 160 miles northwest of Moscow. Here Serge Koussevitzky was born, the son of a poor musician. His mother, also a musician, died when he was 3. The boy learned music early; his principal instrument in his boyhood appears to have been the cello. As a lad he realized that his native town could not provide him with the opportunity to learn, and when he was 17, he left for Moscow.

HE tried to enter the Imperial Moscow Conservatory but was turned down. He forced his way into the office of the director of the School of the Moscow Philharmonic Society, refused to be turned away and was finally admitted, provided he would take up the study of the double bass. The student orchestra of the school needed a double bass player, and young Koussevitzky was ready to study anything in return for a musical education.

He became in due time one of the greatest virtuosos of that unwieldy instrument. But before he stepped out on his own as a soloist, he played with the orchestra of the Bolshoi Theatre. By the time he had reached his twenties, he was also a professor of the double bass at his old school, and soon he had "academic, artistic and social standing and some security" in Moscow. On Sept. 8, 1905, he was married to Natalya Ushkov, daughter of a wealthy tea merchant. It was his second marriage; the first, to a ballet dancer, had not worked out. But the second endured, until his wife's death, for almost forty years, and it helped Koussevitzky to turn to a career, conducting, for which he longed.

In the years before the Russian Revolution, Koussevitzky formed his own orchestra, played with it up and down the length of Russia. One of his most ambitious ventures was a tour down the Volga with his orchestra, bringing symphonic music to communities that had never heard it before. The first tour in 1910 was so successful it was repeated twice, until the war in 1914 brought it to a halt. Later Koussevitzky also started concerts at low prices in Moscow, another precedent-breaking venture. After the Revolution Koussevitzky remained in Moscow, personally unmolested, for several years. By then he was Russia's most important conductor. Had he chosen to remain in Russia, his career could have been as brilliant as it became outside. When he left Russia late in 1920, he made his center of activity in Paris, and the Concerts Kousse-

(Continued on Page 35)

Koussevitzky at Rehearsal.

Life of a Great Conductor

(Continued from Page 5)

vitzky became the last word in musical excitement.

AT his very first concert as a conductor Koussevitzky had placed new works by Taneiev and Glière on his programs, and throughout his career he was to seek out young, talented composers and to give them their chance to be heard. His Paris concerts were landmarks in adventurous program-making. The same zeal has marked his work in Boston, where he became conductor in 1924. Shortly after his arrival in Boston he asked whether there were any young composers in or about Harvard. He was told about Walter Piston, whom he sent for. It turned out that Piston had not composed any orchestral works because "nobody would play them." Koussevitzky said he would play them and did.

The record of his achievement in Boston is too well known to need repetition here, but a glance at one of Mr. Smith's appendices shows what a proud and catholic assortment of contemporary, including American, composers Mr. Koussevitzky has performed. The quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself is a tribute to his leadership and musicianship, and his building of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center is another of his good works.

Mr. Smith has told the story comprehensively. He does not hesitate to be critical of Mr. Koussevitzky, but he also gives credit where credit is due. This biography does not belong to the flowery school of writing; it is sober, conscientious and perhaps too detailed for its own good. But the reader will learn a lot about musicians from it and will gain new respect for Koussevitzky's achievement.

OPEN PROBE ON LOST TRAWLER

Hold Inquiry on Fate of Missing Belle

At yesterday's official government investigation being conducted by a coast guard board of inquiry at the Custom House into the loss of the Boston trawler Belle on or about Jan. 9, Captain Thomas J. Fowler of 17 Ballou ave., Dorchester, skipper of the trawler Margie & Pat II., a sister ship of the Belle, testified that his vessel was one of the best he ever sailed. He described her as "an excellent sea boat," but admitted that he had made but one trip aboard the vessel.

It was brought out in testimony that 14 tons of ballast had been placed aboard the Margie & Pat II. since the disappearance of the Belle to give her greater stability. Incline tests were held on the vessel yesterday by an expert from New York and the results were reported to the merchant marine inspection service officials, not being made public. It is expected that the hearing into the disaster will be concluded today.

CONDUCTOR CONGRATULATES SINGER—Miss Carol Brice, right receives congratulations from Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who says of Miss Brice's voice, "Her voice is like a cello." Miss Brice appears in concert here at Wheat Street Baptist Church, Sunday, February 16 at 5 o'clock, under the sponship of Washington high school. Tickets on sale at Smith's Music and Appliance Co., $.55 and $1.20.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 1

BERNSTEIN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conducts Program of Works by Beethoven, Hindemith, Mozart at Carnegie Hall

Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest conductor at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program, which made severe demands on the youthful leader's directorial powers, consisted of Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 425); Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and the Hindemith Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

The Mozart symphony performed, popularly named the "Linz" after the city in which it was composed, is a difficult work to conduct because of its constantly shifting moods. Mr. Bernstein was signally successful not only in capturing its spirit, but also and in bringing out the subtle meanings of each change of tonality as well as in indicating the significance of the constant fluctuations from the major to the minor modes, characteristic of this music.

The reading was poetic, and showed real insight into the intentions of a composer whose creations have a way of eluding the majority of interpreters. It exhibited a genuine feeling for Mozart's grace of melodic outline on Mr. Bernstein's part. He knew where to intensify phrases, and how to give them shape and proportion, throughout an account of the four movements that was always musical and musicianly.

"Pianissimo" Held Lacking

If the dynamics were not as sharply varied as the symphony asks, and the orchestral tone not always of the best, it is somewhat difficult to know where to lay the blame for these deficiencies, which also were in evidence in the rest of the offerings. A real "pianissimo" was seldom supplied, during the concert, and the difference between "piano" and "forte" was seldom sufficiently marked to become duly effective.

The fine sensitivity disclosed by the conductor in the Mozart masterpiece was strangely missing in the first two movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, where results were largely of a pedestrian nature. The introduction of the first division was heavy in sound, and the transitional measures leading to the Vivace, like the rest of the opening movement and the entire Allegretto, displayed only a partial comprehension of their inner life.

Hindemith Reading Rewarding

Much more rewarding was the performance accorded the iVolin Concerto of Hindemith. Mr. Bern stein's approach to this fine sco was deeply sympathetic, and h was especially communicative i the "tutti's," where his tempera ment could be freely unleashed

Miss Posselt, who had played th work here at its local première b the same orchestra, under Serg Koussevitzky, in 1941, evinced he long familiarity with it in a pres entation of the solo part that dis closed a firm grasp of its charac ter and had great sweep and in tensity. But, probably because th orchestral support was seldom sub dued enough in softer measures Miss Posselt kept her brillian playing, in general, on a somewha unvaried dynamic plane. . . N. S.

MASTER'S PIANO SURVIVED BOMBING

The small instrument used by Mozart on trips is now stored alon with other musical exhibits at the Offenbach Arts and Crafts Schoo It was removed from the Offenbach Schloss Museum after the buildin was hit by Allied airmen.

The New York Times (Frankfort Bureau)

NEW YORK, N.Y. TIMES
FEB 16 1947

BERNSTEIN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conducts Program of Works by Beethoven, Hindemith, Mozart at Carnegie Hall

Leonard Bernstein appeared as guest conductor at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program, which made severe demands on the youthful leader's directorial powers, consisted of Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 425); Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and the Hindemith Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

The Mozart symphony performed, popularly named the "Linz" after the city in which it was composed, is a difficult work to conduct because of its constantly shifting moods. Mr. Bernstein was signally successful not only in capturing its spirit, but also in bringing out the subtle meanings of each change of tonality as well as in indicating the significance of the constant fluctuations from the major to the minor modes, characteristic of this music.

The reading was poetic, and showed real insight into the intentions of a composer whose creations have a way of eluding the majority of interpreters. It exhibited a genuine feeling for Mozart's grace of melodic outline on Mr. Bernstein's part. He knew where to intensify phrases, and how to give them shape and proportion, throughout an account of the four movements that was always musical and musicianly.

If the dynamics were not as sharply varied as the symphony asks, and the orchestral tone not always of the best, it is somewhat difficult to know where to lay the blame for these deficiencies, which also were in evidence in the rest of the offerings. A real "pianissimo" was seldom supplied, during the concert, and the difference between "piano" and "forte" was seldom sufficiently marked to become duly effective.

The fine sensitivity disclosed by the conductor in the Mozart masterpiece was strangely missing in the first two movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, where results were largely of a pedestrian nature. The introduction of the first division was heavy in sound, and the transitional measures leading to the Vivace, like the rest of the opening movement and the entire Allegretto, displayed only a partial comprehension of their inner life.

Much more rewarding was the performance accorded the Violin Concerto of Hindemith. Mr. Bernstein's approach to this fine score was deeply sympathetic, and he was especially communicative in the "tutti's," where his temperament could be freely unleashed.

Miss Posselt, who had played the work here at its local première by the same orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in 1941, evinced her long familiarity with it in a presentation of the solo part that disclosed a firm grasp of its character and had great sweep and intensity. But, probably because the orchestral support was seldom subdued enough in softer measures, Miss Posselt kept her brilliant playing, in general, on a somewhat unvaried dynamic plane. N. S.

FEB 16 1947

Smith's Biography Probes Sevitzky-Koussevitzky Rift

A GREAT DEAL of local interest will attach to "Koussevitzky" (Allen, Towne and Heath), a biography of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Moses Smith, because the author, a former music critic of the Boston American and Transcript, discusses in it the relations between Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, and his famous uncle.

He discloses that Dr. Sevitzky (nee Koussevitzky) was "ordered" by Serge Koussevitzky to change his name when he began to appear as a solo double-bass performer in Russia. He had joined his uncle's Bol'shoi Imperial Theater Orchestra, Moscow, in 1910.

The reason, as stated by Mr. Smith, was that Serge Koussevitzky feared confusion if there were two Koussevitzkys in the field.

WHEN DR. SEVITZKY first arrived in Boston as director of the orchestra in a "presentation" movie house, his uncle, by then conductor of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave him his blessing in public, Mr. Smith reports. He quotes the elder Koussevitzky as saying, "But yes, that boy is a brilliant boy. You are to wait . . . in three or four years you will hear his name ver' loud in this country."

He changed his tune, Mr. Smith relates, when Fabien Sevitzky accepted the post of conductor of the Boston People's Symphony Orchestra in 1933. To the well-established Koussevitzky it was a second-rate orchestra, worse than the worst orchestra in Paris, beneath the family dignity. To his aspiring young nephew it was the long-awaited chance to prove what he could do. But the uncle's feeling against him became so intense, Mr. Smith declares, that he wrote letters to influential people in the musical world "warning them against his nephew. The situation, he confesses, became extremely difficult for their mutual friends.

IN ADDITION to their quarrel over the Boston People's Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Smith suggests "there was a basis of personal friction, not unique in the Koussevitzky family." Peace between them finally was restored in 1944. Dr. Sevitzky made his first appearance in Symphony Hall, home of the Boston Orchestra, with his Indianapolis orchestra last season.

Mr. Smith embellishes this subject with several amusing, and revealing, anecdotes. He tells of one time when Serge Koussevitzky was holding a conference with other musicians at a New York hotel. The telephone rang.

"KOUSSEVITZKY answered it, listened for a moment, then broke into a long tirade in Russian, his voice constantly rising in pitch and intensity. Finally he slammed down the receiver, turned to his companions and said, 'My nephew. He doesn't let me say a word!'"

His probing of the Koussevitzky family matter, which unfortunately became a matter of public concern, forms only a part of one chapter in Mr. Smith's brilliant life study of one of the most significant musical figures of our time. The author was among the Bostonians who came here in 1937 to witness Dr. Sevitzky's debut as conductor of the Symphony Orchestr

---

MILWAUKEE, WIS. JOURNAL
FEB 16 1947

The Reading Glass

Books and Authors

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston symphony, has begun a legal fight to suppress a biography of him which Allen, Towne & Heath, a new publishing house, issued a few days ago as its first book. The conductor charges that the book—written by Moses Smith, a music critic—libels him and violates his right of privacy. New York Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag has granted Koussevitsky an "interim stay" restraining distribution of the book pending a decision. Shientag indicated that the suit would establish whether publishers must have the subject's consent to publish a biography of a living person. The conductor also filed notice of a $500,000 libel suit against the author and publisher, asserting that the book "untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians, incompetent as an instructor of conducting, and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training."

Dr. Koussevitsky

"Furthermore, this book attacks my integrity as a man and an artist. It impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work and devotion to the ideals of music, art and culture in the United States and throughout the world."

David Ewen, editor and director of the new publishing firm, described the book as "not only an unbiased but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career." He insisted that legal action against the work infringes the right of critics "to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to [illegible] culture." He said that 3,000 copies of the book had already been sent to booksellers.

Smith was music critic for the Boston American and Transcript for nearly 20 years, and more recently was director of the Masterworks division of Columbia records. He was active in the unionization of the Boston symphony, which had been nonunion traditionally.

Koussevitzky Blocks Biography as Libelous

Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today had won a court order restraining publication and distribution of a biography of him on the ground that it was unauthorized and libelous.

The book, which bears his name, is published by Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc. Supreme Court Justice Shientag, in granting the stay yesterday, ordered attorneys to submit briefs by next Wednesday.

Notice of a $500,000 suit against Moses Smith, Boston music critic who wrote the book, was filed in the complaint.

The Bostonians

Ruth Posselt Joins Orchestra in Hindemith Concerto

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor, third concert of its New York afternoon series yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:
Symphony No. 36, in C major, "Linz" (K.425) .... Mozart
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra... Hindemith
Symphony No. 7, in A major........ Beethoven

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the third time here and the second at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. In last fall's concerts of the New York City Symphony, he made a point of including in each program a previously performed but still relatively unfamiliar work by a composer of our day. Presenting Paul Hindemith's violin concerto in yesterday's concert was in line with this policy—which is a laudable one, although, in this case, the work did not prove to be particularly rewarding.

The Hindemith concerto was introduced to New York by Ruth Posselt and the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 9, 1941; it also received a pair of performances from the New York City Symphony, then under Leopold Stokowski, in January, 1945, with Robert Gross as the soloist. Yesterday, what with Miss Posselt's previous acquaintance with the work and Mr. Bernstein's evident understanding of it, the concerto was performed under particularly favorable circumstances. Yet, as in 1941, it gave an impression of frequent aridity. This did not seem due to difficulties of assimilation existing in the music itself, such as unusual complexity of form or structure, or aggressive harmonic acridity. The idiom is of the present, but occasional romantic touches are not absent. The work is ingeniously wrought, but it gave a sense of little expressive communication or intensity of mood.

It was well played. The solo violin part, which seemed exacting and is not particularly effective as a vehicle for technical brilliance, was presented by Miss Posselt with thorough technical skill and a consistently good quality of tone, in a musicianly, if somewhat cool interpretation. Coolness, indeed, characterizes much of the music, but the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Bernstein had color and variety of mood as well as clarity of detail, fully realizing the limited expressive resources of this work. The balance between the solo and the concerted music was well adjusted.

Mozart's "Linz" symphony fared well so far as the actual execution was concerned, in quality and proportion of tone, in unfailing lucidity, yet seemed a matter of skillful routine rather than of interpretative persuasiveness. The spirited performance of what the reviewer heard of the Beethoven symphony revealed more of the essential atmosphere of the music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 16 1947

The Bostonians

Ruth Posselt Joins Orchestra in Hindemith Concerto

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor, third concert of its New York afternoon series yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:
Symphony No. 36, in C major, "Linz" (K.425) .... Mozart
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra... Hindemith
Symphony No. 7, in A major........ Beethoven

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the third time here and the second at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. In last fall's concerts of the New York City Symphony, he made a point of including in each program a previously performed but still relatively unfamiliar work by a composer of our day. Presenting Paul Hindemith's violin concerto in yesterday's concert was in line with this policy—which is a laudable one, although, in this case, the work did not prove to be particularly rewarding.

The Hindemith concerto was introduced to New York by Ruth Posselt and the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 9, 1941; it also received a pair of performances from the New York City Symphony, then under Leopold Stokowski, in January, 1945, with Robert Gross as the soloist. Yesterday, what with Miss Posselt's previous acquaintance with the work and Mr. Bernstein's evident understanding of it, the concerto was performed under particularly favorable circumstances. Yet, as in 1941, it gave an impression of frequent aridity. This did not seem due to difficulties of assimilation existing in the music itself, such as unusual complexity of form or structure, or aggressive harmonic acridity. The idiom is of the present, but occasional romantic touches are not absent. The work is ingeniously wrought, but it gave a sense of little expressive communication or intensity of mood.

It was well played. The solo violin part, which seemed exacting and is not particularly effective as a vehicle for technical brilliance, was presented by Miss Posselt with thorough technical skill and a consistently good quality of tone, in a musicianly, if somewhat cool interpretation. Coolness, indeed, characterizes much of the music, but the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Bernstein had color and variety of mood as well as clarity of detail, fully realizing the limited expressive resources of this work. The balance between the solo and the concerted music was well adjusted.

Mozart's "Linz" symphony fared well so far as the actual execution was concerned, in quality and proportion of tone, in unfailing lucidity, yet seemed a matter of skillful routine rather than of interpretative persuasiveness. The spirited performance of what the reviewer heard of the Beethoven symphony revealed more of the essential atmosphere of the music.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.

Winter 1947

The Tale of Tanglewood, by M. A. De-Wolfe Howe.

Mr. Howe has written a pleasant history of Tanglewood as it was in the time of Hawthorne and Melville, and as it is now since it has become the seat of the Berkshire Festivals and the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tanglewood and the surrounding Berkshire country side have a musical history which considerably antedates the year in which the estate was generously presented to the trustees of the Boston Symphony. Stockbridge, Pittsfield, South Mountain are names which have potent musical associations for many people. Mr. Howe very justly divides his account between this early history and the history of the Festivals since 1937. Anyone who has attended the Festivals or heard the broadcasts will enjoy Mr. Howe's Tanglewood Tale. Anyone who has not been able to hear one of the most important festivals in the country will wish that he had after he reads this account. Koussevitzky contributes an introduction to the book, there are many illustrations, and a complete list of the Festival programs from 1934 to 1946 is included. The format of the book is as pleasant as its contents.

Insurance Company Gives Scholarships For Tanglewood

The John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company sponsoring the weekly broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday nights has announced a gift of 10 scholarships for the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

This gift, says the announcement, is to "further Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's plan to promote the cultural heritage of America." In accepting the gift Dr. Koussevitzky noted that until quite recently there had been relatively few Americans playing in the first-desk positions of leading symphony orchestras. Now in the Boston Symphony itself Dr. Koussevitzky pointed out that the first oboist and first double-bass player are both American-born musicians. "And," he added, "they received their final training at Tanglewood." The recently appointed conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, he said, is another American (Thor Johnson) who studied at the Berkshire Music Center.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 16 1947

Two Views of Koussevitzky

Great Conductor and His Orchestra

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith. 400 pages. Allen, Towne & Heath, $4.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, by Hugo Leichentritt. 199 pages. Harvard University Press, $3.

Reviewed by
GEORGE Y. LOVERIDGE

BOTH books survey approximately the same field, but Mr. Smith focuses on the man, while Dr. Leichentritt focuses on Dr. Koussevitzky as a protagonist in the encouraging of American composers. Mr. Smith's book is by far the more interesting: he presents what he takes to be facts about Dr. Koussevitzky and what he takes to be rumors, plainly labeled, and they are generally entertaining and instructive facts and rumors; whereas Dr. Leichentritt ignores or evades what everybody would like to know about Dr. Koussevitzky and presents a set of program notes on American music. The notes are informative, however, and Dr. Leichentritt has done a service though not the one that the title of the book would mainly suggest.

There are some things, particularly about his early years, that Dr. Koussevitzky apparently does not wish to be known; he has kept them from Mr. Smith, who, as a music critic in Boston, knew him well; and if he has not kept them from Dr. Leichentritt, at least Dr. Leichentritt isn't telling.

"* * * Serge Koussevitzky has implied that the family was large. * * * It is extremely unlikely that the boy (Serge) left home so young. * * * According to one story, Koussevitzky reached Moscow without a farthing in his pocket; according to another, he had precisely three and a half rubles. * * * " And, "Koussevitzky married Nadezhda Galat, a ballet dancer, not later than 1902, and probably several years earlier." Dr. Koussevitzky, one supposes, could have settled these matters, and unquestionably Mr. Smith wanted him to.

(Since this review was written, Dr. Koussevitzky himself has come forward with a rather unfavorable criticism, to wit, notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against Mr. Smith and court action to restrain the publishers from distributing the book, which happens to be the house's very first publication. Dr. Koussevitzky also explains that he intends to publish his autobiography later and that he declined to give information to Mr. Smith.)

When it comes to the second marriage, Mr. Smith has the date, Sept. 8, 1905, and reports: "Koussevitzky was getting, in addition to Natalya's devotion, the effective control of a huge fortune, with which he might realize any musical ambition he might have or acquire."

Dr. Leichentritt's closest approaches to this not unimportant point are: "* * * he fortunately had available funds. But financial risks have never been an impediment to him when an artistic goal has been sufficiently tempting," and "* * * he found means in 1909 to establish a new orchestra to be conducted by him."

The two writers are far apart in their appraisals of Dr. Koussevitzky's competence at the time he became conductor of the Boston Symphony. "Approaching his 50th year, Koussevitzky had now attained full mastery of his art, full maturity of interpretation, full control of his individual style," asserts Dr. Leichentritt. Mr. Smith says, "The most dramatic achievement in Koussevitzky's career lay in his eventual victory over his fears and obsessions, in his application of his talents and powerful will to learning after 50 when a student of conducting often learns before 20."

Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

Mr. Smith's account of the Koussevitzky temper, humor, ideals, pettiness, generosity, insight, vision, determination, conceit and leadership shows us a human being, and one of large mental and spiritual dimensions. Many other figures in music gather around the hero of these pages. The orchestra itself receives substantial attention.

Dr. Leichentritt admits only Toscanini, Walter, and Furtwangler to the first rank with Koussevitzky, and seems not to consider Stokowski, Monteux and Ormandy conductors at all, which is, surely, his privilege. With his general position—that whatever Koussevitzky does is right—one may reasonably disagree; but nobody is likely to deny this: "Without his (Koussevitzky's) ever ready help much of it (the new American music) would not have been written at all, and many other scores would have remained unknown and hardly ever performed."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 16 1947

RECORDS: LINCOLN

Copland 'Portrait' Played By Boston Symphony

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

AARON COPLAND'S Lincoln Portrait comes as close as any orchestral work, and there have been quite a few, to evoking the quality of Lincoln the man and his legend. Mr. Copland has come closer to success because he has not aimed too high and because he has written simply and unpretentiously. His use of a couple of folk tunes is felicitous, and the employment of a speaker to read Lincoln's words helps on a non-musical plane. The opening section of the work, which seeks by orchestral means alone to suggest the spirit of the man in its fatality, is the most affecting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, has given the music a stunning performance. Melvyn Douglas as the speaker is perhaps too passionate, and his voice sounds as if it is being projected through a loudspeaker, which makes for a disturbing effect. On the fourth side of this Victor album of two twelve-inch records Mr. Douglas reads the Gettysburg Address.

Another album touching partly on Lincoln is American Legends, Elie Siegmeister's songs in folk style and sung by the American Ballad Singers. (Disc, three ten-inch records). Mr. Siegmeister deals with The Lincoln Penny, Nancy Hanks, Johnny Appleseed, Paul Bunyan, John Reed and Lazy Afternoon, and often his efforts are too self-conscious to be convincing.

For my taste, the best Lincoln song written in recent years remains the one with words by Alfred Hayes and music by Earl Robinson. It can be had on a number of different recordings.

Koussevitzky Wins Court Order Halting Sale of Biography

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who has sued a publishing firm for $400,000 damages on the grounds that a new biography of him was libelous, today won a court order restraining distribution of the book.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag, who granted the order, said the suit would establish a precedent on rights to publish biographies without the subject's consent.

See BOOK Page 3

Book

Continued from the First Page

Koussevitzky has charged that the book, written by Boston music critic Moses Smith, was unauthorized and therefore in violation of his civil rights. He also chadged he was libeled by statements in the biography.

His suit was brought against Allen, Towne & Heath, publishing firm, which had scheduled the book for sale Saturday.

The publishing firm said copies of the books already in the hands of booksellers will go on sale that day, but the restraining order will halt further distribution.

A spokesman for the firm said it was with "surprise" that the publishers learned of Koussevitzky's suit because they believed the biography was unbiased and highly laudatory of the conductor.

The publishers said the charge of libel was less important than the question of whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticisms without the consent of the subject.

The Bostonians

Ruth Posselt Joins Orchestra in Hindemith Concerto

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor, third concert of its New York afternoon series yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:
Symphony No. 38, in C major, "Linz" (K.425) .... Mozart
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ... Hindemith
Symphony No. 7, in A major .... Beethoven

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the third time here and the second at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. In last fall's concerts of the New York City Symphony, he made a point of including in each program a previously performed but still relatively unfamiliar work by a composer of our day. Presenting Paul Hindemith's violin concerto in yesterday's concert was in line with this policy—which is a laudable one, although, in this case, the work did not prove to be particularly rewarding.

The Hindemith concerto was introduced to New York by Ruth Posselt and the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 9, 1941; it also received a pair of performances from the New York City Symphony, then under Leopold Stokowski, in January, 1945, with Robert Gross as the soloist. Yesterday, what with Miss Posselt's previous acquaintance with the work and Mr. Bernstein's evident understanding of it, the concerto was performed under particularly favorable circumstances. Yet, as in 1941, it gave an impression of frequent aridity. This did not seem due to difficulties of assimilation existing in the music itself, such as unusual complexity of form or structure, or aggressive harmonic acridity. The idiom is of the present, but occasional romantic touches are not absent. The work is ingeniously wrought, but it gave a sense of little expressive communication or intensity of mood.

It was well played. The solo violin part, which seemed exacting and is not particularly effective as a vehicle for technical brilliance, was presented by Miss Posselt with thorough technical skill and a consistently good quality of tone, in a musicianly, if somewhat cool interpretation. Coolness, indeed, characterizes much of the music, but the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Bernstein had color and variety of mood as well as clarity of detail, fully realizing the limited expressive resources of this work. The balance between the solo and the concerted music was well adjusted.

Mozart's "Linz" symphony fared well so far as the actual execution was concerned, in quality and proportion of tone, in unfailing lucidity, yet seemed a matter of skillful routine rather than of interpretative persuasiveness. The spirited performance of what the reviewer heard of the Beethoven symphony revealed more of the essential atmosphere of the music.

FEB 16 1947

The Bostonians

Ruth Posselt Joins Orchestra in Hindemith Concerto

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor, third concert of its New York afternoon series yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:
Symphony No. 38, in C major, "Linz" (K.425) .... Mozart
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ... Hindemith
Symphony No. 7, in A major .... Beethoven

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the third time here and the second at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. In last fall's concerts of the New York City Symphony, he made a point of including in each program a previously performed but still relatively unfamiliar work by a composer of our day. Presenting Paul Hindemith's violin concerto in yesterday's concert was in line with this policy—which is a laudable one, although, in this case, the work did not prove to be particularly rewarding.

The Hindemith concerto was introduced to New York by Ruth Posselt and the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 9, 1941; it also received a pair of performances from the New York City Symphony, then under Leopold Stokowski, in January, 1945, with Robert Gross as the soloist. Yesterday, what with Miss Posselt's previous acquaintance with the work and Mr. Bernstein's evident understanding of it, the concerto was performed under particularly favorable circumstances. Yet, as in 1941, it gave an impression of frequent aridity. This did not seem due to difficulties of assimilation existing in the music itself, such as unusual complexity of form or structure, or aggressive harmonic acridity. The idiom is of the present, but occasional romantic touches are not absent. The work is ingeniously wrought, but it gave a sense of little expressive communication or intensity of mood.

It was well played. The solo violin part, which seemed exacting and is not particularly effective as a vehicle for technical brilliance, was presented by Miss Posselt with thorough technical skill and a consistently good quality of tone, in a musicianly, if somewhat cool interpretation. Coolness, indeed, characterizes much of the music, but the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Bernstein had color and variety of mood as well as clarity of detail, fully realizing the limited expressive resources of this work. The balance between the solo and the concerted music was well adjusted.

Mozart's "Linz" symphony fared well so far as the actual execution was concerned, in quality and proportion of tone, in unfailing lucidity, yet seemed a matter of skillful routine rather than of interpretative persuasiveness. The spirited performance of what the reviewer heard of the Beethoven symphony revealed more of the essential atmosphere of the music.

FEB 16 1947

Two Views of Koussevitzky

Great Conductor and His Orchestra

~~KOUSSEVITZKY~~, by Moses Smith. 400 pages. Allen, Towne & Heath, $4.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, by Hugo Leichentritt. 199 pages. Harvard University Press, $3.

Reviewed by
GEORGE Y. LOVERIDGE

BOTH books survey approximately the same field, but Mr. Smith focuses on the man, while Dr. Leichentritt focuses on Dr. Koussevitzky as a protagonist in the encouraging of American composers. Mr. Smith's book is by far the more interesting; he presents what he takes to be facts about Dr. Koussevitzky and what he takes to be rumors, plainly labeled, and they are generally entertaining and instructive facts and rumors; whereas Dr. Leichentritt ignores or evades what everybody would like to know about Dr. Koussevitzky and presents a set of program notes on American music. The notes are informative, however, and Dr. Leichentritt has done a service though not the one that the title of the book would mainly suggest.

There are some things, particularly about his early years, that Dr. Koussevitzky apparently does not wish to be known; he has kept them from Mr. Smith, who, as a music critic in Boston, knew him well; and if he has not kept them from Dr. Leichentritt, at least Dr. Leichentritt isn't telling.

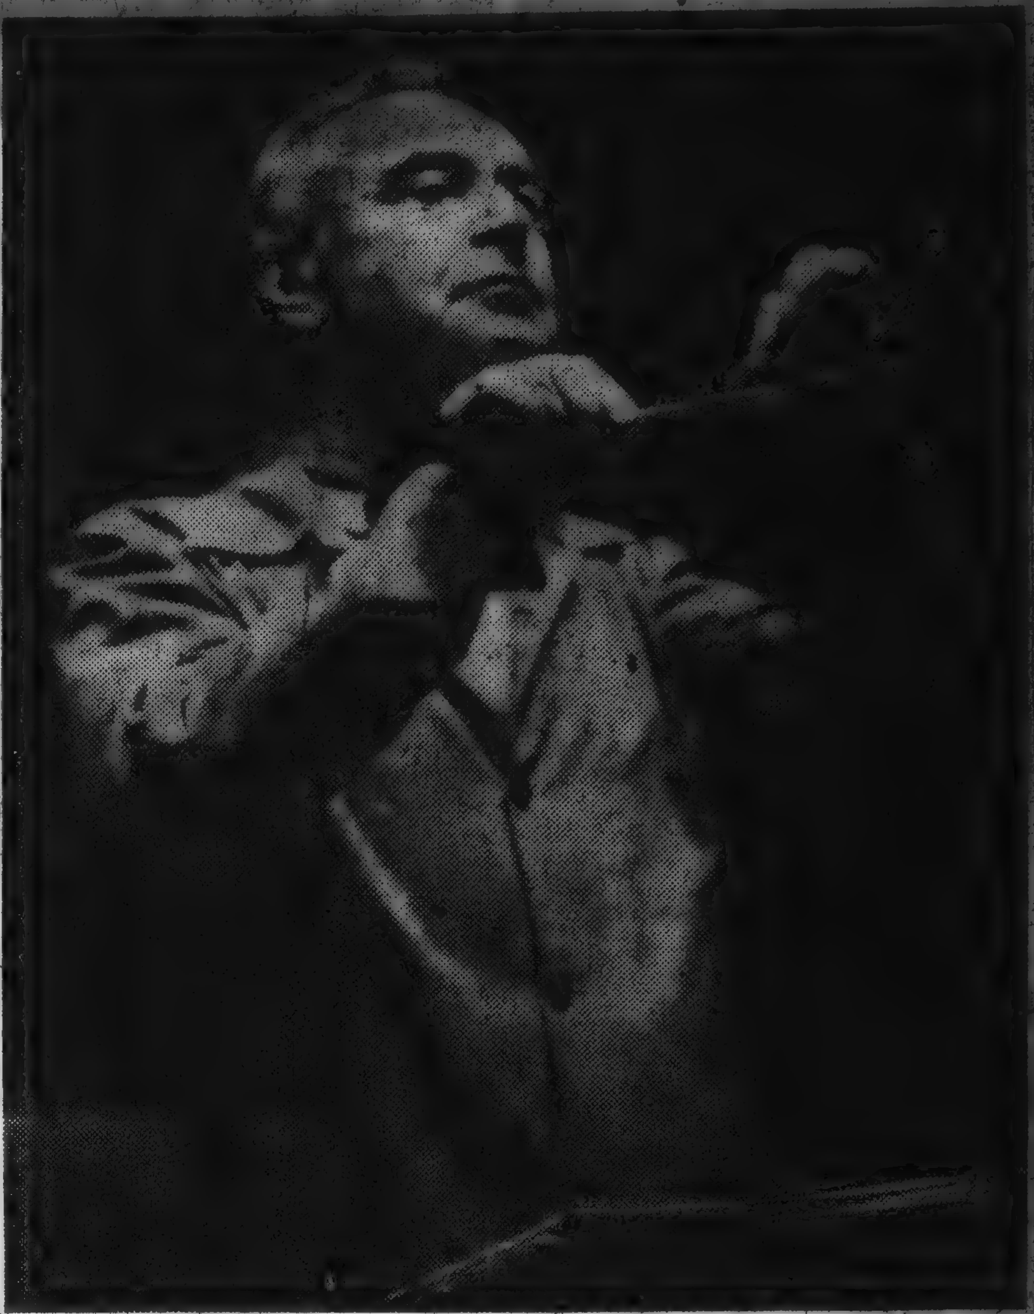
"* * * Serge Koussevitzky has implied that the family was large. * * * It is extremely unlikely that the boy (Serge) left home so young. * * * According to one story, Koussevitzky reached Moscow without a farthing in his pocket; according to another, he had precisely three and a half rubles. * * * ." And, "Koussevitzky married Nadezhda Galat, a ballet dancer, not later than 1902, and probably several years earlier." Dr. Koussevitzky, one supposes, could have settled these matters, and unquestionably Mr. Smith wanted him to.

(Since this review was written, Dr. Koussevitzky himself has come forward with a rather unfavorable criticism, to wit, notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against Mr. Smith and court action to restrain the publishers from distributing the book, which happens to be the house's very first publication. Dr. Koussevitzky also explains that he intends to publish his autobiography later and that he declined to give information to Mr. Smith.)

When it comes to the second marriage, Mr. Smith has the date, Sept. 8, 1905, and reports: "Koussevitzky was getting, in addition to Natalya's devotion, the effective control of a huge fortune, with which he might realize any musical ambition he might have or acquire."

Dr. Leichentritt's closest approaches to this not unimportant point are: "* * * he fortunately had available funds. But financial risks have never been an impediment to him when an artistic goal has been sufficiently tempting," and "* * * he found means in 1909 to establish a new orchestra to be conducted by him."

The two writers are far apart in their appraisals of Dr. Koussevitzky's competence at the time he became conductor of the Boston Symphony. "Approaching his 50th year, Koussevitzky had now attained full mastery of his art, full maturity of interpretation, full control of his individual style," asserts Dr. Leichentritt. Mr. Smith says, "The most dramatic achievement in Koussevitzky's career lay in his eventual victory over his fears and obsessions, in his application of his talents and powerful will to learning after 50 what a student of conducting often learns before 20."



Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

Mr. Smith's account of the Koussevitzky temper, humor, ideals, pettiness, generosity, insight, vision, determination, conceit and leadership shows us a human being, and one of large mental and spiritual dimensions. Many other figures in music gather around the hero of these pages. The orchestra itself receives substantial attention.

Dr. Leichentritt admits only Toscanini, Walter, and Furtwangler to the first rank with Koussevitzky, and seems not to consider Stokowski, Monteux and Ormandy conductors at all, which is surely his privilege. With his general position—that whatever Koussevitzky does is right—one may reasonably disagree; but nobody is likely to deny this: "Without his (Koussevitzky's) ever ready help much of it (the new American music) would not have been written at all, and many other scores would have remained unknown and hardly ever performed."

TIMES
FEB 16 1947

RECORDS: LINCOLN

Copland 'Portrait' Played By Boston Symphony

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

AARON COPLAND'S Lincoln Portrait comes as close as any orchestral work, and there have been quite a few, to evoking the quality of Lincoln the man and his legend. Mr. Copland has come closer to success because he has not aimed too high and because he has written simply and unpretentiously. His use of a couple of folk tunes is felicitous, and the employment of a speaker to read Lincoln's words helps on a non-musical plane. The opening section of the work, which seeks by orchestral means alone to suggest the spirit of the man in its fatality, is the most affecting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, has given the music a stunning performance. Melvyn Douglas as the speaker is perhaps too passionate, and his voice sounds as if it is being projected through a loudspeaker, which makes for a disturbing effect. On the fourth side of this Victor album of two twelve-inch records Mr. Douglas reads the Gettysburg Address.

Another album touching partly on Lincoln is American Legends, Elie Siegmeister's songs in folk style and sung by the American Ballad Singers. (Disc, three ten-inch records). Mr. Siegmeister deals with The Lincoln Penny, Nancy Hanks, Johnny Appleseed, Paul Bunyan, John Reed and Lazy Afternoon, and often his efforts are too self-conscious to be convincing.

For my taste, the best Lincoln song written in recent years remains the one with words by Alfred Hayes and music by Earl Robinson. It can be had on a number of different recordings.

Koussevitzky Wins Court Order Halting Sale of Biography

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, who has sued a publishing firm for $400,000 damages on the grounds that a new biography of him was libelous, today won a court order restraining distribution of the book.

State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag, who granted the order, said the suit would establish a precedent on rights to publish biographies without the subject's consent.

See BOOK Page 3

Book

Continued from the First Page

Koussevitzky has charged that the book, written by Boston music critic Moses Smith, was unauthorized and therefore in violation of his civil rights. He also chadged he was libeled by statements in the biography.

His suit was brought against Allen, Towne & Heath, publishing firm, which had scheduled the book for sale Saturday.

The publishing firm said copies of the books already in the hands of booksellers will go on sale that day, but the restraining order will halt further distribution.

A spokesman for the firm said it was with "surprise" that the publishers learned of Koussevitzky's suit because they believed the biography was unbiased and highly laudatory of the conductor.

The publishers said the charge of libel was less important than the question of whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticisms without the consent of the subject.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.
Winter 1947

The Tale of Tanglewood, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe.

Mr. Howe has written a pleasant history of Tanglewood as it was in the time of Hawthorne and Melville, and as it is now since it has become the seat of the Berkshire Festivals and the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tanglewood and the surrounding Berkshire country side have a musical history which considerably antedates the year in which the estate was generously presented to the trustees of the Boston Symphony. Stockbridge, Pittsfield, South Mountain are names which have potent musical associations for many people. Mr. Howe very justly divides his account between this early history and the history of the Festivals since 1937. Anyone who has attended the Festivals or heard the broadcasts will enjoy Mr. Howe's Tanglewood Tale. Anyone who has not been able to hear one of the most important festivals in the country will wish that he had after he reads this account. Koussevitzky contributes an introduction to the book, there are many illustrations, and a complete list of the Festival programs from 1934 to 1946 is included. The format of the book is as pleasant as its contents.

Insurance Company Gives Scholarships For Tanglewood

The John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company sponsoring the weekly broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday nights has announced a gift of 10 scholarships for the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

This gift, says the announcement, is to "further Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's plan to promote the cultural heritage of America." In accepting the gift Dr. Koussevitzky noted that until quite recently there had been relatively few Americans playing in the first-desk positions of leading symphony orchestras. Now in the Boston Symphony itself Dr. Koussevitzky pointed out that the first oboist and first double-bass player are both American-born musicians. "And," he added, "they received their final training at Tanglewood." The recently appointed conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, he said, is another American (Thor Johnson) who studied at the Berkshire Music Center.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
FEB 16 1947

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

Eastern Critics Write About Rodzinski and the Philharmonic

PERHAPS Chicago, which is the one winner in the fracas, is not actively concerned with Artur Rodzinski's dispute with Arthur Judson which led to Mr. Rodzinski's resignation as musical director and conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra of which Mr. Judson is manager. To us, it meant primarily that with a suddenness almost too good to be true, Mr. Rodzinski accepted a similar post with the Chicago Symphony orchestra, to take full charge of its destinies next fall. But it is of interest to all music that such a man has been hampered, apparently beyond endurance, by managerial interference. I will not dignify by discussion some of the ridiculous rumors deviously routed to my desk in vain attempt to discredit a courageous conductor. But I will quote from two of New York's music critics, Olin Downes of the Times, and Virgil Thomson of the Herald-Tribune, who of necessity rushed into the Sunday prints without knowing that Mr. Rodzinski had agreed to come to Chicago.

Mr. Downes was primarily concerned with the Philharmonic's ups and downs over its century of something less than sustained progress, but he found time to deplore "officious meddling by those without knowledge of the conductor's art," and to say of our new conductor, ."Dr. Rodzinski, when he became Barbirolli's successor, had to pick up after him, partially reorganize the orchestra, refurbish it in personnel and quality—a direction in which he had made notable progress at the time of the deplorable and complete collapse of his relations, both personal and professional, with the society."

An Orchestra Can Use Only One Star

Mr. Thomson comes pungently to the point. He begins:

"Artur Rodzinski has gone and done it. For years the knowledge has been a secret scandal in music circles. Now he has said it out loud That the trouble with the Philharmonic is nothing more than an unbalance of power. Management has usurped, according to him, certain functions of the musical direction without which no musical director can produce a first class and durable artistic result. He has implied that no conductor, under present conditions, can keep the orchestra a musical instrument comparable to those of Boston and Philadelphia. He points to Arthur Judson, a powerful business executive who manages the orchestra as a sideline, as the person chiefly interested in weakening the musical director's authority. He is right; he is perfectly right; he could not be more right. An orchestra can use one star performer and one only. And such a star's place is the podium, not the executive offices."

Artur Rodzinski

Mr. Thomson goes on to say that the long term contract "without strings attached" which the Philharmonic board voted to Mr. Rodzinski last December actually contained, when received, not strings but chains. It seemed to jeopardize his authority to decide which should be his guest conductors, to confer on their choice of programs, or even in full freedom to decide on his own. Mr. Thomson states, and most of us will agree, that the only way to have a first class orchestra is to let a first class conductor run it.

Rodzinski Built a Great Orchestra

As to his opinion of Mr. Rodzinski, Mr. Thomson is equally explicit. He says, "Artur Rodzinski has done more for the orchestra in that respect [namely, to put the orchestra permanently on an artistic equality with the other American orchestras of comparable financial resources] than any other conductor in our century has done. Mahler and Toscanini were greater interpreters, were not such great builders. If Stokowski and Münch, also great interpreters, have been able this winter, as guests, to play upon the orchestra in full freedom and to produce from it sonorous and expressive beauties of the highest quality, that achievement has been made possible by Rodzinski's personnel replacements and his careful training. Such an achievement on the part of guest conductors has not heretofore been possible. Today the Philharmonic for the first time in this writer's memory, is the equal of the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras and possibly their superior."

In closing, Mr. Thomson calls the Philharmonic "the tip-top executant musical organization of the world," hopes that it will remain so, and states that perhaps the most valuable of all Mr. Rodzinski's benefits bestowed upon that orchestra may be his exposure of its managerial scandal. He hopes "Rodzinski's career will not be gravely interrupted by his courageous gesture." Fortunately for Chicago, it will not be.

A Book on Koussevitzky

When a biografer says of his sources of information, "Most of them must remain anonymous, for an obvious reason; a few are identified in the text," I begin to wonder if by calling the result objective the publishers really mean objectionable. At any rate, so I read and so I wondered in "Koussevitzky," by Moses Smith [Allen, Towne, and Heath, $4]. A former Boston music critic, Mr. Smith is industriously engaged in trying to chop Mr. Koussevitzky down to size, but with the Boston orchestra as his superlative achievement, and the admiring affection of young musicians he has helped and the gratitude of music lovers the world over as his unsought testimonial, the magnificent Russian just doesn't chop. At least not to the hacking of so clumsy a cutting tool as this typically petulant windup to a long and belabored chapter: "In the fall of 1891, Serge Koussevitzky, plump, cherub faced, 17 years old, not 14, left his parental home for the big city." P. S. Mr. Koussevitzky, suing author and publisher for $500,000, won a court order restraining the book's publication and distribution.

"Joan of Lorraine"

Maxwell Anderson's "Joan of Lorraine" [Dodd, Mead, $2.50] boils down to the credos of the stage manager and the girl who plays Joan. The man says, "I believe in democracy, and I believe the theater is the temple of democracy. A democratic society needs a church without a creed—where anybody is allowed to talk as long as he can hold an audience—and that's what the theater is." The girl says, "But to surrender what you are, and live without belief—that's more terrible than dying—more terrible than dying young."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
FEB 17 1947

Leonard Bernstein was the baton wielder with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in midweek. It is not often that anyone but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Bostonians in those sacrosanct purlieus, but Mr. Bernstein is one of the bright young men in whose future Doctor Koussevitzky has greatest faith, and it was like the veteran conductor to give him his chance.

Mr. Bernstein took ample advantage of the opportunity. Not all critics were equally enthusiastic about his reading of the respective scores, but everyone was agreed that he was a young conductor of exceptional talent and of amazing technical excellence. Moreover the works he attacked were a long way from being on the kindergarten list, involving, among others, the Schubert Seventh Symphony and Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps, which has proven the bete noir of many a more mature musician.

Music-minded tourists will have an extra incentive to travel below the Mexican border this coming Summer if ambitious government plans mature in the interim. The new National Mexican Institute of Fine Arts and Literature is planning to summon singers from all sections of the nation to the south of us to participate in a great summer fiesta under the direction of Carlos Chavez. If successful this will become an annual event.

It is always good news to supporters of American talent when an American-born singer makes a hit. Plaudits in generous measure went to young Nadine Conner in midweek at the Metropolitan, where the youthful and attractive soprano appeared for the first time in Puccini's La Boheme. It must have been an exciting event for the young soprano, for she sang opposite Ferruccio Tagliavini, the new Italian tenor, who is literally the "talk of New York." Morever, the critical gentry were about as cordial to La Conner's Mimi as to Mr. Tagliavini's Rudolfo.

William Primrose, violist, who was one of the stellar performers in the concert last Tuesday evening at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the Veterans' Rehabilitation Division of the Musicians Emergency Fund (translated into everyday English this means free music lessons for disabled veterans) will head the Chamber Music Department at the Berkshire Music Center this coming Summer, it was announced this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy W. Gillespie, jr., of Whittier Street, entertained Sunday afternoon in observance of the first birthday of their daughter, Lynn Dianne. Those attending were Mr. and Mrs. George Wescott and son Bruce, Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Wescott, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Roy W. Gillespie and children, Lois and Douglas, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Thaxter and Children Carol and David, Mrs. Louise Wescott and Miss Katherine Foley.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 17 1947

Bernstein Leads Beethoven No. 7

Some further light on the present status of Leonard Bernstein as a conductor was shed by the concert he directed in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was nothing but the expected as he directed a shapely, well-paced performance of the Hindemith violin concerto (in which Ruth Posselt was the resourceful soloist). This was mostly mathematics and technic, since the work contains little emotional substance.

The other works—the "Linz" symphony of Mozart (No. 36) and the seventh of Beethoven—posed other problems. There was good will and sober intentions in the Mozart, but also a lack of the subtlety and relaxation to realize the character of the work. On the other hand, the bigger mechanism of the Beethoven provided Bernstein with more tangible physical assets and he utilized them to great advantage. Rhythms were sharply differentiated and orchestral values properly appraised, in a performance of joyous power and freshness. At some moments (especially in the finale) Bernstein seemed to be dragging a slightly unwilling orchestra after him, but the cumulative effect was considerable. Notably enough, he took the trio of the scherzo at the equitable pace, rather than at the faster one espoused by Toscanini and some of his adulators. I. K.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.
PROGRESS
FEB 17 1947

A Woman's New York

By Alice Hughes

If you believe in the rule of three, there's another big-time orchestra conductor in hot water this minute. Two of them are now sizzling on the front pages. I refer, of course, to Rodzinski, until recently of the New York Philharmonic, whose troubles with his manager Judson have been aired all over the country. More music and less management is Rodzi's tune and he will have an opportunity to say it with music in Chicago this fall when he heads that city's Symphony Orchestra. The law is still embattled over how much Rodzi should collect for his unexpired New York contract, but as he employs the same lawyer who at one time retrieved $25 for me from a laundry which lost all my handkerchiefs, I'm betting on Rodzi and legal-eagle Morris Ernst.

Boston Brahmin Serge Koussevitsky is swapping insults with a book publishing firm in that Massachusetts Cultural Center. Koussy is mad over a biography just published which he says is libelous and violates his privacy. Besides he was planning to do his autobiography and he doesn't want anyone else scooping him. The author of the disputed book, "Koussevitsky" is Moses Smith, a Boston music critic. Koussy won the first round by procuring a court order restraining further publication and distribution, though 3,000 books have already been sent around.

Koussevitsky believes that his civil rights to privacy prevent any author from doing a book about him unless he gives his consent. He also says this biography falsely portrays his life and musical career. The latter charge, of libel, is a legitimate one if he can prove it. But freedom of the written word is in great danger in this country if critics forfeit the right to speak honestly and openly about any of the arts, should they happen to hurt someone's personal vanity. No one wields freedom of the baton with more talent and agility than Boston's deified conductor. How about permitting the pen and typewriter the same privilege, Koussy Old Boy?

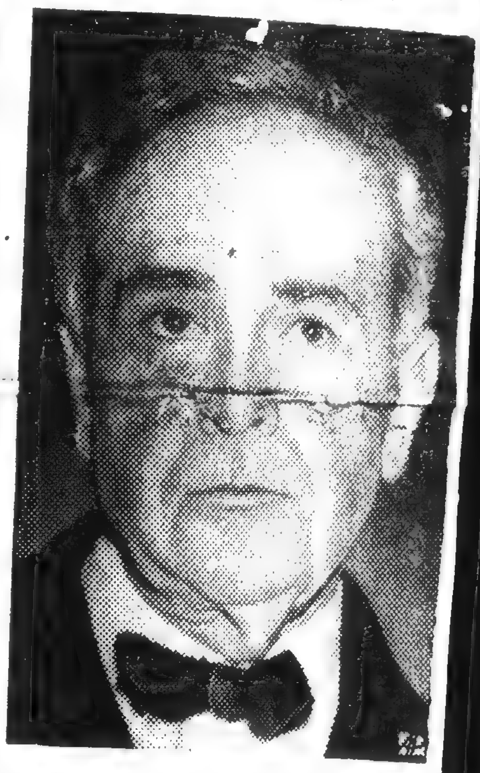
RENTED PICTURES — Everyone who comes to the Howard Myers' house (he is the editor of Architectural Forum) makes the same first remark. "Where did you get that painting?" referring to a large modern by Laurence Lebduska showing a forest with bright colored animals painted on like polka dots, as if a child had done it. The Myers can afford to own paintings but they prefer to rent masterpieces like this one, from the New York Circulating Library of Paintings. For $3 to $74 a month (the Lebduska costs $12) you can rent a large or small canvas from a long list of 18th and 19th century and contemporary paintings by European and American artists; your choice of Utrillo, Henri, Degas, Brackman — etc. The Myers live in a huge, old-fashioned apartment modernized by architect Ed Stone with ceiling-high natural wood flooring panels that look like a mural, and make the room inviting.

ORLANDO, FLA.
REPORTER-STAR
FEB 17 1947

Koussevitsky Sues Book Publisher

Ended Florida Rest To Start Action

Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who abruptly terminated his Winter Park vacation early this month upon learning of a publisher's intent to print an unauthorized biography titled "Koussevitsky," brought suit in New York Feb. 11 against Allen Towne and Heath, Inc., charging invasion of his civil rights.



SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY
. . . objects to new biography

This action was the first of its kind brought under the state civil rights law, and has been said by authoritative sources to have "wide implications for the publishing business."

☼ ☼ ☼

AT A PRELIMINARY HEARing last Tuesday, Justice Bernard L. Shientag granted the conductor an interim stay restraining the firm from publishing or distributing the book, pending his decision for a temporary injunction.

Written by Moses Smith, former music critic for Boston newspapers, the book was to have gone on sale Saturday at $4 per copy.

In his complaint, the 72-year-old conductor charged the biography was, in effect, an attempt to exploit his personality commercially and might cut into the market for his proposed autobiography; that it contained false and misleading statements and that its publication would do him irreparable harm.

☼ ☼ ☼

BORN IN RUSSIA, KOUSSEVITSKY has conducted the Boston Symphony since 1924 when he arrived in this country.

The firm of Allen, Towne and Heath was formed last August to specialize in books on musical subjects and the projected "Koussevitsky" is its first publication.

While in Winter Park, Koussevitsky was a guest at the Alabama Hotel and had planned to remain there until later this month. He left for New York after obtaining an advance copy of the book through a friend.

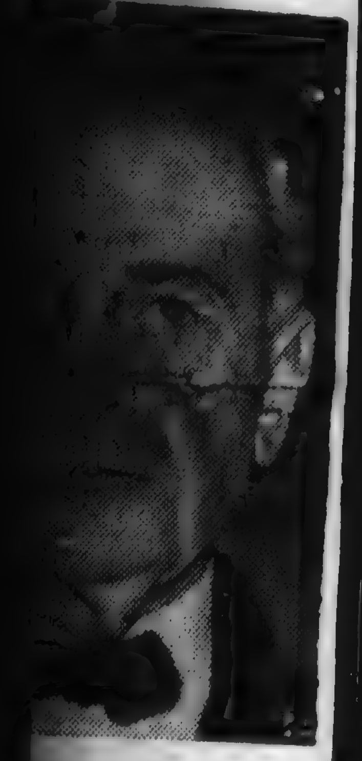
...RO, FLA.
...TER-STAR

...7 1947

...sevitzky ...Book ...sher

...Florida Rest ...t Action

... Koussevitzky, con-
...e Boston Symphony
...who ~~[illegible]~~
...inter Park vacation
...nth upon learning of
... intent to print an
... biography titled
...y," brought suit in
...eb. 11 against Allen
...Heath, Inc., charging
...his civil rights.



...KOUSSEVITZKY
... to new biography

... was the first of its
... under the state civil
...nd has been said by
... sources to have
...tions for the publish-

⁂

...ELIMINARY HEAR-
...day, Justice Bernard
...ranted the conductor
...tay restraining the
...blishing or distribu-
... pending his decision
...ary injunction.
...Moses Smith, former
... for Boston news-
...ook was to have gone
...day at $4 per copy.
...plaint, the 72-year-
... charged the biog-
... effect, an attempt
...is personality com-
... might cut into the
...his proposed auto-
...at it contained false
...ng statements and
...cation would do him
...arm.

⁂

...RUSSIA, KOUSSE...
...nducted the Boston
...ce 1924 when he ar...
...country.
... of Allen, Towne and
...rmed last August t...
...on musical sub...
...projected "Kouss...
... publication.
... Park, Kousse...
...at the Alabama...
...planned to remain
...this month. He
...after obtaining
...y of the book

READING, PA.
EAGLE

FEB 18

Boston Brahmin Serge Koussevitzky ... swapping insults with ~~a book~~ publishing fir... ...n that Massachusetts Cultural Center. Kous... ...s mad over a biography just published whic... he says is libelous and violates his privacy. Besides he was plan... ning to do his autobiography and he doesn't want anyone else scoop... ing him. The author of the disputed book, "Koussevitzky" ... Moses Smith, a Boston music critic. Koussy won the first round by procuring a court order restraining further publication and dis... ...tion, though 3,000 books have already been sent around.

Koussevitzky believes that his civil rights to privacy prevent ... from doing a book about him unless he gives his con... He also says this biography falsely portrays his life and ... career. The latter charge, of libel, is a legitimate one if ... prove it. But freedom of the written word is in great d... in this country if critics forfeit the right to speak honestly a... about any of the arts, should they happen to hurt some- one's personal vanity. No one wields freedom of the baton with ... talent and agility than Boston's deified conductor. How ... permitting the pen and typewriter the same privilege, K... y Old Boy?

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

FEB 19 1947

Marshall Repels Soviet Protest, Backs Acheson

Says Aid Was 'Frank' and Within Rights; Bearing Is Seen on Moscow Talks

By Frank Kelley

WASHINGTON, Feb. 18.—Secretary of State George C. Marshall sharply rejected today Russia's protest that Under Secretary Dean Acheson was "rudely slanderous and hostile" in calling Soviet foreign policy "aggressive and expanding."

In a note handed to Foreign Minister Viacheslav M. Molotov by Walter Bedell Smith, American Ambassador at Moscow, Mr. Marshall said firmly that under the constitutional system of this nation an officer of the executive branch of the government "is under a duty to answer frankly relevant questions" on non-secret matters when called before the legislative branch.

He said that Mr. Acheson, in replying to Senator Kenneth McKellar, Democrat, of Tennessee, at the Feb. 10 hearing on David E. Lilienthal's nomination for the Atomic Energy Commission, answered "frankly and in accordance with his conscience."

Rejecting Russia's contention

Marshall Meets With House Foreign Affairs Group

Associated Press wirephoto

...ge C. Marshall (right), Secretary of State, sitting with Repre... ...tative Charles A. Eaton, Republican, of New Jersey, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, yesterday

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

FEB 19 1947

Soviet Press Attacks U. S. Policy in Arcti...

By ALEXANDER KENDRICK
(Copyright, 1947, by the Chicago Sun and The Newspaper PM, Inc.)

MOSCOW, Feb. 19.—The U. S. reply to the Soviet protest note on the "Acheson incident" had not been received by the U. S. Embassy here at a late hour last night, but it was assumed it had been delivered through Soviet channels from Washington.

Meanwhile, whether by coincidence or not, various phases of U. S. foreign policy came under the most severe criticism in the Soviet press, with various commentators demonstrating that policy's alleged potential aggressiveness.

Policy of 'Iron Fist in Velvet Glove' Charged

Izvestia, government newspaper, devoted nearly four columns of print out of yesterday's 36 to two articles: one on the recently concluded U. S.-Canadian agreement for continued joint defense and the other on growing U. S. influence in the Pacific, with especial reference to Australia.

The commentary on U. S.-Canadian collaboration, headed The Iron Fist in the Velvet Glove, is extremely outspoken.

"Active efforts of military circles in the U. S. A. for conversion of Canada into a northernly extended American base for imperialist expansion have reached their final form," the commentator declares.

Meanwhile, the U. S. A. has renewed a request from the Soviet Union for increased cultural relations and has offered a series of nine specific proposals, including the sending of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Soviet Union and the bringing of the Russian Ballet Company to the U. S. A.

This was revealed by Ambassador Bedell Smith who said he made the request to Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov on the basis of recent interviews in which Stalin expressed interest in the cultural exchange.

The envoy's communication to Molotov, ... the chief ... Soviet view... rier to ... activity—nam... scientists, an... U. S. A. ... pelled to r...

... did not mention ... which from the ... constitutes a bar- ... mutual cultural ... that Soviet artists, ... invited to the ... will be com- ... "alien agents."

Aisle Say

by Groverman Blake

Cincinnati, Ohio
1/19/47

Critics and Censors—

ALLEN, Towne and Smith, publishers of Moses Smith's biography of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now express surprise over the half million dollar libel suit the conductor has levied against the Boston critic and author. The publishers claim the author pays high tribute to the conductor, both as a musician and as an individual and that the biography as a whole presents a laudatory and unbiased account of the life to date of the noted maestro.

What Koussevitzky apparently is objecting to are Moses Smith's occasional criticisms of some of the conductor's interpretations, to the revelations of the relationship that existed between conductor and orchestramen, and to various aspects of Koussevitzky's early career.

Mr. Smith has been one of the country's leading critics for a good many years, working for the Boston Transcript and American, he has spent four years on this biography, and it seems only fair to feel, as the publishers do, "that to restrain the right to publish a work of critical value by an acknowledged authority is to infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of society."

Marshall

(Continued from page one)

that Mr. Acheson's behavior was "inadmissible," Secretary Marshall told Foreign Minister Molotov it was "rather in line of duty."

"You characterize the content of his statement as a rude slander and hostile to the Soviet Union," Mr. Marshall's note concluded. "Under our standards a restrained comment on a matter of public policy is not a slander. Therefore, I know that on second thought you will not attribute hostility to frankness."

Secretary Marshall included the official transcript of Senator McKellar's question and Mr. Acheson's answer, and said Mr. Acheson had not "volunteered" his assertion but gave it in the course of questions "explicitly ruled permissible" by Senator Bourke B. Hickenlooper, Republican, of Iowa, chairman of the Senate Atomic Energy Committee.

In a separate action Secretary Marshall lifted a corner of the veil on the policy he will pursue on Germany's future, disclosing to reporters that the United States offer of a forty-year pact with Russia, Great Britain and France to police the demilitarization of Germany is "still alive." The pact, offered at Paris last year by former Secretary of States James F. Byrnes, is regarded by the State Department as the answer to critics who say the United States will "pull out of Europe" as it did after World War I.

The Secretary of State read his note to Mr. Molotov in advance at a closed session of the House Foreign Affairs Committee today and members afterward gave it overwhelming approval.

The text of the note follows:

"I have your letter of Feb. 14 sent to me through Ambassador Smith in which you protest against what you describe as the inadmissible behavior of the Under Secretary of State in making a statement before a committee of the Senate of the United States which you consider as a rude slander and hostile to the Soviet Union.

"The expression complained of was not volunteered by the Under Secretary but was in response to questioning by a member of the Senate. The answer was given in the course of questions explicitly ruled permissible by the chairman of the committee. The particular question and answer were as follows:

" 'Senator McKellar: Now, assuming that Russia is reaching out not only for those countries that she already has but is reaching out for additions to her territory, do you not believe that if she gets this bomb discovery she would take not only the remainder of Europe but perhaps the remainder of the world?

" 'Mr. Acheson: Senator, I don't think that that is a question which is capable of being answered in the way in which you ask it. I am quite aware of that fact that Russian foreign policy is an aggressive and expanding one. I think that one of the great ... which ...

Nations is to attempt to find means for solving the problems of that sort. If those means and agreements can be found then there is hope that there will not be major clashes. If they can't be found then I think the situation is very serious.'

"You are thoroughly familiar with the constitutional system of this nation, including the separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches of this government. In accordance with our system an officer of the executive branch, called before a committee of the legislative branch, is under a duty to answer frankly relevant questions not involving a matter of secrecy incompatible with the public interest. Such an exception did not exist here.

"The conduct of the Under Secretary, therefore, in answering the question frankly and in accordance with his conscience cannot be described as inadmissible, but was rather in line of duty.

"You characterize the content of his statement as a rude slander and hostile to the Soviet Union. Under our standards a restrained comment on a matter of public policy is not a slander. Therefore, I know that on second thought you will not attribute hostility to frankness."

Smith Presses Requests

MOSCOW, Feb. 18 (AP).—American Ambassador Walter Bedell Smith said today he had renewed several American requests aimed at broadening the base of Soviet-American cultural relations.

Among the pending requests which Smith renewed with Foreign Minister V. M. Molotov were:

The offer of conductor Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to make a two-week tour in Russia at the expense of the orchestra, and to donate the receipts of ticket sales to any benefit the Russians desired.

The offer of Dr. Harold W. Dodds, president of Princeton University, to have outstanding Russian scientists participate in Princeton's current bicentennial celebration in the United States.

The offer of Mrs. Lafell Dickinson, president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, to have a Russian girl accept a scholarship offered by the organization.

The request of Dr. Thomas Parran, United States Surgeon General, for three doctors to come to Russia to do research in cancer with Russian scientists.

The offer of Cornell University to accept four graduate students from Russia to do graduate work.

[108]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 19 1947

AMERICAN OFFERS TO USSR RENEWED

Moves Would Stimulate Cultural Exchanges Between Nations

Moscow, Feb. 18.—(AP)—U. S. Ambassador Walter B. Smith disclosed today, coincident with the inauguration of U. S. State Department broadcasts to Russia, that he has renewed several American requests aimed at broadening American-Soviet Union cultural exchanges. Smith has received no answer as yet to his definite proposals for cultural exchanges.

These included:

The offer of Sergei Koussevitzky and the ~~Boston Symphony Orche~~stra to make a 2-week tour in Russia at the expense of the orchestra and to donate the proceeds to any benefit the Russians desire;

The proposal of Dr. Harold W. Dodds, president of Princeton, to have outstanding Russian scientists participate in a bi-centennial celebration in the United States;

The request of Dr. Thomas Parran, U. S. Surgeon General, for three doctors to be admitted to Russia to do cancer research; and the offer of Dr. E. D. Young, representative of the Russian War Relief Organization, to give a penicillin factory to Russia and to participate in an exchange of Russian and American scientists.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 19 1947

Boston Symphony Tour In Russia Is Rumored

BOSTON, Feb. 18 (UP)—Boston Symphony officials today would neither confirm nor deny reports from Moscow Conductor ~~Serge Koussevitzky and~~ the orchestra had offered to make a two-week tour of Russia at the orchestra's expense.

George Judd, orchestra manager, said "The idea of a European tour has been broached a number of times but a practical way of finding the free time and necessary funds has not yet been worked out."

Commenting on another report, that Conductor Eugene Mrovinsky of the Leningrad orchestra had been asked to serve as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, Judd said:

"Mr. Mrovinsky had been invited to be a guest conductor for this season and the invitation has been extended for next season."

Koussevitzky was reported to be vacationing in New York and could not be reached for comment.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS

FEB 19 1947

Rodzi and Koussy Both in Hot Water

By ALICE HUGHES

If you believe in the rule of three, there's another big-time orchestra conductor in hot water this minute. Two of them are now sizzling on the front pages. I refer, of course, to Rodzinski, until recently of the New York Philharmonic, whose troubles with his manager Judson have been aired all over the country. More music and less management is Rodzi's tune and he will have an oportunity to say it with music in Chicago this fall when he heads that city's Symphony Orchestra. The law is still embattled over how much Rodzi should collect for his unexpired New York contract, but as he employs the same lawyer who at one time retrieved $25 for me from a laundry which lost all my handkerchiefs, I'm betting on Rodzi and legal-eagle Morris Ernst.

Boston Brahmin Serge Koussevitzky is swapping insults with a book publishing firm in that Massachusetts Cultural Center. Koussy is mad over a biography just published which he says is libelous and violates his privacy. Besides he was planning to do his autobiography and he doesn't want anyone else scooping him. The author of the disputed book, "Koussevitzky" is Moses Smith, a Boston music critic. Koussy won the first round by procuring a court order restraining further publication and distribution, thought 3,000 books have already been sent around.

Koussevitzky believes that his civil right to privacy prevent any author from doing a book about him unless he gives his consent. He also says this biography falsely portrays his life and musical career. The latter charge, of libel, is a legitimate one if he can prove it. But freedom of the written word is in great danger in this country if critics forefeit the right to speak honestly and openly about any of the arts, should they happen to hurt someone's personal vanity. No one weilds freedom of the baton with more talent and agility than Boston's defied conductor. How about permitting the pen and typewriter the same privilege, Koussy Old Boy?

* * *

Everyone who comes to the Howard Myers' house (he's editor of Architectural Forum) makes the same first remark. "Where'd you get that painting?" referring to a large modern by Laurence Lebduska showing a forest with bright-colored animals painted on like polka dots, as if a child had done it. The Myers can afford to own paintings but they prefer to rent masterpieces like this one, from the New York Circulating Library of Paintings. For $3 to $75 a month (the Lebduska costs $12) you can rent a large o. small canvas from a long list of 18th and 19th century and contemporary paintings by European and American artists; your choice of Utrillo, Henri, Degas, Brackman—etc. The Myers live in a huge, old-fashioned apartment modernized by Architect Ed Stone with ceiling-high natural wood flooring panels that look like a mural, and make the room inviting.

* * *

LIBERTY FREE OF LIPSTICK

Men who can't get lipstick stains off their collars will understand the plight of the Statue of Liberty which has just been repainted with a paint guaranteed lipstick-proof. It's up to some laundry to discover how to apply that same protection to men's collars and shirts. So many sightseers yearn to autograph their names on Liberty's insides that their lip rouge signatures are an inch thick in some places. Henceforth—they've got to find something more lasting than lipstick.

* * *

SUBWAY STIRS EXCITEMENT

The noise of our fracas over whether we have a 5c or a 10c fare must have reached your city by now. You can depend on it, the fare will stay at 5c, for the wrangling is as much political as financial. It seems a far cry, but Gov. Dewey believes the Republican future depends upon raising our New York City subway fare to a dime. The Mayor of our City feels just as strongly that the Democrats stand or fall upon a 5c fare. The people are nickel-minded, and have even sent a man dressed up as Father Knickerbocker down to the City Hall to tell the City Fathers how we feel. All we need is a Town Crier to announce the glad tidings: 5c subways are here to stay.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

FEB 20 1947

Berkshire Fest Program Announced

First announcement of the repertory for next summer's Berkshire Festival has been released by Serge Koussevitzky, who is now on his mid-winter vacation in Florida.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give twelve concerts at its summer home at Tanglewood next summer. These will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart respectively by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13, 20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed, the middle week to be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, August 2, 3), the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (Aug. 5).

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the greater part of the Festival, and has invited two guest conductors, Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw, both of whom are to be on the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, which will be currently in session at Tanglewood.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE

FEB 21 1947

EDITORIAL

THE PHILHARMONIC

A battle between the conductor and board of directors of a symphony orchestra is, under ordinary circumstances, of purely local concern. But the controversy which has lately resulted in a change of leaders for the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is of broader interest. By virtue of the fact that its Sunday afternoon concerts have been broadcast over a national network for many years it has an audience which now extends over the greater part of the United States.

This large audience is not particularly well-informed on the details of the scrap which led to the resignation in mid-season of Artur Rodzinski as the orchestra's conductor and it would probably find it difficult to judge them if it did. But it has every reason to be deeply concerned over the decision of the Philharmonic's management to go back to the system of splitting the chore of leading the orchestra among five different conductors.

Great symphony orchestras are not made or maintained this way. The Boston Symphony is one of the world's greatest because it has been trained and disciplined by a single great conductor over a long period of years. The Philadelphia Orchestra is another, brought to its musical apogee by Leopold Stokowski and maintained at the same high level by Eugene Ormandy, his successor.

Under a mediocre conductor and later under a series of temporary ones, the New York Philharmonic declined. Rodzinski, in his three years as conductor, brought it back to the top rank of symphony orchestras. It would be unfortunate to permit it to go into another period of decline for lack of the type of leadership it deserves.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE SUN

FEB 20 1947

TURNTABLE TALK

BY BRUNO DAVID USSHER

Another conductor, famous also on phonograph recordings, has crashed the front page. Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, has obtained from the Massachusetts Supreme Court an interim stay preventing, at least temporarily, New York Publishers Allen, Towne & Heath from distributing a biography written about him without his consent or cooperation by Moses Smith. Smith has been for 20 years music critic of the lamented Boston Transcript and the Boston American. For a period he also was recording director in charge of Columbia Musical Masterworks. Koussevitzky's action has caused a sensation and is arousing wide attention because it threatens individual freedom of speech and criticism. As for the other maestro in the news, Artur Rodzinski, taking over the Chicago baton after verbally pummeling the board and Manager Arthur Judson, of the New York Philharmonic. Rodzinski will now be heard on Victor issues. The New York Philharmonic "belongs" to Columbia Recordings, Judson also being President of the Columbia Concerts Corp., a booking firm, which, like Columbia Recording Co., has more than name ties with the Columbia Broadcasting System. The Chicago Symphony has numerous titles in the Victor catalog. Lately it has been rather silent on disks since Desire Defauw succeeded the late Frederick Stock, three years ago. That means Rodzinski will "go" Victor.

BRUNO USSHER

HOUGHTON, MICH.
MINING GAZETTE

FEB 22 1947

Book Review

BY W. G. ROGERS

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith (Allen, Towne & Health).

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, since 1924 the Boston Symphony's conductor, since 1936 asociated with the Berkshire Music Festival and founder in 1940 of the Berkshire Music Center, was born in 1874 in Vishny-Volotchok, son of a Jewish violin or double-bass player.

At 17 he left home to study the double-bass in Moscow. By 1902 he was married to a dancer; he played in the Bol'shoi Theatre orchestra, made a reputation as soloist on his unlikely instrument, renounced Jewry.

In 1905 he was divorced and remarried to a young woman of such wealth that, when they set up their home and he sought a new career in Berlin, he was regarded as the richest instrumentalist in Europe. There in 1908 he made his conducting début, featuring the new music with which his name has always been associated reverently by composers, critics and a large section of the public. Later he had his own orchestra in Russia, his own publishing house, the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, and finally the Boston offer.

This biographer, former critic who knows his subject personally, registers several complaints in some detail. The principal ones are that Koussevitzky, from his school days, was weak in theory, and that for years he couldn't read a score. He has acted the role of "grand seigneur," aped Beau Brummel, and been vain. Smith tells fascinating stories, many to Koussevitzky's discredit, in these tart, critical pages. But he acknowledges the genius, the tremendous energy, the sensitive ear, the familiarity with instruments, and the sensuous tone coaxed from the famous orchestra.

This is not an authorized biography, and for that reason perhaps all the more valuable. Blind worshippers of the maestro, like the woman who called him God, will squirm, and who knows, maybe Boston will ban the book. It is, however, a most worthwhile type of volume, the kind our musical culture needs badly. If it is unkind to do such a thorough job on Koussevitzky, it is also an outright tribute to him, for with one possible exception, what other conductor would have been worth all this trouble?

H

Koussevitzky Blocks Book On His Life

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (AP)—Se Koussevitzky, conductor of the B ton Symphony Orchestra, obtai a temporary court order today straining publication of a b which he said "falsely and wro fully portrays my life and mu career."

The book, titled "Koussevit and written by Moses Smith, scheduled for release next Sa day.

In his petition, the cond said Smith told him several ago that he planned to write a raphy of him. Koussevitzky he declined to give the write information, advising him th planned to publish his auto raphy later.

Koussevitzky's petition sai book contained [illegible] justified statements disparagi ability as a conductor, musici teacher.

Defendants named beside were Allen, Towne and Heat publishers, and the Arco P ing Company, Inc., distribu

Supreme Court Justice B L. Shientag, who granted terim injunction, will decid whether the order will b permanent.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

FEB 22 1947

Koussevitsky Biog Suit May Set Law Precedent

NEW YORK, Feb. 15.—A court order restraining publication and distribution of Koussevitsky, a bio by Moses Smith, Hub longhair cric, on complaint of Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony batoneer, was granted here Thursday (13) by Supreme Court Justice Bernhard L. Shientag. In granting the injunction, Justice Shientag indicated that the suit would establish a precedent on the rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent. Opposing attorneys were ordered to submit briefs Wednesday (19).

Notice of a $500,000 libel against Smith and publishers tome, Allen, Towne & Heath, book is firm's initial ventur filed Thursday with the cor

---

GENEVA, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 21 1947

FIGHTS HIS BIOGRAPHY

Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symph Orchestra, evidently believes that a man's private life longs to himself alone and that biographers, without perm sion, should not be permitted to invade such privacy.

Conductor Koussevitsky has brought action seeking restrain the publication of Moses Smith's unauthorized bi graphy of himself, which is said to have been printed alrea and has been circulated among reviewers. It is to be surmis that the biography is not complimentary to its subject.

Attorney for the publishing house which was to ha issued the book next Saturday says that Mr. Koussevitsky suit abridges the freedom of the press under the Constitu tion. He argued that if the book is suppressed "a preceden will be set by which all biographers of living persons, includ ing biographical magazine articles, will be subject to sup pression at the whim of the subject."

In this day of frank biographies, both in magazines an in books, the legalities involved in the case become of grea importance. The outcome of Mr. Koussevitsky's suit will b awaited with much interest.

York state civil rig

but as conductor of the lic Symphony Orchestr portrays my life and

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS
FEB 19 1947

Rodzi and Koussy Both in Hot Water

By ALICE HUGHES

If you believe in the rule of three, there's another big-time orchestra conductor in hot water this minute. Two of them are now sizzling on the front pages. I refer, of course, to Rodzinski, until recently of the New York Philharmonic, whose troubles with his manager Judson have been aired all over the country. More music and less management is Rodzi's tune and he will have an oportunity to say it with music in Chicago this fall when he heads that city's Symphony Orchestra. The law is still embattled over how much Rodzi should collect for his unexpired New York contract, but as he employs the same lawyer who at one time retrieved $25 for me from a laundry which lost all my handkerchiefs, I'm betting on Rodzi and legal-eagle Morris Ernst.

Boston Brahmin Serge Koussevitzky is swapping insults with a book publishing firm in that Massachusetts Cultural Center. Koussy is mad over a biography just published which he says is libelous and violates his privacy. Besides he was planning to do his autobiography and he doesn't want anyone else scooping him. The author of the disputed book, "Koussevitzky" is Moses Smith, a Boston music critic. Koussy won the first round by procuring a court order restraining further publication and distribution, thought 3,000 books have already been sent around.

Koussevitzky believes that his civil right to privacy prevent any author from doing a book about him unless he gives his consent. He also says this biography falsely portrays his life and musical career. The latter charge, of libel, is a legitimate one if he can prove it. But freedom of the written word is in great danger in this country if critics forefeit the right to speak honestly and openly about any of the arts, should they happen to hurt someone's personal vanity. No one weilds freedom of the baton with more talent and agility than Boston's defied conductor. How about permitting the pen and typewriter the same privilege, Koussy Old Boy?

* * *

Everyone who comes to the Howard Myers' house (he's editor of Architectural Forum) makes the same first remark. "Where'd you get that painting?" referring to a large modern by Laurence Lebduska showing a forest with bright-colored animals painted on like polka dots, as if a child had done it. The Myers can afford to own paintings but they prefer to rent masterpieces like this one, from the New York Circulating Library of Paintings. For $3 to $75 a month (the Lebduska costs $12) you can rent a large o. small canvas from a long list of 18th and 19th century and contemporary paintings by European and American artists; your choice of Utrillo, Henri, Degas, Brackman—etc. The Myers live in a huge, old-fashioned apartment modernized by Architect Ed Stone with ceiling-high natural wood flooring panels that look like a mural, and make the room inviting.

* * *

LIBERTY FREE OF LIPSTICK

Men who can't get lipstick stains off their collars will understand the plight of the Statue of Liberty which has just been repainted with a paint guaranteed lipstick-proof. It's up to some laundry to discover how to apply that same protection to men's collars and shirts. So many sightseers yearn to autograph their names on Liberty's insides that their lip rouge signatures are an inch thick in some places. Henceforth—they've got to find something more lasting than lipstick.

* * *

SUBWAY STIRS EXCITEMENT

The noise of our fracas over whether we have a 5c or a 10c fare must have reached your city by now. You can depend on it, the fare will stay at 5c, for the wrangling is as much political as financial. It seems a far cry, but Gov. Dewey believes the Republican future depends upon raising our New York City subway fare to a dime. The Mayor of our City feels just as strongly that the Democrats stand or fall upon a 5c fare. The people are nickel-minded, and have even sent a man dressed up as Father Knickerbocker down to the City Hall to tell the City Fathers how we feel. All we need is a Town Crier to announce the glad tidings: 5c subways are here to stay.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE SUN
FEB 20 1947

TURNTABLE TALK

BY BRUNO DAVID USSHER

Another conductor, famous also on phonograph recordings, has crashed the front page. Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, has obtained from the Massachusetts Supreme Court an interim stay preventing, at least temporarily, New York Publishers Allen, Towne & Heath from distributing a biography written about him without his consent or cooperation by Moses Smith. Smith has been for 20 years music critic of the lamented Boston Transcript and the Boston American. For a period he also was recording director in charge of Columbia Musical Masterworks. Koussevitzky's action has caused a sensation and is arousing wide attention because it threatens individual freedom of speech and criticism. As for the other maestro in the news, Artur Rodzinski, taking over the Chicago baton after verbally pummeling the board and Manager Arthur Judson, of the New York Philharmonic. Rodzinski will now be heard on Victor issues. The New York Philharmonic "belongs" to Columbia Recordings, Judson also being President of the Columbia Concerts Corp., a booking firm, which, like Columbia Recording Co., has more than name ties with the Columbia Broadcasting System. The Chicago Symphony has numerous titles in the Victor catalog. Lately it has been rather silent on disks since Desire Defauw succeeded the late Frederick Stock, three years ago. That means Rodzinski will "go" Victor.

BRUNO USSHER

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
FEB 20 1947

Berkshire Fest Program Announced

First announcement of the repertory for next summer's Berkshire Festival has been released by Serge Koussevitzky, who is now on his mid-winter vacation in Florida.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give twelve concerts at its summer home at Tanglewood next summer. These will include two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart respectively by an orchestra of chamber proportions (July 13, 20) and three weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed, the middle week to be devoted to a Beethoven cycle (July 31, August 2, 3), the Ninth Symphony to be performed as an extra concert on the following Tuesday (Aug. 5).

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the greater part of the Festival, and has invited two guest conductors, Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw, both of whom are to be on the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, which will be currently in session at Tanglewood.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
FEB 21 1947

EDITORIAL

THE PHILHARMONIC

A battle between the conductor and board of directors of a symphony orchestra is, under ordinary circumstances, of purely local concern. But the controversy which has lately resulted in a change of leaders for the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society is of broader interest. By virtue of the fact that its Sunday afternoon concerts have been broadcast over a national network for many years it has an audience which now extends over the greater part of the United States.

This large audience is not particularly well-informed on the details of the scrap which led to the resignation in mid-season of Artur Rodzinski as the orchestra's conductor and it would probably find it difficult to judge them if it did. But it has every reason to be deeply concerned over the decision of the Philharmonic's management to go back to the system of splitting the chore of leading the orchestra among five different conductors.

Great symphony orchestras are not made or maintained this way. The Boston Symphony is one of the world's greatest because it has been trained and disciplined by a single great conductor over a long period of years. The Philadelphia Orchestra is another, brought to its musical apogee by Leopold Stokowski and maintained at the same high level by Eugene Ormandy, his successor.

Under a mediocre conductor and later under a series of temporary ones, the New York Philharmonic declined. Rodzinski, in his three years as conductor, brought it back to the [illegible] rank of symphony orchestras. It would be unfortunate to permit it to go into another period of decline for lack of the type of leadership it deserves.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
FEB 22 1947

Koussevitsky Biog Suit May Set Law Precedent

NEW YORK, Feb. 15.—A court order restraining publication and distribution of Koussevitsky, a bio by Moses Smith, Hub longhair cric, on complaint of Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony batoneer, was granted here Thursday (13) by Supreme Court Justice Bernhard L. Shientag. In granting the injunction, Justice Shientag indicated that the suit would establish a precedent on the rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent. Opposing attorneys were ordered to submit briefs Wednesday (19).

Notice of a $500,000 libel against Smith and publishers tome, Allen, Towne & Heath, book is firm's initial ventur filed Thursday with the cor

GENEVA, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 21 1947

FIGHTS HIS BIOGRAPHY

Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, evidently believes that a man's private life belongs to himself alone and that biographers, without permission, should not be permitted to invade such privacy.

Conductor Koussevitsky has brought action seeking to restrain the publication of Moses Smith's unauthorized biography of himself, which is said to have been printed already and has been circulated among reviewers. It is to be surmised that the biography is not complimentary to its subject.

Attorney for the publishing house which was to have issued the book next Saturday says that Mr. Koussevitsky's suit abridges the freedom of the press under the Constitution. He argued that if the book is suppressed "a precedent will be set by which all biographers of living persons, including biographical magazine articles, will be subject to suppression at the whim of the subject."

In this day of frank biographies, both in magazines and in books, the legalities involved in the case become of great importance. The outcome of Mr. Koussevitsky's suit will be awaited with much interest.

HOUGHTON, MICH.
MINING GAZETTE
FEB 22 1947

Book Review

BY W. G. ROGERS

KOUSSEVITZKY, by Moses Smith (Allen, Towne & Health).

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, since 1924 the Boston Symphony's conductor, since 1936 asociated with the Berkshire Music Festival and founder in 1940 of the Berkshire Music Center, was born in 1874 in Vishny-Volotchok, son of a Jewish violin or double-bass player.

At 17 he left home to study the double-bass in Moscow. By 1902 he was married to a dancer; he played in the Bol'shoi Theatre orchestra, made a reputation as soloist on his unlikely instrument, renounced Jewry.

In 1905 he was divorced and remarried to a young woman of such wealth that, when they set up their home and he sought a new career in Berlin, he was regarded as the richest instrumentalist in Europe. There in 1908 he made his conducting debut, featuring the new music with which his name has always been associated reverently by composers, critics and a large section of the public. Later he had his own orchestra in Russia, his own publishing house, the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, and finally the Boston offer.

This biographer, former critic who knows his subject personally, registers several complaints in some detail. The principal ones are that Koussevitzky, from his school days, was weak in theory, and that for years he couldn't read a score. He has acted the role of "grand seigneur," aped Beau Brummel, and been vain. Smith tells fascinating stories, many to Koussevitzky's discredit, in these tart, critical pages. But he acknowledges the genius, the tremendous energy, the sensitive ear, the familiarity with instruments, and the sensuous tone coaxed from the famous orchestra.

This is not an authorized biography, and for that reason perhaps all the more valuable. Blind worshippers of the maestro, like the woman who called him God, will squirm, and who knows, maybe Boston will ban the book. It is, however, a most worthwhile type of volume, the kind our musical culture needs badly. If it is unfair to do such a thorough job on Koussevitzky, it is also an outright tribute to him, for with one possible exception, what other conductor would have been worth all this trouble?

H

Koussevitzky Blocks Book On His Life

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (AP)—Se
Koussevitzky, conductor of the B ton Symphony Orchestra, obtai a temporary court order today straining publication of a b which he said "falsely and wr fully portrays my life and mu career."

The book, titled "Koussevit and written by Moses Smith, scheduled for release next S day.

In his petition, the cond said Smith told him several ago that he planned to write a raphy of him. Koussevitzky he declined to give the write information, advising him th planned to publish his aut raphy later.

Koussevitzky's petition sai book contained "untruthful an justified statements disparagi ability as a conductor, musici teacher."

Defendants named beside were Allen, Towne and Heat publishers, and the Arco P ing Company, Inc., distribu

Supreme Court Justice
L. Shientag, who granted terim injunction, will deci whether the order will b permanent.

HARRISON, N.Y
CITIZEN
2/21/47

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Bernstein Thrill 4,000

BY JOHN D. CHEQUER
Staff Correspondent

WHITE PLAINS — A number of firsts were chalked up last week at County Center when an enthusiastic audience of approximately 4,000 welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the reopening of the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

To enumerate only a few, it was the first appearance of the Boston Symphony here; it was the first time Leonard Bernstein had conducted this major orchestra in Westchester; it was the first Olney concert since cessation of hostilities with the exception of a piano program by Arthur Rubinstein last year, and it was the first major musical program at the Center since the new roof was affixed.

And as if to celebrate these many important occasions, the Boston Symphony included as its three program numbers, outstanding works of major classic composers: Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, Opus 72; Brahms' "Serenade No. 1 in A-major, Opus 16"; and Schubert's "Symphony in C-Major, No. 7," sometime called his "great" symphony.

The Boston's performance of the Leonore overture, written by Beethoven as an opener for his opera "Fidelia," is a thrilling work, with its full emotional content realized in last night's reading.

The inclusion of the Schubert 7th on the same program, was a happy coincidence, for friends urged Schubert to review the works of Beethoven as he was writing his "Great C-Major," with the idea of adding massiveness to its content, and it was "Fidelio," he painstakingly worked over, while writing his next to the last symphony.

If there were any unfamiliar work on the program it was the Brahms' "Serenade." But although early in opus number, and preceding in creation, his three great symphonies, it sounds like Brahms, and is Brahms, in just as great stature as he stands in his later and more pretentious works.

Bernstein Thrills

As virtuoso an instrumental group as is the Boston Symphany orchestra, so was there a conducting virtuoso on the podium last night.

Here was no time-beater. Bernstein shook his fists at the orchestra, he beat time with his shoulders, he swayed his body like a ballerina, he employed his hands as vocal parts of the orchestra, and when his hands were busy bringing in one set of instruments, his head was indicating a coming entrance for another group.

The audience of 4,000 saw one of the great conductors of tomorrow, not as a neophyte, but as a full grown artist, who unfortunately is too young to be accepted as truly great, but who nevertheless will convince even the most skeptical that in his musicianship lies all the flowering genius that some day will lead one of our greatest orchestras.

SCARSDALE, N.Y
INQUIRER
2/21/47

Boston Symphony Plays in County

An outstanding musical event took place at the County Center on Thursday, February 13, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by the brilliant young composer-conductor Leonard Bernstein played for the first time in Westchester. The event opened the fourteenth concert season of the Mrs. Julian Olney series.

The second half of the program was devoted to the Schubert "Symphony in C Major, No. 7," the lyrical performance of which roused the large and sympathetic audience to enthusiastic applause. The program opened with "Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Opus 72" by Beethoven, followed by "Serenade No. 2 in A Major, Opus 16" by Brahms.

Mr. Bernstein's conducting was spoken of as ". . . straightforward and spirited; in fact, there is a great deal of vitality about all that Mr. Bernstein does. His conducting is full of vigor and animation and one is intrigued by the expressiveness of his every motion, working as he does without a baton."

In all renditions the great skill of the magnificent orchestra, called by many the greatest musical organization of all time, was evident.

Mr. Bernstein was introduced by Mrs. Olney, who greeted her audience again after the enforced break in the Olney programs. She announced that the next program in the series will be by Eleanor Steber, soprano, and will be given on Friday evening, February 28.

LA CROSSE, WIS.
TRIBUNE AND LEADER PRESS
FEB 2

Civic Concert Band To Make First Appearance Wednesday

La Crosse music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Vocational Civic Concert band in its first concert of the season Wednesday evening in the Vocational school auditorium.

Tickets are available from band members, at Terry's, Leithold's and Hebberd's on the south side and at Berg's and Soell's on the north side.

The Civic band this season, sponsored by the board of education of the La Crosse Vocational and Adult schools, has a membership of 60, with Frank Italiano directing.

Wide Talent Range

Its personnel ranges from musicians who have been playing professionally or as a hobby for many years to high school students whose talent has been developed in the schools of the city.

Dr. Hale Hunt, trombone, is a typical representative of a group that has made music its avocation despite the pressure of other acactivities.

Hunt, a veteran of World war I, played in the University of Wisconsin band, Marquette university band, 127th infantry band, the special Wisconsin band which played in Paris in 1927 and the world champion Blatz American Legion post band of Milwaukee. He also is a member of the La Crosse Symphony.

Some of the World war II veterans in the organization are Bernard Birnbaum, flutist, Dewey Storti, baritone, bandmaster at Houston high school, Lyle Shanley, French horn, Thomas C. Bell, trombone.

Birnbaum, member of the La Crosse Symphony and La Crosse Union band, played with the Navy band in Washington, D. C. He studied flute under Tipton and Kincaid of the Philadelphia Symphony and also under Laurent of the Boston Symphony.

With Marine Band

Storti, formerly a member of Marquette and Tulane university bands and the Duluth Civic band, was with the west coast marine corps band while in service.

Shanley played solo horn with several famous army bands, including the Atlantic base section band at Casablanca, while Bell, a Teachers college student, who played in the University of Kansas organization, was in the 42nd (Rainbow) band, the army war show band and the 242nd army band at Panama.

The Civic band director, Italiano, led the Third fleet flagship band and was guest conductor of the Shanghai Municipal Symphony while the fleet was at Shanghai.

After its debut in La Crosse, Italiano will take the band to Houston on March 2 and to Caston later in the month.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
FEB 21 1947

BOOKS AND THINGS

By LEWIS GANNETT

THERE are no better internationalists than the world-wandering concert artists, and few in any walk of life who work harder and enjoy life more. Joseph Szigeti's "With Strings Attached" (Knopf, $4) is the author's meditative series of improvisations in the theme of his own life.

World Music

He was born in a Carpathian town called Maramaros-Sziget, and his father was a rebel and Socialist, converted by the American author of "Looking Backward." In that town lived an obscure versifier who sold his poems for pennies, and Mr. Szigeti still admires any artist who has the art to make a crowd part with its money. He made his debut as a wonder child in Budapest, when another American, Isadora Duncan, was converting Hungarians to another doctrine; at thirteen, in Berlin, he had a succès d'estime in the Bechsteinsaal, and a succès de finance (under a pseudonym) fiddling, along with trained dogs and a troop of American Negro blues singers, at the Schumannzirkus. Soon afterward, he was introduced to the great American religion of the toothbrush. But he did not reach America until 1925, when he was thirty-three.

He is old enough to have played for Joachim and Busoni, to have met Gorky and Lenin in the studio of a London disciple of Mendelssohn, and to have compared, in pre-World War I days, the bourgeois tastes of Queen Elizabeth of Belgium and the imperial splurges of Melba. Today he likes the enthusiasm of the students at the New York High School of Music and Art, and deplores the overcivilized fear of applause now the vogue at Carnegie Hall. He loves the wild passion of Moscow audiences and admires the techniques of Hollywood, but he suspects that on the radio the engineer may be usurping the role of the artist. He writes intimately and charmingly, and sometimes a little too technically for this musically illiterate reviewer, of great musicians of many nations, and, recalling how an enraptured Frenchman said of Kreisler, "He plays like a Frenchman!" suggests that the highest praise would be "He plays like a citizen of the world." But the reader of his book will observe that even in Mr. Szigeti's world there are no friends like fellow Hungarians.

Joseph Szigeti

Who May Write About Whom?

Mr. Szigeti tells his own story; it may have been edited, but it doesn't seem ghosted. On the other hand, a Boston music critic, Moses Smith, wrote "Koussevitzky" (Allen, Towne & Heath, $4). Mr. Koussevitzky didn't like it; his attorneys, in fact, asked a judge [redacted] of the book on the ground that it was an invasion of his privacy. They even wrote newspapers advising them that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

I had not planned to read or review the book, but this threat naturally excited my curiosity. I find nothing in the book as interesting as the lawyers' letter. I like Mr. Koussevitzky, as Mr. Smith obviously does, but I don't like his lawyers' doctrine. An orchestral conductor is as much a public character as a politician. Is Herman Talmadge or is Senator Bilbo—or even Frank Costello or Johnny Torrio—entitled to ask a court to enjoin publication of any unauthorized biography which might be written of them? The principle is the same, and is worse than absurd; it is an actual menace to the functioning of democratic society.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 22 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Current and Recurrent

THE first paragraph of music comment in the first issue of this magazine, twenty-two years ago, concerned a guest conductor—Igor Stravinsky, who was then directing the Philharmonic orchestra as a visiting maestro. Guest conductors have made first-paragraph items for me on many occasions since then, and this is another of them. The guest conductor under discussion is Leonard Bernstein, who was not quite seven years old in February, 1925. Mr. Bernstein appeared in Carnegie Hall as transient director of the Boston Symphony last week, when he conducted one of the most famous of that other guest conductor's compositions, "Le Sacre du Printemps." In the twenties, "Le Sacre" was still something of a chore for a good many listeners. Today, it's an accepted and popular part of the standard orchestral repertory. It makes exacting demands on the instrumentalists and their leader (I doubt that "Le Sacre" ever will play the high-school-orchestra circuit), demands that were met brilliantly by the Boston orchestra and Mr. Bernstein. Everything was clear, logical, and cleanly rhythmic.

Before "Le Sacre," Mr. Bernstein offered Schubert's Seventh Symphony, sometimes known as "the symphony of heavenly length." Actually, it is no longer than a good many other symphonies, and it probably would lose none of its heavenliness if it were shorter by a few measures. Mr. Bernstein led it with directness, crispness, and restraint. The directness and crispness were admirable, but a little less restraint would have benefited the more fanciful episodes of this charming music.

HARRISON, N.Y.
CITIZEN
2/21/47

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Bernstein Thrill 4,000

BY JOHN D. CHEQUER
Staff Correspondent

WHITE PLAINS — A number of firsts were chalked up last week at County Center when an enthusiastic audience of approximately 4,000 welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the reopening of the Mrs. Julian Olney concert series.

To enumerate only a few, it was the first appearance of the Boston Symphony here; it was the first time Leonard Bernstein had conducted this major orchestra in Westchester; it was the first Olney concert since cessation of hostilities with the exception of a piano program by Arthur Rubinstein last year, and it was the first major musical program at the Center since the new roof was affixed.

And as if to celebrate these many important occasions, the Boston Symphony included as its three program numbers, outstanding works of major classic composers: Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, Opus 72; Brahms' "Serenade No. 1 in A-major, Opus 16"; and Schubert's "Symphony in C-Major, No. 7," sometime called his "great" symphony.

The Boston's performance of the Leonore overture, written by Beethoven as an opener for his opera "Fidelia," is a thrilling work, with its full emotional content realized in last night's reading.

The inclusion of the Schubert 7th on the same program, was a happy coincidence, for friends urged Schubert to review the works of Beethoven as he was writing his "Great C-Major," with the idea of adding massiveness to its content, and it was "Fidelio," he painstakingly worked over, while writing his next to the last symphony.

If there were any unfamiliar work on the program it was the Brahms' "Serenade." But although early in opus number, and preceding in creation, his three great symphonies, it sounds like Brahms, and is Brahms, in just as great stature as he stands in his later and more pretentious works.

Bernstein Thrills

As virtuoso an instrumental group as is the Boston Symphany orchestra, so was there a conducting virtuoso on the podium last night.

Here was no time-beater. Bernstein shook his fists at the orchestra, he beat time with his shoulders, he swayed his body like a ballerina, he employed his hands as vocal parts of the orchestra, and when his hands were busy bringing in one set of instruments, his head was indicating a coming entrance for another group.

The audience of 4,000 saw one of the great conductors of tomorrow, not as a neophyte, but as a full grown artist, who unfortunately is too young to be accepted as truly great, but who nevertheless will convince even the most skeptical that in his musicianship lies all the flowering genius that some day will lead one of our greatest orchestras.

SCARSDALE, N.Y
INQUIRER
2/21/47

Boston Symphony Plays in County

An outstanding musical event took place at the County Center on Thursday, February 13, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by the brilliant young composer-conductor Leonard Bernstein played for the first time in Westchester. The event opened the fourteenth concert season of the Mrs. Julian Olney series.

The second half of the program was devoted to the Schubert "Symphony in C Major, No. 7," the lyrical performance of which roused the large and sympathetic audience to enthusiastic applause. The program opened with "Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Opus 72" by Beethoven, followed by "Serenade No. 2 in A Major, Opus 16" by Brahms.

Mr. Bernstein's conducting was spoken of as ". . . straightforward and spirited; in fact, there is a great deal of vitality about all that Mr. Bernstein does. His conducting is full of vigor and animation and one is intrigued by the expressiveness of his every motion, working as he does without a baton."

In all renditions the great skill of the magnificent orchestra, called by many the greatest musical organization of all time, was evident.

Mr. Bernstein was introduced by Mrs. Olney, who greeted her audience again after the enforced break in the Olney programs. She announced that the next program in the series will be by Eleanor Steber, soprano, and will be given on Friday evening, February 28.

LA CROSSE, WIS.
TRIBUNE AND LEADER PRESS
FEB

Civic Concert Band To Make First Appearance Wednesday

La Crosse music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Vocational Civic Concert band in its first concert of the season Wednesday evening in the Vocational school auditorium.

Tickets are available from band members, at Terry's, Leithold's and Hebberd's on the south side and at Berg's and Soell's on the north side.

The Civic band this season, sponsored by the board of education of the La Crosse Vocational and Adult schools, has a membership of 60, with Frank Italiano directing.

Wide Talent Range

Its personnel ranges from musicians who have been playing professionally or as a hobby for many years to high school students whose talent has been developed in the schools of the city.

Dr. Hale Hunt, trombone, is a typical representative of a group that has made music its avocation despite the pressure of other activities.

Hunt, a veteran of World war I, played in the University of Wisconsin band, Marquette university band, 127th infantry band, the special Wisconsin band which played in Paris in 1927 and the world champion Blatz American Legion post band of Milwaukee. He also is a member of the La Crosse Symphony.

Some of the World war II veterans in the organization are Bernard Birnbaum, flutist, Dewey Storti, baritone, bandmaster at Houston high school, Lyle Shanley, French horn, Thomas C. Bell, trombone.

Birnbaum, member of the La Crosse Symphony and La Crosse Union band, played with the Navy band in Washington, D. C. He studied flute under Tipton and Kincaid of the Philadelphia Symphony and also under Laurent of the Boston Symphony.

With Marine Band

Storti, formerly a member of Marquette and Tulane university bands and the Duluth Civic band, was with the west coast marine corps band while in service.

Shanley played solo horn with several famous army bands, including the Atlantic base section band at Casablanca, while Bell, a Teachers college student, who played in the University of Kansas organization, was in the 42nd (Rainbow) band, the army war show band and the 242nd army band at Panama.

The Civic band director, Italiano, led the Third fleet flagship band and was guest conductor of the Shanghai Municipal Symphony while the fleet was at Shanghai.

After its debut in La Crosse, Italiano will take the band to Houston on March 2 and to Caston later in the month.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
FEB 21 1947

BOOKS AND THINGS

By LEWIS GANNETT

THERE are no better internationalists than the world-wandering concert artists, and few in any walk of life who work harder and enjoy life more. Joseph Szigeti's "With Strings Attached" (Knopf, $4) is the author's meditative series of improvisations in the theme of his own life.

World Music

He was born in a Carpathian town called Maramaros-Sziget, and his father was a rebel and Socialist, converted by the American author of "Looking Backward." In that town lived an obscure versifier who sold his poems for pennies, and Mr. Szigeti still admires any artist who has the art to make a crowd part with its money. He made his debut as a wonder child in Budapest, when another American, Isadora Duncan, was converting Hungarians to another doctrine; at thirteen, in Berlin, he had a succès d'estime in the Bechsteinsaal, and a succès de finance (under a pseudonym) fiddling, along with trained dogs and a troop of American Negro blues singers, at the Schumannzirkus. Soon afterward, he was introduced to the great American religion of the toothbrush. But he did not reach America until 1925, when he was thirty-three.

Joseph Szigeti

He is old enough to have played for Joachim and Busoni, to have met Gorky and Lenin in the studio of a London disciple of Mendelssohn, and to have compared, in pre-World War I days, the bourgeois tastes of Queen Elizabeth of Belgium and the imperial splurges of Melba. Today he likes the enthusiasm of the students at the New York High School of Music and Art, and deplores the overcivilized fear of applause now the vogue at Carnegie Hall. He loves the wild passion of Moscow audiences and admires the techniques of Hollywood, but he suspects that on the radio the engineer may be usurping the role of the artist. He writes intimately and charmingly, and sometimes a little too technically for this musically illiterate reviewer, of great musicians of many nations, and, recalling how an enraptured Frenchman said of Kreisler, "He plays like a Frenchman!" suggests that the highest praise would be "He plays like a citizen of the world." But the reader of his book will observe that even in Mr. Szigeti's world there are no friends like fellow Hungarians.

Who May Write About Whom?

Mr. Szigeti tells his own story; it may have been edited, but it doesn't seem ghosted. On the other hand, a Boston music critic, Moses Smith, wrote "Koussevitzky" (Allen, Towne & Heath, $4). Mr. Koussevitzky didn't like it; his attorneys, in fact, asked a judge [redacted] of the book on the ground that it was an invasion of his privacy. They even wrote newspapers advising them that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

I had not planned to read or review the book, but this threat naturally excited my curiosity. I find nothing in the book as interesting as the lawyers' letter. I like Mr. Koussevitzky, as Mr. Smith obviously does, but I don't like his lawyers' doctrine. An orchestral conductor is as much a public character as a politician. Is Herman Talmadge or is Senator Bilbo—or even Frank Costello or Johnny Torrio—entitled to ask a court to enjoin publication of any unauthorized biography which might be written of them? The principle is the same, and is worse than absurd; it is an actual menace to the functioning of democratic society.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 22 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Current and Recurrent

THE first paragraph of music comment in the first issue of this magazine, twenty-two years ago, concerned a guest conductor—Igor Stravinsky, who was then directing the Philharmonic orchestra as a visiting maestro. Guest conductors have made first-paragraph items for me on many occasions since then, and this is another of them. The guest conductor under discussion is Leonard Bernstein, who was not quite seven years old in February, 1925. Mr. Bernstein appeared in Carnegie Hall as transient director of the Boston Symphony last week, when he conducted one of the most famous of that other guest conductor's compositions, "Le Sacre du Printemps." In the twenties, "Le Sacre" was still something of a chore for a good many listeners. Today, it's an accepted and popular part of the standard orchestral repertory. It makes exacting demands on the instrumentalists and their leader (I doubt that "Le Sacre" ever will play the high-school-orchestra circuit), demands that were met brilliantly by the Boston orchestra and Mr. Bernstein. Everything was clear, logical, and cleanly rhythmic.

Before "Le Sacre," Mr. Bernstein offered Schubert's Seventh Symphony, sometimes known as "the symphony of heavenly length." Actually, it is no longer than a good many other symphonies, and it probably would lose none of its heavenliness if it were shorter by a few measures. Mr. Bernstein led it with directness, crispness, and restraint. The directness and crispness were admirable, but a little less restraint would have benefited the more fanciful episodes of the charming music.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

FEB 22 1947

This Week In Books

TWO book controversies currently are titillating the trade in New York. One is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's $500,000 libel suit against critic Moses Smith's biography, which came as a surprise, according to the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.

BEN WICKHAM JR.

In a statement, the publishers (incidentally the book is their first venture in the business) say the famous conductor bases his objections on the author's "occasional criticisms of some of the conductor's interpretations . . . and to various aspects of Koussevitzky's career, which Smith unearthed after painstaking research and tapping of first-hand materials."

Dr. Koussevitzky has claimed, the publishers say, that the book, being unauthorized, constitutes an invasion of his civil rights. "If Dr. Koussevitzky's contentions should prevail," asserts David Ewen, director of the publishing firm, "every publisher who has published any book concerning living people without their consent would be subject to an action for damages for invasion of their private rights."

The other outburst was occasioned by the ban of Howard Fast's "Citizen Tom Paine" from New York high school libraries after it had passed the routine censorship of the Board of Education.

The ban was upheld by a board committee three days ago and immediately a round-robin protest by 11 major publishers was made public. The protest, signed by such well-known publishing names as Maxwell Perkins of Scribners, Stanley Rinehart, Robert K. Haas of Random House, Thomas R. Coward of Coward-McCann, John Farrar of Farrar, Straus and others, was made on the grounds of free speech. One of the board committee characterized portions of the book as improper and lewd.

Fast, with fast indignation, called the ban a "form of book burning." To this corner, the board's position is good for a few laughs as the book, which has had tremendous public sale, had been in the school libraries for a substantial period of months before the copies were removed.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE-STATES

FEB 23 1947

Symphony of Boston Plans for Summer

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival Concerts will be increased in number next summer from nine to twelve, according to an announcement by Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra. There will be the customary three series of three concerts each and three extra concerts, one devoted to the music of Bach, one to Mozart, and the third to include a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The orchestra's summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, will open its six-week term at "Tanglewood" on June 30, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. As in the past, the faculty of the Center will include the principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1947

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Although the storm thinned out the attendance at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, there nevertheless was a sizable audience on hand to hear Brahms' Serenade in A major, No. 2; Bela Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, and the Second Symphony of Schumann. With this program, which will be repeated tonight and tomorrow afternoon, Leonard Bernstein will conclude his stay as guest conductor.

Not much of Bartok's music is known in Boston, since we do not take easily to decidedly modern idioms. That is our loss, for Bartok was a powerful musical personality who, on the authority of composer Roger Sessions, was one of four men who left the music of their time quite different from what they found it. The other three were Alban Berg, Arnold Schoenberg and Igor Stravinsky.

The Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, which Mr. Bernstein actually introduced to this city at last Tuesday's concert, was composed in 1936 and is, I would gather, typical late Bartok. It is not music of horrendous dissonance, although there are a good many "fourths" bristling out of the contrapuntal texture. This is mainly spirited music, a study in rhythms, many of them irregular, and it has a definite fascination for the receptive listener.

Of the four movements, the first is an eerie-sounding andante, the second a brisk allegro with very close counterpoint, the third an absorbing (if not exactly tuneful) adagio, and the last an allegro based on a dance melody in the Lydian mode. Throughout there are plain suggestions of Hungarian folk material.

This unusual combination of instruments—strings with the "heavenly toned" celesta; kettle, snare and bass drums, harp, cymbals and piano with two players—results in very effective tone colors. Not the least evident is one obtained by beating the kettledrum with the wooden handles of the sticks.

Brahms' Serenade with the adagio omitted went well in its archaic, naive fashion, and the performance of the tricky Bartok work appeared to be authoritative. Mr. Bernstein was less successful this time with the Schumann Symphony than he had been a year ago. The texture was not clear enough; the first allegro was a little too fast, and somehow Schumann's Spring-like music was just not gentle enough.

All the same, Mr. Bernstein's appearances have been proof that his extraordinary talent is developing rapidly. He may turn out to be America's first great native-born conductor.

BOZEMAN, MONT.
CHRONICLE

FEB 23 1947

$7,000 Violin Pawned

BOSTOR, Feb. 22 — George Zazofski, a violinist with the Boston Symphny Orchestra, reported his 193-year-old $7,000 violin was stolen after a concert in Alexandria, Va. It was recovered later in a pawnshop, where it had been pawned for $12.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 23 1947

OF BOOKS AND MEN

By DANIEL LIONEL

The half-million-dollar libel suit of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky against Moses Smith's biography of him came as a surprise to the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.

The book, in the opinion of the publishers, is not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career, and is a vital contribution to the literature of contemporary musical biography. It pays high tribute not only to Dr. Koussevitzky's genius with the baton, but also to his far-reaching contributions to the musical culture of our generation, particularly in this country.

What Dr. Koussevitzky objected to, however, was Moses Smith's occasional criticisms of some of the conductor's interpretations, to the revelations of the relationship that existed between conductor and orchestra-men, and to various aspects of Koussevitzky's early career, which Smith unearthed after painstaking research and tapping of first-hand materials.

A Public Figure

"However," maintains David Ewen, a Brooklynite and director of Allen, Towne & Heath, "Dr. Koussevitzky is a public figure. He looks to and depends upon the public for the support of his concerts, purchase of records, attendance at his Berkshire Center, and listening to his radio broadcasts. This same public is entitled to receive as much information as is available about such a public figure, particularly, as in this case, when it comes from highly reputable and authoritative sources."

The publishers feel that to restrain the right to publish a work of such critical value is to infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of our society.

Remade Records

We stopped at Kjeldsen & Sons in Bay Ridge the other afternoon to hear some of the Heritage Series recordings that have received such wide publicity. Book editors, you know, occasionally do evince an interest in literature's sister arts. Some of these records, bringing to life voices like Caruso and Tettrazini, were originally recorded 47 years ago and have been remade with modern orchestration dubbed in.

In the essentially musical atmosphere created by striking murals with musical themes painted on the walls of Kjeldsen's by Frank Ryan, a young Bay Ridge veteran, these records sounded good.

Koussevitzky Biographer Defends Book

Moses Smith of Brookline defended today his new book, "Koussevitzky," biography of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, against the charge made by Koussevitzky that it "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

LIBEL DENIED

Smith, music critic of two Boston newspapers and subsequently director of Columbia Masterworks of the Columbia Recording Corporation, said:

"As far as I am concerned there's nothing libelous in the book."

He said that he does not know as yet what the exact charge of libel is and that he is leaving for New York today to confer with his lawyer and his publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., who were scheduled to release the book Saturday.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is vacationing in New York, obtained a temporary court order yesterday restraining publication of the book. In his petition he said the book contained "untruthful and unjustified statements, disparaging my ability as a conductor, musician and teacher."

In the foreword of his book Smith wrote that "the ensuing pages are in no sense an 'authorized' biography."

Smith said there was an earlier biography of Koussevitzky, written by his friend Arthur Lourie, but in the foreword he describes the value of this book as a source as being "unfortunately lessened greatly by its numerous errors, by the author's excessively worshipful attitude toward his subject, and by the book's inadequate factual content, particularly as to omissions of important matter about Koussevitzky's origins and early life.

"The special significance of these errors of commission and omission lies in the fact that Lourie's 'Life' was 'authorized' by Koussevitzky," Smith wrote.

"In an effort to correct them I had recourse, among other sources, to those who knew Koussevitzky 'when'—for there are still many such in this country."

Smith said that reference books "unfortunately tend to repeat the same misinformation as is contained in Lourie's 'Life,' even those that were published many years earlier. So do many of the autobiographical statements contained in published interviews with Koussevitzky."

AID DECLINED

Through his counsel, Henry Root Stern of Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, Dr. Koussevitzky contended that publication of the book was without his consent and violates his privacy.

The 72-year-old Russian-born virtuoso set forth in his petition that he had declined to give Smith any information, advising him that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

"The said book untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training," Dr. Koussevitzky complained.

He added that he found the book as a whole "not only disparaging, but very distinctly damaging, no; no indication when."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 23 1947

The Symphony's Sponsor Sets A Commendable Example

It is good to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra back on the air under commercial sponsorship. It would be better, of course, if there were no financial necessity for this peerless musical organization to have a sponsor and its music were available to the radio audience on a sustaining basis.

But such can no longer be. The decimation of wealthy persons with an interest in the fine arts willing and able to make up the deficits of such endeavors have made it necessary to seek commercial sponsorship. Otherwise the quality of the music would suffer, government subsidy would have to be sought, or the cost to the concert-goer would have to be raised. As alternatives [illegible] has much to recommend it.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT

FEB 23 1947

THE NEW BOOK

. . . "Koussevitsky," which was to have been on the book stands last Saturday has been held up because Serge Koussevitsky has secured an injunction against it. His grounds are that the book is libelous and violates his privacy. Notice of a $500,000 suit against the author of the book, Moses Smith, a Boston music critic, also was filed. It is said that about 3,000 of the first 5,000 copies of the book had already been sent out when the injunction was granted. The conductor has said that he did not give Mr. Smith much of the personal and private material appearing in the book. Mr. Koussevitsky has been conducting the Boston orchestra for nearly 23 years and Mr. Smith for 20 years was music critic for the Boston American and the Boston Transcript.

York state civil righ but as conductor of the Symphony Orchestr portrays my life and

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 24 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, 72, the Boston Symphony's prestigious maestro for the past 22 years, went to court in Manhattan and gave a new publishing firm (Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.) a blazing sendoff on its very first book. Title: Koussevitzky. Author: ex-Boston Music Critic Moses Smith. The maestro sued to stop publication. The book, he complained, "describes me as . . . incompetent . . . brutal . . . a poseur . . . attacks my integrity . . . impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work." Besides, complained the maestro, it might spoil the sale of a literary project of his own: the Koussevitzky autobiography.

Harris & Ewing

MRS. CHESTER NIMITZ & SOLOIST
A sensitive interpretation.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
FEB 24 1947

When Is A Critic

A new publishing firm devoted exclusively to books about music and musicians made a brave start with the first of the year. Under the direction of critic David Ewen, the house of Allen, Towne & Heath set as its criterion the belief that "authority and scholarship are not incompatible with readability and cultured entertainment." It hoped its first publication would prove the point.

Neatly bound and printed, illustrated with photographs, its $4, 400-page, documented, annotated, and indexed "Koussevitsky," by Moses Smith, veteran Boston music critic, seemed to fill the bill. It even appeared likely to be a mild hit. Howard Taubman had written a quotable review for The New York Times to appear on Feb. 16, the day after the book's publication. Other advance readers had praised its critical frankness and biographical fullness. But last Thursday, three days before publication, the book landed its publishers, its author, and its distributors, the Arco Publishing Co., in a sizzling kettle of legal hot water.

Among the advance readers was Serge Koussevitzky himself. When the gray-haired, 72-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra finished his borrowed copy, he was furious. When his lawyers finished it, they rushed into New York Supreme Court.

According to Koussevitzky's complaint, the biography not only was detrimental to his reputation and property interests to the extent of a half-million-dollar libel claim. The maestro charged it also violated New York's civil-rights law which expressly forbids the use "for advertising purposes, or for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait, or picture of any living person" without that person's consent. Never before had this law been invoked against a book. But Justice Bernard Shientag, scenting a test case, enjoined all concerned from publishing or distributing the book.

Question Before the Court: There was no question that Smith had used Koussevitzky's name and portrait. The text of "Koussevitzky" is enlivened with several formal and many more informal shots of the Russian-born conductor. But whether Smith wrote the book "for the purposes of trade" or instead was acting within his rights as an established critic writing about a newsworthy public figure was the legal question which excited literary and publishing circles.

Almost as long as Koussevitzky has been wielding his baton before Boston's Brahmins on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings in Symphony Hall, Smith has been a critic on The Boston Post, The Boston Evening American, and The Boston Evening Transcript. More recently he has directed the Masterworks division of Columbia Recording Corp.

While on The Transcript, Smith engaged in a feud with Koussevitzky for two years, during which they did not speak. Smith tells about this in his book, which is also crammed with many intimate details about the conductor's life. His anecdotes about Koussevitzky's early feuds with members of the Boston Symphony are frank and revealing. He is highly critical of Koussevitzky, but, as Taubman pointed out in his Times review, the book on the whole is "sober, conscientious" and one from which the reader will "gain new respect for Koussevitzky's achievement."

Acme

Koussevitzky is hoping to establish a precedent in New York courts

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 24 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, 72, the Boston Symphony's prestigious maestro for the past 22 years, went to court in Manhattan and gave a new publishing firm (Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.) a blazing sendoff on its very first book. Title: Koussevitzky. Author: ex-Boston Music Critic Moses

Harris & Ewing

MRS. CHESTER NIMITZ & SOLOIST
A sensitive interpretation.

Smith. The maestro sued to stop publication. The book, he complained, "describe me as . . . incompetent . . . brutal . . . a poseur . . . attacks my integrity . . . impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work." Besides, complained the maestro, it might spoil the sale of a literary project of his own: the Koussevitzky autobiography.

[illegible]
FEB 24 1947

BOOKS

When Is A Critic

A new publishing firm devoted exclusively to books about music and musicians made a brave start with the first of the year. Under the direction of critic David Ewen, the house of Allen, Towne & Heath set as its criterion the belief that "authority and scholarship are not incompatible with readability and cultured entertainment." It hoped its first publication would prove the point.

Neatly bound and printed, illustrated with photographs, its $4, 400-page, documented, annotated, and indexed "Kousevitsky," by Moses Smith, veteran Boston music critic, seemed to fill the bill. It even appeared likely to be a mild hit. Howard Taubman had written a quotable review for The New York Times to appear on Feb. 16, the day after the book's publication. Other advance readers had praised its critical frankness and biographical fullness. But last Thursday, three days before publication, the book landed its publishers, its author, and its distributors, the Arco Publishing Co., in a sizzling kettle of legal hot water.

Among the advance readers was Serge Koussevitzky himself. When the gray-haired, 72-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra finished his borrowed copy, he was furious. When his lawyers finished it, they rushed into New York Supreme Court.

According to Koussevitzky's complaint, the biography not only was detrimental to his reputation and property interests to the extent of a half-million-dollar libel claim. The maestro charged it also violated New York's civil-rights law which expressly forbids the use "for advertising purposes, or for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait, or picture of any living person" without that person's consent. Never before had this law been invoked against a book. But Justice Bernard Shientag, scenting a test case, enjoined all concerned from publishing or distributing the book.

Question Before the Court: There was no question that Smith had used Koussevitzky's name and portrait. The text of "Koussevitzky" is enlivened with several formal and many more informal shots of the Russian-born conductor. But whether Smith wrote the book "for the purposes of trade" or instead was acting within his rights as an established critic writing about a newsworthy public figure was the legal question which excited literary and publishing circles.

Almost as long as Koussevitzky has been wielding his baton before Boston's Brahmins on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings in Symphony Hall, Smith has been a critic on The Boston Post, The Boston Evening American, and The Boston Evening Transcript. More recently he has directed the Masterworks division of Columbia Recording Corp.

While on The Transcript, Smith engaged in a feud with Koussevitzky for two years, during which they did not speak. Smith tells about this in his book, which is also crammed with many intimate details about the conductor's life. His anecdotes about Koussevitzky's early feuds with members of the Boston Symphony are frank and revealing. He is highly critical of Koussevitzky, but, as Taubman pointed out in his Times review, the book on the whole is "sober, conscientious" and one from which the reader will "gain new respect for Koussevitzky's achievement."

Acme

Koussevitzky is hoping to establish a precedent in New York courts

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

FEB 25 1947

Tanglewood Expands

Nothing succeeds like success and nothing that succeeds should fail of seizing its hour. Therefore the increase of the Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood this coming summer from nine to twelve.

There will be the customary three series of three concerts each, and three extra concerts, one of which will be devoted to Bach, one to Mozart and a third will be made one of the highest points of the season with the production of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. Great feeders for future summers at Tanglewood, at least as long as Kusseivitzky is there, is the Berkshire Music school which opens its six weeks term on June 30. And by joining the Soviety of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center — all music lovers who can come and spend the season there can attend all student concerts, all rehearsals and the choral and opera performances, as guests.

We are a shifting people in the gods we follow. Just now we in this highly cosmopolitan part of the United States turn our eyes to the Berkshire Festival. If we can keep up our interest long enough, and if the Berkshire authorities will only make the exits and entrances for the cars by which people must come, if they come at all, so that people's cars can be parked when they come and can be sent when they want to go home, the Berkshire Festival may prove its staying powers. It has great present leadership. It has magnificent location.

The building that houses the concerts is excellent. But the comings and goings are literally painful especially at night. It is not possibly for people to walk there. There are no public conveyances except the busses from Pittsfield. There are no hotels close enough for patrons to go afoot.

It is all just a simple problem of parking and a highway that will let a car pass another going in the same direction. There is much land in the Berkshires that is not used. Enough of it could be acquired to create a safe and fairly speedy way of getting out while the glory of the music still possesses the listener. Having to battle for a chance to get safely onto the broad highway takes some of the fine flavor off great music.

SUFFOLK, VA.
NEWS-HERALD

Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 27 1947

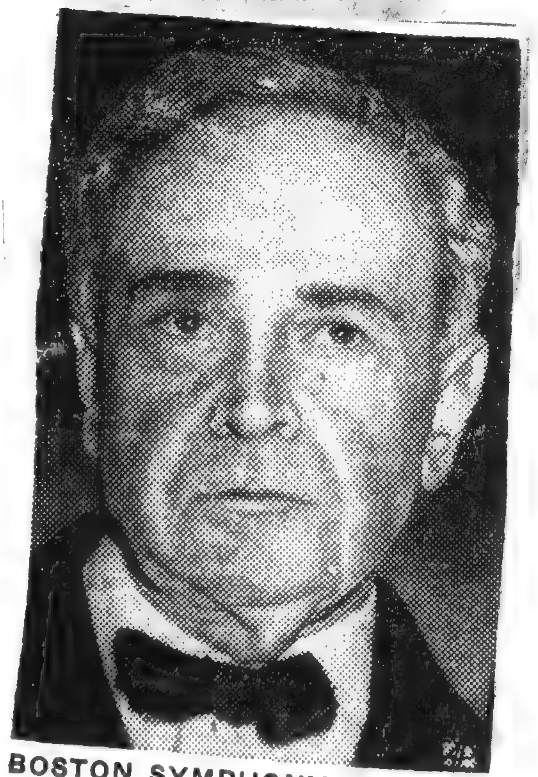
Auditions For Student Orchestra Set For March 6

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held Thursday, March 6, from 2 to 4 p. m. at Symphony hall, Boston, by members of the Boston Symphony, who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. The Music Center will be held at Tanglewood in Lenox from June 30 to Aug. 10.

Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Symphony hall, Boston, before Wednesday. Those who have not already made application for admission to the center, may do so at the time of audition.

MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER

FEB 25 1947



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA welcomes back batoneer Serge Koussevitzky for broadcast at 8 p.m. Tuesday over WMOB-ABC.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 26 1947

Music

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in 4th Met Concert

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played the fourth concert of the season in Metropolitan Theater to an audience which was most appreciative of the music as it was programmed and as it was played. It was a pleasure to welcome Dr. Koussevitzky back after his mid-Winter vacation and a privilege to have heard him conduct here for the third time this season. The program:

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 .... Beethoven
  Allegro con brio
  Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
  Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
  Finale: Allegro molto
Prelude to "Khovanstchina" .. Moussorgsky
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques .... Debussy
  De l'aube a midi sur la mer
  Jeux de vagues
  Dialogue du vent et de la mer

An excellent reading of the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 was presented. The 'cello section has never seemed so splendid as it did in the opening phrases of the first movement. The pleasant exchange of themes between choirs was delightful and the audience sat back for an enjoyable evening, after a few bars. It was in the "Marcia funebre" and it accompanying "Adagio" that a high point was reached. The ominous notes of the double basses were indicative of the mood of the music but last evening's interpretation seemed rather to contain more of a sense of positive affirmation than is usually heard. The quick pace of the Scherzo was delightful. In the Trio, it took the horns three tries to make a perfect phrase. Thanks to Beethoven's structure, the phrase came back times enough for them to prove that it could be done. This is by no means, however, a situation that can be controlled. French horns simply are "like that" and it is something to be profoundly grateful for, if this difficult bit in the "Eroica" comes off without a mishap. The Finale was done in fine style.

As a preface to Debussy's imaginative music "La Mer," we were given the exquisite little "Prelude to Khovanstchina" by Moussorgsky. Never was a French horn heard to play more delicately or a clarinet to play a pianissimo tone so clearly. One wondered if it had really been of Koussevitzky's masterpieces of interpretation. Its rhythmic sweep and melodic beauty were played with a superlative touch. Debussy's sea off the Normandy coast is the same ocean which lashes the coast of New England. Last evening's music sent the spray into our faces. It was a wonderful bit of realism.

Local, National and World News from the Journal and Bulletin Editorial Rooms

WJAR AT 8:17 A. M. 12:16, 6:02, 11:02 P. M.

GALLIPOLIS, OHIO
TRIBUNE

The Privacy of a Public Figure

THE author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA.
JOURNAL

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitsky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Any one might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, Congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitsky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

A Note to New York

On matters of music Boston can still speak to New York in big-brother fashion. Thanks in equal parts to the artistic leadership of Serge Koussevitzky and to the cohesive, supporting policies of the board of trustees, the Boston Symphony Orchestra proceeds smoothly from triumph to triumph. Unhappily, New York's Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra seems to be almost continuously in upheaval. The latest blow to its prestige is the resignation, effective next October, of Arthur Rodzinski, its conductor since 1943, who has been doing an increasingly good job in restoring the orchestra to its one-time eminent position.

From this distance it appears that the Philharmonic's troubles do not stem from a personal quarrel between Mr. Rodzinski and Arthur Judson, the manager, or between Mr. Rodzinski and any members of his orchestra. They arise from a fundamental defect in supervisory organization. It is simply too big to operate effectively. For example, it is headed by a group of nine officers. This is followed by a board of directors of 30 members, a smaller board of trustees, and an almost innumerable list of auxiliary boards and committees. Compare this with the Boston orchestra's single board of 14 trustees, which has sole and complete power.

Under the New York set-up it is almost inevitable that schisms should occur and factions arise. One group wants Mr. Stokowski to be the next conductor. Another wants Mr. Muench. Still another, presumably, is loyal to Mr. Rodzinski. Social jealousies, racial prejudices, and financial rivalries all have room to thrive and grow. The Philharmonic will never have artistic peace and financial prosperity, we make so bold as to suggest, until its control is centered in a small, responsible group which, after appointing a conductor, will back him to the limit.

STERLING, COLO.
ADVOCATE

FEB 27 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has bee sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction agains publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

FEB 25 1947

Tanglewood Expands

Nothing succeeds like success and nothing that succeeds should fail of seizing its hour. Therefore the increase of the Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood this coming summer from nine to twelve.

There will be the customary three series of three concerts each, and three extra concerts, one of which will be devoted to Bach, one to Mozart and a third will be made one of the highest points of the season with the production of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. Great feeders for future summers at Tanglewood, at least as long as Kusseivitzky is there, is the Berkshire Music school which opens its six weeks term on June 30. And by joining the Soviety of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center — all music lovers who can come and spend the season there can attend all student concerts, all rehearsals and the choral and opera performances, as guests.

We are a shifting people in the gods we follow. Just now we in this highly cosmopolitan part of the United States turn our eyes to the Berkshire Festival. If we can keep up our interest long enough, and if the Berkshire authorities will only make the exits and entrances for the cars by which people must come, if they come at all, so that people's cars can be parked when they come and can be sent when they want to go home, the Berkshire Festival may prove its staying powers. It has great present leadership. It has magnificent location.

The building that houses the concerts is excellent. But the comings and goings are literally painful especially at night. It is not possibly for people to walk there. There are no public conveyances except the busses from Pittsfield. There are no hotels close enough for patrons to go afoot.

It is all just a simple problem of parking and a highway that will let a car pass another going in the same direction. There is much land in the Berkshires that is not used. Enough of it could be acquired to create a safe and fairly speedy way of getting out while the glory of the music still possesses the listener. Having to battle for a chance to get safely onto the broad highway takes some of the fine flavor off great music.

SUFFOLK, VA.
NEWS-HERALD

Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 27 1947

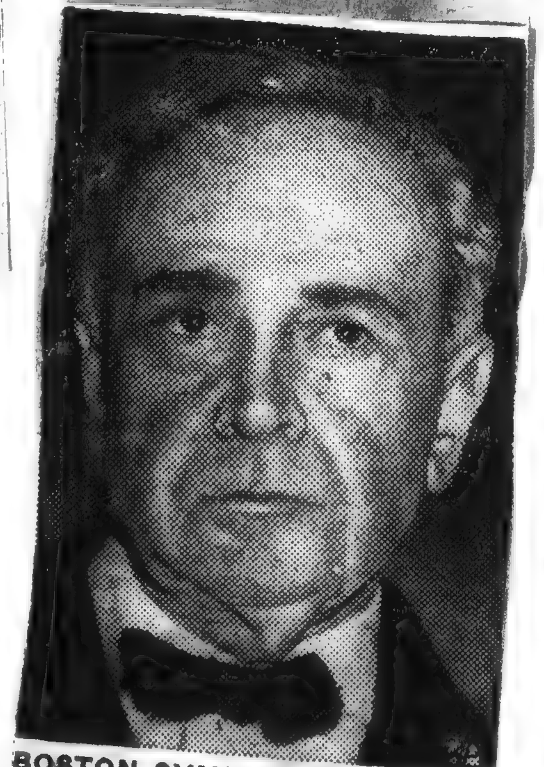
Auditions For Student Orchestra Set For March 6

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held Thursday, March 6, from 2 to 4 p. m. at Symphony hall, Boston, by members of the Boston Symphony, who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. The Music Center will be held at Tanglewood in Lenox from June 30 to Aug. 10.

Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Symphony hall, Boston, before Wednesday. Those who have not already made application for admission to the center, may do so at the time of audition.

MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER

FEB 25 1947



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA welcomes back batoneer Serge Koussevitzky for broadcast at 8 p.m. Tuesday over WMOB, ABC.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 26 1947

Music

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in 4th Met Concert

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played the fourth concert of the season in Metropolitan Theater to an audience which was most appreciative of the music as it was programmed and as it was played. It was a pleasure to welcome Dr. Koussevitzky back after his mid-Winter vacation and a privilege to have heard him conduct here for the third time this season. The program:

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 .... Beethoven
  Allegro con brio
  Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
  Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
  Finale: Allegro molto
Prelude to "Khovanstchina" .. Moussorgsky
"La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques .... Debussy
  De l'aube a midi sur la mer
  Jeux de vagues
  Dialogue du vent et de la mer

An excellent reading of the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 was presented. The 'cello section has never seemed so splendid as it did in the opening phrases of the first movement. The pleasant exchange of themes between choirs was delightful and the audience sat back for an enjoyable evening, after a few bars. It was in the "Marcia funebre" and it accompanying "Adagio" that a high point was reached. The ominous notes of the double basses were indicative of the mood of the music but last evening's interpretation seemed rather to contain more of a sense of positive affirmation than is usually heard. The quick pace of the Scherzo was delightful. In the Trio, it took the horns three tries to make a perfect phrase. Thanks to Beethoven's structure, the phrase came back times enough for them to prove that it could be done. This is by no means, however, a situation that can be controlled. French horns simply are "like that" and it is something to be profoundly grateful for, if this difficult bit in the "Eroica" comes off without a mishap. The Finale was done in fine style.

As a preface to Debussy's imaginative music "La Mer," we were given the exquisite little "Prelude to Khovanstching" by Moussorgsky. Never was a French horn heard to play more delicately or a clarinet to play a pianissimo tone so clearly. One wondered if it had really been of Koussevitzky's masterpieces of interpretation. Its rhythmic sweep and melodic beauty were played with a superlative touch. Debussy's sea off the Normandy coast is the same ocean which lashes the coast of New England. Last evening's music sent the spray into our faces. It was a wonderful bit of realism.

Local, National and World News from the Journal and Bulletin Editorial Rooms

WJAR AT 8:17 A. M.
12:16, 6:02, 11:02 P. M.

GALLIPOLIS, OHIO
TRIBUNE

The Privacy of a Public Figure

THE author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA.
JOURNAL

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitsky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Any one might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, Congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitsky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

A Note to New York

On matters of music Boston can still speak to New York in big-brother fashion. Thanks in equal parts to the artistic leadership of Serge Koussevitzky and to the cohesive, supporting policies of the board of trustees, the Boston Symphony Orchestra proceeds smoothly from triumph to triumph. Unhappily, New York's Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra seems to be almost continuously in upheaval. The latest blow to its prestige is the resignation, effective next October, of Arthur Rodzinski, its conductor since 1943, who has been doing an increasingly good job in restoring the orchestra to its one-time eminent position.

From this distance it appears that the Philharmonic's troubles do not stem from a personal quarrel between Mr. Rodzinski and Arthur Judson, the manager, or between Mr. Rodzinski and any members of his orchestra. They arise from a fundamental defect in supervisory organization. It is simply too big to operate effectively. For example, it is headed by a group of nine officers. This is followed by a board of directors of 30 members, a smaller board of trustees, and an almost innumerable list of auxiliary boards and committees. Compare this with the Boston orchestra's single board of 14 trustees, which has sole and complete power.

Under the New York set-up it is almost inevitable that schisms should occur and factions arise. One group wants Mr. Stokowski to be the next conductor. Another wants Mr. Muench. Still another, presumably, is loyal to Mr. Rodzinski. Social jealousies, racial prejudices, and financial rivalries all have room to thrive and grow. The Philharmonic will never have artistic peace and financial prosperity, we make so bold as to suggest, until its control is centered in a small, responsible group which, after appointing a conductor, will back him to the limit.

STERLING, COLO.
ADVOCATE

FEB 27 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biog raphy of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor o the Boston Symphony orchestra, has bee sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conduc tor has also asked a court injunction agains publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advise newspapers that they would publish review at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS-SENTINEL

FEB 25 1947

A Country Calendar—
Lucy Templeton

Correspondent Regrets Dearth of Classic Music in America

MRS. C. C. Brooks, of Rugby, recently wrote me about some friends of hers who had been with our Army in Germany and had "enjoyed and benefited by their experiences . . . contact with people, found them friendly and appreciative.

"You know the old saying, 'Bring a smiling face to the mirror and you meet a smile.' The English, though, are mostly a reticent people and do not make friends easily; no sociability in bus or tram travel; the French also show or feel superiority.

"I have wished to write a comment on our musical tastes. One returned soldier, not an educated youth, told me that while in Vienna and out with a bunch of pals, loafing for amusement, saw cheap prices for an opera production. Most of them did not wish to take it in, saying, 'Oh, highbrow stuff,' but finally entered, heard the opera Martha.

"It could not have been a wiser beginning, for all of them were delighted with the tuneful melodies, and henceforth always took in operas. Operas and symphonies are within reach of all in Europe. Alas, in this country they are never offered or put before the public at a reasonable price or on popular radio programs.

"And the boys certainly appreciated and bought their art treasures and marveled at the cities and the way the land was highly cultivated, and the industry of the people."

While it is true, as Mrs. Brooks says, that we do not have performances of opera at popular prices in this country, or indeed at any price, except in some of the large cities, we do have some excellent radio programs, notably the opera broadcast on Saturday afternoons, the New York Symphony concerts on Sunday afternoons and the Boston Symphony broadcasts on one weekday evening.

* * *

Miss Pauline Strickland, Linden Avenue, telephoned two or three weeks ago to tell me of finding a dead cedar waxwing in her yard which she thought might have been killed by returning north too early.

My observation of these birds leads me to believe that they have no fixed season for migrations, but are likely to appear at any time anywhere there is a likelihood of food. I have seen them here in every month of the year. I remember well one January when we lived in town, nearly missing a train to Florida because I was watching a flock of waxwings in a tree on Hill Avenue.

E. H. Forbush in the Natural History of Birds says: "The seasonal movements of the cedar waxwing appear to be rather erratic. If there is a bountiful supply of wild fruit of the kinds which persist during the winter many birds remain here (New England) . . . usually during the latter part of the winter there is an early northward movement of these birds."

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

FEB 27 1947

Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

Chippewa Falls, Wis
T elegram
2-28-47

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publisher of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

CORBIN, KY.
TRIBUNE
FEB 26 1947

EDITORIAL COMMENT

NEA SERVICE
Staff Writer
James Thrasher

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

A Happy Reawakening

The magazine Steel reports that the gains made by gas and oil heating have spurred coal stoker manufacturers to improve their product. Some new units not only feed the coal fire but also remove ashes from the furnace to a dust-tight container that needs emptying only every 10 days. The stoker also moves coal around corners so that it will function no matter how the coal bin is situated in relation to the furnace.

That's a small item, maybe, but encouraging. The business about the ashes is good news. So is the reawakening of competition that it illustrates. And there are other encouraging symptoms of that reawakening.

Railroads are spending vast sums to meet air and bus competition with new, more comfortable equipment and better service. Airlines are reciprocating. And even though the day seems far off when we can pick and choose among various automobiles, there are rumors of improvements which will make for better cars when that day arrives.

Such news makes the consumer lick his chops. For that much-abused private enterprise, with its accompanying sharp competition, is getting ready to pay off once more. It looks as if happy days are almost here again.

FEB 28 1947

Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitsky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND THE NEW AMERICAN MUSIC. By Hugo Leichtentritt. Cambridge: Harvard University Press; 199 pp.; $3.

DR. LEICHTENTRITT'S book fills a definite need. It offers a short biographical sketch of a great conductor, analyzes a cross-section of American music composed since 1890, and gives an idea of its amazing variety. Special emphasis is given to Koussevitsky's methods of promoting national music in Russia and to the influence he has had as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To show how a clearly perceptible national American music has evolved from the melting pot of nationalities, and the part that Koussevitsky has played in this evolution has been Dr. Leichtentritt's object. Koussevitsky's conception of the art of conducting and his character as an interpreter are also considered. The book is scholarly, but not too technical or abstruse for the average music lover.

J. B.

UNIONTOWN, PA.
STANDARD

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

FEB 27 1947

★ ★ LET'S ALL WORK FOR LASTING PEACE ★ ★

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

WAYNESBORO, PA.
RECORD HERALD

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political boses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

MT. CLEMENS, MICH.
DAILY MONITOR

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor also has asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressman, presidents?

We hope that Dr. Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

NEW PHILADELPHIA, OHIO
TIMES

FEB 27 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From
CHILLICOTHE, OHIO
SCIOTIO GAZETTE

FEB 27 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

* * *

With pancake season with us again, who remembers the good old days when we used to smear butter on 'em?

Tuesday Symp

New Work by Bartók Introduced by Bèrnstein

By Winthrop P. Tryon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the fourth program in the monthly series of concerts in Symphony Hall last night, presenting Mozart's "Linz" Symphony in C major, No. 36, Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta, and Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7.

The Bartók work was new to the town and was no doubt performed not so much by way of a novelty for the mid-week subscribers as by way of a reading preliminary to real production for the end-week regulars. The two symphonies were doubtless put in the program to contribute to the classic expectations and requirements of the Tuesday people.

* * *

The occasion was a distinguished success, considered as a rehearsal of the Music, as the title reads, by Bartók, though he could as well have used the term Symphony. The only difference is that he employs an orchestra without woodwinds and brasses and organizes his strings in two groups more or less independent of each other. The construction itself is quite in the symphonic rule of today, with an Andante movement for opening, followed by Allegro, Adagio, and Finale.

To make a brief preview of the piece rather than to attempt a critique, three general characteristics are to be noted. Neo-classicism is evident at the very outset in the framework of the first movement, which in a very large way is fugal. It would be a music lesson indeed for Bach if he could return and see what a complication his schemes of counterpoint have grown into. Then, the types of rhythm that culminated in the Russian Ballet orchestra of Stravinsky show out markedly in the second movement. Add a distinct feeling and style of neo-impressionism in the Adagio, and you have influences in part accounted for.

his two hands never could keep the ever-shifting beat in place alone. As it is, the piece demands the highest mastery and the utmost concentration on the part of the man at the front of the platform for things to come safely through. Mr. Bernstein showed the insight into the composer's design and the command of the players that were necessary. He proved himself, no question, an authority in expression of the modern idea.

Take him, too, in an old-school work, like the "Linz" Symphony, he there displayed excellent schooling, even if a good deal of it could be traced to Dr. Koussevitzky, whose place he for the time supplies. He has much, however, that is his own; in particular, he reads his scores in periods: pausing at intervals and starting anew. He knows, furthermore, how to phrase a melody for a flute or a horn.

But—with Beethoven he was outrageous. In the Symphony No. 7, he converted the orchestra into a jazz band. Boston has a tradition about some things. Mr. Bernstein has yet to learn it.

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
FEB 28 1947

Bentley Warren Dies at 82; Was Boston Lawyer

U. S. Adviser on Fuel in World War I Served as Counsel to Corporations

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Feb. 27.—Bentley Wirt Warren, eighty-two, outstanding Boston constitutional lawyer who was prominent for many years in political, civic and business life, died this afternoon at his home, 228 Beacon Street. He had been ill three months.

He was legal advisor to the United States Fuel Administration during World War I, and was at one time legislative counsel for the Massachusetts Street Railway Association. One of his best known cases was handling litigation before the United States Supreme Court involving diversion of the Ware and Swift Rivers for Boston's water supply. Mr. Warren handled the case from 1927 to 1931 and won a decision for Massachusetts against Connecticut.

He was a member of the state legislature in 1891-'92 and served on the state civil service commission from 1903 to 1905.

Born in Brighton, the son of William Wirt Warren and Mary Adams Warren, he was a descendant of John Warren, one of the early settlers of Watertown. He attended Boston Latin School and was graduated from Williams College in 1885. He studied law in the Boston University School of Law and was admitted to the bar in 1889.

He was a former president, director and trustee of the Boston and Providence Railroad Corporation and a director of the Springfield Street Railway Company, Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company, State Street Trust Company, Holyoke Power and Electric Company, North Texas Company and Union Freight Railroad Company.

He was also a trustee of the Consolidated Investment Trust and the Brighton Five Cents Savings Bank. He was a trustee and former president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A funeral service will be conducted Saturday at 4 p. m. in Emmanuel Church, with the Rev. Robert G. Metters officiating. Burial will be in Williamstown Cemetery.

In 1894 he married Ellen Hatch Windon, who died in 1931. He leaves a daughter, Mrs. Ellen G. Sangster, of Short Hills, N. J., and a son, Bentley W. Warren jr., of Essex.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

FEB 28 1947

Privacy of a Public Figure

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the biography (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk." He has also sued the author and publisher for libel.

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, Presidents?

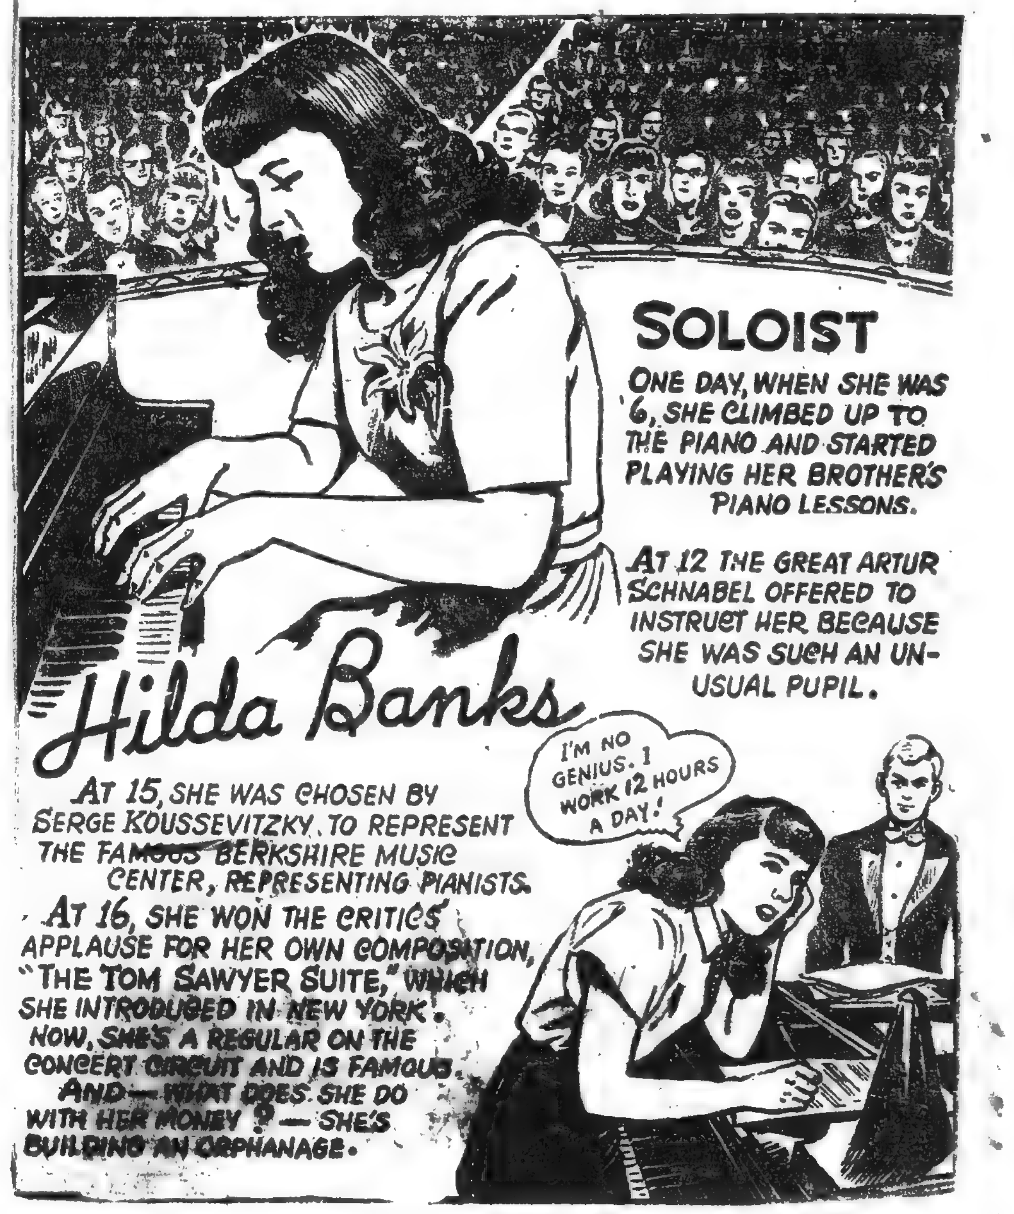
We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position.

If Koussevitzky were not the musical genius he is and at the top of his profession, one would almost suspect that the libel suit and the injunction were a scheme engineered by the publishers and the principals to enhance the sale of the book by calling attention to it. This is, of course far from the truth because the artistic stature of Dr. Koussevitzky needs no further lustre.

Perhaps the action was inevitable because the very eminence of the personality. Genius, extreme sensitivity and temperament unfortunately are frequently combined. If we must make allowances for it, nevertheless, we can not condone it because the principle, if vindicated, would strike at fundamental liberties of a free press.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
FEB 28 1947

TEEN-AGE TRIUMPHS.



SOLOIST
ONE DAY, WHEN SHE WAS 6, SHE CLIMBED UP TO THE PIANO AND STARTED PLAYING HER BROTHER'S PIANO LESSONS.
AT 12 THE GREAT ARTUR SCHNABEL OFFERED TO INSTRUCT HER BECAUSE SHE WAS SUCH AN UNUSUAL PUPIL.
Hilda Banks
AT 15, SHE WAS CHOSEN BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY TO REPRESENT THE FAMOUS BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER, REPRESENTING PIANISTS.
AT 16, SHE WON THE CRITICS' APPLAUSE FOR HER OWN COMPOSITION, "THE TOM SAWYER SUITE," WHICH SHE INTRODUCED IN NEW YORK. NOW, SHE'S A REGULAR ON THE CONCERT CIRCUIT AND IS FAMOUS.
AND—WHAT DOES SHE DO WITH HER MONEY ? — SHE'S BUILDING AN ORPHANAGE.
I'M NO GENIUS. I WORK 12 HOURS A DAY!

ING AT HOLLYWOOD

When Carleton Smith went through here on his lecture tour, he told me a festival is being planned for Edinburgh next summer that will make the Salzburg one look like a tent show. It's due to open Aug. 15 and last a month, with all forms of the theatrical arts—drama, opera, ballet—being featured. The Old Vic company will take part. The Alfred Lunts have agreed to do a play. Officials hope to fly the Boston Symphony Orchestra over for the event. Two of the best Russian ballet troupes have been invited, but as yet no answer has seeped through the iron curtain.

TURNTABLE TALK

BY BRUNO DAVID USSHER

Another conductor, famous also on phonograph recordings, has crashed the front page. Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, has obtained from the Massachusetts Supreme Court an interim stay preventing, at least temporarily, New York Publishers Allen, Towne & Heath from distributing a biography written about him without his consent or cooperation by Moses Smith. Smith has been for 20 years music critic of the lamented Boston Transcript and the Boston American. For a period he also was recording director in charge of Columbia Musical Masterworks. Koussevitzky's action has caused a sensation and is arousing wide attention because it threatens individual freedom of speech and criticism. As for the other maestro in the news, Artur Rodzinski, taking over the Chicago baton after verbally pummeling the board and Manager Arthur Judson, of the New York Philharmonic. Rodzinski will now be heard on Victor issues. The New York Philharmonic "belongs" to Columbia Recordings, Judson also being President of the Columbia Concerts Corp., a booking firm, which, like Columbia Recording Co., has more than name ties with the Columbia Broadcasting System. The Chicago Symphony has numerous titles in the Victor catalog. Lately it has been rather silent on disks since Desire Defauw succeeded the late Frederick Stock, three years ago. That means Rodzinski will "go" Victor.

BRUNO USSHER

* * *

In addition Koussevitzky's lawyers are reported to have served notice of a $500,000 libel suit against Author Smith and the publishers, if they persist in distributing the book this week. Koussevitzky's contention is said to be based on finding the Smith volume personally and artistically libelous, defamatory and generally damaging. The director's complaint alleges that Smith describes him as deficient in training and education, incompetent, brutal and insincere personally as well as in his artistic efforts.

Legal action is based on the Massachusetts State Code, pertaining to protection of civil rights and laws of privacy.

Publishers Allen, Towne & Heath are protesting the whole proceeding because it would prevent, not only them, but in future any author or publisher from writing or publishing frank statements about any person living or dead without previous consent and approval of opinions or facts stated. In the case of a deceased person, such agreement would have to be obtained from immediate survivors or descendants.

Serge Koussevitzky, it is understood, is planning to pen his autobiography. (He has been conductor of the Boston Symphony for the last 23 years.) Two books about him already are in existence, one by Arthur Lourie (Knopf, 1931) and a new one by Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard Press, 1946).

Thus the "Case of Koussevitzky vs. Smith" bids fair to be not only a "cause celebre" but a far-reaching test case, involving freedom of opinion and publication.

* * *

From Taverns and Cafe Society: Victor presents as a "find" Susan Reed, who makes a disk debut in Album M-1086, "Folksongs and Ballads," with zither and Irish harp accompaniments. She is a native of Columbus, S. C., where her father, Daniel Reed, known beyond that city in professional community theater circles, headed the resident stock company. Miss Reed met at the paternal home such folklorists as Carl Sandburg, Jacob Niles, the Lomaxes and others and in turn became a collector herself.

Record collectors should give an ear to the nine tunes Susan Reed presents on three 10-inch records, which, if not always quite as poignant as might be, yet are sung charmingly and with an almost disarming lack of vocal artiness. They cover a wide variety of native Americana and tunes "imported" from Norway, Barbados and other far-off places.

Columbia also turns up a discovery in the domain of "We, the People." Dorothy Shay, styled as the "Park Ave. Hillbilly," has personality plus. It reaches out of these four 10-inch records in Album C-119, selections including stuff of the "cafe socety" style.

Miss Shay came up through USO programs in her home state of Florida. This set, too, contains striking as well as negative ballads. "Uncle Fud" and "Mountain Gal" are among the best. Of the two newcomers, Miss Shay is the more vital. She has humor as well as sentiment.

BERNSTEIN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

By IRVING KOLODIN.

A singular honor came to Leonard Bernstein in Carnegie Hall last night when he appeared to lead the first of two concerts by the Boston Symphony during its current visit to New York. Not only is it difficult to recall when another conductor than Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra here, but it is even more difficult to recall when such an opportunity had gone to a musician of American birth.

So, it was an historic occasion, though Bernstein's choice of the C major symphony of Schubert for the first half of his program did not reveal any special sympathy for this great work. The interpretation was technically clean, and it had momentum; but any number of fine points in the pacing of the music were overlooked, the range of dynamics rarely had the breadth to grant Schubert all the meaning he intended, and Bernstein communicated little of the work's profundity to me. Schubert requires freedom and flexibility no less than Chopin, but the leader compressed him in a straitjacket of time beating and mathematical formula.

For a few details: The first allegro got under way too quickly, with the result that the accelerated tempo indicated later was much too fast. Schubert's use of the trombones in this score as more powerful allies of the French horn was not respected in the brassy sound Bernstein drew from them. Finally, the energy he applied to the orchestra roughened its normal tone more than a little, without any compensating gain in emotional fervor. In sum, this work of Schubert at 31 has an oldness of mind that Bernstein at 29 does not yet comprehend.

Stravinsky's "Sacre."

It was followed by Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," a warhorse of another color, and one much more responsive to Bernstein's whip. As well as possessing the secret of its rhythmic complexities and the technic to convey it to the orchestra, Bernstein has a sense of the poetry and the tenderness which Stravinsky—master that he is—invoked as balance to the barbaric power that first offended the sensitive.

That power was communicated with superlative energy by the orchestra in this performance, but to Bernstein's credit, only as a factor in the drama created by Stravinsky, not its one unremitting theme. The "Ritual of the Ancestors" was delivered with especial sensitivity, suggesting that as well as being a rugged people, Stravinsky's primitives had a normal complement of emotions. The upheaval of the "Dance of the Earth" and the "Sacrificial Dance" (which conclude the first and second sections of the work) were superb in their strength and orchestral execution. Among the audience was Serge Koussevitzky, applauding his protege with enthusiasm.

Philharmonic's Plight; Guest Conductors in Review

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It is a little difficult at this distance to put a finger on just what is wrong with the Philharmonic's predicament and the row that has blazed into the open between Artur Rodzinski, its conductor, and Arthur Judson, its manager. Mr. Virgil Thomson in the Herald Tribune, to the contrary, states that the Philharmonic case is simple: "Arthur Judson is unsuited by the nature and magnitude of his business interests to manage with the necessary self-effacement a major intellectual institution doing business with his other interests. He is also a man of far too great personal force to serve effectively as a mediator between a proud musician and the equally proud trustees. That is probably why no conductor ever stays long enough with the Philharmonic to accomplish the job that everybody knows should be done, namely, to put the orchestra permanently on an artistic equality with the other American orchestras of comparable financial resources."

But neither Mr. Thomson nor Mr. Downes in the Times explains just what it is in the current situation and contract with Rodzinski that has caused the rift. Mr. Rodzinski for his part has said: "I'm not interested in money. I'm fighting for something much bigger than dollars and cents . . . It is a fight for musical freedom and independence and for the opportunities to pursue the musical profession free from shackles or organized music control and monopoly." Mr. Judson, meanwhile, has maintained a complete silence. Would that someone in New York were a little more specific.

Here in Boston we may be inclined to be complacent over the struggles of the Philharmonic to get on with itself. For the time being, anyway, the Boston Symphony is in the smoothest waters it has known, if not in its history, at least for a long time. Since, as Mr. Thomson tells us, the Philharmonic's problem is simple, why do not the trustees get together and solve it? It is all most perplexing to anyone not in the know. Everyone agrees that Mr. Rodzinski has done a splendid job in rebuilding the Philharmonic from the sad estate into which it fell during the Barbirolli regime. To retain him on his terms would appear to the outsider to be the sensible course, but at this date it does not seem to be the one which the Philharmonic will pursue.

OUR RECENT GUESTS

The current season of the Boston Symphony may well go down as one of brilliant guest conductors for our three visitors have given, each in his own way, some highly rewarding concerts. Mr. Bernstein completes his stay this coming week, and Mr. Walter returns in March for two more concerts. The success of their visits may, however, be acknowledged now. Mr. Muench gave us a program of French music that will long be remembered for the astonishing verve with which he presented it. Mr. Walter gave is solid classical and romantic fare, served with the great understanding and loving care for which he is renowned. Mr. Bernstein offered programs, admirably prepared and executed, of a type to which Koussevitzky has accustomed us.

In New York Mr. Bernstein has sometimes been subject to some very sharp knocks from a portion of the critical fraternity. I cannot, for the life of me, see why. Of course, it is presumptuous of him to be a young man and to display in his interpretations the energy and vitality of youth. There is a section of the public which will always look askance at a young man, unless he be a child prodigy. Children are all right on the concert platform, and young singers, violinists and pianists, in spite of the natural wickedness of youth, can sometimes succeed. But to be a conductor of a venerable institution, or even a new one; is somehow regarded as shocking. How can the young man know so much?

Observing Mr. Bernstein during his guest conductorship here, with his own orchestra and at Tanglewood, it seem to me inescapable that he does know a lot and that he has the ability to transmit this knowledge of his art into exceedingly fine performances. I have never heard him give a dull or vulgar interpretation. Now and again his gyrations on the platform are a trifle distracting to the [illegible]e, but the results to the ear are more than compensation.

The effect of having three such excellent guest conductors is all for the good in the present status of the Boston Symphony. Their presence consoles us for the long mid-winter absence of Mr. Koussevitzky from Symphony Hall. They relieve him of a lot of hard work at the most burdensome part of the year. He will be back with the Orchestra in time for the meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony on Wednesday, Feb. 26. On that occasion, if reference to the current well-being of the Boston Symphony is made, he should be honored for his own giant's share in maintaining this condition. Even if the mood of black pessimism, in which Boston trustees take a gloomy pleasure in revelling, be observed, the Symphony's conductor will deservedly hold the spotlight.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 17th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Serenade in A major............Brahms
Music for Strings and Percussion..Bartok
Symphony No. 2 in C major Op. 61
Schumann

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

MR. BERNSTEIN'S final concerts of his visit here brought us a more controversial modern work than either the Hindemith Violin Concerto or, certainly at this date, the Sacre which he offered earlier. Bartok through the years and right up to his death in 1945 went his own solitary and original way with the result that his musical ideas and compositions have gained the respect, if not always the liking, of a large part of the knowing public.

His Music for Strings and Percussion was played by Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra last Tuesday night. Hearing it again yesterday, I cannot say that the impression is any more rewarding. There are, of course, fascinating effects of orchestral sound, ingeniously contrived in the curious instrumental medium which Bartok set himself. These are always good to listen for and to. Furthermore the scherzo is an original and effective piece. Some of the effects, though, are less alluring, for example that xylophone in the adagio which might well have done service as accompaniment to "The Lost Weekend." The finale starts brilliantly and then gets nowhere. There is much in the rest of the score that sounds amorphous. As an experiment in orchestral timbres this work may have something now and for the future, but as music qua music it is disappointing, meandering and abstruse.

THE SERENADE in A major is Brahms at his least typical youthful self. It is an utterly charming work. The first movement is strangely prophetic of Mahler at his most spiritual. The rest of the Serenade is a young romanticist's dip into the 18th century, with the most delightful results. Small wonder that Mr. Bernstein chose to resurrect this work, even though its orchestral demands are no more than a woodwind and horn band and the lower strings. It is a good thing to hear this piece for another reason than its own intrinsic merits, for it proves that Brahms was a more versatile composer than a certain school of modern criticism allows him to be.

Mr. Bernstein ended the concert with Schumann's C major Symphony, with which he achieved such success last season. The performance yesterday seemed more feverish than dazzlingly effective. The scherzo and the adagio are the great movements of this symphony. The speed of the former yesterday (marked allegro vivace) made the allegro molto vivace of the finale sound like a veritable slow coach. The adagio had more frenzy than poetry. Save for the Brahms, Mr. Bernstein's other two concerts were considerably superior to this.

Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns from his mid-winter vacation to conduct Vaughan Williams' 5th Symphony and Brahms' Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist.

2, 1947.

KOUSSEVITSKY GETS WRIT AGAINST BOOK

Temporary Stay Granted on Conductor's Complaint That Biography Is Libelous

On the ground that a new biography of him is libelous and violates his privacy, Serge Koussevitsky, Bostom Symphony Orchestra conductor, won a court order and distribution of the book.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, in granting an interim stay pending determination of the musician's application for a preliminary injunction, indicated that the suit would establish a precedent on rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent. Opposing attorneys were directed to submit briefs next Wednesday.

Notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against Moses Smith, a Boston music critic who is author of the disputed book, "Koussevitsky," and the publishing concern, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., was filed in the complaint.

Concern's First Publication

The book, which was to have been distributed next Saturday, is the initial publication of the company, organized here last July. David Ewen, its editor and director, expressed "surprise" last night at Mr. Koussevitsky's action and reported that 3,000 copies of a first printing of 5,000 books had been distributed to booksellers. Howard Chipkin, lawyer and the company's secretary, appeared as defense counsel.

Should the court grant a temporary injunction, Mr. Ewen said, "every publisher in the country is in dire danger if he ever published a book about any living person, or for that matter a dead person whose family is alive or mentioned in the book."

Mr. Koussevitky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern of Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, listed three points as basis for an injunction. He contended that publication of the book wah without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, the "rights of privacy" law.

Publication of photographs in the book also constitute a violation of that law, he charged. Finally, he asserted, the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The 7[illegible]-year-old Russian-born virtuoso, who almost since his advent in Boston twentythree years ago has been the subject of adulatory comment in the musical world, set forth in an affidavit that he had declined to give Mr. Smith any information, advising that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

"The said book unturthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training," Mr. Koussevitsky complained.

Reputation Seen Damaged

He added that he found the book as a whole "not only disparaging but very distinctly damaging, not only to my reputation but to my material resources."

"Furthermore," he continued, "this book unjustifiably and untruthfully attacks my integrity as a man and as an artist. It impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work and devotion to the ideals of music, art and culture in the United States and throughout the world."

Mr. Ewen described the book as "not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career." To restrain the right to publish it, he said, would infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts "to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of our society."

The charge of libel, he went on, was less important than the question whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticisms without the consent of the subject.

Mr. Smith for almost twenty years was music critic for the Boston American and the Boston Transcript and more recently has been director of the Masterworks Division of Columbia Records.

oussevitzky Analyzed; n Unsuccessful Operation

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

There is nothing more precarious an the attempt to write an objece, critical biography of a living n. For one thing the author is ually too near in time to his subct and too prejudiced one way or nother. For another the subject an strike back. Undaunted by these onsiderations, Mr. Moses Smith has attempted just such a biography of Serge Koussevitzky (Allen, Towne & Heath; $4.00). At least it can be said of the book that it is an antidote to Arthur Lourie's earlier, friendly and inadequate life of the Boston Symphony's conductor.

Mr. Smith will be recalled as a former music critic of the Boston American and subsequently of the Boston Evening Transcript, which he left to direct Columbia's masterwork records. It will at once be noticed, however, that as a biographer he has ardently re-embraced his former profession. The reader will be struck from the outset at the critical approach and he will probably surmise that the author must have had some sort of a chip on his houlder. The impression that Mr. Smith set about his task with a eeling of bitterness towards his ubject ends by marring the uniased portrait which he so obvious wished to paint.

I doubt very much if Mr. Smith as failed to print a single piece of l-natured gossip or hostile critiism which he happened upon in he course of his researches. Ineed, it seems more likely that he eliberately sought out these things. et me offer one sample of the anner in which Mr. Smith bestows raise with one hand and takes it way with another. Thus, reporting n Koussevitzky's London visit of 933 he writes: "He had a great opular success, and most of the reiewers, especially Ernest Newman, greed with the public. The princial dissenting critic, who neverthess praised much that Koussevitzky id and treated him as one of the orld's leading conductors, was the orrespondent of the Manchester uardian, Neville Cardus, perhaps e ablest reviewer in England. He t his finger on a cardinal weakss in some of Koussevitzky's inrpretations."

Then follows the dissenting view, t Mr. Smith has already planted e seed of bitterness. Almost everydy, you see, liked what Koussetzky did in London with the B.C. except "the ablest reviewer England." This is actually a ld example of Mr. Smith's meth, which he repeats again and ain throughout the course of the ok. He rakes up all sorts of "inents" and tuning-room gossip, st of which have been and had better be forgotten.

The reason for Mr. Smith's atude is not, I believe, difficult to cover. He has had to rely for account of Koussevitzky's earlier ars through his first marriage on rbal reports by contemporary usicians many years after, on ssian newspaper reviews and en on rumor and conjecture, none which are good sources for finitive biography. Why did he t get a frank story of this peod from Koussevitzky himself? hatever the reason Mr. Smith early did not obtain the information he urgently needed from the st available source. It is tempting to put two and two together d suggest that the reason Mr. mith quoted so much adverse iticism and recounted so many rather unsavory and trivial incidents was pique at being thwarted in his biographical quest.

The results of this unfortunate inner struggle on the author's side make for an unbalanced record. His loading of the scales, first with praise and then with blame, leaves the reader who has never listened to the results Koussevitzky can achieve with an orchestra, in a turmoil of doubt. As for the reader who does know Koussevitzky's position as a conductor and his long association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I imagine that he will smile ironically at the tangled web Mr. Smith has woven. The reactions of those actually involved in the biography, by implication, association or quotation, would be more interesting to note. I fancy that Mr. Smith's work will engender no little heat locally.

My own view of the matter is that Mr. Smith and his publishers were unwise to have released a book so imbued with inimical criticism and even malice at this time. Critical biography comes better posthumously, not while the subject is in full possession of his powers and standing in the glow of a highly successful lifework devoted to music. I have no wish to deride the value of objective biography, Mr. Smith's ideal and Strachey's. It is vastly to be preferred, even while the subject is alive, to those ecstatic tributes and official testtimonials which now and again get themselves published. But Mr. Smith's volume is little more than an attack under the guise of a biography which presumably would not have been undertaken unless the subject's career and achievement merited the trouble. Inasmuch as the facts of Kousevitzky's life are sometimes either wanting or suspect in this book, its value yet further deteriorates. It is certainly readable enough, but its conclusions and contradictions quite falsify the picture.

(As the public now knows Mr. Koussevitzky has gone to law aganist publication of this biography, so that it is not yet available at book-stores. But copies have long been in the hands of reviewers and some reviews have already appeared. There is, then, no reason to refrain from a discussion of a subject of such interest to many Bostonians.)

IN PERSPECTIVE

Music Over There

Listening to Myra Hess in her recent appearance here with the Boston Symphony set me to thinking back over the musical adventures I enjoyed during my term with the army overseas. I had considerable luck in this direction, and the English pianist was part of it.

Dame Myra's magnificent labors as impresario of the lunchtime concerts at London's National Gallery are by now almost a legend among people who are fond of music. She arranged and ran the whole show, and played herself in something like 140 of the concerts. I managed to squeeze into half a dozen of her performances (which were always jammed), and recall each of them with delight. One, however, particularly sticks in my memory, because in addition to the music, it provided the most dramatic moment I have ever experienced in a concert hall.

* * *

The National Gallery concerts went on uninterrupted during the buzzbomb era, even when cloudy weather hampered interception along the coast and made it likely that things would be noisy. On just such an afternoon I paid my shilling and shouldered my way into a Hess performance. Sure enough, shortly after the concert started, an alert sounded. V-1 was an old story by then, and I don't believe a single person left the Gallery.

The first buzzer came in just after Dame Myra began to play—a Chopin prelude, if I remember correctly. Artist and audience ignored the thing to begin with, but that soon became impossible. The bomb seemed headed straight for us (a common illusion), and its tooth-rattling clatter began to drown out the music. Suddenly the pianist broke off in the middle of the prelude, and sat immobile, with one hand resting on the piano above the keyboard. The roar of the buzzbomb grew louder and louder, then cut off into that skin-prickling silence that always preceded the explosion. Still Dame Myra sat motionless, her back to the audience. The blast came, fairly close at hand, echoing and re-echoing. As the noise died away, Myra Hess lifted her hands and began the prelude again, exactly as though she had just come on stage. If she had been ruffled, her music never betrayed it.

N.Y. Tribune

BOOKS AND THINGS

By LEWIS GANNETT

THERE are no better internationalists than the world-wandering concert artists, and few in any walk of life who work harder and enjoy life more. Joseph Szigeti's "With Strings Attached" (Knopf, $4) is the author's meditative series of improvisations in the theme of his own life.

World Music

He was born in a Carpathian town called Maramaros-Sziget, and his father was a rebel and Socialist, converted by the American author of "Looking Backward." In that town lived an obscure versifier who sold his poems for pennies, and Mr. Szigeti still admires any artist who has the art to make a crowd part with its money. He made his debut as a wonder child in Budapest, when another American, Isadora Duncan, was converting Hungarians to another doctrine; at thirteen, in Berlin, he had a succès d'estime in the Bechsteinsaal, and a succès de finance (under a pseudonym) fiddling, along with trained dogs and a troop of American Negro blues singers, at the Schumannzirkus. Soon afterward, he was introduced to the great American religion of the toothbrush. But he did not reach America until 1925, when he was thirty-three.

Joseph Szigeti

He is old enough to have played for Joachim and Busoni, to have met Gorky and Lenin in the studio of a London disciple of Mendelssohn, and to have compared, in pre-World War I days, the bourgeois tastes of Queen Elizabeth of Belgium and the imperial splurges of Melba. Today he likes the enthusiasm of the students at the New York High School of Music and Art, and deplores the overcivilized fear of applause now the vogue at Carnegie Hall. He loves the wild passion of Moscow audiences and admires the techniques of Hollywood, but he suspects that on the radio the engineer may be usurping the role of the artist. He writes intimately and charmingly, and sometimes a little too technically for this musically illiterate reviewer, of great musicians of many nations, and, recalling how an enraptured Frenchman said of Kreisler, "He plays like a Frenchman!" suggests that the highest praise would be "He plays like a citizen of the world." But the reader of his book will observe that even in Mr. Szigeti's world there are no friends like fellow Hungarians.

Who May Write About Whom?

Mr. Szigeti tells his own story; it may have been edited, but it doesn't seem ghosted. On the other hand, a Boston music critic, Moses Smith, wrote "Koussevitzky" (Allen, Towne & Heath, $4). Mr. Koussevitzky didn't like it; his attorneys, in fact, asked a judge to enjoin publication of the book on the ground that it was an invasion of his privacy. They even wrote newspapers advising them that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

I had not planned to read or review the book, but this threat naturally excited my curiosity. I find nothing in the book as interesting as the lawyers' letter. I like Mr. Koussevitzky, as Mr. Smith obviously does, but I don't like his lawyers' doctrine. An orchestral conductor is as much a public character as a politician. Is Herman Talmadge or is Senator Bilbo—or even Frank Costello or Johnny Torrio—entitled to ask a court to enjoin publication of any unauthorized biography which might be written of them? The principle is the same, and is worse than absurd; it is an actual menace to the functioning of democratic society.

Sound Scriber (adv.?)

The lawyers seem to be interfering with the business of writing in various strange ways. Describing John Steinbeck's technique in writing "The Wayward Bus," I recently wrote that he composed it longhand, then dictated his product to a "dictograph" and finally, listening to the sound of his own voice, improved some of his rhythms of speech. A series of indignant letters informs me, first, that "dictograph" is the copyrighted word for an interoffice communication system; second (this from an officer of the Dictaphone Corporation) that "dictaphone" was what I probably meant, and, thirdly (from the sales promotion manager of the SoundScriber Corporation), that what John Steinbeck really used was a "SoundScriber." (This is correct, and Mr. Steinbeck tells me it is a good machine.) Finally, in a humorless letter from a gentleman who signs himself counsel for the Dictaphone Corporation, I am told that my use of the word "dictograph" "does harm to three separate corporations and benefits no one. We hope you will avoid the misuse of these words in future."

Well, I shall try; but I suspect that the English language, which long ago adapted the words "phonograph" (copyright, 1877), "gramophone" (copyright, 1887), kodak (copyright, 1888) and even zu-zu to its own wayward uses, will continue its historic process of evolution without paying much attention to what any lawyer says.

And I hope that the publishers of biographical reports on public figures, whether in newspapers, magazines, books or on the radio, will also refuse to be bullied.

Jul 9.

Conversion of Estates Affects Lenox Tax Rate

Bill Up in Legislature Again To Reimburse Communities Because Of Educational Institutions

Up for consideration in the Republican dominated Massachusetts Legislature again this year is a bill which calls for the reimbursement by the state to towns and cities for loss on taxes owned by educational institutions.

Typical of the towns in the commonwealth where many private estates have been turned into educational institutions is Lenox, which through the Board of Selectmen of the town, supported by Representative James E. Hannon (D-Lee) fought to have the legislation passed last year. It was defeated but the town fathers of Lenox and Representative Hannon expect to return to the State House again soon to push the measure again.

County Commissioner J. Joseph McCabe (D-Lenox), who is chairman of the Board of Selectmen in his home town, told a legislative committee last year that the loss on taxes in Lenox amounts to about $18,500 a year, which means an increase on the tax rate for the people of the town of about $3 on $1000.

Show Places Gone

Show places in Lenox are a thing of the past and only a scattered few are now occupied by veterans of the summer colony, like John Shepard Jr., the heirs of Charles R. Bristed's estate, David T. Dana and a few others.

Summer residents like Giraud Foster, Mrs. Carlos M. deHeredia, W. Roscoe Bonsal, Mrs. Henry White, Grenville L. Winthrop, Miss Kate Buckingham, Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, Miss Kate Cary, Major George E. Turnure, Harris Fahnestock, George L. Higginson, Halstead Lindsley, R. J. Flick and many other well known residents of the town have gone.

Among the tax free properties in Lenox are Cranwell School for Boys, the former Berkshires Hunt and Country Club, which had a valuation of $188,468; the Lenox School for Boys, valued in 1937 at $228,081; Foxhollow School for Girls, $122,000; a part of Shadowbrook, the Jesuit Novitiate, $14,450, with a total loss of taxes on more than $550,000.

Other estates in the town where schools are now being operated include the home of Major Turnure, Mr. Winthrop and the Drake property, where the Rollins School is located, as well as Tanglewood, the former home of Miss Tappan, a part of which is in Lenox.

Valuations over a 10-year period have been cut more than one-half. In 1934, the Winthrop estate was valued at $172,800 and in 1944 it dropped to $99,600. The Harris Fahnestock, property decreased in valuation in the same period from $137,900 to $40,300 and the Turnure estate from $99,000 to $28,000.

Other figures for the same period follow:

	1934	1944
Rollins Theatre	$25,000	$21,500
Tanglewood (Portion)	4,300	4,100
Bonsal's estate (Tracy Inn)	99,500	40,000
Kate Cary's (an inn)	33,900	20,000
Bonner's estate (an inn) ..	20,000	9,000
Frothingham's estate (an inn)	59,000	35,000

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the matter of sonorities the current Boston Symphony program, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, is cunningly devised. The first number, Brahms' Second Serenade in A major, last played at a Boston Symphony Concert in 1895 (!), enlists an octet of woodwinds, two horns, violas, 'cellos and double basses. The next number, Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, gives the violins a chance and, in addition to the usual percussion instruments, calls for harp, pianoforte and xylophone. Then the full orchestra, as understood in Schumann's day, has its chance in that composer's Second Symphony. More specifically, the trumpets and the trombones are finally added to the picture.

Interesting as a study in sonorities, the program was otherwise rewarding and, save for the fact that Mr. Bernstein overdrove every part of the symphony except the introduction to the first movement and the Adagio, the performances yesterday were also satisfactory. And in the Bartok, something more.

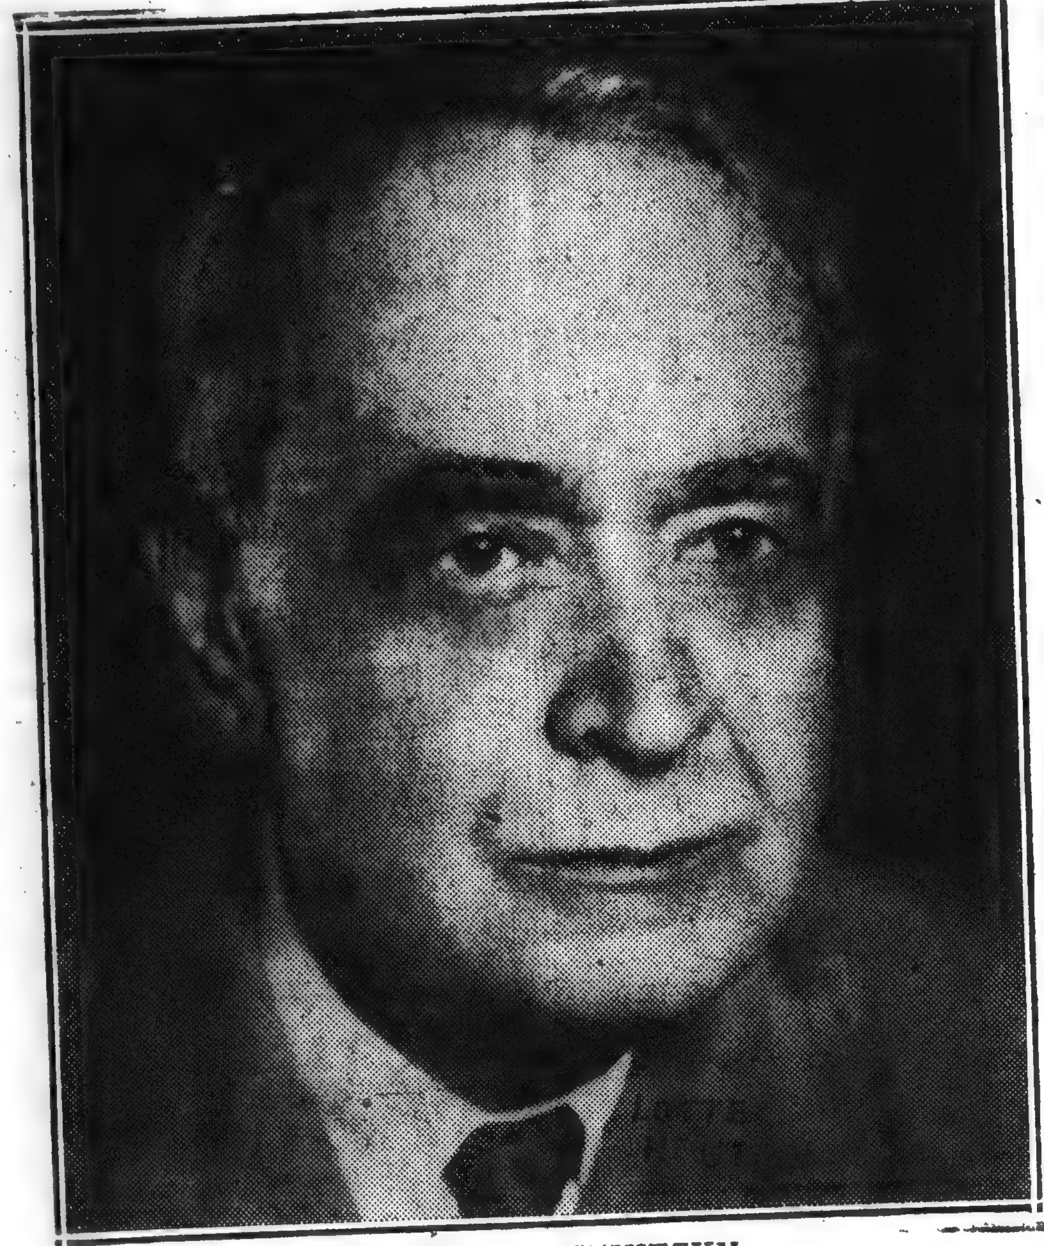
The Brahms Serenade had not actually gone unheard here for 52 years, since Mr. Bernstein presented it at a pair of chamber concerts given by members of the Symphony Orchestra in the summer of 1943. Outside a rather dull first movement the music is not without charm, and although the instrumental setup leans toward heaviness, it is sufficiently unusual to be interesting in its own right. Written in Brahms' 27th year, the music is to a degree conservative and cautious, harking back to the 18th century, both in style and in spirit.

In a different way, Bartok's music, first played here last Tuesday evening, is interesting as sheer sound. You are frequently reminded of the Gipsy orchestras of Hungary though Bartok scorned the typical Gipsy music and went to native Hungarian sources for much of his inspiration and melodic material. The Oriental tinge in this curiously fascinating work is easily accounted for. Hungary is the farthest east of the major European countries, outside Russia, and it was more than once overrun by the Turks. Yet to this primitivism, this exoticism, Bartok adds a good measure of strictly classical procedure, and the four movements of this suite with their contrasting moods, ranging from melancholy to wild excitement, add up to an extraordinary work of which we have been too long deprived—New York heard it 10 years ago. Although this music can hardly be called easy to listen to, it was received with genuine enthusiasm yesterday. The virtuoso performance of an exceedingly difficult and complicated score would, of itself, have justified the answering applause. As for the Schumann, one would rather recall Mr. Bernstein's more judicious performance of last season.

[116]

JUDGE BANS BOOK ON KOUSSEVITZKY

Halts Publication Pending Study ---Symphony Head Says It Falsely Pictures Him



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Objects to book about him and obtains injunction against it.

NEW YORK, Feb. 11 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, obtained a temporary court order today restraining publication of a book which he said "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career.

Continued on Page 6—First Col.

6

JUDGE BANS BOOK ON KOUSSEVITZKY

Continued From First Page

The book, titled "Koussevitzky" and written by Moses Smith, was scheduled for release next Saturday.

In his petition, the conductor said Smith told him several years ago that he planned to write a biography of him. Koussevitzky said he declined to give the writer any information, advising him that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

Koussevitzky's petition said the book contained "untruthful and unjustified statements, disparaging my ability as a conductor, musician and teacher."

Defendants named besides Smith were Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., publishers, and the Arco Publishing Co., Inc., distributors.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, who granted the interim injunction, will decide later whether the order will be made permanent.

Moses Smith, music critic of two Boston newspapers and subsequently connected with the Columbia Phonograph Company as supervisor of classical recordings, in his book views the Boston conductor from more than one angle (something that other music critics have done all along in the ordinary practice of their profession).

Apparently the book does not minimize Koussevitzky's tremendous accomplishment with the Boston Symphony, which he has firmly established as the world's foremost symphonic organization.

Returns to Brookline

The existing biography of Serge Koussevitzky was the work of his friend, Arthur Lurie, who is known to Symphony Hall audiences as a composer. In it Dr. Koussevitzky is presented only in the most favorable light.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who had been vacationing in Florida, has returned to his Brookline home. In the meantime, his young protege, Leonard Bernstein, is taking charge of the orchestra's visit this week to New Haven and New York. Not before has Koussevitzky voluntarily relinquished a New York concert.

Incidentally, there is nothing unpremeditated in Mr. Bernstein's taking over now. He had conducted in Boston for two weeks, and when the New York trip is completed, he will return to Boston for some more concerts.

Bernstein Is So Busy Conducting He Has No Time to Write Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

One of the busiest men in music today is Leonard Bernstein, the former Boston young man who is again back in his home town as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Lennie," as his intimates know him, is an enormously talented musician who has worked hard, and to whom success has come quickly and in large quantity.

Engagements as guest conductor keep him flitting about the country —and out of it. Last Spring he made himself known in Prague and London, and come April he will take off again for a big swing around the European circuit. No one enjoys or appreciates all this activity more than small, spare and earnest Mr. Bernstein himself. But there is one drawback—he has practically no time for composition.

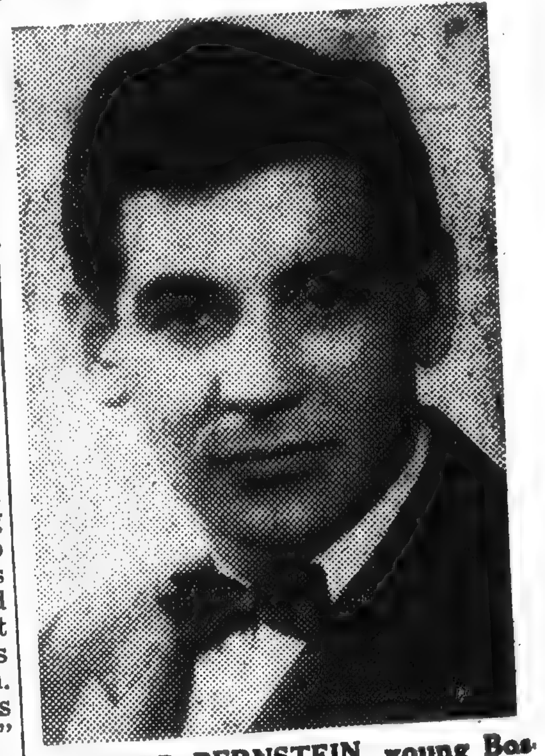
"I like to think of myself as both a conductor and a composer," he observed a little sadly over lunch last week. "When I'm not doing both I don't feel complete. Just think! Since 'On the Town' I've written only the ballet score for 'Facsimile'. With so much conducting I've just no time to compose. I'll have to work it out somehow."

The Czech citizens of Prague liked Mr. Bernstein's conducting and the American music he took them last May. But he found one American piece had long since become a "popular classic" there. That is Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." Mr. Bernstein almost had to play the piano part as well as conduct that number, for the Army car bringing Eugene List (the pianist who had played for Truman, Churchill and Stalin at Potsdam) had a breakdown on the road between Berlin and Prague. But Mr. List finally arrived and did the keyboard stint.

"It was just a year after the liberation of Prague that I arrived," said Mr. Bernstein. "It was a time of wild celebration. Peasants came in from the countryside in their gala costumes and joined the Prague citizens in the dancing in the streets. That was just it, too, dancing in the streets. What they danced to were highly amplified recordings of boogie-woogie music from over here.

"In all that year not one piece of serious German or Austrian music had been played in Prague. After all, Czecho-Slovakia had experienced nearly seven years of Nazi occupation, during which only German music was allowed. When Prague was liberated they went whole hog and absolutely barred German music.

"The Czechs are a very musical race," smiled Mr. Bernstein, fitting a cigarette into his metal holder. "Every kid on the streets knows the quartets and symphonies of Dvorak, who is their national hero in music. They know every note and word of his operas, too."



LEONARD BERNSTEIN, young Boston composer, now substituting for Dr. Koussevitsky.

KOUSSEVITSKY GETS WRIT AGAINST BOOK

Temporary Stay Granted on Conductor's Complaint That Biography Is Libelous

On the ground that a new biography of him is libelous and violates his privacy, Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, won a court order yesterday restraining publication restraining publication and distribution of the book.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag, in granting an interim stay pending determination of the musician's application for a preliminary injunction, indicated that the suit would establish a precedent on rights of publishers to publish biographies without the subject's consent. Opposing attorneys were directed to submit briefs next Wednesday.

Notice of a $500,000 suit for libel against Moses Smith, a Boston music critic who is author of the disputed book, "Koussevitzky," and the publishing concern, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., was filed in the complaint.

Concern's First Publication

The book, which was to have been distributed next Saturday, is the initial publication of the company, organized here last July. David Ewen, its editor and director, expressed "surprise" last night at Mr. Koussevitzky's action and reported that 3,000 copies of a first printing of 5,000 books had been distributed to booksellers. Howard Chipkin, lawyer and the company's secretary, appeared as defense counsel.

Should the court grant a temporary injunction, Mr. Ewen said, "every publisher in the country is in dire danger if he ever published a book about any living person, or for that matter a dead person whose family is alive or mentioned in the book."

Mr. Koussevitzky, through his attorney, Henry Root Stern of Mudge, Stern, Williams & Tucker, listed three points as basis for an injunction. He contended that publication of the book was without his consent and therefore violated Sections 50 and 51 of the State's Civil Rights Law, the "rights of privacy" law.

Publication of photographs in the book also constituts a violation of that law, he charged. Finally, he asserted, the book was libelous and "falsely and wrongfully portrays my life and musical career."

The 72-year-old Russian-born virtuoso, who almost since his advent in Boston twenty-three years ago has been the subject of adulatory comment in the musical world, set forth in an affidavit that he had declined to give Mr. Smith any information, advising that he planned to publish his autobiography later.

"The said book untruthfully and without justification describes me as generally incompetent as a conductor of orchestras, brutal to the musicians in my orchestra, incompetent as an instructor of conducting and a poseur, deficient in musical education and training," Mr. Koussevitzky complained.

Reputation Seen Damaged

He added that he found the book ~~as a whole "not only disparaging~~ but very distinctly damaging, not only to my reputation but to my material resources."

"Furthermore," he continued, "this book unjustifiably and untruthfully attacks my integrity as a man and as an artist. It impugns my loyalty and slanders a lifetime of work and devotion to the ideals of music, art and culture in the United States and throughout the world."

Mr. Ewen described the book as "not only an unbiased, but even a highly laudatory exposition of a great musical career." To restrain the right to publish it, he said, would infringe upon the rights of critics in all the arts "to speak honestly and openly about any creative contribution to the culture of our society."

The charge of libel, he went on, was less important than the question whether the rights of critics could be infringed on by prohibiting publication of criticism without the consent of the subject.

Mr. Smith for almost twenty years was music critic for The Boston American and The Boston Transcript and more recently has been director of the Masterworks Division of Columbia Records.

News Reporter

Guest Conductors Invited To Lead At Berkshire Festival

Serge Koussevitzky has invited Leonard Bernstein and Robert Shaw to be guest conductors at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer. Dr. Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the greater part of the festival of 12 concerts, announces music to be included in the programs. Mr. Bernstein and Mr. Shaw will be members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, which will be in session at the orchestra's summer home in July and early August.

The opening concert on July 13, by an orchestra of chamber music proportions, will be devoted to the works of Bach, and the second concert on July 20 to Mozart.

In the first series of concerts (July 24, 26 and 27) by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include Brahms' Second Symphony, Schubert's Seventh, Copland's Third, Rachmaninoff's Third, Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Hindemith's Violin Concerto, Barbert's Overture, "School for Scandal", Ravel's "Pavane" and "La Valse" and Martinu's Concerto Grosso. Miss Ruth Posselt will be the soloist for the Hindemith Concerto and William Primrose for the Berlioz Symp[illegible].

The second week-end, July 31 and August 2 and 3, will be devoted to a Beethoven cycle, and will be followed on August 5 by a performance of the Ninth Symphony in an extra concert.

In the final series, August 7, 9 and 10, will be played a Haydn Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Schumann's Second, Tchaikovsky's Fourth, Debussy's "The Sea", Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Mozart's Requiem, with chorus and soloists.

Information and subscriptions may be obtained from the Festival Office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

4 Conductors Back Judson in Rodzinski Row

Stokowski, Walter, Szell, Muench in Testimonials to Philharmonic Official

By Robert S. Bird

Testimonials in support of Arthur Judson, manager of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, were offered by four prominent conductors yesterday as the [illegible] began choosing sides in the quarrel between the Philharmonic manager and its resigning conductor, Atur Rodzinski, who objected to Mr. Judson's "interference."

Leopold Stokowski, Bruno Walter, George Szell and Charles Muench were the conductors who inspired the testimonials released by Mr. Judson yesterday. All have been Philharmonic guest conductors, and all but Mr. Muench are under Mr. Judson's management. Their opinions as given out in the press releases ranged from a single terse sentence by Mr. Stokowski to an enthusiastic panegyric by Mr. Muench, the visiting French conductor who enjoyed a huge success in recent appearances with the Philharmonic orchestra.

May Not Go to Court

The contest itself entered the sparring phase yesterday, but all indications were that Dr. Rodzinski was deep in a deal with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and would probably quit his relations with the Philharmonic immediately without a battle in court. He had offered his resignation Monday, effective next October, but the Philharmonic board of directors voted the next day to have it take effect at once.

Today the executive committee of the Philharmonic will meet to decide a tentative successor to fill the gap made by Dr. Rodzinski in this season's schedule. It appeared unlikely that a permanent successor would be named until much later.

Dr. Rodzinski himself received letters and telegrams from persons prominent in the music world supporting his side of the controversy, and though he was willing to exihibit these at his home, 1160 Park Avenue, he said he would first obtain permission from the senders before making them public. He said he would seek this consent today.

Center of Quarrel

Dr. Rodzinski's quarrel with Mr. Judson, who had offered him a further three-year contract to remain with the Philarmonic, centers around the conductor's charges that the manager was impairing the artistic standing of the orchestra by his interference, and that Mr. Judson's dual role as manager of the orchestra on the one hand, and head of an artists' booking agency on the other, was a major factor in the ruffled relations.

The testimonial letters to Mr. Judson adderessed themselves to the interference charge without mentioning them specifically. Mr. Muench, the visiting conductor, wrote:

"Coming as a guest to this country for the first time this year, I have had the opportunity of conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks. Not only has my musical experience been a memorable one, but I have been enchanted with the organizational perfection with which the Philharmonic concerts are run, without the smallest hitch or difficulty. The conductor has only to think of his music; everything else is done for him. I want to express to Mr. Judson and Mr. Zirate my profound gratitude and admiration."

Bruno Zirato is a associate manager of the Philharmonic.

"Co-operation" is Cited

George Szell, recently appointed conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, wrote:

"I wish to state that I found, during all periods of my guest-conductorship with the Philharmonic, during the seasons of 1944-'45, 1945-'46 and 1946-'47, the very fullest measure of genuine, helpful co-operation on the part of the management and its entire staff. This fact contributed considerably to making my appearances with the Philharmonic an especially pleasurable experience."

Bruno Walter, who is guest conductor this week and next week of the Philharmonic concerts, said:

"For many years I have been associated as conductor with the Philharmonic-Symphony. During all this time, my relationship with the management has been most cordial and satisfactory, and I have full artistic freedom."

Mr. Stokowski said:

"My relations with Arthur Judson have always been amicable."

[illegible] was [illegible]

Mr. Stokowski is [illegible] to take the orchestra on the first eleven engagements of the spring tour starting in April, and he is regarded as a possible candidate to succeed Dr. Rodzinski.

Philharmonic patrons, it was learned, are making strong representations to the management to induce Mr. Muench to take the retiring conductor's place. But in any case, it was explained yesterday that the management probably would do some improvisation among available conductors for finishing out the season; perhaps by inducing Mr. Walter to extend his Philharmonic engagements and persuade Mr. Stokowski to rearrange his part of the schedule so as to fill in further, and perhaps obtain the services of Mr. Muench when he returns to New York in mid-March from an out-of-town tour. He is now scheduled to fly to France the day after his return here.

Both Sides Seo Lawyers

Though both sides had consulted lawyers in conection with legal phases of the rift, it was learned that the Philharmonic's letter of notification to Dr. Rodzinski, terminating his services forthwith instead of in October as he had requested, was couched in conciliatory terms. This appeared to diminish the chances of an open court battle.

Neither the Chicago Symphony Orchestra management nor Dr. Rodzinski would confirm nor deny the persistent and even detailed reports of their negotiations.

One report, confirmed only by an interested third party, was that Dr. Rodzinski was dickering with the Chicago orchestra at the same time he was discussing the matter of a ned Philharmonic contract, and that a meeting Monday of the Philharmonic executive committee which was attended by the conductor was the showdown on the dual bargaining deals.

In Chicago, Edward L. Ryerson, president of the Chicago Orchestra, told the New York Herald Tribune in answer to the direct question, as to whether Dr. Rodzinski was joining the Chicago orchestra:

"I'm not ready to make any comment now. I will neither deny nor confirm any report on Dr. Rodzinski." He added that he might have something further to say in a week or so.

The present conductor of the Chicago orchestra is Desiro Defauw, the Belgian, who succeeded in revivifying artistically and financially the moribund organization during his tenure. "The Chicago Tribune" has been demanding his removal, however.

The issue in the present dispute involves Mr. Judson's double role as manager of the Philharmonic and president of Columbia Concerts, Inc., which manages artists and most of the country's leading conductors. The Philharmonic is a non-profit body that functions on a deficit basis, and Columbia Concerts is a profit-making organization. It consists of ve management bureaus, of which one is Mr. Judson's Concert Management Arthur Judson.

The Philharmonic and Columbia concerts have separate organizations except for a few facilities shared by both, of which one is the press department. But the effect of Mr. Judson's dual connection is that soloist artists and conductors managed by him are also frequently the paid guests of the Philharmonic, the non-profit-making organization.

Because Mr. Judson manages so many of the conductors, most of the guest conductors of the Philharmonic are under this double Judson control. Of the other guest artists that appear with Philharmonic, some are managed by the Judson organization and many of them by other booking agencies.

MUSIC

Le Beau Charles

[illegible] was mid-season—a time when symphony conductors take a rest and the players try to fathom the strange habits of guest conductors. With Conductor Artur Rodzinski away, the men of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony had just gotten used to fiddling and blowing in the allout way Guest Conductor Leopold Stokowski wanted. Now they had to get used to another guest conductor.

The new man, Charles Münch, France's greatest conductor, pleaded with the men at rehearsal: "Gentlemen, gentlemen! Please play lightly." When the orchestra finally caught on, Charles Münch threw the men a kiss and shouted "Bravo!" In the musicians' locker room afterward, there was a buzz of enthusiasm; a good many of the Philharmonic players had caught some of the Münch spirit that is proverbial in Paris.

Joe Covello-Black Star

CONDUCTOR MÜNCH

Cheers for horizontal dissonance.

Conductor Münch, a well-set-up 55, is an Alsatian who learned conducting from Wilhelm Furtwängler in Leipzig. In 1938 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, Paris' oldest symphony orchestra, soon had a following of hundreds of French women who bought season tickets for concerts of "le beau Charles," without even caring what he was to play. The Conservatoire directors cared, though. They admitted that he got brilliant tone quality out of his musicians, but they did not share his enthusiasm for contemporary music. Three months ago the directors ordered him to conduct more familiar symphonies. Münch resigned. (He could afford to: his wife, a Swiss condensed-milk heiress, is a very wealthy woman.)

For guest appearances in his first visit

TIME, FEBRUARY 3, 1947

Summer
is only an Afte

FROM CHICAGO: Luxury DC-4 Flights Non-Stop to Miami — 5 Hrs. 36 Min. One Way Fare $59.00, plus tax

FROM CINCINNATI: Miami Express Flights in Luxury DC-4's via Jacksonville, Florida. One Way Fare $47.15, plus tax

FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MILWAUKEE, DETROIT, COLUMBUS, DAYTON and TOLEDO, convenient connections at Chicago or Cincinnati.

For reservations c

ATHENS, GA.
BANNER HERALD

MAR 4 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

4 Conductors Back Judson in Rodzinski Row

Stokowski, Walter, Szell, Muench in Testimonials to Philharmonic Official

By Robert S. Bird

Testimonials in support of Arthur Judson, manager of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, were offered by four prominent conductors yesterday as the music world began choosing sides in the quarrel between the Philharmonic manager and its resigning conductor, Atur Rodzinski, who objected to Mr. Judson's "interference."

Leopold Stokowski, Bruno Walter, George Szell and Charles Muench were the conductors who inscribed the testimonials released by Mr. Judson yesterday. All have been Philharmonic guest conductors, and all but Mr. Muench are under Mr. Judson's management. Their opinions as given out in the press releases ranged from a single terse sentence by Mr. Stokowski to an enthusiastic panegyric by Mr. Muench, the visiting French conductor who enjoyed a huge success in recent appearances with the Philharmonic orchestra.

May Not Go to Court

The contest itself entered the sparring phase yesterday, but all indications were that Dr. Rodzinski was deep in a deal with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and would probably quit his relations with the Philharmonic immediately without a battle in court. He had offered his resignation Monday, effective next October, but the Philharmonic board of directors voted the next day to have it take effect at once.

Today the executive committee of the Philharmonic will meet to decide a tentative successor to fill the gap made by Dr. Rodzinski in this season's schedule. It appeared unlikely that a permanent successor would be named until much later.

Dr. Rodzinski himself received letters and telegrams from persons prominent in the music world supporting his side of the controversy, and though he was willing to exhibit these at his home, 1160 Park Avenue, he said he would first obtain permission from the senders before making them public. He said he would seek this consent today.

Center of Quarrel

Dr. Rodzinski's quarrel with Mr. Judson, who had offered him a further three-year contract to remain with the Philarmonic, centers around the conductor's charges that the manager was impairing the artistic standing of the orchestra by his interference, and that Mr. Judson's dual role as manager of the orchestra on the one hand, and head of an artists' booking agency on the other, was a major factor in the ruffled relations.

The testimonial letters to Mr. Judson adderessed themselves to the interference charge without mentioning them specifically. Mr. Muench, the visiting conductor, wrote:

"Coming as a guest to this country for the first time this year, I have had the opportunity of conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks. Not only has my musical experience been a memorable one, but I have been enchanted with the organizational perfection with which the Philharmonic concerts are run, without the smallest hitch or difficulty. The conductor has only to think of his music; everything else is done for him. I want to express to Mr. Judson and Mr. Zirate my profound gratitude and admiration."

Bruno Zirato is a associate manager of the Philharmonic.

"Co-operation" Is Cited

George Szell, recently appointed conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, wrote:

"I wish to state that I found, during all periods of my guest-conductorship with the Philharmonic, during the seasons of 1944-'45, 1945-'46 and 1946-'47, the very fullest measure of genuine, helpful co-operation on the part of the management and its entire staff. This fact contributed considerably to making my appearances with the Philharmonic an especially pleasurable experience."

Bruno Walter, who is guest conductor this week and next week of the Philharmonic concerts, said:

"For many years I have been associated as conductor with the Philharmonic-Symphony. During all this time, my relationship with the management has been most cordial and satisfactory, and I have full artistic freedom."

Mr. Stokowski said:

"My relations with Arthur Judson have always been amicable."

eleven [illegible] tour starting in [illegible] is regarded as a possible candidate to succeed Dr. Rodzinski.

Philharmonic patrons, it was learned, are making strong representations to the management to induce Mr. Muench to take the retiring conductor's place. But in any case, it was explained yesterday that the management probably would do some improvisation among available conductors for finishing out the season; perhaps by inducing Mr. Walter to extend his Philharmonic engagements and persuade Mr. Stokowski to rearrange his part of the schedule so as to fill in further, and perhaps obtain the services of Mr. Muench when he returns to New York in mid-March from an out-of-town tour. He is now scheduled to fly to France the day after his return here.

Both Sides See Lawyers

Though both sides had consulted lawyers in conection with legal phases of the rift, it was learned that the Philharmonic letter of notification to Dr. Rodzinski, terminating his services forthwith instead of in October as he had requested, was [illegible] in conciliatory terms. T[illegible] to diminish the chan[illegible] open court battle.

Neither the Chicago Symphony Orchestra management nor Dr. Rodzinski would [illegible] nor deny the persistent and even detailed reports of their negotiations.

One report, confirmed only by an interested third party, was that Dr. Rodzinski was dickering with the Chicago orchestra at the same time he was discussing the matter of a ned Philharmonic contract, and that a meeting Monday of the Philharmonic executive committee which was attended by the conductor was the showdown on the dual bargaining deals.

In Chicago, Edward L. Ryerson, president of the Chicago Orchestra, told the New York Herald Tribune in answer to the direct question, as to whether Dr. Rodzinski was joining the Chicago orchestra:

"I'm not ready to make any comment now. I will neither deny nor confirm any report on Dr. Rodzinski." He added that he might have something further to say in a week or so.

The present conductor of the Chicago orchestra is Desiro Defauw, the Belgian, who succeeded in revivifying artistically and financially the moribund organization during his tenure. "The Chicago Tribune" has been demanding his removal, however.

The issue in the present dispute involves Mr. Judson's double role as manager of the Philharmonic and president of Columbia Concerts, Inc., which manages artists and most of the country's leading conductors. The Philharmonic is a non-profit body that functions on a deficit basis, and Columbia Concerts is a profit-making organization. It consists of ve management bureaus, of which one is Mr. Judson's Concert Management Arthur Judson.

The Philharmonic and Columbia concerts have separate organizations except for a few facilities shared by both, of which one is the press department. But the effect of Mr. Judson's dual connection is that soloist artists and conductors managed by him are also frequently the paid guests of the Philharmonic, the non-profit-making organization.

Because Mr. Judson manages so many of the conductors, most of the guest conductors of the Philharmonic are under this double Judson control. Of the other guest artists that appear with Philharmonic, some are managed by the Judson organization and many of them by other booking agencies.

MUSIC

Le Beau Charles

[illegible] was mid-season—a time when symp[illegible] conductors take a rest and the [illegible] try to fathom the strange habits of [illegible] conductors. With Conductor Artur [illegible]ski away, the men of the New York [illegible]monic-Symphony had just gotten [illegible] fiddling and blowing in the allout [illegible] Guest Conductor Leopold Stokowski [illegible]. Now they had to get used to an[illegible] guest conductor.

[illegible] new man, Charles Münch, France's [illegible] conductor, pleaded with the men [illegible] rehearsal: "Gentlemen, gentlemen! [illegible] lightly." When the orchestra [illegible] on, Charles Münch threw [illegible] kiss and shouted "Bravo!" In the musicians' locker room afterward, there was a buzz of enthusiasm; a good many of the Philharmonic players had caught some of the Münch spirit that is proverbial in Paris.

Joe Covello-Black Star

CONDUCTOR MÜNCH
Cheers for horizontal dissonance.

Conductor Münch, a well-set-up 55, is an Alsatian who learned conducting from Wilhelm Furtwängler in Leipzig. In 1938 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, Paris' oldest symphony orchestra, soon had a following of hundreds of French women who bought season tickets for concerts of "le beau Charles," without even caring what he was to play. The Conservatoire directors cared, though. They admitted that he got brilliant tone quality out of his musicians, but they did not share his enthusiasm for contemporary music. Three months ago the directors ordered him to conduct more familiar symphonies. Münch resigned. (He could afford to: his wife, a Swiss condensed-milk heiress, is a very wealthy woman.)

For guest appearances in his first visit

TIME, FEBRUARY 3, 1947

Summer
is only an Afte

FROM CHICAGO: Luxury DC-4 Flights Non-Stop to Miami — 5 Hrs. 36 Min. One Way Fare $59.00, plus tax

FROM CINCINNATI: Miami Express Flights in Luxury DC-4's via Jacksonville, Florida. One Way Fare $47.15, plus tax

FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MILWAUKEE, DETROIT, COLUMBUS, DAYTON and TOLEDO, convenient connections at Chicago or Cincinnati.

For reservations c

Over

ATHENS, GA[illegible]
BANNER H[illegible]
MAR 4 [illegible]

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

4 Conductors Back Judson in Rodzinski Row

Stokowski, Walter, Szell, Muench in Testimonials to Philharmonic Official

By Robert S. Bird

Testimonials in support of Arthur Judson, manager of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, were offered by four prominent conductors yesterday as the music world began choosing sides in the quarrel between the Philharmonic manager and its resigning conductor, Atur Rodzinski, who objected to Mr. Judson's "interference."

Leopold Stokowski, Bruno Walter, George Szell and Charles Muench were the conductors who inscribed the testimonials released by Mr. Judson yesterday. All have been Philarmonic guest conductors, and all but Mr. Muench are under Mr. Judson's management. Their opinions as given out in the press releases ranged from a single terse sentence by Mr. Stokowski to an enthusiastic panegyric by Mr. Muench, the visiting French conductor who enjoyed a huge success in recent appearances with the Philharmonic orchestra.

May Not Go to Court

The contest itself entered the sparring phase yesterday, but all indications were that Dr. Rodzinski was deep in a deal with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and would probably quit his relations with the Philharmonic immediately without a battle in court. He had offered his resignation Monday, effective next October, but the Philharmonic board of directors voted the next day to have it take effect at once.

Today the executive committee of the Philharmonic will meet to decide a tentative successor to fill the gap made by Dr. Rodzinski in this season's schedule. It appeared unlikely that a permanent successor would be named until much later.

Dr. Rodzinski himself received letters and telegrams from persons prominent in the music world supporting his side of the controversy, and though he was willing to exhibit these at his home, 1160 Park Avenue, he said he would first obtain permission from the senders before making them public. He said he would seek this consent today.

Center of Quarrel

Dr. Rodzinski's quarrel with Mr. Judson, who had offered him a further three-year contract to remain with the Philarmonic, centers around the conductor's charges that the manager was impairing the artistic standing of the orchestra by his interference, and that Mr. Judson's dual role as manager of the orchestra on the one hand, and head of an artists' booking agency on the other, was a major factor in the ruffled relations.

The testimonial letters to Mr. Judson adderessed themselves to the interference charge without mentioning them specifically. Mr. Muench, the visiting conductor, wrote:

"Coming as a guest to this country for the first time this year, I have had the opportunity of conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks. Not only has my musical experience been a memorable one, but I have been enchanted with the organizational perfection with which the Philharmonic concerts are run, without the smallest hitch or difficulty. The conductor has only to think of his music; everything else is done for him. I want to express to Mr. Judson and Mr. Zirate my profound gratitude and admiration."

Bruno Zirato is a associate manager of the Philharmonic.

"Co-operation" is Cited

George Szell, recently appointed conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, wrote:

"I wish to state that I found, during all periods of my guest-conductorship with the Philharmonic, during the seasons of 1944-'45, 1945-'46 and 1946-'47, the very fullest measure of genuine, helpful co-operation on the part of the management and its entire staff. This fact contributed considerably to making my appearances with the Philharmonic an especially pleasurable experience."

Bruno Walter, who is guest conductor this week and next week of the Philharmonic concerts, said:

"For many years I have been associated as conductor with the Philharmonic-Symphony. During all this time, my relationship with the management has been most cordial and satisfactory, and I have full artistic freedom."

Mr. Stokowski said:

"My relations with Arthur Judson have always been amicable."

eleven [illegible] tour starting in [illegible] he is regarded as a possible candidate to succeed Dr. Rodzinski.

Philharmonic patrons, it was learned, are making strong representations to the management to induce Mr. Muench to take the retiring conductor's place. But in any case, it was explained yesterday that the management probably would do some improvisation among available conductors for finishing out the season; perhaps by inducing Mr. Walter to extend his Philharmonic engagements and persuade Mr. Stokowski to rearrange his part of the schedule so as to fill in further, and perhaps obtain the services of Mr. Muench when he returns to New York in mid-March from an out-of-town tour. He is now scheduled to fly to France the day after his return here.

Both Sides See Lawyers

Though both sides had consulted lawyers in conection with legal phases of the rift, it was learned that the Philharmonic's letter of notification to Dr. Rodzinski, terminating his services forthwith instead of in October as he had requested, was [illegible] in conciliatory terms. [illegible] to diminish the chance of an open court battle.

Neither the Chicago Symphony Orchestra management nor Dr. Rodzinski would confirm nor deny the persistent and even detailed reports of their negotiations.

One report, confirmed only by an interested third party, was that Dr. Rodzinski was dickering with the Chicago orchestra at the same time he was discussing the matter of a ned Philharmonic contract, and that a meeting Monday of the Philharmonic executive committee which was attended by the conductor was the showdown on the dual bargaining deals.

In Chicago, Edward L. Ryerson, president of the Chicago Orchestra, told the New York Herald Tribune in answer to the direct question, as to whether Dr. Rodzinski was joining the Chicago orchestra:

"I'm not ready to make any comment now. I will neither deny nor confirm any report on Dr. Rodzinski." He added that he might have something further to say in a week or so.

The present conductor of the Chicago orchestra is Desiro Defauw, the Belgian, who succeeded in revivifying artistically and financially the moribund organization during his tenure. "The Chicago Tribune" has been demanding his removal, however.

The issue in the present dispute involves Mr. Judson's double role as manager of the Philharmonic and president of Columbia Concerts, Inc., which manages artists and most of the country's leading conductors. The Philharmonic is a non-profit body that functions on a deficit basis, and Columbia Concerts is a profit-making organization. It consists of ve management bureaus, of which one is Mr. Judson's Concert Management Arthur Judson.

The Philharmonic and Columbia concerts have separate organizations except for a few facilities shared by both, of which one is the press department. But the effect of Mr. Judson's dual connection is that soloist artists and conductors managed by him are also frequently the paid guests of the Philharmonic, the non-profit-making organization.

Because Mr. Judson manages so many of the conductors, most of the guest conductors of the Philharmonic are under this double Judson control. Of the other guest artists that appear with Philharmonic, some are managed by the Judson organization and many of them by other booking agencies.

---

to the U.S., Münch was allowed to pick his own programs. In Boston, where he made a big hit, Beacon Hill rustled with rumors that he would succeed 72-year-old Serge Koussevitzky as the Boston's permanent conductor.*

For his two weeks with the New York Philharmonic, Münch scheduled nine pieces by six Frenchmen. In his first Manhattan appearance last week, critics panned his Ravel and Debussy (they thought he overdid them), but cheered the first U.S. performance of French Dissonantist Arthur Honegger's Third (Liturgique) Symphony. It clanked through a violent first movement, settled into a lyric, prayer-like second movement and after an explosive climax in the third concluded with a wispy, ethereal melody. Said Conductor Münch: "It is horizontal music, rather stern and unsentimental, and as such, an expression of our times."

Harpsichordists out of Tune

The harpsichord went out when the piano came in. Nobody at the time seemed very sorry: the piano was easier to play, its notes carried further, and it had greater range of tone. But the harpsichord has made a startling comeback—thanks largely to one woman. There has probably been more harpsichord-playing in New York in the past year than any time since the days of George Washington. Last week Manhattan harpsichord fans, a serious-minded lot, could hear either the master herself, stately, 67-year-old Wanda Landowska, or her most successful ex-pupil, Ralph Kirkpatrick.

To the unschooled ear, the harpsichord jangles like a regiment of mice scurrying through a pile of coins. But its connoisseurs find in the harpsichord rarefied and rustling harmonies, comparable to a choir of flutes and mandolins. When Landowska began, nobody was writing harpsichord music; it was a dead art. Composers like Francis Poulenc (her student for a year) and the late Manuel De Falla wrote harpsichord music for her. Said she: "It was a battle, you have no idea what a battle it was, to impose the harpsichord upon the musical world. When I started before 1900, the tradition was not."

Most of the topflight harpsichordists are Landowska-trained: Switzerland's Isabel Nef, Italy's Ruggero Gerlin, London's Lucille Wallace, Los Angeles' Alice Ehlers, Manhattan's Sylvia Marlowe (who sometimes swings it) and Ralph Kirkpatrick.

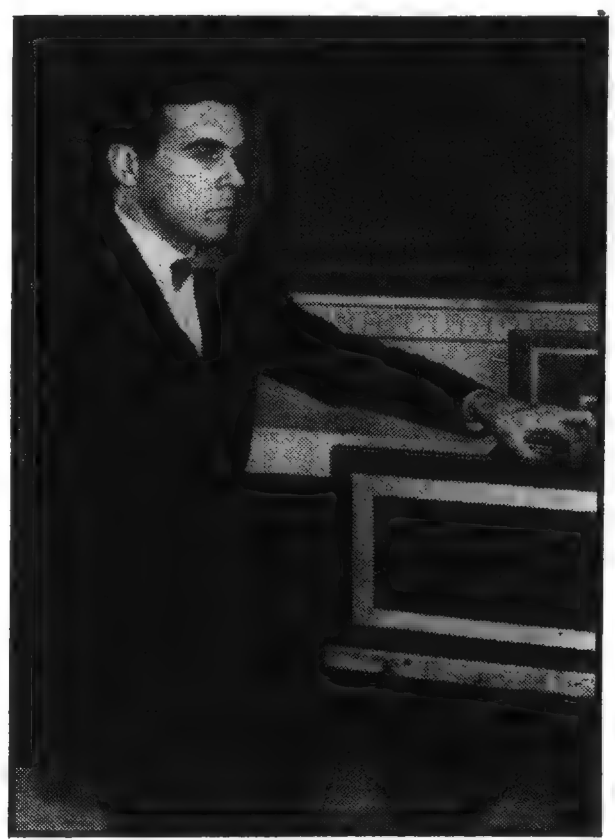
Collectors & Cranks. Kirkpatrick, who is now 35, was a sophomore at Harvard when he saw his first harpsichord—a museum piece. When he was graduated (he majored in art history) he went to France, studied at Landowska's academy at Saint-Leu-le-Forêt, gave his first public recital in Berlin in 1933. Today he plays about 70 recitals a season, and is glad to see his audiences spreading beyond the earnest, humorless cultists he once played to. Says he: "Audiences used to be largely record collectors and cranks who also liked folk dancing because it was pure and sexless."

Philippe [illegible]

WANDA LANDOWSKA

In a pile of coins . . .

Kirkpatrick, a bachelor, lives in a tiny Manhattan apartment crowded with two harpsichords, an 18th Century piano, a clavichord and a thousand books. To keep his instruments in tune he seldom turns on the radiator ("My friends stay away in the winter to keep from catching cold"). He plays Bach and Mozart with a hard, dry purity—and sometimes, say critics, with a little too much banging. He long ago broke with Teacher Landowska, whose playing is more showy and dramatic. Says Kirkpatrick starchily: "Landowska is a great artist. But other artists take different ways. It generally means a break." Wanda Landowska also long ago stopped speaking of Kirkpatrick as her pupil. Says she: "Shall we say, my pupils must be my friends."



Ralph Royle-Graphic House

RALPH KIRKPATRICK

. . . no scurrying mice.

---

* Dr. Koussevitzky too was on his annual vacation. In his absence, the Boston will be led for a month by 28-year-old Leonard Bernstein, Koussevitzky's favorite protégé, and also mentioned as a likely successor.

ATHENS, GA.
BANNER HERALD
MAR 4

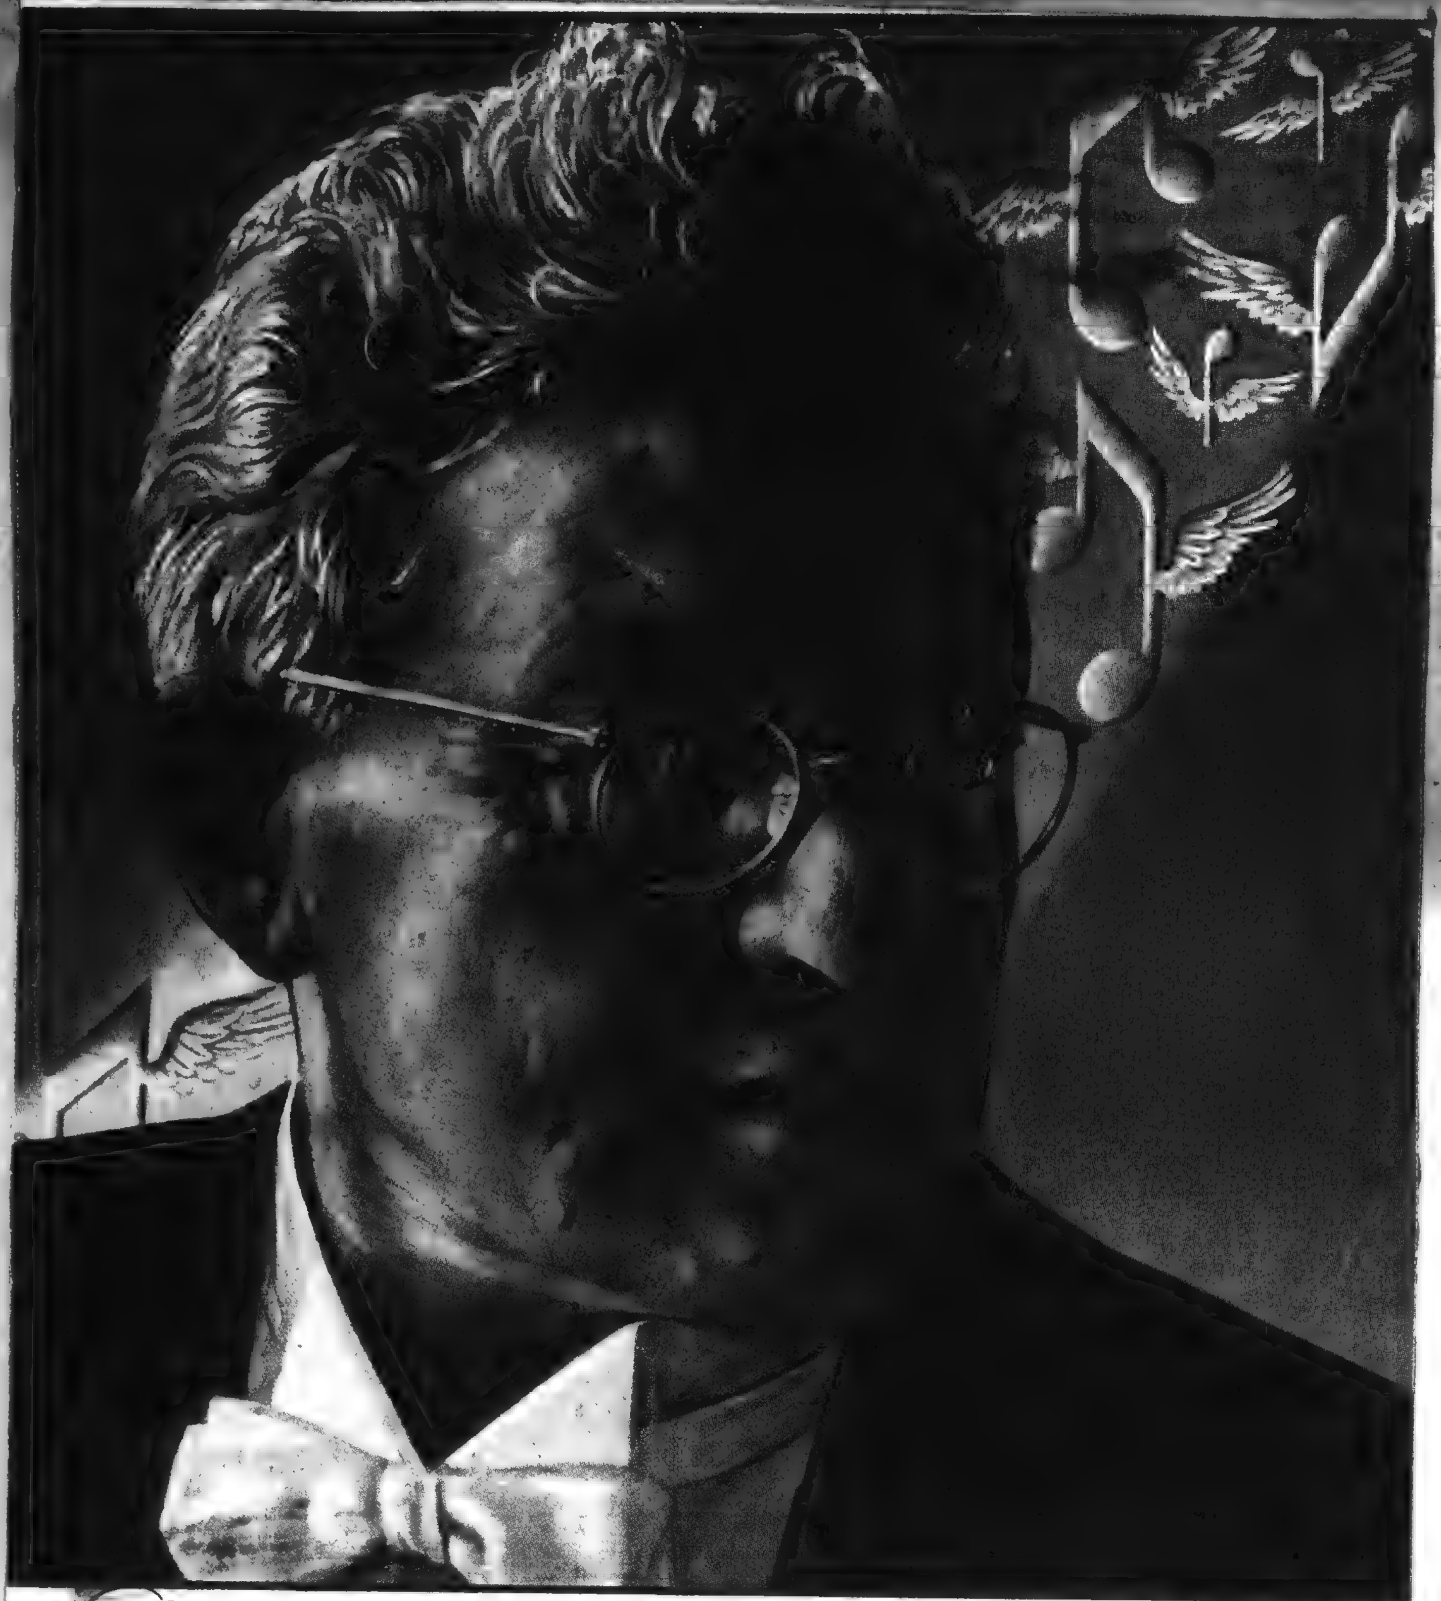
THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

[118]



Carlos Ochagavi

Times
Feb 17 1947

CONDUCTOR RODZINSKI
Harmony is hand-made.
(Music)

rest from records and radio), Rodzinski would be getting less than $50,000 in Chicago.

Wherever the command had come from, Rodzinski was also moved by a strong negative reason. New York is a big place, in a sense, but it cramped Rodzinski's style; the town was not big enough to hold both him and Arthur Judson. "You cannot play music with one ear on the box office," says Rodzinski. And the box office means Judson. He is not only the man behind the Philharmonic, but the man who comes nearest to controlling classical music in the U.S. The 30-man Philharmonic board, a collection of socialites, Wall Streeters, amateurs of the arts and a few musicians, stand greatly in awe of Judson. They respect his judgments; and they have bought and paid for them. And Arthur Judson would not let Rodzinski run the Philharmonic the way he wanted it run.

King Arthur. Music is not only one of the highest arts, it is also a pretty tough business. In the music business, austere, unapproachable Arthur Judson has the making or breaking of scores of careers. James Caesar Petrillo sets the minimum wages for U.S. musicians; it is Judson who often gets the maximum for the best ones. Judson was once a professional violinist, but he learned early that there is more money in managing artists than in being one. The money he gets from the Philharmonic is peanuts to him ($15,000 a year) but the prestige and power count. Today his Columbia Concerts Inc. grosses $5 million a year, keeps Lily Pons, Jascha Heifetz and $250-a-concert unknowns circulating through 540 cities & towns.* Judson, remote from lesser musicians, has close friends among his top clients, looks like a Lord Calvert whiskey Man of Distinction (and in fact is one).

All but a stubborn handful of U.S. conductors (some exceptions: Toscanini, Koussevitsky, and for the past year Rodzinski) are under contract to Judson. Conductors are glad to pay his stiff commissions (up to 20%) simply as unemployment insurance; if they need a new job they will need his help. There are only 24 major symphonies in the U.S., and some 50 conductors on ic's board of busy New udson and his assistant, ce secretary to Enrico

le such things as con-
Judson & Zirato have dling, say their critics.
e Philharmonic has had ile in the same period
, and Philadelphia two.
ski demanded a three-
d no strings.
," he said, "it had no
s!" The contract gave what pieces would be

---

ts big rival, National Con-
orp. (which handles few 90% of the concert book-gers, dancers and instru-o Sol Hurok, better known
o self-effacing as Judson,
N C A C works through it.

Metropo

RODZINSKI IN REHEARSAL
Precision without fire.

Alfred Eisenstaedt-Pix

RODZINSKI LEADING THE NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC
Big Ben rang.

MUSIC

The Master Builder

(See Cover)

A conductor's job is to make harmony. He plays the most complicated musical instrument conceivable—a symphony orchestra. When he plays well, he has only to raise his hand, or nod his head, and strings bow in unison, brasses, flutes and kettledrums come in on cue.

That is the harmony the public hears. But there are other, behind-the-scene noises that go to make up that harmony. They are the clashes of musical temperament, the clanging demands of the cash register, the murmurings of directors and managers. A successful conductor has to make a harmony out of them too.

Last week a pent-up man eased his big frame into a desk chair in a plainly furnished 16th-floor office in Manhattan's Steinway Building. The man was Dr. Artur Rodzinski, conductor of New York's renowned Philharmonic-Symphony. His small eyes, almost concealed behind thick glasses, took in his audience: seven tense members of the Philharmonic's executive committee.

They had offered to renew Rodzinski's contract for three years. There were a few strings attached, of course, but—. Well, what did he say? Grey-maned Artur Rodzinski had a lot to say. Speaking above the muted horns of the 57th Street traffic below, he said it for an hour and 20 minutes. A lot of it was on the state of the orchestra whose greatness he had restored. Improved rather. But a lot more was about a man named Arthur Judson. His speech rose to a bitter, excited tirade that accused Arthur Judson, the handsome, leonine manager of the Philharmonic, of trying to run the orchestra and hamstringing the conductor. Mr. Judson, who was present, listened with interest.

When Rodzinski stopped, flushed and spent, there was half a minute of pregnant, almost audibly gestating silence. When the Philharmonic's board chairman finally spoke, it was as if a thin sheet of ice had been carefully cracked. And what, said he, had Mr. Rodzinski decided? "Give me 24 hours to think it over," said Rodzinski, and left for home.

There he discussed matters with Halina, his attractive wife—and with his conscience. (Conductor Rodzinski is a Buchmanite, and believes that he gets "guidance" in all his decisions.) Two hours later, he sent a telegram to the board chairman—and tipped off the press too. He had quit.

Babushka,* We Go! Next morning, the story was on Manhattan front pages. (Not the tabloids, of course: there was no sex angle.) Waves of friends and reporters eddied through the Rodzinskis' Park Avenue apartment. They found the household as gaily confused as a Polish wedding party: the telephone and doorbell jingled merrily, Artur poured wine, vivacious Halina sliced Polish pastries.

From here & there over the country telegrams cried bravo. In the midst of all these exclamation points came a lone period: a terse message from the Philharmonic board, releasing Rodzinski not at the end of the season, as he had asked, but at once. His spirits only soared higher. Elatedly, he jounced his two-year-old son's big clown doll on his knee and told it the news; he grabbed his 75-year-old mother around the waist, waltzed her around the room and cried exultantly: "Babushka, now we are going to Chicago!"

Rogers-European

MANAGER JUDSON
Big Arthur was silent. (OVER)

What was he so happy about? Artur Rodzinski had cut himself off from the biggest job in U.S. music. Most conductors would give either arm to get his place—and he was quitting, to take over the run-down Chicago Symphony. The prestige-incrusted Philharmonic is the oldest (104 years) orchestra in the U.S., and, next to London's and Vienna's, the oldest in the world. It is also the most widely heard (13 million people listen to its Sunday CBS broadcasts).

Mission Accomplished. Under Toscanini the Philharmonic made musical history. But between his departure (1936) and Rodzinski's arrival from Cleveland (1943), the Philharmonic began to droop; neither Toscanini's hapless successor, John Barbirolli, nor a long parade of guest conductors could get it marching.

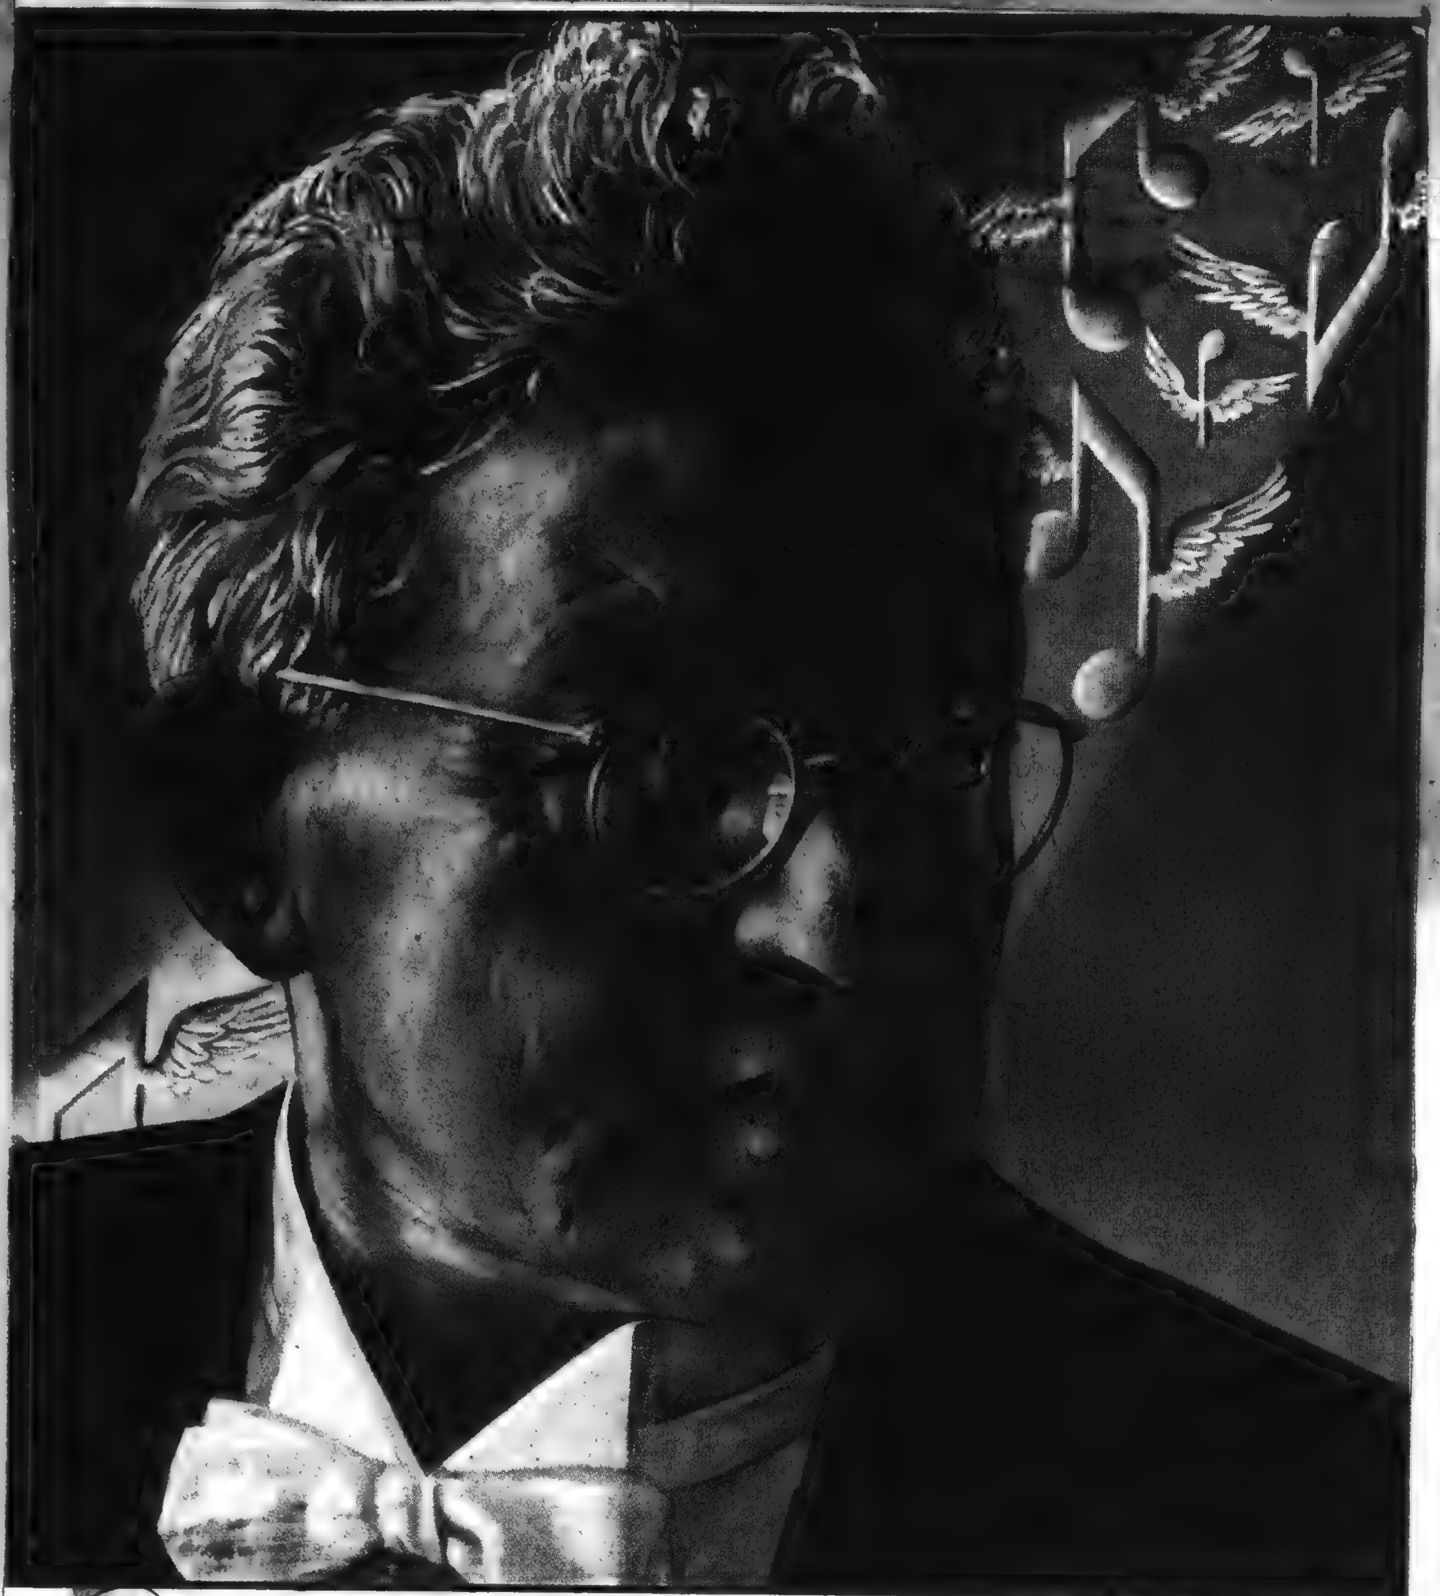
Today it is the most improved orchestra in the land. An arguable case can now be made (as it could not when Rodzinski took over) that the Philharmonic is the best orchestra in the U.S. The New York Herald Tribune's able Critic Virgil Thomson considers it "possibly the finest in the world."

The man who brought it to that pitch is a great orchestra builder. Rodzinski tore into the Philharmonic as a contractor would attack a run-down mansion. He ripped out the human deadwood, restored the shaky foundations of the strings, the brass. He drove his workmen furiously, taught them precision and sonority.

When he came, they were torn by hatred and jealousy. The new conductor invited his men to his home. Then Halina asked the wives over. One by one, Rodzinski had his men in for heart-to-heart chats, talked over their domestic harmony as well as their musical problems.

"Every violinist," he explains, "is a

[119]



Carlos Ochagavi

Times
Feb 17 1947

CONDUCTOR RODZINSKI
Harmony is hand-made.
(Music)

RODZINSKI LEADING THE NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC
Big Ben rang.

MUSIC

The Master Builder

(See Cover)

A conductor's job is to make harmony. He plays the most complicated musical instrument conceivable—a symphony orchestra. When he plays well, he has only to raise his hand, or nod his head, and strings bow in unison, brasses, flutes and kettledrums come in on cue.

That is the harmony the public hears. But there are other, behind-the-scene noises that go to make up that harmony. They are the clashes of musical temperament, the clanging demands of the cash register, the murmurings of directors and managers. A successful conductor has to make a harmony out of them too.

Last week a pent-up man eased his big frame into a desk chair in a plainly furnished 16th-floor office in Manhattan's Steinway Building. The man was Dr. Artur Rodzinski, conductor of New York's renowned Philharmonic-Symphony. His small eyes, almost concealed behind thick glasses, took in his audience: seven tense members of the Philharmonic's executive committee.

They had offered to renew Rodzinski's contract for three years. There were a few strings attached, of course, but—. Well, what did he say? Grey-maned Artur Rodzinski had a lot to say. Speaking above the muted horns of the 57th Street traffic below, he said it for an hour and 20 minutes. A lot of it was on the state of the orchestra whose greatness he had restored. [illegible] rather. But a lot more was about a man named Arthur Judson. His speech rose to a bitter, excited tirade that accused Arthur Judson, the handsome, leonine manager of the Philharmonic, of trying to run the orchestra and hamstringing the conductor. Mr. Judson, who was present, listened with interest.

When Rodzinski stopped, flushed and spent, there was half a minute of pregnant, almost audibly gestating silence. When the Philharmonic's board chairman finally spoke, it was as if a thin sheet of ice had been carefully cracked. And what, said he, had Mr. Rodzinski decided? "Give me 24 hours to think it over," said Rodzinski, and left for home.

There he discussed matters with Halina, his attractive wife—and with his conscience. (Conductor Rodzinski is a Buchmanite, and believes that he gets "guidance" in all his decisions.) Two hours later, he sent a telegram to the board chairman—and tipped off the press too. He had quit.

Babushka*, We Go! Next morning, the story was on Manhattan front pages. (Not the tabloids, of course: there was no sex angle.) Waves of friends and reporters eddied through the Rodzinskis' Park Avenue apartment. They found the household as gaily confused as a Polish wedding party: the telephone and doorbell jingled merrily, Artur poured wine, vivacious Halina sliced Polish pastries.

From here & there over the country telegrams cried bravo. In the midst of all these exclamation points came a lone period: a terse message from the Philharmonic board, releasing Rodzinski not at the end of the season, as he had asked, but at once. His spirits only soared higher. Elatedly, he jounced his two-year-old son's big clown doll on his knee and told it the news; he grabbed his 75-year-old mother around the waist, waltzed her around the room and cried exultantly: "Babushka, now we are going to Chicago!"

Rogers-European

MANAGER JUDSON
Big Arthur was silent. (OVER)

What was he so happy about? Artur Rodzinski had cut himself off from the biggest job in U.S. music. Most conductors would give either arm to get his place—and he was quitting, to take over the run-down Chicago Symphony. The prestige-incrusted Philharmonic is the oldest (104 years) orchestra in the U.S., and, next to London's and Vienna's, the oldest in the world. It is also the most widely heard (13 million people listen to its Sunday CBS broadcasts).

Mission Accomplished. Under Toscanini the Philharmonic made musical history. But between his departure (1936) and Rodzinski's arrival from Cleveland (1943), the Philharmonic began to droop; neither Toscanini's hapless successor, John Barbirolli, nor a long parade of guest conductors could get it marching.

Today it is the most improved orchestra in the land. An arguable case can now be made (as it could not when Rodzinski took over) that the Philharmonic is the best orchestra in the U.S. The New York Herald Tribune's able Critic Virgil Thomson considers it "possibly the finest in the world."

The man who brought it to that pitch is a great orchestra builder. Rodzinski tore into the Philharmonic as a contractor would attack a run-down mansion. He ripped out the human deadwood, restored the shaky foundations of the strings, the brass. He drove his workmen furiously, taught them precision and sonority.

When he came, they were torn by hatred and jealousy. The new conductor invited his men to his home. Then Halina asked the wives over. One by one, Rodzinski had his men in for heart-to-heart chats, talked over their domestic harmony as well as their musical problems.

"Every violinist," he explains, "is a rest from records and radio), Rodzinski would be getting less than $50,000 in Chicago.

---

Wherever the command had come from, Rodzinski was also moved by a strong negative reason. New York is a big place, in a sense, but it cramped Rodzinski's style; the town was not big enough to hold both him and Arthur Judson. "You cannot play music with one ear on the box office," says Rodzinski. And the box office means Judson. He is not only the man behind the Philharmonic, but the man who comes nearest to controlling classical music in the U.S. The 30-man Philharmonic board, a collection of socialites, Wall Streeters, amateurs of the arts and a few musicians, stand greatly in awe of Judson. They respect his judgments; and they have bought and paid for them. And Arthur Judson would not let Rodzinski run the Philharmonic the way he wanted it run.

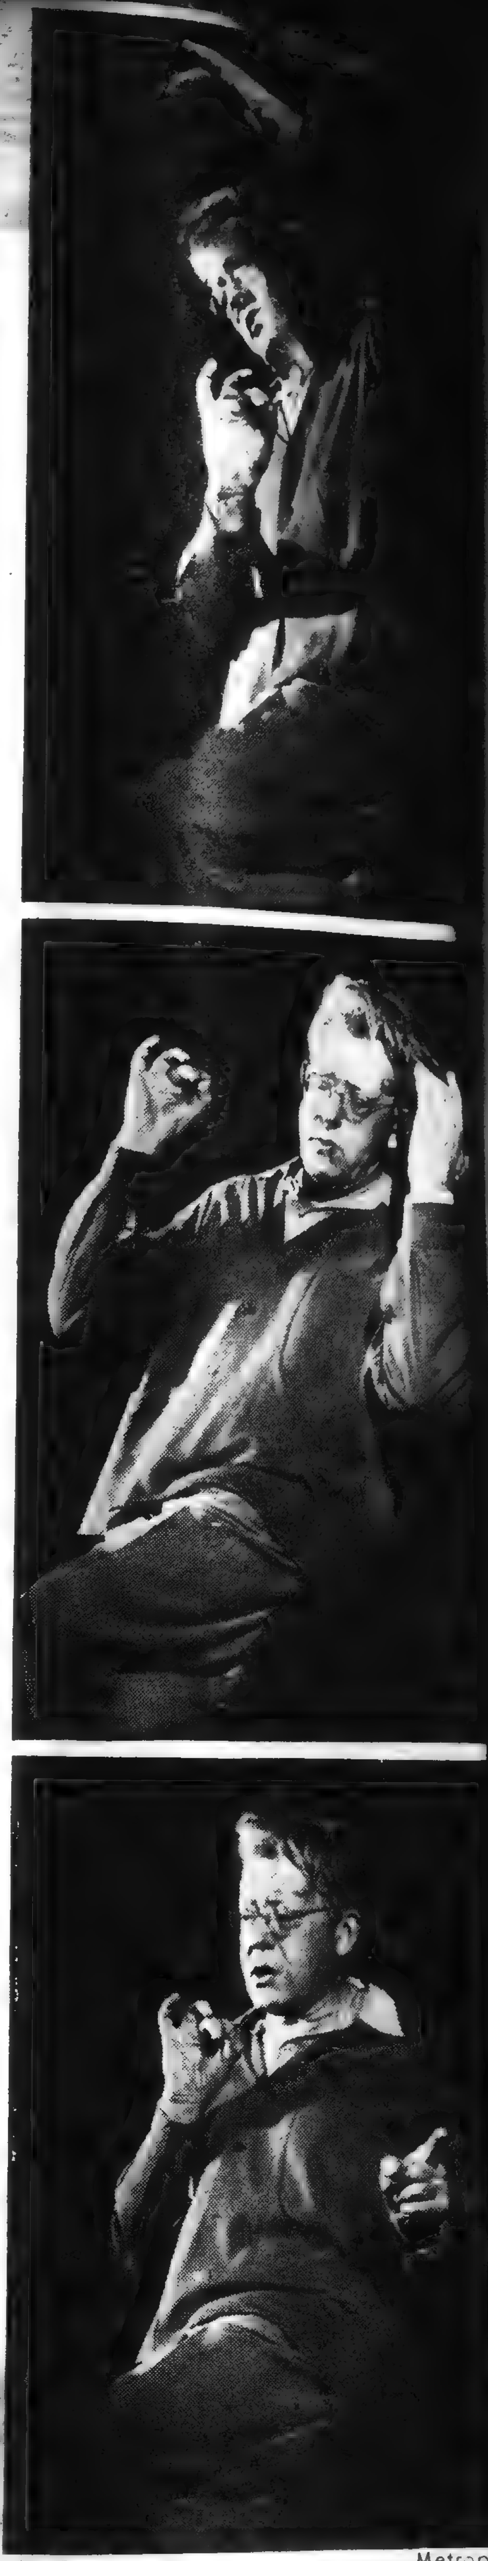
King Arthur. Music is not only one of the highest arts, it is also a pretty tough business. In the music business, austere, unapproachable Arthur Judson has the making or breaking of scores of careers. James Caesar Petrillo sets the minimum wages for U.S. musicians; it is Judson who often gets the maximum for the best ones. Judson was once a professional violinist, but he learned early that there is more money in managing artists than in being one. The money he gets from the Philharmonic is peanuts to him ($15,000 a year) but the prestige and power count. Today his Columbia Concerts Inc. grosses $5 million a year, keeps Lily Pons, Jascha Heifetz and $250-a-concert unknowns circulating through 540 cities & towns.* Judson, remote from lesser musicians, has close friends among his top clients, looks like a Lord Calvert whiskey Man of Distinction (and in fact is one).

All but a stubborn handful of U.S. conductors (some exceptions: Toscanini, Koussevitsky, and for the past year Rodzinski) are under contract to Judson. Conductors are glad to pay his stiff commissions (up to 20%) simply as unemployment insurance; if they need a new job they will need his help. There are only 24 major symphonies in the U.S., and Judson alone has some 50 conductors on his rolls.

The Philharmonic's board of busy New Yorkers looks to Judson and his assistant, Bruno Zirato (once secretary to Enrico Caruso), to handle such things as conductors' contracts. Judson & Zirato have done so much handling, say their critics, that in 20 years the Philharmonic has had 20 conductors—while in the same period Boston has had one, and Philadelphia two. This winter Rodzinski demanded a three-year agreement, and no strings.

"When I got it," he said, "it had no strings—but chains!" The contract gave him first choice of what pieces would be

* Judson's firm and its big rival, National Concerts and Artists Corp. (which handles few conductors), do about 90% of the concert bookings for all U.S. singers, dancers and instrumentalists. Impresario Sol Hurok, better known because he is not so self-effacing as Judson, shares an office with N.C.A.C., works through it.



Metropo

RODZINSKI IN REHEARSAL
Precision without fire.

[119]

played during the season, but no control over what guest conductors played, no say in the choice of his guests and soloists unless the board and Judson chose to consult him. Rodzinski was fuming over these terms when Edward L. Ryerson, board chairman of Inland Steel Co. and head of the Chicago Symphony, called on him in Manhattan during the holidays.

When Rodzinski faced the Philharmonic executive committee last week, he knew he could have the Chicago job with the crook of a finger. So did the committee. He blew off at Arthur Judson, but if anyone thought Rodzinski was a white knight out to unseat music's Mr. Big, he was mistaken. "I don't hate Judson," Rodzinski said. "I've learned to eliminate hatred."

Holy Terror. Artur Rodzinski is a professional, in the strongest sense of the word: he is a professed musician. He regards music as his calling, and himself as consecrated to it. His devotion to his calling is selfless—though his selflessness is sometimes as hard to take as another man's selfishness.

He was born 53 years ago in the Dalmatian town of Spalato (now the Yugoslav town of Split) but spent his childhood in Lvov. His father was a Polish surgeon in the Austrian Army.

Artur was put at the piano at 6, became a page-turner at Lvov concerts at 15 and practiced furiously five and six hours a day. Once when his big brother Richard, trying to study medicine, shouted that he couldn't stand the noise, Artur slashed Richard's hand with a saber. "Our house," as he looks back on it, "was a madhouse." He became infatuated with the opera, joined the claque to get in free.

Rodzinski played the piano in a cabaret to support his first wife and their small son. It was a big break when the local opera director let him conduct Verdi's Ernani: "The smell of the scenery, the makeup, the wigs . . . you can't get it out of your system. Ask any opera man."

In 1924 Leopold Stokowski, visiting Warsaw, met Rodzinski, later hired him as assistant conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. When Rodzinski reached the U.S., the first thing "Stokie" did was to run his fingers through Rodzinski's slick and parted hair, "to give me a conductor's look." He did much more in the next four years, and Rodzinski is "incredibly grateful." But their temperaments did not mix well. Stokowski and Arthur Judson helped line up the run-down Los Angeles Symphony for Rodzinski. No admirer of Stokowski's lushed-up style, he says that Stokowski "plays music sexually."

After four years in Los Angeles, Rodzinski quarreled with the manager and headed for Cleveland. Toscanini heard one of his Cleveland broadcasts, and recommended him for the 1937 Salzburg Festival. And when Toscanini agreed to head the projected NBC Symphony, he insisted that Rodzinski should recruit the players.

The Cleveland musicians came to respect but never to love their abusive foreman. There was no big farewell party when he left in 1943, and his welcome to

TIME, FEBRUARY 17, 1947

Koussevitzky: The Life and Times of a Great Conductor

KOUSSEVITZKY. By Moses Smith. Illustrated. 400 pp. New York: Allen, Towne & Heath. $4.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY had a big career in Russia, followed it with an equally significant one in France and has crowned it with more than twenty years here, where he has not only integrated his work into the life of the country but has become a friend, leader and spokesman of America's creative forces in music. The story of his life, rich in action and accomplishment, is now told in a biography by Moses Smith, who was for years a music critic in Boston and later in charge of the masterworks section of Columbia Records. The book is the first under the imprint of the new firm of Allen, Towne and Heath, which plans to devote itself entirely to books dealing with music.

Mr. Smith is at pains to point out that this is no "authorized" biography, meaning, no doubt, that his intention was to speak frankly. And that he does. He brings to light new facts and throws new light on old situations. But it appears that he deliberately avoided consulting his subject on some matters under discussion, and you get the impression that you are not always hearing both sides of the case.

Whatever the truth may be on some points, there is no questioning the general outlines of the story, and it is a story of tremendous achievement. It began in 1874 in the small town of Vishny - Volotchok, 160 miles northwest of Moscow. Here Serge Koussevitzky was born, the son of a poor musician. His mother, also a musician, died when he was 3. The boy learned music early; his principal instrument in his boyhood appears to have been the cello. As a lad he realized that his native town could not provide him with the opportunity to learn, and when he was 17, he left for Moscow.

HE tried to enter the Imperial Moscow Conservatory but was turned down. He forced his way into the office of the director of the School of the Moscow Philharmonic Society, refused to be turned away and was finally admitted, provided he would take up the study of the double bass. The student orchestra of the school needed a double bass player, and young Koussevitzky was ready to study anything in return for a musical education.

He became in due time one of the greatest virtuosos of that unwieldy instrument. But before he stepped out on his own as a soloist, he played with the orchestra of the Bolshoi Theatre. By the time he had reached his twenties, he was also a professor of the double bass at his old school, and soon he had "academic, artistic and social standing and some security" in Moscow. On Sept. 8, 1905, he was married to Natalya Ushkov, daughter of a wealthy tea merchant. It was his second marriage; the first, to a ballet dancer, had not worked out. But the second endured, until his wife's death, for almost forty years, and it helped Koussevitzky to turn to a career, conducting, for which he longed.

In the years before the Russian Revolution, Koussevitzky formed his own orchestra, played with it up and down the length of Russia. One of his most ambitious ventures was a tour down the Volga with his orchestra, bringing symphonic music to communities that had never heard it before. The first tour in 1910 was so successful it was repeated twice, until the war in 1914 brought it to a halt. Later Koussevitzky also started concerts at low prices in Moscow, another precedent-breaking venture. After the Revolution Koussevitzky remained in Moscow, personally unmolested, for several years. By then he was Russia's most important conductor. Had he chosen to remain in Russia, his career could have been as brilliant as it became outside. When he left Russia late in 1920, he made his center of activity in Paris, and the Concerts Kousse-

(Continued on Page 35)

Koussevitzky at Rehearsal.

OOK REVIEW, FEBRUARY 16, 1947.

Life of a Great Conductor

(Continued from Page 5)

vitzky became the last word in musical excitement.

AT his very first concert as a conductor Koussevitzky had placed new works by Taneiev and Glière on his programs, and throughout his career he was to seek out young, talented composers and to give them their chance to be heard. His Paris concerts were landmarks in adventurous program-making. The same zeal has marked his work in Boston, where he became conductor in 1924. Shortly after his arrival in Boston he asked whether there were any young composers in or about Harvard. He was told about Walter Piston, whom he sent for. It turned out that Piston had not composed any orchestral works because "nobody would play them." Koussevitzky said he would play them and did.

The record of his achievement in Boston is too well known to need repetition here, but a glance at one of Mr. Smith's appendices shows what a proud and catholic assortment of contemporary, including American, composers Mr. Koussevitzky has performed. The quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself is a tribute to his leadership and musicianship, and his building of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center is another of his good works.

Mr. Smith has told the story comprehensively. He does not hesitate to be critical of Mr. Koussevitzky, but he also gives credit where credit is due. This biography does not belong to the flowery school of writing; it is sober, conscientious and perhaps too detailed for its own good. But the reader will learn a lot about musicians from it and will gain new respect for Koussevitzky's achievement.

New York was open warfare: even before he hit town he had fired 14 players, including Concertmaster Mishel Piastro.

Change of Life. Not all the 100 men got to like their new master. But some did. When Halina came home from the hospital with a baby two years ago, a delegation from the Philharmonic serenaded her with Wagner's Siegfried Idyll,* and reduced the Rodzinskis to tears. Some of the boys, trying to oblige the boss, for a while drank goat's milk that Rodzinski sent in from his farm at Stockbridge, Mass.

ARTUR (left) & FAMILY (1896)
Furious pounding, furiously defended.

The New York musicians found him less of a ring-tailed Tartar than he had been in Cleveland. In the meantime, he had found Buchmanism. He went to see a doctor in Boston about a sore back, and was told that his trouble was spiritual. He never joined in the public confessions of his fellow evangels in Moral Re-Armament, but liked the way the Buchmanites had become "such happy people."

Shake on It. Last week happy Artur Rodzinski was a man without a contract. In New York the Philharmonic scurried around for a successor to him (a possible candidate: Minneapolis' dramatic Dimitri Mitropoulos). In Chicago, all Rodzinski had was a "handshake agreement." A handshake, however, was all that Chicago's late, beloved Dr. Frederick Stock needed for 38 years. And (until now) it had been enough for the outgoing conductor, earnest, uninspired Désiré Defauw.

"Since 21 years," Rodzinski exulted last week, "Chicago is my goal. It is a healthy city, like a young colt, full of concentrated power. . . . New York will go down."

---

* Which Wagner wrote as a surprise for wife Cosima on her 33rd birthday (Christmas Day, 1870). Wagner hired a group of musicians, led them as they played on the stairs for his bride of four months, their children (including 1½-year-old Siegfried, for whom it was named) and Nietzsche, their house guest.

TIME, FEBRUARY 17, 1947

Koussevitzky: The Life and Times of a Great Conductor

KOUSSEVITZKY. By Moses Smith. Illustrated. 400 pp. New York: Allen, Towne & Heath. $4.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY had a big career in Russia, followed it with an equally significant one in France and has crowned it with more than twenty years here, where he has not only integrated his work into the life of the country but has become a friend, leader and spokesman of America's creative forces in music. The story of his life, rich in action and accomplishment, is now told in a biography by Moses Smith, who was for years a music critic in Boston and later in charge of the masterworks section of Columbia Records. The book is the first under the imprint of the new firm of Allen, Towne and Heath, which plans to devote itself entirely to books dealing with music.

Mr. Smith is at pains to point out that this is no "authorized" biography, meaning, no doubt, that his intention was to speak frankly. And that he does. He brings to light new facts and throws new light on old situations. But it appears that he deliberately avoided consulting his subject on some matters under discussion, and you get the impression that you are not always hearing both sides of the case.

Whatever the truth may be on some points, there is no questioning the general outlines of the story, and it is a story of tremendous achievement. It began in 1874 in the small town of Vishny - Volotchok, 160 miles northwest of Moscow. Here Serge Koussevitzky was born, the son of a poor musician. His mother, also a musician, died when he was 3. The boy learned music early; his principal instrument in his boyhood appears to have been the cello. As a lad he realized that his native town could not provide him with the opportunity to learn, and when he was 17, he left for Moscow.

HE tried to enter the Imperial Moscow Conservatory but was turned down. He forced his way into the office of the director of the School of the Moscow Philharmonic Society, refused to be turned away and was finally admitted, provided he would take up the study of the double bass. The student orchestra of the school needed a double bass player, and young Koussevitzky was ready to study anything in return for a musical education.

He became in due time one of the greatest virtuosos of that unwieldy instrument. But before he stepped out on his own as a soloist, he played with the orchestra of the Bolshoi Theatre. By the time he had reached his twenties, he was also a professor of the double bass at his old school, and soon he had "academic, artistic and social standing and some security" in Moscow. On Sept. 8, 1905, he was married to Natalya Ushkov, daughter of a wealthy tea merchant. It was his second marriage; the first, to a ballet dancer, had not worked out. But the second endured, until his wife's death, for almost forty years, and it helped Koussevitzky to turn to a career, conducting, for which he longed.

In the years before the Russian Revolution, Koussevitzky formed his own orchestra, played with it up and down the length of Russia. One of his most ambitious ventures was a tour down the Volga with his orchestra, bringing symphonic music to communities that had never heard it before. The first tour in 1910 was so successful it was repeated twice, until the war in 1914 brought it to a halt. Later Koussevitzky also started concerts at low prices in Moscow, another precedent-breaking venture. After the Revolution Koussevitzky remained in Moscow, personally unmolested, for several years. By then he was Russia's most important conductor. Had he chosen to remain in Russia, his career could have been as brilliant as it became outside. When he left Russia late in 1920, he made his center of activity in Paris, and the Concerts Kousse-

(Continued on Page 35)

Koussevitzky at Rehearsal.

BOOK REVIEW, FEBRUARY 16, 1947.

Life of a Great Conductor

(Continued from Page 5)

vitzky became the last word in musical excitement.

AT his very first concert as a conductor Koussevitzky had placed new works by Taneiev and Glière on his programs, and throughout his career he was to seek out young, talented composers and to give them their chance to be heard. His Paris concerts were landmarks in adventurous program-making. The same zeal has marked his work in Boston, where he became conductor in 1924. Shortly after his arrival in Boston he asked whether there were any young composers in or about Harvard. He was told about Walter Piston, whom he sent for. It turned out that Piston had not composed any orchestral works because "nobody would play them." Koussevitzky said he would play them and did.

The record of his achievement in Boston is too well known to need repetition here, but a glance at one of Mr. Smith's appendices shows what a proud and catholic assortment of contemporary, including American, composers Mr. Koussevitzky has performed. The quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself is a tribute to his leadership and musicianship, and his building of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center is another of his good works.

Mr. Smith has told the story comprehensively. He does not hesitate to be critical of Mr. Koussevitzky, but he also gives credit where credit is due. This biography does not belong to the flowery school of writing; it is sober, conscientious and perhaps too detailed for its own good. But the reader will learn a lot about musicians from it and will gain new respect for Koussevitzky's achievement.

ZINSKI IN REHEARSAL

ecision without f

Metropo

New York was open warfare: even before he hit town he had fired 14 players, including Concertmaster Mishel Piastro.

Change of Life. Not all the 100 men got to like their new master. But some did. When Halina came home from the hospital with a baby two years ago, a delegation from the Philharmonic serenaded her with Wagner's *Siegfried Idyll, and reduced the Rodzinskis to tears. Some of the boys, trying to oblige the boss, for a while drank goat's milk that Rodzinski sent in from his farm at Stockbridge, Mass.

ARTUR (left) & FAMILY (1896)
Furious pounding, furiously defended.

The New York musicians found him less of a ring-tailed Tartar than he had been in Cleveland. In the meantime, he had found Buchmanism. He went to see a doctor in Boston about a sore back, and was told that his trouble was spiritual. He never joined in the public confessions of his fellow evangels in Moral Re-Armament, but liked the way the Buchmanites had become "such happy people."

Shake on It. Last week happy Artur Rodzinski was a man without a contract. In New York the Philharmonic scurried around for a successor to him (a possible candidate: Minneapolis' dramatic Dimitri Mitropoulos). In Chicago, all Rodzinski had was a "handshake agreement." A handshake, however, was all that Chicago's late, beloved Dr. Frederick Stock needed for 38 years. And (until now) it had been enough for the outgoing conductor, earnest, uninspired Désiré Defauw.

"Since 21 years," Rodzinski exulted last week, "Chicago is my goal. It is a healthy city, like a young colt, full of concentrated power. . . . New York will go down."

---

* Which Wagner wrote as a surprise for wife Cosima on her 33rd birthday (Christmas Day, 1870). Wagner hired a group of musicians, led them as they played on the stairs for his bride of four months, their children (including 1½-year-old Siegfried, for whom it was named) and Nietzsche, their house guest.

TIME, FEBRUARY 17, 1947

Koussevitzky: The Life and Times of a Great Conductor

KOUSSEVITZKY. By Moses Smith. Illustrated. 400 pp. New York: Allen, Towne & Heath. $4.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY had a big career in Russia, followed it with an equally significant one in France and has crowned it with more than twenty years here, where he has not only integrated his work into the life of the country but has become a friend, leader and spokesman of America's creative forces in music. The story of his life, rich in action and accomplishment, is now told in a biography by Moses Smith, who was for years a music critic in Boston and later in charge of the masterworks section of Columbia Records. The book is the first under the imprint of the new firm of Allen, Towne and Heath, which plans to devote itself entirely to books dealing with music.

Mr. Smith is at pains to point out that this is no "authorized" biography, meaning, no doubt, that his intention was to speak frankly. And that he does. He brings to light new facts and throws new light on old situations. But it appears that he deliberately avoided consulting his subject on some matters under discussion, and you get the impression that you are not always hearing both sides of the case.

Whatever the truth may be on some points, there is no questioning the general outlines of the story, and it is a story of tremendous achievement. It began in 1874 in the small town of Vishny - Volotchok, 160 miles northwest of Moscow. Here Serge Koussevitzky was born, the son of a poor musician. His mother, also a musician, died when he was 3. The boy learned music early; his principal instrument in his boyhood appears to have been the cello. As a lad he realized that his native town could not provide him with the opportunity to learn, and when he was 17, he left for Moscow.

HE tried to enter the Imperial Moscow Conservatory but was turned down. He forced his way into the office of the director of the School of the Moscow Philharmonic Society, refused to be turned away and was finally admitted, provided he would take up the study of the double bass. The student orchestra of the school needed a double bass player, and young Koussevitzky was ready to study anything in return for a musical education.

He became in due time one of the greatest virtuosos of that unwieldy instrument. But before he stepped out on his own as a soloist, he played with the orchestra of the Bolshoi Theatre. By the time he had reached his twenties, he was also a professor of the double bass at his old school, and soon he had "academic, artistic and social standing and some security" in Moscow. On Sept. 8, 1905, he was married to Natalya Ushkov, daughter of a wealthy tea merchant. It was his second marriage; the first, to a ballet dancer, had not worked out. But the second endured, until his wife's death, for almost forty years, and it helped Koussevitzky to turn to a career, conducting, for which he longed.

In the years before the Russian Revolution, Koussevitzky formed his own orchestra, played with it up and down the length of Russia. One of his most ambitious ventures was a tour down the Volga with his orchestra, bringing symphonic music to communities that had never heard it before. The first tour in 1910 was so successful it was repeated twice, until the war in 1914 brought it to a halt. Later Koussevitzky also started concerts at low prices in Moscow, another precedent-breaking venture. After the Revolution Koussevitzky remained in Moscow, personally unmolested, for several years. By then he was Russia's most important conductor. Had he chosen to remain in Russia, his career could have been as brilliant as it became outside. When he left Russia late in 1920, he made his center of activity in Paris, and the Concerts Kousse-

(Continued on Page 35)

Koussevitzky at Rehearsal.

BOOK REVIEW, FEBRUARY 16, 1947.

Life of a Great Conductor

(Continued from Page 5)

vitzky became the last word in musical excitement.

AT his very first concert as a conductor Koussevitzky had placed new works by Taneiev and Glière on his programs, and throughout his career he was to seek out young, talented composers and to give them their chance to be heard. His Paris concerts were landmarks in adventurous program-making. The same zeal has marked his work in Boston, where he became conductor in 1924. Shortly after his arrival in Boston he asked whether there were any young composers in or about Harvard. He was told about Walter Piston, whom he sent for. It turned out that Piston had not composed any orchestral works because "nobody would play them." Koussevitzky said he would play them and did.

The record of his achievement in Boston is too well known to need repetition here, but a glance at one of Mr. Smith's appendices shows what a proud and catholic assortment of contemporary, including American, composers Mr. Koussevitzky has performed. The quality of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself is a tribute to his leadership and musicianship, and his building of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center is another of his good works.

Mr. Smith has told the story comprehensively. He does not hesitate to be critical of Mr. Koussevitzky, but he also gives credit where credit is due. This biography does not belong to the flowery school of writing; it is sober, conscientious and perhaps too detailed for its own good. But the reader will learn a lot about musicians from it and will gain new respect for Koussevitzky's achievement.

This Clipping From
GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
HERALD

MAR 1 - 1947

PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

THE author and publisher of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

WISCONSIN RAPIDS, WIS.
TRIBUNE

1 1947

Privacy in Public

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not nationalism are not chiefly products of the history classroom. They are affirmed or denied by home teaching and environment. These in turn are shaped by many influences—the neighborhood, the section of the country, the parents' occupation, economic position, racial origin, and so on. These are surely as important as the sketchy instruction which grade and high school pupils necessarily get in so vast and complex a subject as world history.

Professor Mattingly seems to feel that this major emphasis on American history is bad in itself. But does it always produce the bad results he describes, no matter how excellent the textbook or teacher may be?

It seems quite possible that an intelligent presentation of American history could combat distorted nationalism and cultural isolation. It seems equally possible that world history could be presented in such a way as to encourage those misconceptions.

Professor Mattingly must agree that the evils of which he complains have been more prevalent in past years than they are now. They are still strong, of course. But they seem even stronger as the world draws more closely together, and the United States assumes a more important role in world affairs.

World history must be taught to the youngsters who will help shape future history. It scarcely seems dangerous if they devote even more time to learning of their own country and its people.

This Clipping From
DOUGLAS, ARIZ.
DISPATCH

MAR 1 1947

Artistic Eminence

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Doussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 1 1947

Music Center Auditions To Be Held Next Week

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held next week in Boston by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

The Music Center, which is operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, music director of the orchestra, with Aaron Copeland as assistant director and Stanley Chapple as dean. The Music Center will be open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from June 30 to August 10.

The auditions will be held at Symphony Hall, Boston, Thursday afternoon, on the following schedules: Violin and viola, 2 p. m.; cello and contrabass, 3 o'clock; woodwinds, 3:30 o'clock; brass instruments, 4 o'clock; harp, 3 o'clock; timpani and percussion, 4 o'clock.

Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Symphony Hall, Boston 15, before Wednesday noon. Those who have not already made application for admission to the Music Center, may do so at the time of the audition.

This Clipping From FREMONT, OHIO
NEWS MESSENGER

MAR 3 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

MAR 1 - 1947

No Privacy In The Limelight

Displeased with a new biography, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought suit against the author and publishers for libel. Asserting that the book is "unauthorized," he has applied to the courts for an injunction against its publication and distribution on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. And his lawyers have warned the newspapers that they will publish reviews of the book "at their peril and risk".

If granted and upheld, the injunction which Mr. Koussevitsky is seeking would create an alarming precedent. If a musician is immune to all but personally authorized publicity, why not lawyers, judges, political bosses, Congressmen, Presidents? Koussevitsky's artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure. And public figures have very little privacy. They have to accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of being in the limelight.

This Clipping From
GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS

MAR 1 - 1947

THE KOUSSEVITZKY CASE.

Perhaps no one is more allergic to criticism than are members of the music profession. A case in point is that of Serge Koussevitzky, revered conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Besides having directed one of the nation's two or three greatest orchestras for more than 20 years, Dr. Koussevitzky is famed as a virtuoso on the double-bass and as a man who has probably done more than any other person in a similar position to advance the cause of the American composer. His position is secure and few would wish to belittle his stature.

Most important, however, the eminent conductor is a public figure, a point he seems to have missed in seeking to prevent publication and distribution of a new and unauthorized biography about himself. The author of the book is Moses Smith, long-time Boston music critic who has been counted among Koussevitzky's firmest admirers. It is reported that in the biography Smith has attempted to look at his subject objectively, to give praise where it is deserved, but in any case to tell the whole story.

The conductor has claimed that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy and his attorneys have warned newspapers that they might publish reviews of the book at their "peril and risk."

The charges pose several questions. If they are upheld it would mean that thereafter only a biography personally acceptable to the subject could get into print. Under those circumstances the chance of getting an accurate, unbiased word portrait of a living person would be indeed remote. Conceivably it might mean that no picture or article about any public figure could be published without that person's express permission. And not only musicians, but judges, congressmen and others might undertake to set up their private censorship bureaus.

It is difficult to believe that one who has been so open-minded in his approach to the literature of music as Dr. Koussevitzky has been will fail to see the incongruity of his position with reference to the Smith book.

47

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky has returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra after his long mid-Winter vacation. At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon he was welcomed home with that especial warmth reserved for him. His program brings the "Oberon" Overture by Weber; Vaughan Williams' Fifth Symphony, new to Boston, and the Brahms Violin Concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist.

Vaughan Williams' Fifth Symphony, composed in England during the war and dedicated "without permission to Jean Sibelius," is music finely wrought, and carefully considered, in its way tuneful; too long but eloquent, of modest orchestration but sounding "big," and of spreading musical architecture.

With the knowledge that the distinguished English composer is approaching 75, it is easy to think of the Fifth Symphony as a work that looks back over his career and, as Somerset Maugham said of his book, forms a summing-up. Yet such is precisely the case, for the Symphony, far from attempting anything new, takes us in its modal harmony as far back as the "Tallis" Fantasia, and in certain colors and phrase-patterns back to the "London" Symphony. This is music spiritual and calm, which does not speak out very much, yet has its own depth and richness. It is also Vaughan Williams independent as ever.

Intermission lobby chatter made much of the Symphony's seeming monotony, but I venture to believe that longer acquaintance will reward a patient listener. This is an old man's music, and the art of old age can be elusive.

The Brahms Concerto has become a Heifetz specialty, and now his performance of the solo par glows with beauty of tone and certain affection in the way he phrases it. Technically, of course, the Heifetz performance is with a blemish. Little wonder tha was cheered as well as applauded

The Boston Symphony respond naturally, to Mr. Koussevitzky to no other conductor, and yes day it sounded familiarly ma cent most of the time. Ye players seemed on edge and played little faults like ragged trances. The horns wavered a beginning of "Oberon" and Vaug Williams; the woodwind and the strings were sometimes out of tune. Mr. Kousse whipped up too fast a pace i Overture until the strings not articulate clearly.

WACO, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD

MAR 1 1947

The Privacy Of A Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally authorized pubicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, Congressmen, Presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From
ZANESVILLE, OHIO
SIGNAL

MAR 3 - 1947

Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

STATESVILLE, N. C.
DAILY RECORD

MAR 3 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitsky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitsky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

SHAMOKIN, PA.
NEWS-DISPATCH

MAR 1 - 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

POTTSVILLE, PA.
JOURNAL

MAR 1 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR

MAR 2 - 1947

Privacy Of A Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From
RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS-OBSERVER

MAR 2 - 1947

Disputed Biography of Conductor

KOUSSEVITZKY. By Moses Smith. Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., New York. 400 pages. $4.

(Editor's note: An order restraining further distribution of the book has been granted in New York by State Supreme Court Justice Bernard Shientag following suit by the author against the publishers. The author asked $400,000 damages on the grounds that the volume was libelous and unauthorized. The publishing firm has announced that copies of the book already in the hands of booksellers will be sold but that further distribution will be halted pending action on the case.)

Moses Smith, former director of Columbia Masterworks series, in his own very entertaining way, tells the story of one of the greatest, if not the "greatest," conductors ever to become a part of the American scene.

Koussevitzky-Smith are also the latest partners in book-writing for the

CONDUCTOR KOUSSEVITZKY
. . . He Objected to Biography

publishers, who announce that their works are to be "devoted entirely to books on music for the layman . . . non-technical books in all branches of music—not only informative, but entertaining as well . . . with authority, scholarship and readability."

Smith was music critic of the Boston "American" and "Transcript" from the day of Koussevitzky's American debut to the spring of 1939 and reports much of these days from firsthand experience and knowledge.

Koussevitzky, great Russian-American that he is, has recently been reported as saying, "America has had enough of foreign conductors—she must now give credit to her own sons who are far more capable than any who can be imported again," which would seem to show a full Americanization of this one-time foreign conductor.

The author tells the fabulous story of this poor Russian lad who worked his way through the Moscow conservatory, who founded his Russian Symphony Orchestra which made fabulous tours up and down the Volga River, taking the finest symphonic music to thousands who had never heard it before, and who came to America and Boston after the close of World War I.

In 1924, Koussevitzky became the conductor of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, bringing it for the first time to a national popularity with the whole of the United States, possibly the greatest popularity of any American orchestra to this day; also devoting the great Berkshire Symphonic Festival and Music Center at Tanglewood.

Writing as he does, with a knowledge of the Boston scene, with a wide acquaintance among musicians, including musicians of the Boston Orchestra, Smith is able to describe many of the personality conflicts within the orchestra, and between that group and the conductor.

"Koussevitzky's tenure to date has only been exceeded in this country by Frederick Stock with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. In recent seasons he has continued to cultivate contemporary composers assiduously. Americans have fared especially well . . . in 1943-43 new symphonies by Harris, Barber and Piston were presented, almost in [illegible] weeks."

Smith is not a prejudiced writer, he gives pictures on all sides of the scene, reflecting the subject in the light of his genius and also showing up his limitations. "It is hazardous," says Smith, "not to say unfruitful, to venture a guess as to which of the three, Koussevitzky, Stokowsky or Toscanini, is the greatest conductor of our time and scene. It is more to the point to say that each has proven himself great by one fair and constant, if inconclusive, test: the ability to realize his musical intentions with the musicians before him."

"Now, past 70, Koussevitzky goes on learning. He continues [illegible] debt he acquired when [illegible] ago, he began to stud[illegible] from the top down." [illegible] cludes: "The manne[illegible] continuity of this pay[illegible] the years suggests fe[illegible] musical history."

AGNES C[illegible]PER.

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

MAR 1 - 1947

The Privacy of a Public Figure

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From
MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

MAR 3 - 1947

Berkshire Center Announces Auditions

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held this week in Boston by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

The Music Center, which is operated by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra, with Aaaron Copland, as assistant director and Stanley Chapple as dean. The Music Center will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from June 30 to Aug. 10, 1947.

The auditions will be held at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Thursday afternoon, March 6 on the following schedule: Violins and viola, at 2 p. m.; violoncello and contrabass, at 3 p. m.; wood winds, at 3:30 p. m.; brass instruments, at 4 p. m.; harp, at 3 p. m.; timpani and percussion, at 4 p. m.

Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Boston, Symphony orchestra, Inc., Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., before Wednesday noon, March 5. Those who have not al ready made application for admission to the Music Center, may do so at the time of the audition.

This Clipping From CHESTER, PA.
TIMES

MAR 3 - 1947

PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

From the Norristown Times-Herald: The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and ized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy.

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create a bad precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, Congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From
WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
PALM BEACH POST

MAR 2 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, Congressmen, Presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From PEOPLE'S WORLD
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

MAR 3 - 1947

Koussevitzky, the 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony, returns to the air tonight after a winter vacation. He received his training in Czarist Russia, and at one time made three trips down the Volga on a chartered steamer with his own rchestra.

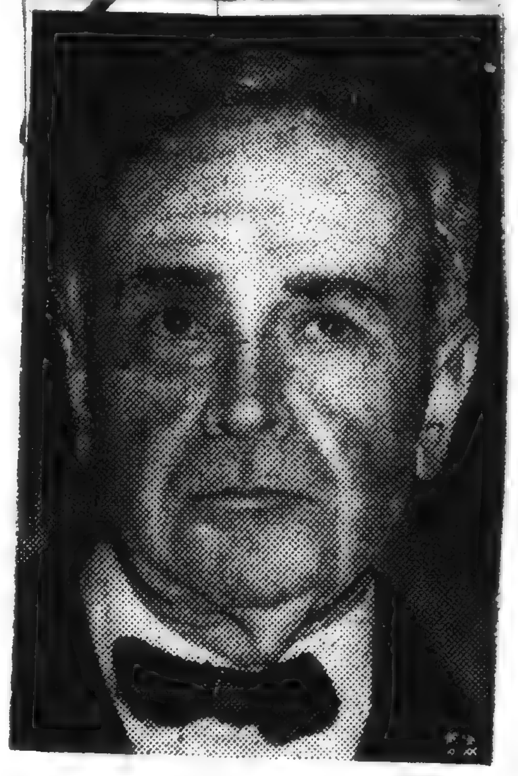
Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have maintained aggressive campaigns to introduce modern compositions.

Incidentally, he is suing, for libel, the writer of a recent book who wrote that Koussevitzky didn't know anything about music, and couldn't even read a score.

Many people have said that Koussevitzky couldn't read score, nevertheless, they admit, with a shake of their heads, that the orchestra under his direction is remarkably competent, but they don't know how he does it.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
ADVERTISER

MAR 2 - 1947



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S biography by Moses Smith, published by Allen Towne and Heath, is reviewed here today.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
~~NEWS~~
Journal

MAR 3 - 1947

Privacy And Publicity

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

The suit itself might be well-taken and justified, for all we know. We haven't read, and probably won't read the book. Anyway, the American citizen is entitled to redress in court against defamation and libel.

The injunction, however, is quite another matter. If granted, and upheld, it would create an unfortunate precedent. Anyone at all might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not lawyers, judges, political bosses, or even criminals?

Doctor Koussevitzky's artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure. This has certain advantages, including monetary. But it has annoyances as well, which most men in public life accept in good grace as the inevitable penalty for fame.

This is not a plea, however, for the conductor to withdraw the injunction request. We would much rather see it battled through in court—and, of course, soundly whipped.

This Clipping From
DES MOINES, IOWA
REGISTER

MAR 4 1947

AIRGLANC

RALPH VAUGHN WILLIAMS' new Fifth Symphony will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 7:30 p. m. KRNT. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major is also programmed.

KOUSSEVITZKY.

Vaughn Williams' Fifth Symphony was first performed in London in 1943. In marked contrast to the experimentation and dissonance of his Fourth Symphony, the Fifth has a pastoral quality. Dedicated "without permission" to Jean Sibelius, it is called akin to the Finnish composer's symphonic procedure in its economy of means, its constant development of one or two motives and intervals, stated at the start. However, the work is called pure Vaughn Williams, with a pervasive flavor that is essentially English. Now 70 years old, Vaughn Williams is the dean of English composers.

The final offer of the John Hancock Tanglewood Scholarships will be made on tonight's broadcast. The ten scholarships cover tuition and expenses for the six-week season this summer at the Berkshire Music Centre under the supervision of Dr. Koussevitzky. Full details may be obtained from the Boston Symphony, Boston 15, Mass.

Koussevitzky Fails to Halt Biography Sale

Globe

NEW YORK, March 4—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today lost his suit in the Supreme Court to restrain a publishing house from issuing an unauthorized biography of himself.

The 72-year-old conductor had brought the action, first of its kind in New York, under the State Civil Rights law, charging that the book was an invasion of his privacy.

Justice Bernard L. Shientag held that Mr. Koussevitzky "is well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and the privacy statute "does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character."

As to Mr. Koussevitzky's allegations that the book contained false and misleading statements and that its release would do him irreparable harm, Justice Shientag ruled that "the plaintiff must be left to his remedy at law for redress as to any matters contained in the book or the advertisements thereof which are shown to be libelous."

See BOOK Page 3

be fire chief after March 11.

Book

Continued from the First Page

The opinion dissolved an interim stay prohibiting public sale of the book which the court had issued against the defendant firm, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., Feb. 11, when the suit was filed.

David Ewen, director and editor of the firm, announced that the biography, titled "Koussevitzky," will go on sale today. Three thousand copies were already in the hands of booksellers throughout the country when the stay was granted. It was written by Moses Smith, who for 20 of the 23 years Mr. Koussevitzky has conducted the Boston Symphony, was music critic of the Boston Transcript and the Boston American.

Henry Root Stern, counsel for Mr. Koussevitzky, said an appeal would be taken to the Appellate Division of the court.

(Boston Globe-N. Y. Tribune, Inc.)

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAR 4 - 1947

Music Center Auditions Listed

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be conducted this week in Boston by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are also on the faculty at the Music Center at Tanglewood. The auditions are to be at Symphony Hall Thursday afternoon from 2 to 4, and applicants are to notify Thomas D. Perry Jr., Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, before Wednesday noon.

Those who have not already made application to study at the Music Center may do so at the time of the audition.

CUMBERLAND, MD.
NEWS

MAR 5 - 1947

Must Accept Annoyances And Advantages, Alike

The authors and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Mr. Koussevitsky. The conductor also has asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen and presidents?

Dr. Koussevitsky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, must accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

MAR 5 - 1947

Koussevitzky Denied Injunction By Court

New York, March 4. (AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag today refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, Koussevitzky.

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers, Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., and Arco Publishing Company, Inc., the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

This Clipping From GREENVILLE, OHIO
ADVOCATE

MAR 5 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzy, whose artistic eminence makes him somewhat of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his lega laction.

TIFFIN, OHIO
ADVERTISER-TRIBUNE

MAR 4 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 5 - 1947

Rule No Invasion In Private Life Of Koussevitzky

New York, March 5 (AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag yesterday refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., and Arco Publishing Co., Inc., the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionized.

This Clipping From HARRISBURG, PA.
NEWS

MAR 5 - 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY LOSES CASE

By United Press

NEW YORK, March 5.—An unauthorized biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went on sale today following the dismissal of a suit brought by the conductor to stop its distribution. Justice Bernard L. Shientag ruled in Supreme Court that "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, former Boston music critic, was not an invasions of the conductor's

---

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

MAR 5 - 1947

Auditions to Be Held For Tanglewood School

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held this week in Boston by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

The Music Center is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra, with Aaron Copland as assistant director and Stanley Chapple as dean. The Music Center will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, from June 30 to Aug. 10.

The auditions will be held at Symphony Hall, Boston, tomorrow afternoon, on the following schedule: violins and viola at 2 p. m.; violoncello and contrabass at 3 p. m.; wood winds at 3:30 p. m.; brass instruments at 4 p.m.; harp at 3 p. m. and timpani and percussion at 4 p. m.

Applicants should notify Thomas D. Perry Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc., Symphony Hall Boston 15.

WACO, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD

MAR 5 1947

CONDUCTOR LOSES

NEW YORK, March 5—UP — Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky lost the second round of his court fight to halt the sale of his biography today when a State Supreme Court ruling held that the right of privacy did not apply to biographies about public figures.

Robert Shaw is to choral singing what Toscanini is to orchestras and Paul Draper is to the dance—he's a sort of a high priest to those who are convinced that his particular form of musical direction is the ultima Thule of artistry.

ARTIST—Probably the lady sopranos who threaten to swoon at every meaningful gesture of the young master will tell you that anyone with any judgment at all would recognize Shaw as a super genius at first glance. Chances are, however, that to you or me Robert Shaw would look like some young fellow just off the campus of, let's say, Pomona College. That's a good thing to say because, as a matter of fact, that's exactly where he's from. That college, which has turned out glee clubs of extraordinary quality for a good many years, recognized genius in the young man when he was just another guy in another good glee club.

GENIUS—He was an enthusiast above everything else. In the winter vacation, when some of the better element of the local colleges journeyed up to the religious conference at Asilomar, Shaw went along. Survivors of the affair one year remember that there were two young fellows who were always making the cliffs and pines of the Monterey Peninsula rock and sway with their music. They'd go around herding the Asilomar delegates together to perform in old-fashioned singsongs. The guy who was the chief herder-upper and sing leader was none other than Pomona's young Mr. Shaw.

STAR—Perhaps before going on it would be well to identify his sidekick, who, like Shaw, went on to fame probably not foreseen at Asilomar. He was a cornet player, but you'd never recognize him that way now. He threw away his horn and went in for singing and, for a couple of years, has been the star of the Broadway show Carousel. His name was, and is, John Raitt. Bob Shaw, however, beat Raitt to Broadway by several years for he was among the earliest of a batch of Pomona and Occidental glee clubbers to show up as synthetic Pennsylvanians in Fred Waring's musical organization.

SUCCESS—In pretty nearly no time at all our hero was leading the celebrated Waring chorus. He warmed 'em up, put 'em through their paces, polished up the numbers and turned 'em over to Waring fit and slick and polished at rehearsal. From that, Shaw got off into bigger and better choral work, working with large groups on the sort of number that wouldn't fit into the Waring pattern. It is probably correct to say that Shaw gave up something pretty fat in the way of a commercial future with Waring for a far more hazardous future with high art in the form of big league choral numbers. But it paid dividends for him in an artistic way.

PERFORMANCE—Shaw is a medium-sized chap who wears a loose-fitting double-breasted coat which allows free movement of his arms as he leads the singers. It is quite a treat to stand backstage, for instance, at the Hollywood High School performance of Requiem and "Elijah" and watch the manner in which he coaxes from the augmented Occidental College orchestra and the singers from eight of the city's church choirs a performance anyone might think resulted from months of practice under his direction instead of only two or three painstaking but brief rehearsals.

SUCCESS—He comes from a musical family as well as from a musical environment. His sister, Hollace Shaw, stars on one of the big network shows. Bob, however, found more pleasure in extracting music from others than in being a soloist. And the chances are that if choral singing continues its emergence from the wilderness of musical sounds, Pomona's young Bob Shaw will be the Elijah who will lead the movement.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MA

BIOGRAPHY ISSUED ON KOUSSEVITZKY

Copies of "Koussevitzky," an unauthorized biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are being distributed today after the conductor yesterday lost a suit in Supreme Court to restrain its publication.

In the first case of its kind in New York State, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag vacated a temporary stay against public sale of the book and refused to issue an injunction to prevent publication, advertising and distribution. Charging that the book falsely portrayed his life and invaded his rights of privacy, Koussevitzky had brought action against the publishers, Allen, Towne & Heath, of 1 Madison avenue; the distributors, the Arco Publishing Company, and the author, Moses Smith, a Boston music critic.

"The right of privacy statute does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure, unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character," Shientag said in a nine-page opinion.

"There are statements in the book which the plaintiff might naturally find to be highly objectionable, if he is at all sensitive about those things. He may be able to prove some of them to be untrue and even defamatory. There are, however, no so-called revelations of any intimate details which would tend to outrage public tolerance. There is nothing repugnant to one's sense of decency or that takes the book out of the realm of the legitimate dissemination of information on a subject of general interest."

David Ewen, director of the publishers, called the decision "a triumph for the rights of critics and the publishing world to that freedom of speech which is basic to the concept of democracy." Henry Root Stern, Koussevitzky's lawyer, said an appeal would be taken to the Appellate Division.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

MAR 5 - 1947

Judge Refuses To Ban Biography Of Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, March 5—(AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, supereme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag Tuesday refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serg Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy, was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers and the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

This Clipping From
UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

MAR 5 - 1947

Judge Refuses to Ban Conductor's Biography

New York—(AP)—Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag refused yesterday to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy, that it was unauthorized and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career.

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

MAR 5 - 1947

Koussevitzky Loses Action to Ban Biography

Justice Shientag Denies Privacy Statute Applies; Book Goes on Sale Today

Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lost yesterday his suit in the Supreme Court to restrain a publishing house from issuing an unauthorized biography of himself.

The seventy-two year-old conductor had brought the action, the first of its kind in New York, under the state civil rights law, charging that the book was an invasion of his privacy.

Justice Bernard L. Shientag held, however, that Mr. Koussevitzky "is well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and the privacy statute "does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character."

As to Mr. Koussevitzky's allegations that the book contained false and misleading statements and that its release would do him irreparable harm, Justice Shientag ruled that "the plaintiff must be left to his remedy at law for redress as to any matters contained in the book or the advertisements thereof, which are shown to be libelous."

The opinion dissolved an interim stay prohibiting public sale of the book, which the judge had issued against the defendant firm, Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., of 1 Madison Avenue, on Feb. 11, when the suit was filed.

David Ewen, director and editor of the concern, announced that the biography, titled "Koussevitsky," will go on sale today. Three thousand copies were already in the hands of booksellers throughout the country when the stay was granted. It was written by Moses Smith, who for twenty of the twenty-three years Mr. Koussevitsky has conducted the Boston Symphony, was music critic of "The Boston Transcript" and "The Boston American."

In a nine-page opinion which was of importance to the entire publishing industry, Justice Shientag found that the conductor's prominent achievements as a musician "bring him constantly before the public eye and make his life of general interest."

The biography is clearly not fictional in character, he held, and the fact that "it may contain untrue statements does not transform it into the class of fiction."

"There are statements in the book," the opinion said, "which the plaintiff might naturally find to be highly objectionable, if he is at all sensitive about those things. He may be able to prove some of them to be untrue and even defamatory. There are, however, no so-called revelations of any intimate details which would tend to outrage public tolerance.

"Curiously enough, although there are many deprecatory statements they seem to be invariably followed by ameliorative observations or unreserved praise. . . . There is nothing repugnant to one's sense of decency, or that takes the book out of the realm of the legitimate dissemination of information on a subject or general interest.

Mr. Ewen said that Allen, Towne & Heath "look upon this decision not only as a vindication of an important work of criticism, but also as a decisive triumph for the rights of critics and the publishing world to that freedom of speech which is basic to [illegible] concept of democracy." The company was represented in court by Morris L. Ernst.

Henry Root Stern, counsel for Mr. Koussevitzky, said an appeal would be taken to the Appellate Division of the court.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 5 - 1947

Injunction Lost By Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, Wednesday (AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag yesterday refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that "Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers, Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., and Arco Publishing Co., Inc., the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

MAR 5 - 1947

Koussevitzky Loses Book Suit

NEW YORK. UP)—An unauthorized biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went on sale today following the dismissal of a suit brought by the conductor to stop its distribution.

Justice Bernard L. Shientag ruled in Supreme Court yesterday that "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith, former Boston music critic, was not an invasion of the conductor's privacy. Koussevitzky had brought suit, the first of its kind, under the State Civil Rights Law.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 5 - 1947

Court Rules Koussevitzky Can't Bar Book on Career

In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag yesterday refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him well within the orbit of public interest and security, and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also claimed the book was unauthorized, and "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith, the publishers, Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc., and Arco Publishing Co. ,Inc., the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right of privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 5 - 1947

Koussevitzky Fails To Bar Biography's Sale

Sergei Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, was unsuccessful yesterday in an attempt to bar through court action the distribution of his biography, written by Moses Smith and published by Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., of 1 Madison Ave., Manhattan.

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag ruled that the 72-year-old conductor "is well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and that the statute under which Koussevitizy sought to bar the book "does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure, unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character."

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

MAR 5 - 1947

Court Refuses To Ban Book On Koussevitzky

New York, March 4 (AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the state, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag today refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny," and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career. He had obtained a temporary restraining order against Smith; the publishers—Allen, Towne and Heath, Inc.—and Arco Publishing Company, Inc., the distributors.

Justice Shientag noted that the book dealt almost exclusively with the conductor's musical career, and that the right-of-privacy statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 5 - 1947

MUSICIAN LOSES BIOGRAPHY SUIT

Koussevitzky Is Denied Writ to Prevent Publication

New York, March 4.—(AP)—In the first decision of its kind in the State, Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag today refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitzky."

Judge Shientag ruled that Serge Koussevitzky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny" and overruled a motion in which the Boston Symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitzky also had claimed that the book was unauthorized, and had "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career.

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS SENTINEL
MAR 5 - 1947

A Potential Danger

Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so unhappy about his biography that he is suing the author and publishers.

He contends that he has been libeled and that the biography and pictures are an "invasion of his privacy." "Besides that," he adds, "I didn't authorize the book."

Must a public figure authorize published comment about himself? Upon the ultimate answer by the courts hinges the establishment of a dangerous legal precedent menacing the freedom of the press.

The injunction which the conductor asks against publication and distribution of a book that ostensibly would make him even more famous, if granted, would leave the courts swamped by thousands of people whose feelings had been hurt by "unauthorized" material.

Anyone might be immune to all but personally authorized publicity. If a symphony conductor, then why not politicians, Congressmen, or even Presidents?

The right of privacy which the musician thinks has been invaded is a comparatively new development. It applies to publication of material in which "the feelings of the individual may be hurt because of his modesty or abhorrence of publicity or notoriety."

Chief Justice Parker, of the New York State Court of Appeals, in 1901 defined it as the "claim that a man has the right to pass through this world, if he wills, without having his picture published, his business enterprises discussed, his successful experiments written up for the benefit of others, or his eccentricities commented upon. . ."

This description of the right of privacy is broader than has yet been recognized by the courts.

Apparently both the judicial and legislative branches of Government assume that the law of libel, which is the damage done to the reputation of an individual because of defamatory matter that is either untrue, or printed with malicious intent, offers adequate protection to a person's good name.

To a limited degree legal status has been given the right of privacy by judicial interpretation in Georgia, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Missouri and New Jersey. New York has a statute establishing this right in relation to advertising. This right as it applies to newspapers so far has extended chiefly to the use of photographs.

The courts have been justifiably reluctant to recognize the "right of privacy" because of a well-founded apprehension that extension of its interpretation would violate the rights of the press as guaranteed under the Constitution.

Should the principle become law, one legal authority observes, it would not be confined to photographs "but must also embrace word pictures, comments on one's looks, conduct, domestic relations or habits."

Imagine getting Bobby Feller's written permission for saying he hitched up his pants before every pitch!

As a potential danger the issue, though harmlessly brought to public attention by a ruffled-up orchestra conductor, should not be underestimated. Whether in books, newspapers or magazines, any further attempts at abridgement of freedom of the press should be promptly thwarted.

If Doctor Koussevitzky finds himself defamed or maliciously damaged, he is justified in proceeding in the libel action. Otherwise, he should be willing to accept some of the annoyances as well as the advantages of so prominent a place in the public eye.

This Clipping From
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 5 - 1947

Boston Symphony Holding Auditions

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra are being held this week in Boston by members of the orchestra, who are also on the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

The music center, which is operated by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland, as assistant director and Stanley Chapple as dean.

The music center will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, from June 30 to Aug. 10, 1947.

The auditions will be held at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Thursday afternoon on the following schedule: Violins and viola, at 2; violoncello and contrabass, at 3; wood winds, at 3:30; brass instruments, at 4; harp, at 3; timpani and percussion, at 4.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
MAR 6 - 1947

Boston Symphony ~~Introduces Work~~ Of Young Pianist

BOSTON, (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, noted for introducing new music to America, starts tomorrow the fullest introductory program in its 66-year history for any single work—a cantata by its 24-year-old pianist.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has scheduled eight performances in nine days for the biblical work "The Song of Songs" by German-born Lukas Foss, official pianist for the orchestra since 1944.

At a rehearsal of the work for orchestra and soprano soloist, Dr. Koussevitzky told the young composer:—

"This work alone would keep your name alive."

The eight consecutive introductory performances—at Smith college, Yale, New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn—establish a new record for a new work by the orchestra. It played first for the nation the latest works of such Americans as Roy Harris and Aaron Copeland and the Russians, Shostakovitch and Prokofieff.

Foss was born in Berlin, came to this country at the age of 15 and studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and with Composer Paul Hindemith at Yale.

His father is Martin Foss, professor of philosophy at Haverford college, Haverford, Pa., and his mother, a painter, Hilda Foss.

The young composer's first work to be played by the Boston Symphony was performed when he was 20, his symphonic "The Prairie" to the poem by Carl Sandburg.

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
MAR 5 - 1947

Finale, We Hope

Several weeks ago, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, became disturbed about a biography called "Koussevitsky," written by Moses Smith, Boston music critic.

Whether Serge was most concerned about what he called the violation of his privacy or about the threat to the sales of his future autobiography is not clear, but what he wanted was the liquidation of the biography, and he went to court in an attempt to prevent its distribution.

Justice Bernard Shientag, of the New York State Supreme Court, granted a temporary injunction against the book's sale, but now that he has considered the case, he has ruled that an unauthorized biography violates civil rights only if it is fictional in character.

A biography, of course, is not fiction. The ruling apparently means simply that a biography must be untrue before the person whose life it concerns has a case against the biographer.

This is, obviously, only common sense, but it is a welcome ruling that finds this bit of sense reflected in law.

An opposite ruling could have had dire effects on the publishing world and on dissemination of facts in any medium. The Hitlers, Dillingers and Lucianos of the world doubtless would welcome such a limitation of the right to print facts, but the effect on society would be disastrous.

In aiding the reaffirmation of press freedom, Conductor Koussevitsky has, though apparently unwillingly, performed a public service. He has, also unwillingly, built up a market for Critic Smith's book, which might have made only a small splash without this unexpected publicity. Probably many readers who otherwise would have been uninterested will now want to know what Serge wanted to suppress.

Now that Serge has accomplished these things, we suggest that he, one of the world's greatest conductors, go back to his orchestra, one of the world's greatest orchestras, and leave the world of letters to those who understand it better and its enjoyment to the public which stands to gain by leaving it unfettered.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1947

FIGHT ON BOOK LOST BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Justice Shientag Rules That the Conductor's Privacy Was Not Invaded by Biography

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lost yesterday his legal fight to enjoin the publication of the biography, "Koussevizky," written by Moses Smith, Boston music critic. Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag vacated a temporary stay and denied injunctive relief sought by the conductor to prevent publication, advertisement and distribution of the book.

Dr. Koussevitzky had charged that the book invaded his rights of privacy and named as defendants Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc.; Arco Publishing Company and Mr. Smith.

Justice Shientag in his decision said:

"The right of privacy statute does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character. An examination of the book complained of clearly shows that it is not fictional.

"The factual matter contained in the book testifies to the plaintiff's triumphs as a conductor of the Boston Symphony and other great orchestras, to his courage and independence, and to his devotion to the education and training of young musicians.

"Most people know that a great conductor's work with his orchestra is not altogether carried on in an atmosphere of sweetness and light. The author evidently knows that, too, and loses no opportunity to inform his readers about it. In his final chapter the author gives his personal estimate of the plaintiff's place in musical history, and in sentence after sentence we find that depreciation and praise vie with each other for utterance.

"There are statements in the book which the plaintiff might naturally find to be highly objectional, if he is at all sensitive about those things. He may be able to prove some of them to be untrue and even defamatory. There are, however, no so-called revelations of any intimate details which would tend to outrage public tolerance. There is nothing repugnant to one's sense of decency or that takes the book out of the realm of the legitimate dissemination of information on a subject of general interest."

Justice Shientag called attention to the fact that right of privacy does not prohibit any publication of matter that is of public or general interest and that the plaintiff's "prominent achievements as a musician bring him constantly before the public eye and make his life of general interest." The court said that this "precise question" raised by Dr. Koussevitzky "has never been decided in this State."

David Ewen, director of Allen, Towne & Heath, publishers of "Koussevitzky," said in a statement issued last night:

"We look upon the decision not only as a personal victory and vindication of an important work of criticism, but also as a decision of triumph for the rights of critics and the publishing world to that freedom of speech which is basic to the concept of democracy."

This Clipping From
GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS
MAR 5 - 1947

Denied Privacy In Book Fight

New York--(UP)--Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky lost the second round of his court fight to halt the sale of his biography Wednesday when a state supreme court ruling held the right of privacwy did not apply to biographies about public figures.

Justice Bernard Shientag, who earlier granted the conducter a temporary injunction against sale of the book, held an unauthorized biography violated civil rights only if it was fictional.

Publishers of the biography, written by a Boston music critic, Moses Smith, said the ruling was a "decisive triumph for the right of critics and the publishing world to that freedom of speech which is basic to our concept of democracy."

Koussevitzky, however, still has pending a suit for $500,000 damages in which he charges the publishers with libel.

FIGHT ON BOOK LOST BY KOUSSEVITZK

Justice Shientag Rules Tha the Conductor's Privacy Was Not Invaded by Biography

Serge Koussevitzky, conducto of the Boston Symphony Orches tra, lost yesterday his legal figh to enjoin the publication of th biography, "Koussevizky," writte by Moses Smith, Boston mus critic. Supreme Court Justic Bernard L. Shientag vacated temporary stay and denied injun tive relief sought by the conduct to prevent publication, advertis ment and distribution of the boo

Dr. Koussevitzky had charg that the book invaded his righ of privacy and named as defen ants Allen, Towne & Heath, In Arco Publishing Company a Mr. Smith.

Justice Shientag in his decisi said:

"The right of privacy statu does not apply to an unauthoriz biography of a public figure unle the biography is fictional or nov ized in character. An examinati of the book complained of clear shows that it is not fictional.

"The factual matter contain in the book testifies to the plai tiff's triumphs as a conductor the Boston Symphony and oth great orchestras, to his coura and independence, and to his d votion to the education and trai ing of young musicians.

"Most people know that a gre conductor's work with his orche tra is not altogether carried on an atmosphere of sweetness a light. The author evidently kno that, too, and loses no opportuni to inform his readers about In his final chapter the auth gives his personal estimate of t plaintiff's place in musical histo and in sentence after sentence find that depreciation and pra vie with each other for utteran

"There are statements in t book which the plaintiff mig naturally find to be highly obj tional, if he is at all sensitive ab those things. He may be able prove some of them to be unt and even defamatory. There a however, no so-called revelations any intimate details which wou tend to outrage public tolerance. There is nothing repugnant to one's sense of decency or that takes the book out of the realm of the legitimate dissemination of information on a subject of general interest."

Justice Shientag called attention to the fact that right of privacy does not prohibit any publication of matter that is of public or general interest and that the plaintiff's "prominent achievements as a musician bring him constantly before the public eye and make his life of general interest." The court said that this "precise question" raised by Dr. Koussevitzky "has never been decided in this State."

David Ewen, director of Allen, Towne & Heath, publishers of "Koussevitzky," said in a statement issued last night:

"We look upon the decision only as a personal victory and dication of an important work criticism, but also as a decision triumph for the rights of criti and the publishing world to th freedom of speech which is ba to the concept of democracy."

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
1947

Boston maestro loses 2nd round in court fight

NEW YORK, March 4—(UP)—Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky lost the second round of his court fight to halt the sale of his biography today when a state supreme court ruling held that the right of privacy did not apply to biographies about public figures.

Justice Bernard Shientag, who earlier granted the conductor a temporary injunction against sale of the book, held today that an unauthorized biography violated civil rights only if it was fictional in character.

Publishers of the biography, "Koussevitzky," written by a Boston music critic, Moses Smith, said the ruling was a "decisive triumph for the right of critics and the publishing world to that freedom of speech which is basic to our concept of democracy."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
MAR 5 - 1947

Koussevitzky's Plea to Ban Book Is Denied

Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag yesterday ruled that the writing of an unauthorized biography of a public figure does not violate any private rights.

The ruling, the first of its kind in this State, was made in voiding a motion for a temporary injunction brought by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who charged that the biographical book, Koussevitzky by Moses Smith, violated his right of privacy under the Civil Rights Law.

Justice Shientag pointed out his ruling does not apply when the biography "is fictionalized or novelized in character." He added, however, that although a book may contain untrue statements, that "does not transform it into the class of fiction."

Early last month Koussevitzky's lawyers warned PM, and presumably other newspapers, that publication of any review of the biography which Smith had written, would run at the "peril and risk" of the newspapers that printed it. The warning said it would hold the publishers "strictly accountable for any damage which he (Koussevitzky) may obtain."

PM answered the warning with an editorial pointing out that "the whole business of obtaining injunctions to prevent the publication of anything is a very dangerous business, a threat to civil rights of all of us, not just those of Dr. Koussevitzky. The conductor was told that if PM's editors thought the book worth reviewing, PM would print the review in spite of his warning since newspapers too have civil rights.

In making his motion, Justice Shientag said:

"There is nothing repugnant to one's sense of decency or that takes the book out of the realm of the legitimate dissemination of information on a subject of general interest."

He added that "plaintiff must be left to his remedy at law for redress as to any matters contained in the book or the advertisements thereof which are shown to be libelous, but injunctive relief to prevent publication of the volume, its advertisements, or its further distribution may not be granted."

This Clipping From
CUMBERLAND, MD.
TIMES
MAR 6 - 1947

A Public Figure

THE AUTHOR and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk." This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents? We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyance as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

This Clipping From ERIE, PA.
TIMES
MAR 6 - 1947

CONDUCTOR LOSES ROUND IN BATTLE

New York, March 6.—(U.P.)—Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky lost the second round of his court fight to halt the sale of his biography when a state supreme court ruling held that the right of privacy did not apply to biographies about public figures.

Justice Bernard Shientag, who earlier granted the conductor a temporary injunction against sale of the book, held that an unauthorized biography violated civil rights only if it was fictional in character.

Publishers of the biography 'Koussevitsky," written by a Boston music critic, Moses Smith, said the ruling was a "decisive triumph for the rights of critics and the publishing world to that freedom of speech which is basic to our concept of democracy."

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES
MAR 6 - 1947

Boston Symphony to Introduce Cantata

BOSTON, March 6.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, noted for introducting new music to America, starts Friday the fullest introductory program in its 66-year history for any single work—a cantata by its 24-year-old pianist.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has scheduled eight performances in nine days for the Biblical work "The Song of Songs" by German-born Lukas Foss, official pianist for the orchestra since 1944.

At a rehearsal of the work for orchestra and soprano soloist, Dr. Koussevitzky told the young composer:

"This work alone would keep your name alive."

LOS ANGELES, CAL
EAGLE
3/6/47

New Foss Cantata Features Distinguished Negro Soprano

The world premiere performance of "The Song of Songs", a biblical solo cantata by the 24-year-old American composer, Lukas Foss, will be given at Symphony hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, March 7th, with Ellabelle Davis, the distinguished American Negro soprano — for whom the work was especially commissioned by the League of Composers—as soloist with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The cantata, which represents the major 1946-47 commission by the League (whose membership includes the world's foremost living writers of serious music), will be given 4 repeat performances during the week immediately following the premiere — the first time in many years tha Dr. Koussevitzky has attached sufficient importance to a new contemporary work to schedule it in this way.

The Foss "Song of Songs," which is the 70th League of Composers' commission to an outstanding contemporary composer, bears a dedication to Ellabelle Davis, who was singled out by the League as "the outstanding American singer of the year". Conceived as a lyrical hymn of love, it uses as its text four of the exquisite utterances of the Queen of Sheba (like Miss Davis herself, a dark-skinned heroine) from the bibilcal "Song of Songs" in the King James version of the Old Testament.

The artist who was the inspiration for the Foss "Song of Songs", Ellabelle Davis, erstwhile seamstress of New Rochelle, New York, has, during the past three seasons, sprung from comparative obscurity to a place at the very top among concert artists of hte day. During the summer just past, Miss Davis made musical history in Mexico City, when, singing the title role of Verdi's "Aida" with the Opera Nacional, she became the first American Negro ever to have been starred by a major opera company of the world.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
MAR 6 - 1947

TO PRESENT NEW CANTATA

8 Performances in 9 Days Scheduled for Boston Symphony Pianits'

BOSTON, March 6 (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, noted for introducing new music to America, starts Friday the fullest introductory program in its sixty-sixth-year history for any single week—a cantata by its 24-year-old pianist.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has scheduled eight performances in nine days for the Biblical work "The Song of Songs" by German-born Lukas Ross, official pianist for the orchestra since 1944.

At a rehearsal of the work for orchestra and soprano soloist, Dr. Koussevitzky told the young composer: "This work alone would keep your name alive."

The eight consecutive introductory performances—at Smith College, Yale, New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn—establish a new record for a new work by the orchestra. It played first for the nation the latest works of such Americans as Roy Harris and Aaron Copeland and the Russians Shostakovitch and Prokoflieff.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
MAR 5 - 1947

Dirge for Serge

NEW YORK—(U.P.)—Boston symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky lost the second round of his court fight to halt the sale of his biography Tuesday when a state supreme court ruling held that the right of privacy did not apply to biographies about public figures.

This Clipping From
DES MOINES, IOWA
REGISTER
1947

Allows Printing Of 'Koussevitsky'

NEW YORK, N. Y. (AP)—Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag Wednesday refused to issue an injunction against publication of Moses Smith's biography, "Koussevitsky."

Judge Shientag ruled [illegible] Koussevitsky's achievements put him "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny," and overruled a motion in which the [illegible] Boston symphony conductor had charged the book invaded his rights of privacy.

Koussevitsky claimed the book was unauthorized, and "falsely and wrongfully" portrayed his life and musical career.

Justice Shientag noted the book dealt almost exclusively [illegible] career, and the [illegible] statute did not apply to an unauthorized biography unless the book was fictionalized.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST
MAR 5 - 1947

Koussevitsky Fails To Ban Biography

NEW YORK, March 4—(INS) Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight lost his fight to prevent sale of the unauthorized biography, "Koussevitzky."

Justice Bernard L. Sheintag who ruled that the biography was not a violation of the privacy statute, lifted the injunction against the author, publisher and distributors.

Koussevitzky got the injunction several months ago.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 6 - 1947

Symphony Introduces Cantata

BOSTON, March 6 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, noted for introducing new music to America, starts tomorrow the fullest introductory program in its 66-year history for any single work—a cantata by its 24-year-old pianist.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has scheduled eight performances in nine days for the Biblical work "The Song of Songs" by German-born Lukas Foss, official pianist for the orchestra since 1944.

At a rehearsal of the work for orchestra and soprano soloist, Dr. Koussevitzky told the young composer:

"This work alone should keep your name alive."

The eight consecutive introductory performances—at Smith College, Yale, New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, establish a new record for a new work by the orchestra. It played first for the nation the latest works of such Americans as Roy Harris and Aaron Copeland and the Russians, Shostakovitch and Prokofieff.

Foss was born in Berlin, came to this country at the age of 15 and studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and with Composer Paul Hindemith at Yale.

His father is Martin Foss, professor of philosophy at Haverford College, Haverford, Pa., and his mother a painter, Hilda Foss.

The young composer's first work to be played by the Boston Symphony was performed when he was 20, his symphonic "The Prairie" to the poem [illegible]

This Clipping From ALTOONA, PA.
MIRROR
MAR 6 - 1947

Privacy of Public Figures.

THE AUTHOR and publishers of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds that the text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

This injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Dr. Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 7 - 1947

Review of Music

Bernstein Returns To Conduct Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra

BY RUTH TRIPP

Leonard Bernstein made his second appearance in Providence this season when he appeared as guest conductor with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra last night at the Metropolitan Theatre. He played the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1 with the orchestra and also conducted one of his own compositions.

The occasion was notable for the presence of a second composer in the audience. Aaron Copland paid Bernstein the compliment of coming to Providence to hear his (Copland's) "Danzon Cubano" played.

The program:

Symphony No. 102 in B flat major	Haydn
Facsimile (from Ballet)	Bernstein
Danzon Cubano	Copland
Piano Concerto No. 1 in C major	Beethoven
Mr. Bernstein, soloist

Bernstein had an orchestra of different proportions last night than when he came in January as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Rochester Philharmonic is a fine orchestra also and their playing last night was consistently good.

The Haydn Symphony is almost sure-fire music. Its happy mood starts a program well. The slow movement was played with devotion and in the Minuet the heavy peasant dance rhythm was well accented. The Trio seemed a trifle slower than usual and the last movement was marred by a fuzzy attack. Otherwise it was good Haydn. It was interesting to compare Bernstein's conducting style last night with that which he employed on his previous visit. Last night's performance was smooth and well controlled. There were no excessive dramatics and very little in the way of superfluous direction.

Hearing one's own music from an orchestra places one outside the range of the average performing musician. Bernstein seemed to be completely absorbed in his work. The fun of conducting his own score apparently was enjoyed to the utmost. "Facsimile" is a transparent, disconnected piece of writing which is as its title suggests, bits of thematic material passed from choir to choir, sometimes for solo instruments and then again for groups. An abundance of minor seconds prevailed in the accompaniment figures and for a moment in the broad climax, it was almost a Copland echo. The orchestra gave a good performance of the difficult music and seemed to be able to encompass the rhythmic pitfalls safely. Especially clear and effective were the parts for piano in this score.

Copland's "Danzon Cubano" is more mature writing than the Bernstein "Facsimile," but that may only seem to be true because it was faintly familiar. Its pulse could be measured and it had Latin color in its instrumentation. We should be grateful to the Rochester Philharmonic for giving us the chance to hear contemporary American music of symphonic proportions. The audience was most appreciative of their work and of Bernstein's interesting interpretations.

Leonard Bernstein is an excellent pianist and in spite of our fervent disapproval of stunt performances (the business of taking dual roles of conductor and soloist), his Beethoven concerto was delightfully performed. We recall a similar performance with the Rochester Orchestra and Iturbi which we thought was pretty futile. Bernstein can play and conduct for this listener any day. He does it simply and conclusively. The beauty of his tone and the clarity of his scale passages were never obscured by the orchestra and altogether, if one must hear this type of performance, Bernstein is our choice.

After continuous applause, the young conductor returned to conduct the miniature "Gavotte" from the Classical Symphony by Prokoffief. It was charming.

Chaminade Club Hears Barbara Troxell In "Morning Musical"

BY WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Chaminade Club of Providence presented Barbara Troxell, soprano, with Margaret Denison assisting at the piano, at a "Morning Musical" yesterday forenoon. The audience filled Froebel Hall almost to capacity.

The program:

I
If Music be the Food of Love	Purcell
Where the Bee Sucks	Arne
She never Told Her Love	Haydn
Sailor Song	Haydn
II
Botschaft	Brahms
Von Ewiger Lieber	Brahms
Der Jage	Brahms
Freundlische Vision	Strauss
Cacelie	Strauss
III
Vert	Debussy
Reeveillement	Debussy
Jewel Song from "Faust"	Gounod
IV
Thy Dark Eyes to Mine	Griffes
There Shall be More Joy	Nordoff
Sure on This Shinning Night	Barber
XX Century	Sargaent

Miss Troxell was admirably able to present this particular program. To begin with, she sang with no apparent concern over the prospect of presenting another recital last night in Wilmington, Del., and her poise found no obstacles in shifting from the 17th to the 20th Century in musical style. The early Purcell showed clear diction, and the diction was flawless throughout the entire program. Haydn was displayed in both sad and rather gay moods equally well.

The lieder group was especially satisfying. The use of so-called "covered" tone here was just about perfect. We are still inclined to use Maggie Teyte as a standard for the French songs, but they came off very well by any standard.

Miss Denison provided balanced and sympathetic support everywhere, with the possible exception of the Gounod aria. The piano seldom makes an adequate substitute for the orchestra in cases where the aria is very familiar.

Encores included "Vergebliches Standchen" by Brahms, following the aria, and "The Little Brother's Lullaby"—a Flemish folk tune arranged by Brooks—plus "Loch Lomond" at the end.

Mrs. Harold J. Pearce, president of the Chaminade Club, introduced the artists. Mrs. Charles H. Durfee, Mrs. Robert N. Foote, and Mrs. Chester A. Ruoff were hostesses.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAR 7 - 1947

Koussevitzky Gets Interim Injunction

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has obtained from Associate Justice Albert Cohn of the Appellate Division an interim injunction restraining publication and delivery of the biographical book "Koussevitzky," written by Moses Smith.

The action, taken yesterday, was an appeal by the conductor from a ruling by Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag denying a temporary injunction and holding that Koussevitzky's privacy had not been invaded. The suit was brought against Allen, Towne & Heath Inc., publishers, and the Arco Publishing Company, distributors.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

MAR 7 - 1947

Biography and the Right to Privacy.

Supreme Court Justice BERNARD L. SHIENTAG's opinion in the Koussevitzky case is of interest to others besides the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the author and the publishers of an unauthorized biography of KOUSSEVITZKY. The precise question raised by the effort to enjoin publication of the biography "has never been decided in this State," Justice SHIENTAG says. He holds that the right of privacy statute, enacted more than forty years ago, "does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character." The appearance of incorrect statements in an unauthorized biography does not in itself make the work fictional. In other cases, in which the precise question of the Koussevitzky case was not raised, the State courts have held that the right-of-privacy law does not apply to informative or educational articles which make use of the names or pictures of living persons.

Justice SHIENTAG found that the unauthorized biography—the work of MOSES SMITH—contained "many depreciatory statements . . . invariably followed by ameliorative observations of unreserved praise." Possibly this mixture, common enough in biographies, did not disturb KOUSSEVITZKY so much as the likelihood that prior publication of an unauthorized biography might affect the fortunes of the autobiography that he contemplates writing. But if the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra uses the pen with the skill with which he uses a baton, no biography of him, authorized or unauthorized, will be able to compete successfully with his autobiography.

Santa Monica, Cal.
Outlook

Koussevitzky Holds Up Biography Publication

NEW YORK (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, has obtaine from Associate Justice Alber Cohn of the Appellate Division a interim injunction restrainin publication and delivery of th biographical book, "Kousse vitzky," written by Moses Smith

---

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 7 - 1947

COURT AIDS KOUSSEVITZKY

Interim Injunction Is Granted in Fight on Book Sales

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, obtained yesterday from Associate Justice Albert Cohn of the Appellate Division an "interim injunction" restraining publication and delivery of the biographical book "Koussevitzky," written by Moses Smith.

The injunction will remain in effect until Friday, March 14, accord to Henry Root Stern, attorney for Mr. Koussevitzky. He said that on that day the Appellate Division will hear an appeal by Mr. Koussevitzky from a ruling by Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag that denied a motion for a temporary injunction.

In his suit Mr. Koussevitzky charged that the book invaded his rights of privacy and named as defendants Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., publishers, and the Arco Publishing Company, distributors. Justice Shientag held that the conductor's privacy had not been invaded.

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

MAR 7 - 1947

Book on Koussevitzky Enjoined to March 14

Henry Root Stern, counsel for Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said yesterday he had obtained an intermediate injunction restraining publication and delivery of the biographical book "Koussevitzky," by Moses Smith.

Mr. Stern said the injunction was issued by Associate Justice Albert Cohn of the Appellate Division and would remain in effect until March 14, when the Appellate Division will hear an appeal by Dr. Koussevitzky from a ruling by Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag on Tuesday.

At that time Justice Shientag refused to grant a temporary injunction restraining the book. Dr. Koussevitzky has charged that the book invades his right of privacy.

HENDERSONVILLE, N. C.
TIMES NEWS

MAR 8 - 1947

NEW YORK, March. 8. (U.P.)—The first performance anywhere of "The Song of Songs," a biblical solo cantata by the 24-year-old American composer, Lukas Foss, was given at Symphony Hall, Boston, on March 7.

The solist with Serge Kousseevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Ellabelle Davis, negro soprano, for whom the work was commissioned by the League of Composers. She was selected by the league as "the outstanding American singer of the year."

Dr. Koussevitzky has scheduled four repeat performances of the work in Boston and New York during the week after the premiere. Another performance will be given over the American Broadcasting network on March 11 at 8:30 p. m. EST.

Gian-Carlo Menotti's newest opera, a light little piece called "The Telephone," has been given its first performances at the Hecksher Theater in New York by the Ballet Society. It won immediate favor with its audiences.

"The Telephone" has only two characters and takes about twenty minutes to perform. It is about a young man trying desperately to propose to his girl but the incessant ringing of the telephone keeps interrupting. He finally goes out to the corner drug store and proposes by telephone, with success.

The plot is essentially a vaudeville Skit. The action and the music bubble with fun, and they are expertly joined together. "The Telephone" was given as part of a double bill with Menotti's longer work, "The Medium," which had its premiere at Columbia University last spring. This was a much better staged performance and pointed up the excellent drama which Menotti has devised. Both operas bring home Menotti's fl[illegible] for dramtic writing, both as librettist and composer.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 8 - 1947

~~Boston Symphony~~ To Offer Cantata

New Work by Lukas Foss, Pianist of Orchestra, to be Given Eight Performances.

Boston, March 6 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, noted for introducing new music to America, starts tomorrow the fullest introductory program in its 66-year history for any single work—a cantata by its 24-year-old pianist.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has scheduled eight performances in nine days for the Biblical work "The Song of Songs" by German-born Lukas Foss, official pianist for the orchestra since 1944.

At a rehearsal of the work for orchestra and soprano soloist, Dr. Koussevitzky told the young composer:

"This work alone would keep your name alive."

The eight consecutive introductory performances—at Smith college, Yale, New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn—establish a new record for a new work by the orchestra. It played first for the nation the latest works of such Americans as Roy Harris and Aaron Copeland and the Russians, Shostakovitch and Prokofieff.

Foss was born in Berlin, came to this country at the age of 15 and studied at the Curtis institute in Philadelphia and with composer Paul Hindemith at Yale.

His father is Martin Foss, professor of philosophy at Haverford college, Haverford, Penn., and his mother a painter, Hilda Foss.

The young composer's first work to be played by the Boston symphony was performed when he was [illegible] symphonic "The Prairie" to the poem by Carl Sandburg.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 8 - 1947

Foss Biblical Cantata To Be Presented Here

Boston Symphony Orchestra Brings Negro Soprano Ellabelle Davis as Featured Artist for Monday Concert

The major 1946-47 commission by the League of Composers, a Biblical solo cantata from the pen of the 24-year-old American Composer Lukas Foss, will be given its premiere hearing in John M. Greene hall, Northampton, Monday evening, March 10th, with Ellabelle Davis, the distinguished American Negro soprano for whom the work was especially written, as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky. The performance here follows by three days the world-premiere performance at Symphony hall, Boston, on Friday, March 7th, and is one of eight performances of the work by Miss Davis with Dr. Koussevitzky during a period of only nine days—the first time in the history of his association with the Boston Symphony that Koussevitzsky has attached sufficient importance to a soloist and a piece of music to schedule them in this way.

Entitled "The Song of Songs" and using as its text four passages from the Biblical book, the cantata, written by Mr. Foss during the summer of 1946, represents the 70th commission by the League of Composers to an outstanding contemporary musician and honors the 25th anniversary of the league. It bears a dedication to Ellabelle Davis, who was singled out by the league as "the oustanding American singer of the year," and the composer's choice of the classic utterances of the Queen of Sheb as lyrics is a further gesture t the singer in that she and th Old Testament queen are d scendants of the same race.

Although she will be ap ing for the first time with Koussevitzsky and the Bo Symphony this week, Miss has been soloist during the three seasons with many country's other leading sy ic aggregations, includi New York Philharmonic phony, the NBC Symphon Philadelphia Orchestra, th neapolis Symphony, the apolis Symphony, the Symphony and the Erie P monic.

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

MAR 8 - 1947

KOUSSEVITSKY CASE

While Kathleen Winsor's Forever Amber professedly bores the court and witnesses as the first major trial of a book, as distinguished from the author, publisher or seller, proceeds in Boston toward a doubtful outcome, a New York state supreme court judge makes progress in the tangled jungles of literary censorship. He has ruled that publication of Moses Smith's four-dollar, 400-page biography of Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, does not violate the state's civil rights law.

The conductor had claimed not only that the book impugned his loyalty and slandered a lifetime of work, but also that publication of it without authorization from himself invaded his civil rights. Judge Shientag originally granted an interim stay prohibiting publication and distribution, pending a study of the facts and law. The new ruling Tuesday leaves Mr. Koussevitsky the right to appeal and also to seek redress in the courts for alleged libel against himself.

The lower court decision appears to clear up for the time being at least a troublesome point. The civil rights law forbids the use "for advertising purposes, or for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait or picture of any living person" without that person's consent. If this law were to be applied to straight nonfiction biography of living persons, it would raise havoc with freedom of the press.

What, for example, would happen when a newspaper or magazine wanted to publish a biographical sketch of any living person? Unless the subject of the biography approved the material in advance publication could be prohibited. That would be a tyrannical form of censorship and would be a serious invasion of the ordinary rights of freedom of the press.

THE PR

The author a Serge Koussevi phony orchest sevitzky. The junction agains book (which he that the text an privacy. His la they would publ

This injunction ate an alarming mune to all but a musician, bosses, congre

We hope tha eminence will accept tages of tion.

SYMPHONY

This Clipping From
EDWARDSVILLE, ILL.
INTELLIGENCER

MAR 8 - 1947

THE PRIVACY OF A PUBLIC FIGURE

The author and publisher of a new biography of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been sued for libel by Koussevitzky. The conductor has also asked a court injunction against publication and distribution of the book (which he says is unauthorized) on the grounds [illegible] text and photographs are an invasion of his privacy. His lawyers have advised newspapers that they would publish reviews at their "peril and risk."

The injunction, if granted and upheld, would create an alarming precedent. Anyone might be immune to all but personally-authorized publicity. If a musician, why not also lawyers, judges, political bosses, congressmen, presidents?

We hope that Doctor Koussevitzky, whose artistic eminence makes him something of a public figure, will accept the annoyances as well as the advantages of his position and reconsider his legal action.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

MAR 8 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lost a fast first round in his legal battle to suppress an unauthorized biography by Critic Moses Smith, which was published a few weeks ago, then was withdrawn. In New York this week Supreme Court Justice Bernard L. Shientag refused to issue an injunction against the book's publication, on a petition by the conductor charging invasion of rights of privacy. The judge's opinion in the case, first of its kind in New York State, declared that "the right of privacy statute does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character." Although Koussevitzky's attorneys will appeal the decision, David Ewen, director of Allen, Towne & Heath, publishers, called it "a triumph for the rights of critics and the publishing world to that freedom of speech which is basic to the concept of democracy." The company is expected to release copies of the book for distribution immediately.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Boston Symphony program is a curious affair and hardly to be recommended to those who insist upon the tried and true, although as far as Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony is concerned, we have heard it all before, if not in that particular order. This work, written a dozen years ago and adding nothing to its composer's reputation, is merely a local novelty, whereas the next number, Lukas Foss' "The Song of Songs," for soprano and orchestra, Ellabelle Davis, soloist, received yesterday its first performance anywhere.

It was not the happiest thought on Dr. Koussevitzky's part to follow this new and sometimes unconventional music with Stravinsky's acidulous "Symphony of Psalms." In these performances the choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society are replacing the Cecilia Society, which had been utilized in the six preceding performances in Symphony Hall.

There is not much more to be said about Rachmaninoff's Symphony except to express a certain surprise that, having put it off so long, Dr. Koussevitzky finally thought it was incumbent upon him to perform it here. The music is agreeable, effectively orchestrated and hopelessly unoriginal. Anyway, we probably won't have to hear it again.

Mr. Foss, now in the middle of his 25th year, is an enormously gifted young man with an impressive list of work to his credit, including a Symphony, that Boston has not yet heard. In this, his second Biblical cantata, the Symphony Orchestra's official pianist has gone to the King James version of "The Song of Solomon" for his text. He has set these marvelous lines with great care, being sure that each word received its due, and Miss Davis yesterday sang them as painstakingly. But only here and there did Mr. Foss seem to capture the real spirit of the text. He began effectively and ended impressively, though in the closing passage he has resorted to the emphasis of understatement.

But much of the text, which is frankly voluptuous and seeming to call for an Eastern luxuriance of musical utterance, has been set in a fashion quite at variance with the sense of the words. Mr. Foss might have taken Goldmark for his model but he has gone to Bach instead, with hints of Stravinsky, whose own asceticism was to come immediately afterward. In his case it is, of course, perfectly appropriate. There are passages in "The Symphony of Psalms" that set your teeth on edge, and the suave third movement, which comes to nearly everyone as a blessed relief, is uncomfortably like the Te Deum in Puccini's "Tosca"—as has been already noted. Taken as a whole, it is still one of the striking creations of our time and yesterday everybody concerned in the performance deserved the highest praise.

[illegible]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitsky conducted the first perforance of Lukas Foss' remarkable new Biblical Cantata, "The Song of Songs," at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program began with Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony, new to Boston, and ended with the "Symphony of Psalms" by Stravinsky, in which a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society participated.

"The Song of Songs" is a setting of some of the woman's verses from the Old Testament book, The Song of Solomon. The solo part is for soprano, and at these performances is sung with admirable skill and high beauty of expression by the young Negro artist Ellabelle Davis.

Mr. Foss has woven orchestra and voice together into an organic musical texture, but the writing for voice is truly vocal and it is also sensitive and poetic. In the first of his four movements, the composer suceeds in doing what some contemporaries evidently cannot, and that is to achieve a sense of orchestral motion without writing mechanical "pattern" music. The soprano part of the slower third and fourth movements is decorated with long chromatic figurations which recall the ancient Oriental ancestry of Jewish music. Over the score as a whole hovers a spirit of richness and of Hebraic grandeur.

The orchestration fits the strictly modern style, and it clothes Mr. Foss' bold, but logical dissonance with color. But the most important thing about "The Song of Songs" is its beauty of emotional expression; when you have finished admiring the skill of Mr. Foss' counterpoint and so on, you realize that what counts most is its musical communication of the youth, freshness and ardor of the verses out of the great canticle. From first to last, this is a song, and that is unusual in music today. Composer, soloist conductor and orchestra were enthusiastically applauded.

Although 10 years old, Rachmaninoff's Third Symphony had not found its way to Boston before. It is something of a disappointment, for in spite of its rich sounds, its intermittent Slavic warmth and the distinction of orchestral detail, it seems an overlong and contrived Symphony. It does not suggest inspiration. Nevertheless Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made it brilliant and there were some thrilling moments.

No doubt all went reasonably well in the performance of the "Symphony of Psalms." Nearly 17 years ago the score seemed to me dismal and dreary, static and sterile, and so it does to this day. A pity that bright, cheerful-looking young men and women from across the Charles should be put to praising God in such melancholy accents.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 8 - 1947

LEONARD BERNSTEIN (right) who will conduct the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in its concert Sunday afternoon at the Bushnell. Bernstein, seen here with Serge Koussevitzky, will teach at Berkshire Festival this summer.

This Clipping From
ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL CHRONICLE

MAR 9 - 1947

To Hold Berkshire Music Center Trials During This Week

Auditions for admission to the student orchestra and the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center will be held this week in New York by members of the faculty.

The Music Center will have a six week session at Tanglewood-Lennox, Mass., under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

All auditions, except tympani, will be held in Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, New York.

Orchestral instruments will be auditioned by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Wednesday, violin and viola at 10 a. m., violoncello, doublebass and harp at 11 a. m., woodwinds at 12 noon, and brass at 1 p. m.

Tympani auditions will be held back stage at Carnegie hall at 6:30 p. m. Wednesday.

Opera auditions will be conducted Saturday, March 15, and Sunday, March 16, from 9 a. m. to noon by Boris Goldovsky, Frederic Cohan and Felix Wolfes. An accompanist will be provided.

Applicants who wish to attend auditions should notify Thomas D. Perry Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Boston Symphony orchestra, Symphony hall, Boston 15, at least two days before the auditions.

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY

MAR 8 - 1947

Right of Privacy

A decision of far-reaching effect—providing it is upheld on appeal and there seems to be some indication that it will be appealed — was handed down the other day in New York state supreme court (about corresponding to the Connecticut superior court and with the appellate division and the court of appeals over it) in the case of Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, against Allen, Towne & Heath, Inc., issuers of the book, Koussevitzky. The orchestra conductor sought and obtained an injunction against the company, contending that the book, a biography by Moses Smith, Boston music critic, was an invasion of his private rights. The decision just issued was really an opinion, and it dissolved the interim stay issued earlier by the court. Koussevitzky's counsel announced that an appeal would be taken but the book went on sale on the strength of this supreme court decision.

The point involved is whether the subject of a biography can stop the issuance of the book about him, providing he is a public figure, by contending that it invades his privacy. The action was brought under the state civil rights law and is the first of its kind in New York state. It was, needless to say, not an authorized biography or the subject would not have objected to it. But Justice Bernard L. Shientag, the judge issuing the opinion, holds that the conductor is "well within the orbit of public interest and scrutiny," that the book is clearly not fictional in character, that the privacy statute "does not apply to an unauthorized biography of a public figure unless the biography is fictional or novelized in character."

In fact the judge holds that "Curiously enough, although there are many deprecatory statements (in the book), they seem to be invariably followed by ameliorative observations or unreserved praise. . . . There is nothing repugnant to one's sense of decency or that takes the book out of the realm of legitimate dissemination of information on a subject of general interest." Of course, says the judge, there may be statements in the book that are untrue—and the court obviously cannot test each statement for truth—but "the plaintiff must be left to his remedy at law for redress as to any matters contained in the book, or the advertisements thereof, which are shown to be libelous." But the judge says he finds "no so-called revelations of any intimate details which would tend to outrage public tolerance," even though Koussevitzky, "if at all sensitive about those things," may find some statements in the book "highly objectionable."

The importance of the decision is reasonably clear. If the consent of subjects of biographies had to be obtained in advance on the material in books written about them, many revealing biographies would never be attempted at all during their lifetimes. The remedy, in case of libel of any subject of a biography, is apparent enough. The author and the publisher may be sued, and considerable damages recovered if the injury to the reputation of the individual is of any significance. Upholding Koussevitzky's claim, in this case, would mean that no critical analysis of any individual could safely be published without his consent. And obviously a man so much in the public eye as the famous orchestra conductor must expect public interest in his life and career.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD STAR

MAR 8 - 1947

SOPRANO Ellabelle Davis, who gave the world-premiere performance of Lukas Foss' biblical solo cantata, "The Song of Songs," with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gets some last-minute pointers on the score from Mr. Foss, who wrote the work especially for her on a commission from the League of Composers.

Ellabelle Davis Gives Premiere Of Biblical Solo Cantata

Miss Ellabelle Davis of 89 Horton Avenue, soprano, gave the world-premiere performance yesterday and will give seven subsequent hearings within eight days, of Lukas Foss' biblical solo cantata, "The Song of Songs," with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The major 1946-47 commission by the League of Composers, the cantata by the 24-year-old American composer, was heard under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky yesterday in Boston's Symphony Hall. It will be given its first New York presentation Wednesday night and again Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Miss Davis will also sing the Foss work in Northampton, Mass., Monday night, in New Haven, Conn., Tuesday night from where it will be broadcast nationally, in Philadelphia Thursday night and in the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday.

Using as its text four passages from the biblical book, the cantata is dedicated to Miss Davis, who was singled out by the League in 1946 as the "outstanding American singer of the year."

Although she is appearing with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony for the first time, Miss Davis has been soloist during the past three seasons with the New York Philharmonic, the NBC Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Minneapolis, Indianapolis and Denver symphonies and the Erie Philharmonic. She has also filled more than 30 recital engagements from coast to coast during the 1946-47 season following her operatic debut as "Aida" in Mexico City last Summer when she became the first American Negro ever to be starred by a major opera company.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 9 - 1947

Berkshire Center

Auditions Will Be Held Here During Coming Week

Auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music Center's student orchestra and Opera Department will be held here this week by members of the Center's faculty. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold auditions for instrumentalists next Wednesday morning and early afternoon in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, as follows: violin and viola, 10 o'clock; cello, double-bass, harp, 11 o'clock; woodwinds, noon, and brass, 1 o'clock. Auditions for tympanists will be held Wednesday afternoon at 6:30 backstage at Carnegie Hall.

